43016

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART
FINANCE

FOUNDED 1865

43016

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

VOLUME CXVII

FROM JULY 4, 1923, TO DECEMBER 26, 1923

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

43016

INDEX TO VOLUME CXVII

JULY 4, 1923, TO DECEMBER 26, 1923

(Nos. 3026-3051)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

| | |
|---|---|
| A | Art |
| C | Correspondence |
| D | Drama |
| Dt | Driftway |
| E | Editorial Article |
| EP | Editorial Paragraph |
| F | Fiction |
| I | International Relations, Documents |
| IP | International Relations, Foreign Press |
| IS | International Relations, Signed Article |
| M | Music |
| P | Poetry |
| S | Signed Article |

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

A

- Æ. See Russell, George W.
- Academic freedom
  - Monkeying; E .... 104
  - Positions at Amherst refused; EP .... 49
- Aerial warfare. See Aeronautics, Military
- Aeronautics. See also Airships
- Aeronautics, Commercial
  - British service to India; EP .... 255
- Aeronautics, Military
  - "Air week" in Russia; EP .... 75
  - American legion weekly proposal; EP .... 226
  - Bombing of Waziris, Haitians, etc.; EP .. 49
  - Next war code; EP .... 1
- Africa
  - Democratization possibilities; EP .... 178
- Africa. See also Kenya
- Agriculture—Economic aspects
  - Pebbles in the farmer's boots. H. G. Andrews; S .... 345
- Agriculture—Economic aspects. See also Land tenure
- Airships
  - ZR-1 passes over New York; EP .... 311
- Akins, Zoë
  - Royal fandango. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D .... 614
- Alabama
  - After Florida, Alabama; E .... 31
- Alien property. See Enemy property
- Aliens
  - Violent aliens; E .... 427
- Allen, F. H.
  - Price of gasoline; C .... 117, 217
- Allen, Harbor
  - Missing most of Europe; S .... 343
- Allinson, Brent
  - German youth and the pagan gods; S .... 296
- Alvord, Clarence Walworth
  - Francis Parkman; S .... 394
- American civil liberties union
  - Letter to Ku Klux klan; EP .... 311
  - Protecting our liberties. U. Sinclair; S .. 9
- American civil liberties union, California
  - Casuistry and strategy. C. J. Taft; C .... 526
- American express company
  - Paris employee acquitted; EP .... 425
- American federation of labor
  - Portland convention; EP .... 424
- American Jewish joint distribution committee
  - Helping Russia help herself; I .... 694
- American legion
  - Changing policies; EP .... 476
- American mercury
  - New Nathan-Mencken monthly; EP .... 207
- American review. New bimonthly; EP .... 75
- Amherst college
  - Amherst graduate's answer. E. Glass; C .. 39
  - Chapter ends at Amherst; E .... 5
  - Faculty positions refused and resigned; EP .... 49, 339
  - Issues at Amherst. J. M. Gaus; S .... 12
- Andrews, H. G.
  - Pebbles in the farmer's boots; S .... 345
- Anti-Semitism. See Jews—Political and social conditions
- Appeal to America by fifteen leaders of British thought; S .... 163
- Apponyi, Count Albert
  - Count Albert Apponyi. O. Jaszi; S .... 376
- Arabia Deserta. M. Van Doren; S .... 648
- Arbitration and conciliation, Industrial
  - No accepted code of "justice"; EP .... 225
- Architecture
  - New architecture. H. S. Churchill; S .... 552
- Argentina
  - Is Pan-Americanism a joke—on us? A Pan-American journalist; S .... 683
  - Military appropriation; EP .... 128, 541, 620
- Arkansas
  - Arkansas's literary reputation. E. D. Tittmann; C .... 89
  - Euterpe in Arkansas. E. S. Kelley; C .... 463
  - Mob violence; EP .... 74
- Art
  - About art. H. J. Seligmann; C .... 384
  - Confession and photography; E .... 182
- Artists and models; D .... 273
- Asch, Sholom
  - Wiles of destiny; (story) .... 59
- Asia
  - Democratization prospects; EP .... 178
- Austria
  - Austria saved; E .... 132
  - Cause of Austria's fall and rise. H. Kanner; C .... 241
- Autumn foliage; Dt .... 555
- Azertis, Lorenzo de
  - Casanova. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D .... 412

B

- B., W.
  - Why modern cream is thin; C .... 608
- Babies
  - Bonuses for boys; Dt .... 635
- Baldwin, Oliver. "Comrade Oliver"; EP .... 677
- Baldwin, Stanley
  - "Back to Disraeli"; EP .... 28
- Les ballets suédois; D .... 718
- Bandits
  - Twilight of a noble art; E .... 729
- Bankers; Dt .... 115
- Banks and banking—Philippine Islands
  - Report on National bank; EP .... 205
- Banks and banking, Trade union
  - Labor and its money; E .... 545
  - Opening of third New York bank; EP .... 477
- Baptists
  - Case of the fundamentalists; E .... 729
- Barbusse, Henri
  - Indicted for speech to Ex-service men; EP. 676
  - The woman; (story) .... 262
- Bare almond trees. D. H. Lawrence; P .... 393
- Barker, Thomas
  - Kuzbas indictments. T. Barker; C .... 491
- Barnum, Phineas Taylor
  - Barnum and Cook; E .... 624
- Basanta Koomar Roy
  - British raj dethrones the maharaja of Nabha; IS .... 446
- Baseball
  - Branch of big business; EP .... 451
- Battistini, Mattia
  - Battistini. P. Sanborn; M .... 248
- Bausman, Frederick
  - Imperishable Fielding; C .... 89
- Becker, Agnes E.
  - Some sins of omission; C .... 582
- Bercovici, Konrad
  - Greatest Jewish city in the world; S .... 259
- Berkes, Theodor
  - Revolutionary days in Bulgaria; S .... 37
- Besier, Rudolf, and M. Edgington
  - Lesson in love. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D .... 412
- Billers. A. Hamilton; P .... 437
- Birkenhead, Frederick Edwin Smith, 1st viscount
  - Criticism of Woodrow Wilson; EP .... 225
- Birth. J. Rorty; P .... 553
- Birth control
  - Chicago clinic case; EP .... 620
  - Is this the fact? or this? B. A. K. and A. H. M.; C .... 464
  - N. Y. Clinical research bureau; EP .... 700
  - Questions for birth controllers. H. C. Dekker; C .... 355
- Blacktail row. Liu Yü-hsi; P .... 645
- Blackwell, Alice Stone
  - Appeal for clemency; C .... 741
  - Mr. Stuart Chase's Junk; C .... 116
  - Woman's 75-year fight; S .... 53
- Blake, Aldrich
  - Oklahoma's klan-fighting governor; S .... 353
- Blanshard, Paul
  - Mussolini starts a war; S .... 325
  - The Pennsylvania's war on labor; S .... 79
- Bloomfield, Leonard
  - Mr. Stuart Chase's Junk; C .... 116
- Boat races
  - Race of fishing vessels; EP .... 543
- Bodenheim, Maxwell
  - To a baby; P .... 185
  - Two portraits; P .... 10
- Bok, Edward W.
  - Prize offer for peace plan; EP .... 27
- Bolton, Guy
  - Chicken feed. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D .... 412
- Bonuses, Soldiers'. See Soldiers' bonuses
- Books and reading
  - On rereading; E .... 257
- Books for Germany. B. Watson and G. Huebener; C .... 355
- Borah, William Edgar
  - Free speech, the vital issue; S .... 8
- Boston newspapers
  - Boston, a journalistic poor-farm. O. G. Villard; S .... 109
- Bostwick, Arthur E.
  - Company dinner for Lloyd George; C .... 525
- Bowerman, George F.
  - Intellectual Washington; C .... 439
- Boy scouts of Kenya
  - "Men of the trees"; E .... 229
- Boys and the presidency; EP .... 49
- Breaking point. M. R. Rinehart; D .... 273
- Brewer, Joseph
  - Spectator and Mr. Massingham; C .... 384
- Brewster, Dorothy
  - Lenin and the prize pig; S .... 510
- Brite, Mary D.
  - Anyhow Debs spoke in Cincinnati; S .... 87
- Britnell, George E.
  - Educational reaction in Canada; C .... 166
- Brooks, Van Wyck
  - Receives Dial literary award; EP .... 727
- Broun, Heywood
  - Heywood Broun; S .... 372
- Brown, W. T.
  - Books for San Quentin; C .... 327
  - Reading for political prisoners; C .... 89
- Bulgaria
  - Bulgarian communists; I .... 334
  - Counter-revolution; EP .... 338, 424
  - Revolution in Bulgaria; I .... 388
  - Revolutionary days in Bulgaria. T. Berkes; S .... 37
  - Russia and the Bulgarian reaction; I .... 447
- Bullitt, Agatha Marshall
  - German Samson; S .... 344
- Burman, Ben Lucien
  - Kentucky, where men die standing; S .... 83
- Butler, Nicholas Murray
  - Mistaken for a Southerner; EP .... 75
- Byington, Steven T.
  - Another dastardly outrage; C .... 165
  - Gum and the army; C .... 463
  - That typical American dinner; C .... 687
- Bynner, Witter, and Kiang Kang-hu, translators
  - Thousand years ago; P .... 645

C

- C., J. A.
  - Sailor's offer; C .... 555
- Cabinet officers. See United States—Cabinet
- Cabot family
  - Protests use of name; EP .... 207
- Cain, James M.
  - West Virginia, a mine-field melodrama. Rest of West Virginia. F. K. Viner; C. 354
- Caine, Hall
  - Hall Caine up to date; E .... 78
- California
  - Casuistry and strategy. C. J. Taft; C .... 526
  - Persecution of I. W. W.; EP .... 100
  - Protecting our liberties. U. Sinclair; S .. 9
- California. See also Los Angeles
- California university
  - Fees; correction .... 439
  - Fees for non-residents and foreigners; EP. 309
- Call, C. F.
  - Why the Negro emigrates; C .... 490
- Calvert, Louis. Obituary; EP .... 101
- Camel's back. S. Maugham; D .... 614
- Canada
  - Protected bison herd; EP .... 477
  - Vengeance: Eskimo and official; EP .... 595
  - Where Canada leads; E .... 342
- Capital punishment
  - Sing Sing warden opposes; EP .... 366
- Carb, David, and W. P. Eaton
  - Queen Victoria. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D .... 672
- Carpenter, Edward Childs
  - Connie goes home. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D .... 331

Cartoon, from Projektor, Moscow.........516, 520
Casanova. L. de Azertis; D.................... 412
Cather, Willa Sibert
  Nebraska; the end of the first cycle; S.. 236
Cecil, Lord Robert
  Removal to House of Lords; EP.......... 594
Censorship
  Film censors and other morons; E........ 678
  Naked challenge; E........................ 229
Cézanne, Paul
  Cézanne. T. Scott; A...................... 172
Chains. J. E. Goodman; D.................... 359
Chaliapin, Feodor
  "Let freedom ring!" S. Potashnick; C... 18
Changelings. L. W. Dodd; D................. 359
Chase, Stuart
  Etiquette of big business; C............. 383
  Mr. Stuart Chase's Junk. C. F. Dole, L. Bloomfield, A. P. Weiss, A. S. Blackwell; C.............................. 116
  Was Mencken right?; C..................... 88
Chass, Ben
  Nation clubs; C............................ 355
Chaulmoogra oil
  U. S. experiment station to cultivate; EP. 311
Chauve souris. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D.... 304
Chicago
  Illinois, first province of the middle kingdom. H. V. O'Brien; S.................. 186
  Justice to Chicago. L. A. Mead; C...... 491
Chicken feed. G. Bolton; D.................. 412
Child labor—United States
  New Jersey conditions; EP................ 309
Child prodigies
  Rota Rinaldi, composer; EP............... 3
Children—Management and training
  Parents: gods, policemen or friends?; E. 210
Children of the moon. M. Flavin; D.......... 273
Chile
  Chileans condemn "Yankee justice"; I.... 26
China
  Chinese situation in a nutshell. N. Peffer; C ........................................ 89
  Joint note of powers on bandits; EP..... 177
China—Politics and government
  China's newest president. B. L. Kuhn; S. 735
  Model governor in Shansi; EP........... 477
Church
  Christ and the church today. W. Perkins; C ........................................ 117
  Remedy for its difficulties; Dt............ 739
Church. See also Fundamentalism
Church advertising; EP......................... 701
Churchill, Henry S.
  New architecture; S........................ 552
Cincinnati
  Anyhow Debs spoke in Cincinnati. M. D. Brite; S.................................... 87
Citizenship
  Woman without a country; E............. 730
Citizenship conference
  White, protestant, and dry. W. Hard; S. 461
Civic federation takes up economics; EP...... 179
Civilization
  Twilight of civilization; E............... 426
Clark, Jane Perry
  Mental overfeeding; C...................... 39
Clark university
  Enrolment decreases; EP.................. 339
  Retirement of president demanded; EP... 568
Clifford, John. Obituary; EP................ 621
Clothing and dress
  Another dastardly outrage. S. T. Byington; C........................................ 165
  Tailored clothes and success; Dt.......... 266
Clowns
  Death of Al Miaco; EP.................... 282
  Elijah and the clowns. L. A. Mischkind; C ........................................ 525
Coal industry—United States
  Coal characters. W. Hard; S............. 294
  Coal commission report; EP......47, 281, 338
  Coal strike is not settled; E.............. 314
  Coal, the public's responsibility; E....... 181
  Great joke about coal; E.................. 596
  Pinchot strike conference; EP........225, 281
  Prices and profits; EP..................... 542
  The real problem; EP...................... 253
Coal miners
  How "news" is made. A newspaper man. 160
Cobweb boy. R. L. Wolf; P.................... 607
Colbron, Grace Isabel
  "Prurient prude"; C....................... 241
Coleman, McAlister
  Oklahoma talks back; C................... 195
  When the troops took Tulsa; S.......... 239
College graduates
  University and marriage; E.............. 183
College students
  Languid generation; E.................... 572
  Lively generation. C. Mott-Smith; C..... 688
Colleges and universities—Canada
  Educational reaction in Canada. G. E. Britnell; C.................................. 166
Colleges and universities—Europe
  Anti-Semitism in European universities. M. Lowenthal; S......................... 547
Colleges and universities—Japan. See also Waseda university
Colleges and universities—United States
  Easley to the rescue. H. C. Herring; S. 193
  International missionaries; E.............. 505
  "Log" unseats "Mark Hopkins." F. L. Pattee; S..................................... 55
  Mental overfeeding. J. P. Clark; C...... 39
  Monkeying; E................................ 104
  Stray thoughts on a college pilgrimage. W. A. Robson; S......................... 108
  Youth and the American colleges. N. Thomas; S.................................. 106
Colleges and universities—United States. See also Amherst college; California university; Clark university; Dartmouth college; Delaware university; New York university; Princeton university
Colum, Padraic
  Promise of Irish letters; S............... 396
Commencement addresses; EP................ 3
Communist party (Bulgaria)
  Bulgarian communists; I.................. 334
Communist party (Germany)
  Communists in Saxony and Thuringia; I.. 538
Composers, League of; EP.................... 543
Conduct of life
  Mr. Stuart Chase's Junk. C. F. Dole, L. Bloomfield, A. P. Weiss, A. S. Blackwell; C ....................................... 116
Connelly, Marc, and G. S. Kaufman
  Deep-tangle wildwood. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D.............................. 614
Connie goes home. E. C. Carpenter; D...... 331
Conscientious objectors
  Conscientious objectors and the army intelligence tests. E. A. Lincoln; S.... 523
Contempt of court
  Craig case and contempt evil; EP.594, 619, 675
  Justice Hagerty demands apology; EP.... 699
Convict labor
  After Florida, Alabama; E................ 31
Cook, Frederick A.
  Barnum and Cook; E....................... 624
Coolidge, Calvin
  Calvin Coolidge; made by a myth; E.... 153
  Chooses C. B. Slemp as secretary; EP.... 205
  Coal characters. W. Hard; S............ 294
  Coolidge's country. W. Hard; S.......... 380
  His presidency delights army officers; EP. 178
  Honeymoon. W. Hard; S.................... 320
  President and the progressives; E........ 703
  Who would not take a chance? R. W. M.; C ....................................... 267
Cooperation
  Russian cooperatives; I.................... 536
Cooperative colonies
  Inside a cooperative colony. E. S. Wooster; S.................................. 378
Cooperative wholesale society, England
  Strike of workers; EP...................... 128
Cosmetics
  Have come into the open; Dt............ 216
  "Little red box of courage"; E........... 598
Coy, Harold
  More North Carolina journalism; C...... 242
Cream
  Why modern cream is thin. W. B.; C.. 608
Criticism, Literary. See Literary criticism
Crush, W. G.
  Jim Crowism; C............................ 298
Cuba
  Condemns American interference; EP.... 150
  Lotteries and railroads; EP.............. 206
Cumberland road; Dt............................ 162
Customs service—United States
  N. Y. employees' wages cut; EP......... 28
Cyrano de Bergerac. E. Rostand; D.......... 587
Czecho-Slovakia
  Agreement with France; EP............. 475

D

Dahlem, Franz
  France and the Rhineland; IP............ 333
Daniels, Josephus
  Josephus visits Boulder. Ex-private; C.. 267
Danziger, Samuel
  Mistreating our ex-service men; S........ 184
Dartmouth college
  Free speech at Dartmouth; EP........... 676
Das, Taraknath. See Taraknath Das
Davis, Arthur Powell
  Dismissal from Reclamation service; EP. 206
Davis, S. L.
  Worthy candidate; C...................... 583
Dazey, Frank, and L. Osmun
  Peter Weston. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ....................................... 359
Dead
  Posthumous exploitations co, ltd.; EP.... 543
Death-watch. V. Starrett; P.................. 111
Debs, Eugene Victor
  Anyhow Debs spoke in Cincinnati. M. D. Brite; S.................................... 87
Debts, Public
  Homely truth. B. M. Woodbridge; C.... 327
  Honor among allies; E.................... 599
Deep-tangle wildwood. G. S. Kaufman and M. Connelly; D.......................... 614
De Ford, Miriam Allen
  Some sins of omission; C................ 582
  "Vacation" at San Quentin; S............ 114
Dekker, H. C.
  Questions for birth controllers; C........ 355
Delaware university
  Experiment in foreign study; EP........ 75
De Leon, Solon
  Oklahoma talks back; C.................. 195
Dell, Robert
  Disaster impends in Germany; S.......... 133
  Poland, a danger spot; IS................ 96
De Pachmann, Vladimir
  De Pachmann solves some enigmas. H. Straus; M.............................. 303
  "Only real genius"; EP.................. 255
Deportation scandal. C. Holstein; C.......... 267
Design, Decorative
  Appeal for art in common things; EP.... 151
Dexter, Robert C.
  Gallic war in Rhode Island; S............ 215
Dial
  $2,000 award to Van Wyck Brooks; EP.. 727
Dickens, Harry
  Thanks to Nation readers; C............. 166
Dictators
  Day of the dictator; E.................... 312
Dinners and dining
  "American dinner"; Dt.................... 462
  Company dinner for Lloyd George. A. E. Bostwick; C............................. 525
  That "American dinner." J. Lee; C...... 491
  That typical American dinner. T. B. Tu, W. Fargher, S. T. Byington; C........ 687
  What is an "American dinner"?; E...... 428
  What Lloyd George missed. M. A. Owen; C ....................................... 555
  When we Americans dine: a symposium. W. A. White, H. L. Mencken, D. C. Seitz, E. E. Miller, B. Thompson, C. Wood, R. W. Kauffman, E. S. Sergeant; S.... 731
  Worthy candidate. S. L. Davis; C....... 583
Dirigibles. See Airships
Disarmament
  Two treaties ratified by U. S.; EP....... 226
Disasters. See also Earthquakes; Shipwrecks
Divorce
  Federal divorce law. G. Parkhurst; C.... 298
  Federal law receiving support; EP........ 129
  Matrimonial causes bill; EP.............. 101
Dodd, Lee Wilson
  Changelings. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D. 359
Dole, Charles F.
  Mr. Stuart Chase's Junk; C.............. 116
Dominican Republic
  Before the Pan-American bar. P. Hudicourt; S.................................... 54
  White terror in the West Indies. E. J. Irvine; C.................................. 242
Drake, J. Dennis
  American sailor speaks; C................ 491
Dreiser, Theodore
  Indiana, her soil and light; S............ 348
Dress. See Clothing and dress
Drum-beats. Lu Lun; P........................ 645
Du Bose, Clarence
  At noon Saturday; S...................... 522
Durkee, Harris S.
  Collars for the starving; C............... 636
Duse, Eleonora
  Eleonora Duse. L. Lewisohn; D.......... 562
Dwelling by a stream. Liu Tsung-Yüan; P.. 646

E

Earthquakes—Japan
  At noon Saturday. C. Du Bose; S....... 522
  Collars for the starving. H. S. Durkee; C. 636
  Earthquake and fire; EP.................. 253
  Recollaring the clergy. J. L. Fieser; C.. 741
  Japan refuses aid from Russia; EP...... 366
Eastman, Max
  Land of leisure; S......................... 515
Eaton, Walter Prichard, and D. Carb
  Queen Victoria. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ....................................... 672
Eclipses, Solar
  Insurance against rain; EP.............. 311
Edgington, May, and R. Besier
  Lesson in love. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ....................................... 412
Education—Russia
  In the house of the Sugar King. J. Smith; S ....................................... 518
Education—United States
  Gallic war in Rhode Island. R. C. Dexter; S ....................................... 215
  Old and new methods; Dt................ 437
  Richer—but happier?; E................. 313
Education—United States. See also Colleges and universities—United States; Public schools; Schools; Workers' education
Einstein, Albert
  Einstein and the League again. M. O. Hudson; C.............................. 242
  Resigns from League of nations committee; EP ....................................... 28
Elections—Germany
  Parties of despair profit by chaos; EP.... 127
Elections—Great Britain
  British elections; E....................... 597
  Labor's triumph in England; E.......... 702
  Lloyd George and Asquith reconciled; EP. 567
  Three party contest; EP.................. 675

- Elections—United States
  - Hearst and the N. Y. election; EP ...... 568
  - Sam B. Hill's election to congress; EP .. 365
- Elections—United States. See also Primaries, Presidential
- Ellis Island
  - British criticism of conditions; EP ...... 205
- Emerson, John, and A. Loos
  - Whole town's talking. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ...... 304
- Emery, Gilbert
  - Tarnish. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D .... 444
  - Are we Americans thieves?; E ...... 103
- Enemy property
  - Confiscation pure and simple. C. Nagel; C ...... 165
  - German dye patents. S. B. J.; C ...... 268
  - National honor; Hughes vs. Hamilton; E. 131
- Episcopal church. See Protestant Episcopal church
- Ervine, St. John
  - Mary, Mary, quite contrary. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ...... 331
- Europe
  - Europe in Washington. W. Hard; S ...... 521
  - Next war draws near. O. G. Villard; S .. 680
  - Only hope. O. G. Villard; S ...... 371
  - Slavery or self-extermination. B. Russell; S ...... 32
  - Treaties and loans; EP ...... 73, 475, 502, 727
  - Twilight of civilization; E ...... 426
  - Uncle Sam, hermit?; E ...... 130
  - United States of Europe. F. Toksvig; IS. 386
- Europe—Social conditions
  - Roots of the war—and of peace. H. Kessler; S ...... 191
- Europe and the United States
  - America in the fog; E ...... 544
  - Appeal to America, by fifteen leaders of British thought; S ...... 163
  - Europe in Washington. W. Hard; S ...... 521
  - Honor among allies; E ...... 599
  - Uncle Sam, hermit?; E ...... 130
- European war
  - Roots of the war—and of peace. Count H. Kessler; S ...... 191
  - 200 miles of books; EP ...... 503
  - Was militarism defeated?; EP ...... 450
- Evans, Luther
  - Accepts Klan challenge to speak; EP ...... 74
- Exemption from taxation. See Taxation, Exemption from
- Exile recalled. Liu Chang-Ch'ing; P ...... 645

F

- Failures. H. R. Lenormand; D ...... 692
- Far cry. Z. Gale; (story) ...... 112
- Farewell to a militarist. Liu Chang-Ch'ing; P 645
- Farewell to Li Tuan. Lu Lun; P ...... 646
- Fargher, William
  - That typical American dinner; C ...... 687
- Farmers
  - Pebbles in the farmer's boots. H. G. Andrews; S ...... 345
  - Those terrifying farmers. W. Hard; S .. 105
- Farms and pine trees; Dt ...... 382
- Farr, Albert
  - Extinct orphan; C ...... 555
- Fechenbach
  - German Dreyfus. A. Hohenlohe; C ...... 116
- Federal employees. See Government employees
- Fiction
  - Heroes; E ...... 51
  - Men, women, and books; E ...... 545
  - Reason in fiction; E ...... 453
- Fielding, Henry
  - Imperishable Fielding. F. Bausman; C .. 89
- Fieser, James L.
  - Recollaring the clergy; C ...... 741
- Finance
  - Draining Europe's liquid assets; EP ...... 700
- Finance. See also Debts, Public
- Finance—France
  - When the franc joins the mark. C. Southworth; S ...... 321
- Finance—Germany
  - Germany's capital; IP ...... 389
  - When the franc joins the mark. C. Southworth; S ...... 321
- Finance—Germany. See also Germany—Reparations
- Finance—Great Britain
  - Inflation as unemployment remedy; EP .. 476
- Fisher, Arthur
  - Montana, land of the copper collar; S .... 290
- Fisher, Katharine
  - Women and Negroes excluded; C ...... 636
- Fishman, Joseph F.
  - Our free press; C ...... 18
- Flavin, Martin
  - Children of the moon. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ...... 273
- Fleas for the British museum; Dt ...... 635
- Floriani's wife. L. Pirandello; D ...... 469
- Florida
  - Florida; the desert and the rose. C. G. Stillman; S ...... 485
  - Whipping boss convicted; EP ...... 48
- Flower-vendor. A. Hamilton; P ...... 162
- Fontaine, James
  - Editorial suggestion; C ...... 583
- Foote, Webb
  - School tyranny in Seattle; C ...... 18
- Force (violence)
  - Violent aliens; E ...... 427
- Ford, Henry
  - Challenge to Henry Ford; E ...... 453
  - Challenge to The Nation. C. W. Wood; C ...... 556
  - Why Ford? Well, why not? T. S. Harding; C ...... 117
  - Why Henry Ford wants Muscle Shoals. G. W. Norris; S ...... 738
- Forever. Liu Chung-Yung; P ...... 645
- France—Foreign relations
  - Collapse of the unholy alliance; E ...... 180
  - Treaties and loans; EP ... 27, 73, 475, 502, 727
- France and Germany
  - End of the German empire. O. G. Villard; S ...... 481
  - France and the Rhineland; IP ...... 333
  - Industrial secret diplomacy; EP ...... 423
  - Poincaré's bargain; E ...... 544
- Francis, Rothschild, Chairman
  - Misery in the Virgin Islands; C ...... 165
- Francke, Kuno
  - Political prisoners in the Rhineland and the Ruhr; IS ...... 638
- Free cities
  - Fate of Fiume, etc.; EP ...... 309
- Free speech
  - Free speech, the vital issue. W. E. Borah; S ...... 8
  - Pennsylvania justice ...... 381
- Free speech. See also Contempt of court
- Freedom of the press
  - Conviction of C. C. Magee; EP ...... 74
  - On exalting the president; an open letter; E ...... 208
- Freedom of the press. See also Academic freedom
- Friends, Society of
  - From the Young Friends; I ...... 307
- From the city-tower of Liu-Chou. Liu Tsung-Yüan; P ...... 646
- Fuchs, Georg
  - Convicted of treason; EP ...... 73
- Fundamentalism
  - Case of the fundamentalists; E ...... 729
- Furth, Henry H.
  - Word on tax exemptions; C ...... 61

G

- Gaevernitz, Gerhart von Schulze-. See Schulze-Gaevernitz, Gerhart von
- Gale, Zona
  - Far cry; (story) ...... 112
- Galsworthy, John
  - Windows. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ... 469
- Gandhi Mohandas Karamchand
  - Gandhi's life in prison; IP ...... 24
  - Will Gandhi die in jail? Taraknath Das; C ...... 740
- Gangsters and the new frontier; EP ...... 255
- Gardner, Gilson
  - Liberty and last year's bird nests; C ..... 740
- Gaus, John Merriman
  - Issues at Amherst; S ...... 12
- Gellert, Hugo
  - In the steel country; a diary with drawings; S ...... 604, 632
- Georgia
  - Prison methods; EP ...... 178
- Gerbault, Alain J.
  - Cap'n Josh Slocum; E ...... 370
  - Crosses Atlantic in 30-foot boat; EP ...... 310
- German youth and the pagan gods. B. Allinson; S ...... 296
- Germany
  - Books for Germany. B. Watson and G. Huebener; C ...... 355
  - Death of a nation; E ...... 368
  - Did passive resistance fail? O. G. Villard; S ...... 600
  - Documents of dissolution: Saxony, Bavaria, the Palatinate; IP ...... 616
  - End of passive resistance; I ...... 565
  - End of the German empire. O. G. Villard; S ...... 481
  - France in the Palatinate; I ...... 724
  - From a willing correspondent. T. W. S.; C ...... 609
  - Germany and the Entente; EP ...... 593
  - Germany's darkest week. O. G. Villard; S. 507
  - Industrialists pull the strings; EP ...... 675
  - Monarchy, communism—or mere starvation?; E ...... 478
  - Most distressful country; E ...... 622
  - Next war draws near. O. G. Villard; S. 680
  - "Reactionaries of all countries, unite!" E. Lengyel; IS ...... 721
  - Red Saxony. O. G. Villard; S ...... 573
  - Shall we do nothing? E. Marbury; C .... 740
  - Starving Germany. A. Smedley; S ...... 601
  - Stinnes—Stresemann. J. Lachenbruch; S. 213
  - Tip to Americans; I ...... 307
  - Von Kahr at the beer-hall; IP ...... 722
- Germany. See also France and Germany
- Germany—Economic conditions
  - Changing prices; EP ...... 27, 699
  - Disaster impends in Germany. R. Dell; S. 133
  - German Samson. A. M. Bullitt; S ...... 344
  - Missing most of Europe. H. Allen; S .... 343
  - Prices and the collapse of the mark; EP .. 226
- Germany—Economic conditions. See also Finance—Germany
- Germany—Famine. See Famines—Germany
- Germany—Finance. See Finance—Germany
- Germany—Politics and government
  - Communists in Saxony and Thuringia; I .. 538
  - Germany's political failures. O. G. Villard; S ...... 705
  - Hitler-Ludendorff putsch; EP ...... 567
  - Saxon coup d'etat; EP ...... 502
  - Stresemann government; EP ...... 423, 449
- Germany—Reparations
  - America in the fog; E ...... 544
  - American experts appointed; EP ...... 725
  - Honor among allies; E ...... 599
  - Much ado about nothing; E ...... 504
  - Poincaré and the proposed conference; EP. 567
  - Poincaré's bargain; E ...... 544
  - Should the United States occupy France?; E ...... 228
- Gertlin, Victor
  - Hero or murderer?; C ...... 555
- Ghosts. B. Marconnier; P ...... 711
- Giglio, Giovanni
  - Mussolini fails; S ...... 295
- Gilliam, Florence, and A. Moss
  - Turkey and Armenia; C ...... 140
- Glass, Everett
  - Amherst graduate's answer; C ...... 39
- Gold
  - Draining Europe's liquid assets; EP ...... 700
- Gömbös, Julius
  - New dictator of Hungary. E. Lengyel; IS ...... 332
- Good, N. P.
  - National union's viewpoint; S ...... 82
- Good old days. A. Hoffman; D ...... 273
- Goodman, Jules Eckert
  - Chains. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ...... 359
- Gorki, Maxim
  - Arraigns Russian cruelty; EP ...... 227
  - Cruelty of the Russian; S ...... 231
  - Mister God (story) ...... 512
- Gouraud, Henri Joseph Eugène
  - Arrives to convert U. S.; EP ...... 27
- Government employees
  - "Reversing" Burleson's labor policy. S. D. Spero; S ...... 682
- Government ownership
  - Beer and bigger things; E ...... 479
  - Where Canada leads; E ...... 342
- Government ownership. See also Railroads and state
- Governors' conference on prohibition; EP .... 475
- Grand Guignol players; D ...... 495
- Granoff, Leo, the boy Trotzky; EP ...... 677
- Great Britain—Colonies and dominions
  - Imperial prestige at low ebb; EP ...... 423
  - Indians clubbed and bayoneted; IP ...... 97
  - Treatment of Africans; EP ...... 49
  - White man's burden; E ...... 31
- Great Britain—Finance. See Finance—Great Britain
- Great Britain—Foreign relations
  - Collapse of the unholy alliance; E ...... 180
  - Effect of coal trade on Ruhr policy; EP .. 177
  - Lion pays a price; E ...... 209
- Great Britain—Politics and government
  - Bonar Law; E ...... 546
  - England at the crossroads. O. G. Villard; S ...... 625
  - Labor's triumph in England; E ...... 702
- Great Britain—Politics and government. See also Elections—Great Britain
- Great Britain—Taxation. See Taxation—Great Britain
- Greece
  - Vacations for kings?; EP ...... 595
- Greece—Foreign relations
  - American sailor speaks. J. D. Drake; C. 491
  - Everybody saves his face; E ...... 284
- Greene, Joel Henry
  - North Dakota; C ...... 268
- Greenland
  - Early civilization; EP ...... 367
- Greenwich Village follies; D ...... 412
- Grotstein, Louis
  - Joy unconfined; C ...... 115
- Gruening, Ernest H.
  - Monroe doctrine—killed in its home; S ... 630
- Guiney, Grace, Literary executor
  - Request; C ...... 526
- Guiney, Louise Imogen
  - Request. G. Guiney; C ...... 526
- Gyro pilot
  - On the President Adams; EP ...... 339

H

- Hack driver. S. Lewis (story) ...... 211
- Haessler, Gertrude
  - Japan's untouchables; IS ...... 249

- Haiti
  - Before the Pan-American bar. P. Hudicourt; S ... 54
  - Haiti appeals to the world; I ... 750
  - Imperial America in Haiti; I ... 749
  - Plea for Haiti. G. Sylvain; C ... 525
  - Two significant cablegrams; I ... 566
- Hall, Covington
  - North Dakota; C ... 268
- Haller, Joseph
  - Hero or murderer? V. Gertlin; C ... 555
- Hamilton, Alexander
  - National honor; Hughes vs. Hamilton; E. 131
- Hamilton, Ann
  - Billers; P ... 437
  - Flower-vendor; P ... 162
  - Song overheard on the highway; P ... 216
- Hamlet. W. Shakespeare; D ... 718
- Hard, William
  - America worst; S ... 737
  - Coal characters; S ... 294
  - Coolidge's country; S ... 380
  - Europe in Washington; S ... 521
  - Good old squirrel cage; S ... 351
  - Honeymoon; S ... 320
  - How many Hirams?; S ... 685
  - Little old New England; S ... 435
  - Making wheat sober up; S ... 14
  - Paradoxology; S ... 554
  - People let down; S ... 58
  - Pinchot for president; S ... 482
  - Progressives progress; S ... 712
  - Straws and confetti; S ... 86
  - Tale of the teapot; S ... 575
  - Those terrifying farmers; S ... 105
  - Toward Britain; S ... 603
  - White, protestant, and dry; S ... 461
- Harding, T. Swann
  - Why Ford? Well, why not?; C ... 117
- Harding, Warren Gamaliel
  - Advocates Christian brotherhood; EP ... 127
  - "Anticipations" and "longings"; EP ... 1
  - Freedom and Mr. Harding; E ... 6
  - In Oregon and Washington; EP ... 47
  - I. W. W. to Warren G. Harding. C. Houghteling; C ... 217
  - True respect for the dead; EP ... 178
  - Warren G. Harding; E ... 152
- Hayes, B.
  - From the Book of Mormon; C ... 608
- Hayes, Roland
  - Roland Hayes. H. Straus; M ... 718
- Hazard, Lucy Lockwood
  - Mill on marriage; C ... 218
- Hearst, William Randolph
  - Hearst and the N. Y. election; EP ... 568
- Helper, Hartley H.
  - Old magazines in demand; C ... 268
  - Who wants some magazines?; C ... 39
- Heroes; E ... 51
- Herring, Hubert C.
  - Easley to the rescue; S ... 193
- Hibben, John Grier
  - Lest we forget Hungary; C ... 637
- Hillman, Sidney
  - RAIC declares a dividend; C ... 524
- Hoffman, Aaron
  - Good old days. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ... 273
- Hogue, Richard W.
  - How "Wobbly" originated; C ... 242
- Hohenlohe, Alexander
  - German Dreyfus; C ... 116
- Holbrook, Florence
  - First woman ambassador; C ... 39
- Holding, Elisabeth Sanxay
  - This is life (story) ... 161
- Holmes, John Haynes
  - Victory for passive resistance; C ... 439
- Holstein, Casper
  - Deportation scandal; C ... 267
  - Our rule in the Virgin Islands; C ... 63
- Honfleur conference
  - Peace, in Normandy. J. Melin; C ... 439
- Hoorgin, Isaiah J.
  - Russia's era of revival; S ... 516
- Horse racing
  - Papyrus coming to America; EP ... 283
  - Zev or My Own?; EP ... 425
  - Zev-Papyrus race; EP ... 477
- Hotels in the country; Dt ... 17
- Houghteling, Catherine
  - I. W. W. to Warren G. Harding; C ... 217
- Hours of labor
  - Factory hours in Japan; IP ... 45
  - Four-hour working day; Dt ... 687
- Housing. See also New York (city)—Housing
- Housing—Great Britain
  - "Homes for heroes"; EP ... 254
- Hudicourt, Pierre
  - Before the Pan-American bar; S ... 54
- Hudson, Manley O.
  - Einstein and the League again; C ... 242
  - Missouri; doesn't want to be shown; S .. 431
- Huebener, G.
  - Books for Germany; C ... 355
- Hughes, Charles Evans
  - Commercial defends Salvador loan; EP ... 503
  - Mr. Hughes admits everything; E ... 479
  - Mr. Hughes makes a secret alliance; E .. 452
  - Mussolini and Hughes; E ... 257
  - National honor; Hughes vs. Hamilton; E. 131
  - "No policy of aggression"; E ... 679
  - Path to peace; EP ... 282
- Humann
  - Hugo Stinnes denies it; C ... 383
- Humming-bird. D. H. Lawrence; P ... 393
- Hungary
  - Count Albert Apponyi. O. Jaszi; S ... 376
  - Lest we forget Hungary. J. G. Hibben; C ... 637
  - New dictator of Hungary. E. Lengyel; IS ... 332
  - Oskar Jaszi and other "traitors." E. Lengyel; IS ... 564
  - "Reactionaries of all countries, unite!" E. Lengyel; IS ... 721
- Hungry souls. T. Mann (story) ... 318
- Hyde, Walter Woodburn
  - To students of Carl Robert; C ... 63
- Hylan, John F.
  - Drifter sees Hiram and Hylan; Dt ... 139

I

- Illinois
  - Illinois, first province of the middle kingdom. H. V. O'Brien; S ... 186
- Immigration and emigration—United States
  - "Desirables" and "undesirables" cut; EP .. 542
  - Princes, peasants, and murderers; EP ... 619
  - Results of Dillingham act; EP ... 28
- Imperial conference. Li Shang-Yin; P ... 645
- Imperialism
  - French and American; E ... 502
  - Same the world over; EP ... 128
- Impressions. W. Snow; P ... 739
- In love with love; D ... 273
- In the next room; D ... 718
- India
  - Indians clubbed and bayoneted; IP ... 97
  - Indians in Kenya; I ... 497
  - Parsee cremation measure defeated; EP .. 367
- India—Politics and government
  - British raj dethrones the maharaja of Nabha. Basanta Koomar Roy; IS ... 446
- Indiana
  - Indiana, her soil and light. T. Dreiser; S ... 348
  - Protest against Indiana imperialism. D. C. Seitz; C ... 439
  - Some sins of omission. M. A. De Ford, A. E. Becker; C ... 582
- Indians of North America
  - For the Indian's sake. O. G. V.; S ... 734
- Industrial arbitration. See Arbitration and conciliation, Industrial
- Industrial workers of the world
  - Attempt to disbar E. S. Smith; EP ... 2
  - California persecution; EP ... 100
  - Conditional amnesty; EP ... 48
  - How "Wobbly" originated. R. W. Hogue; C ... 242
  - Only an I. W. W. V. Owen; C ... 18
  - Seattle strikes and bootleggers; EP ... 338
  - "Vacation" at San Quentin. M. A. De Ford; S ... 114
- Inheritance; Dt ... 713
- Injunctions
  - Strike injunction made permanent; EP .. 100
- Institute of politics, Williams college
  - Hero of the session; EP ... 255
- Intellectuals
  - Man and folk; E ... 77
- Interallied federation of former combatants
  - Colonel Owsley's speech; EP ... 282
- International law and relations
  - International missionaries; E ... 505
- Interparliamentary union, 1923
  - United States of Europe. F. Toksvig; IS. 386
- Ireland—Irish Free State
  - Free State majority in Dail; EP ... 253
  - Hunger strike in Ireland. G. W. Russell; IS ... 589
  - Imprisonment of De Valera; EP ... 206
  - Ireland. H. S. Skeffington, J. E. Kelly, C. A. Whitney; C ... 62
  - Irish prisons; E ... 454
  - Premier and President meet; EP ... 128
  - Republican plea; I ... 590
  - Republican prisoners in the Irish Free State; I ... 471
  - Why Irish labor failed. H. W. Nevinson; S ... 460
- Irish literature
  - Promise of Irish letters. P. Colum; S ... 396
- Irish statesman. New weekly; EP ... 425
- Irvine, Edward J.
  - White terror in the West Indies; C ... 242
- Italy
  - Mussolini fails. G. Giglio; S ... 295
- Italy—Fascisti movement
  - Italy's terror goes on; I ... 698
- Italy—Foreign relations
  - American sailor speaks. J. D. Drake; C .. 491
  - Enters Moroccan controversy; EP ... 502
  - Everybody saves his face; E ... 284
  - League of nations faces the test; E ... 256
  - Mussolini and Hughes; E ... 257
  - Mussolini turns to Russia and Spain; EP. 727
  - Piracy is not dead; EP ... 365
- Italy—Political parties. See Political parties—Italy
- Italy—Politics and government
  - Mussolini starts a war. P. Blanshard; S. 325
  - Mussolini's power; EP ... 74
- Italy—Trade unions. See Trade unions—Italy

J

- J., S. B.
  - German dye patents; C ... 268
- Japan
  - Japanese students show their opposition to militarism; IP ... 44
  - Joffe in Japan; IP ... 70
  - Lost Japan. E. A. Jewell; S ... 287
  - Students and militarism; EP ... 28
  - Will cut military budget; EP ... 424
- Japan—Earthquake. See Earthquakes—Japan
- Japan—Foreign relations
  - Japan and the United States; I ... 361
- Japan—Labor and laboring classes. See Labor and laboring classes—Japan
- Japan—Politics and government
  - "Dangerous thoughts" in Japan; IP ... 251
- Japan—Social conditions
  - Japan's untouchables. G. Haessler; IS ... 249
- Jaszi, Oscar
  - Count Albert Apponyi; S ... 376
- Jewell, B. M.
  - Jim Crowism; C ... 298
- Jewell, Edward Alden
  - Lost Japan; S ... 287
- Jewels
  - Italy prevents sale of Florentine diamond; EP ... 151
- Jews
  - Poles protect "their" Jews. D. Schreiber; C ... 741
  - Voice from Jerusalem. J. E. Sampter; C ... 241
- Jews—Political and social conditions
  - Anti-Semitism in European universities. M. Lowenthal; S ... 547
  - Non-sectarian student relief. H. Ogden, M. Lowenthal; C ... 713
- Jews in Russia
  - Jews under the soviet regime. L. Talmy; IS ... 533
- Jews in the United States
  - Greatest Jewish city in the world. K. Bercovici; S ... 259
- Joffe, Adolphe A.
  - Joffe in Japan; IP ... 70
- Johnson, Hiram Warren
  - Drifter sees Hiram and Hylan; Dt ... 139
  - How many Hirams? W. Hard; S ... 685
  - Liberty and last year's bird nests. G. Gardner; C ... 740
- Johnson, Magnus
  - Election to Senate; EP ... 73
  - Mr. Townley and Magnus Johnson; C ... 217
  - Views on political action; EP ... 424
- Johnstown, Pa.
  - Mayor Cauffiel defeated; EP ... 339
- Jolly Roger. A. E. Thomas; D ... 304
- Journalism
  - Newspaper game; E ... 51
  - Pessimistic journalism. B. L.; C ... 268
  - What is the press?; E ... 623
- Journalism. See also Freedom of the press; Newspapers

K

- K., B. A.
  - Is this the fact?; C ... 464
- Kalaw, Maximo M.
  - Filipinos' side; S ... 627
- Kanner, Heinrich
  - Cause of Austria's fall and rise; C ... 241
- Kauffman, Reginald Wright
  - "Dutch" tradition; S ... 733
  - Lettuce with sugar and cream; C ... 637
- Kaufman, George S., and M. Connelly
  - Deep-tangle wildwood. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ... 614
- Kelley, Edith Summers
  - Euterpe in Arkansas; C ... 463
- Kelley, Florence
  - Questions for the Woman's party; C ... 241
- Kelley, Thomas L.
  - Why they subscribe; C ... 39
- Kellogg, Frank B.
  - Ambassador to Great Britain; EP ... 726
- Kelly, John E.
  - Ireland; C ... 62
- Kentucky
  - Kentucky, where men die standing. B. L. Burman; S ... 83
- Kenya
  - Indians in Kenya; I ... 497
  - White man's burden; E ... 31
- Kessler, Count Harry
  - At the Institute of politics; EP ... 255
  - Roots of the war—and of peace; S ... 191

- Kiang Kang-hu, and W. Bynner, translators
  - Thousand years ago; P ... 645
- Knoblock, Edward
  - Lullaby. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ... 359
- Koren, John. Obituary; EP ... 595
- Krasnoschokov, Alexander M.
  - Russia's economic revival; IS ... 69
- Kriger, Eli
  - Sinclair Lewis also nods; C ... 267
- Krimsky, Joseph
  - Science in Jerusalem; C ... 637
- Ku Klux klan
  - Klan and the bottle; E ... 570
  - Ku Kluxism in the schools. D. H. Pierce; C ... 18
  - Letter from Civil liberties union; EP ... 311
  - Own methods not to be used against it; EP ... 225
  - Plain-spoken impeachment; EP ... 74
  - When the troops took Tulsa. M. Coleman; S ... 239
- Kuhn, Bert L.
  - China's newest president; S ... 735
- Kuzbas colony, Siberia
  - Indictments against committee dismissed; EP ... 366
  - Kuzbas indictments. T. Barker; C ... 491
  - Kuzbas tells its own story; I ... 145
- Kuznetz Basin concession. See Kuzbas colony

L

- L., A.
  - Ways of the Fathers; C ... 608
- L., B.
  - Pessimistic journalism; C ... 268
- Labor and laboring classes. See also Coal miners; Labor party; Strikes; Unemployment; Woman—Employment
- Labor and laboring classes—Ireland
  - Why Irish labor failed. H. W. Nevinson; S ... 460
- Labor and laboring classes—Italy
  - Italy's terror goes on; I ... 698
- Labor and laboring classes—Japan
  - Factory hours in Japan; IP ... 45
  - Japanese cotton mills; IP ... 45
- Labor and laboring classes—Mexico
  - May day in Mexico; I ... 71
- Labor and laboring classes—Spain
  - Spanish labor limps; I ... 448
- Labor and laboring classes—Turkey
  - Labor and Turkey; I ... 566
- Labor and laboring classes—United States
  - New emancipation of the Negro. B. Wallerstein; S ... 263
- Labor and laboring classes—United States. See also Trade unions—United States
- Labor bureau, Inc. 1922 report; EP ... 29
- Labor party (Great Britain)
  - Associated Press report; EP ... 48
  - British labor surveys its task; E ... 77
- Labor's newspapers; E ... 258
- Lachenbruch, Jerome
  - Stinnes—and Stresemann; S ... 213
- Land tenure—Mexico
  - Mexican-American agreement; EP ... 206
- Langley, Allan Lincoln
  - Symphony players; M ... 67
- Laugh, clown, laugh; D ... 720
- Launzi. F. Molnar; D ... 469
- Lausanne treaty
  - Turkey wins; EP ... 47
- Law, Andrew Bonar
  - Bonar Law; E ... 546
- Lawn, Victor H.
  - Kennels of New York; S ... 710
- Lawrence, David Herbert
  - Bare almond trees; P ... 393
  - Humming-bird; P ... 393
  - Peace; P ... 393
  - Tropic; P ... 393
- League of composers. Second season; EP ... 543
- League of nations
  - Einstein and the League again. M. O. Hudson; C ... 242
  - Einstein resigns; EP ... 28
  - Everybody saves his face; E ... 284
  - League of nations faces the test; E ... 256
  - Proving its weakness; EP ... 177
  - What of the League? O. G. Villard; S ... 455
- League of nations—Permanent court of international justice
  - Features of third session; EP ... 27
  - Refuses opinion on Karelia case; EP ... 127
- Lee, Jonathan
  - That "American dinner"; C ... 491
- Leipzig Handels-hochschule
  - Leipzig's need. E. Schultze; C ... 195
- Lengyel, Emil
  - New dictator of Hungary; IS ... 332
  - Oskar Jaszi and other "traitors"; IS ... 564
  - "Reactionaries of all countries, unite!"; IS ... 721
- Lenormand, H. R.
  - Failures. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ... 692
- Lerner, Anna
  - Not permitted to return to the U. S.; EP ... 727
- Lesage, John Merry
  - Newspaper game; E ... 51
- Lesson in love. R. Besier, and M. Edgington; D ... 412
- Lettuce with sugar and cream. R. W. Kauffman; C ... 637
- Leviathan (steamship)
  - German sabotage denied; EP ... 48
  - Unproved liability; EP ... 101
  - World's largest; EP ... 129
- Lewis, John
  - Coal characters. W. Hard; S ... 294
- Lewis, Sinclair
  - Hack driver (story) ... 211
  - Sinclair Lewis also nods. E. Kriger; C ... 267
- Lewisohn, Ludwig
  - Comedies; D ... 614
  - Divertissements; D ... 718
  - Eleonora Duse; D ... 562
  - "The failures"; D ... 692
  - First fruits; D ... 359
  - Gleams; D ... 331
  - Importations; D ... 495
  - Jog-trot; D ... 304
  - Legend; D ... 746
  - Ludwig Lewisohn; S ... 583
  - Miscellany; D ... 412
  - Muscovites return; D ... 672
  - Muted strings; D ... 469
  - Oedipus rex; D ... 531
  - Opus I; D ... 444
  - Outburst; D ... 273
  - Saintsbury; S ... 634
  - Scramble; D ... 587
- Li Shang-Yin
  - Imperial conference; P ... 645
- Libby, Frederick J.
  - "Selling" us another war; S ... 315
- Liberia
  - "Love of liberty brought us here." J. M. S. Young; C ... 582
- Liberty
  - The liberty above all others; E ... 4
  - Protecting our liberties. U. Sinclair; S ... 9
  - "Sweet land of liberty." (From bulletins of American civil liberties union); ... 11
- Lincoln, Edward A.
  - Conscientious objectors and the army intelligence tests; S ... 523
- Literary criticism
  - H. L. Mencken. H. L. Mencken; S ... 647
  - Heywood Broun. H. Broun; S ... 372
  - Ludwig Lewisohn. L. Lewisohn; S ... 583
- Literature
  - Confession and photography; E ... 182
  - Literature flourishes; E ... 230
- Literature. See also Books and reading; Censorship; Fiction
- Little Jessie James; D ... 273
- Liu Chang-Ch'ing
  - Exile recalled; P ... 645
  - Farewell to a militarist; P ... 645
- Liu Chung-Yung
  - Forever; P ... 645
- Liu Tsung-Yüan
  - Dwelling by a stream; P ... 646
  - From the city-tower of Liu-Chou, a poem to my four fellow-officials, Chang, Ting, Fêng, and Lien; P ... 646
  - Old fisherman; P ... 646
  - Simplest way; P ... 645
- Liu Yü-hsi
  - Blacktail row; P ... 645
- Lloyd George, David
  - American speaking trip; EP ... 477, 541
  - Lloyd George, puppet; E ... 427
  - Waning prestige; EP ... 207
- Lo Pin-Wang
  - Political prisoner; P ... 646
- Loans, Foreign
  - French military loans; EP. 23, 73, 475, 502, 727
  - Lansing and the Salvador loan; EP ... 541
  - Mr. Hughes admits everything; E ... 479
  - Mr. Hughes makes a secret alliance; E ... 452
- London Daily herald
  - Trade union congress to finance; EP ... 337
- London's dockland. By An onlooker ... 265
- Lonsdale, Frederick
  - Spring cleaning. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ... 614
- Looking on (cartoons). A. Young ... 7, 457
- Loos, Anita, and J. Emerson
  - Whole town's talking. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ... 304
- Los Angeles
  - Dock strike; EP ... 2
- Louis Napoleon. See Napoleon III
- Lowenthal, Marvin
  - Anti-Semitism in European universities; S ... 547
  - Non-sectarian student relief; C ... 713
- Lu Lun
  - Drum-beats; P ... 645
  - Farewell to Li Tuan; P ... 646
- Lullaby. E. Knoblock; D ... 359
- Lynching
  - At Columbia, Mo.; EP ... 100
  - Proscribed by Women's general committee; EP ... 283
  - Savannah mob dispersed; EP ... 2
- Lyne, J. G.
  - Electricity for railroads; C ... 298
- Lyons, A. Neil
  - She would be! (story) ... 606

M

- M., A. H.
  - Or this?; C ... 464
- M., R. W.
  - Who would not take a chance?; C ... 267
- McAdoo, William G.
  - On criticizing the President; C ... 384
- McClure, Mabel B.
  - From a native daughter; C ... 609
- McKeesport, Pa.
  - Pennsylvania justice ... 381
- Maeterlinck, Maurice
  - Pelléas and Mélisande. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ... 746
- Magazines. See Periodicals
- Magee, Carl C. Conviction and pardon; EP ... 74
- Magnolia. B. Tarkington; D ... 273
- Man and folk; E ... 77
- Mann, Thomas
  - Hungry souls (story) ... 318
- Man's sphere; E ... 29
- Marbury, Elisabeth
  - Shall we do nothing?; C ... 740
- Marconnier, Byrne
  - Ghosts; P ... 711
- Marriage
  - Liability in beauty contest; EP ... 310
  - Men, women, and books; E ... 545
  - Mill on marriage. L. L. Hazard; C ... 218
  - University and marriage; E ... 183
- Marriage licenses in Chicago; Dt ... 88
- Martin, Helen R.
  - Mrs. Gladfelter's revolt (story) ... 373
- Martínez, Ramón A.
  - Spain today; C ... 438
- Marx, Magdeleine
  - New Russian women; S ... 508, 549, 580
- Mary, Mary, quite contrary. St. J. Ervine; D. 331
- Massingham, Henry William
  - To contribute to Spectator; EP ... 101
- Masterpieces
  - Literature flourishes; E ... 230
- Masters, Edgar Lee
  - O you young eagles!; P ... 686
- Maugham, Somerset
  - Camel's back. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ... 614
- Maurel, Victor
  - Victor Maurel, singing actor. P. Sanborn; M ... 671
- Mecca
  - Bones of camels; E ... 454
- Meiklejohn, Alexander
  - Chapter ends at Amherst; E ... 5
  - Issues at Amherst. J. M. Gaus; S ... 12
  - Pharisees and reformers; S ... 13
- Melin, Jeanne
  - Peace, in Normandy; C ... 439
- Men and women. Generalizations; Dt ... 582
- Men, women, and books; E ... 545
- Mencken, Henry Louis
  - A la Maryland; S ... 731
  - H. L. Mencken; S ... 647
- Mêng Hao-Jan
  - Stopping at a friend's farm-house; P ... 646
  - Three score and ten; P ... 646
- Merchant marine—Italy
  - Mussolini fails. G. Giglio; S ... 295
- Methodist Episcopal church
  - Letter from Miss Billy Tichenor, dancer; EP ... 677
  - To cooperate with soviet church; EP ... 594
- Mexico
  - De la Huerta rebellion; EP ... 725
  - Disarm the boundary; EP ... 541
  - May day in Mexico; I ... 71
  - Menace of Mexico; E ... 703
  - Mexico in Russia; IP ... 566
  - Mexico pensions a political prisoner; I ... 176
  - Who's who in Mexico?; I ... 748
- Mexico—Foreign relations
  - Recognition by U. S.; EP ... 253
  - Where Mexico stands; I ... 305
- Mexico—Labor and laboring classes. See Labor and laboring classes—Mexico
- Mexico—Land tenure. See Land tenure—Mexico
- Middle ages
  - Greenland relics; EP ... 367
- Midol, Lucien. In the Paris council; EP ... 700
- Militarism
  - Japanese students show their opposition to militarism; IP ... 44
- Military aeronautics. See Aeronautics, Military
- Mill, John Stuart
  - Mill on marriage. L. L. Hazard; C ... 218
- Miller, E. E.
  - When company comes in Tennessee; S ... 732
- Minnesota
  - Election of Magnus Johnson; EP ... 73
  - Joy unconfined. L. Grotstein; C ... 115
  - Minnesota, the Nonpartisan league, and the future; E ... 102
  - Mr. Townley and Magnus Johnson. M. Johnson; C ... 217
- Mischkind, Louis A.
  - Elijah and the clowns; C ... 525
- Missouri
  - From a native daughter. M. B. McClure; C ... 609

  - Missouri; doesn't want to be shown. M. O. Hudson; S ........ 431
- Mister God. M. Gorki (story) ........ 512
- Mrs. Gladfelter's revolt. H. R. Martin (story) 373
- Mob violence in Oklahoma, Texas, Arkansas; EP ........ 74
- Molnàr, Ferenc
  - Launzi. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ..... 469
  - Swan. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ....... 587
- Monopolies
  - Beer and bigger things; E ........ 479
  - Technique of industrial monopoly. A. Pinchot; S ........ 458
- Monroe doctrine—killed in its home. E. H. Gruening; S ........ 630
- Montana
  - Montana, land of the copper collar. A. Fisher; S ........ 290
- Morley, John
  - Dictates of his will; EP ........ 701
  - John Morley; E ........ 341
- Morocco
  - Italy enters controversy; EP ........ 502
- Moscow art theater. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ........ 672
- Moss, Arthur, and F. Gilliam
  - Turkey and Armenia; C ........ 140
- Motoring and the hiker; Dt ........ 297, 524
- Motoring too easy; Dt ........ 38
- Mott-Smith, Constance
  - Lively generation; C ........ 688
- Moving picture censorship
  - Film censors and other morons; E ........ 678
- Moving pictures
  - "Baby Peggy" contract; EP ........ 227
- Muscle Shoals project
  - Challenge to Henry Ford; E ........ 453
  - Why Henry Ford wants Muscle Shoals. G. W. Norris; S ........ 738
- Music—United States
  - Striking the hour. H. Straus; M ........ 410
- Music, English
  - Renaissance of English music in England. H. Straus; M ........ 201
- Music box revue; D ........ 412
- Musicians
  - Rota Rinaldi, child composer; EP ........ 3
  - Symphony players. A. L. Langley; M .... 67
- Mussolini, Benito
  - Dictator. B. Robinson (cartoon) ........ 293
  - Mussolini and Hughes; E ........ 257
  - Mussolini fails. G. Giglio; S ........ 295
- Muzumdar, Haridas T.
  - Gandhi, the apostle; B ........ 243

N

- Nagel, Charles
  - Confiscation pure and simple; C ........ 165
- Nansen, Fridtjof
  - His American mission; EP ........ 569
- Napoleon III
  - Voice from 1870. M. T. Ollivier; C ...... 635
- Nation, The
  - "Bah." P. S. Resnikov; C ........ 327
  - Editorial suggestion. J. Fontaine; C ..... 583
  - "It shall not be again." W. J. Robinson; C ........ 464
  - Nation clubs. B. Chass; C ........ 355
  - Poetry prize ...... 506, 556, 586, 614, 670, 692, 718, 746
  - S. S. McClure and S. S. Menken; EP ..... 569
  - Sailor's offer. J. A. C.; C ........ 555
  - Thanks to Nation readers. H. Dickens; C ........ 166
  - Why they subscribe. T. L. Kelley, W. W. Wolfe; C ........ [illegible]
- National characteristics, American
  - Timid American; E ........ 182
  - Violent aliens; E ........ 427
- National characteristics, Russian
  - Against Gorki. C. L. Todd; C ........ 384
  - Are the Russians cruel? C. Rice; C ...... 327
  - Cruelty of the Russian. M. Gorki; S .... 231
- National nonpartisan league
  - Minnesota, the Nonpartisan league, and the future; E ........ 102
- National petroleum reserves
  - Tale of the Teapot. W. Hard; S ........ 575
- National woman's party
  - Seneca Falls convention; EP ........ 128
- Naturalization
  - Anna Lerner case; EP ........ 727
  - Indian rights in the United States; I ...... 447
  - Pacifists and strikers barred; EP ........ 178
  - Refused to Hindu; EP ........ 366, 367
  - Woman without a country; E ........ 730
- Navies
  - World's chief navies; IP ........ 45
- Nebraska
  - Nebraska; the end of the first cycle. W. S. Cather; S ........ 236
- Negroes in France
  - France resents American insults; EP .... 151
- Negroes in the United States
  - Cause for exodus from South; EP ........ 254
  - Crisis on the Southern exodus; EP ....... 227
  - Excluded from trade unions; EP ........ 542
  - Jim Crow here and there. W. Pickens; C ........ 463
  - Jim Crow in Texas. W. Pickens; S ...... 155
  - Jim Crowism. W. G. Crush, C. L. Stone, B. M. Jewell, F. P. Walsh; C ........ 298
  - New comers driven from Johnstown; EP. 309
  - New emancipation of the Negro. B. Wallerstein; S ........ 263
  - Opposition to Negro staff at Tuskegee hospital; EP ........ 48
  - "White." G. A. Steward; S ........ 436
  - Why the Negro emigrates. C. F. Call; C. 490
  - Shoving of the South; E ........ 131
  - Women and Negroes excluded. K. Fisher; C ........ 636
- Nevinson, Henry W.
  - Why Irish labor failed; S ........ 460
- New England
  - Coolidge's country. W. Hard; S ........ 380
  - Little old New England. W. Hard; S .... 435
- New Mexico
  - New Mexico; a relic of ancient America. E. S. Sergeant; S ........ 577
- New school for social research
  - Student government grows up. G. Peck; C 384
- New York (city)
  - Greatest Jewish city in the world. K. Bercovici; S ........ 259
  - New architecture. H. S. Churchill; S .... 552
  - Prediction of population growth; EP ..... 503
- New York (city)—Housing
  - Housing conditions; EP ........ 451
  - Kennels of New York. V. H. Lawn; S .. 710
  - Tenement law enforcement; EP ........ 476
- New York (city)—Police department
  - "Safety hour"; EP ........ 29
- New York Evening mail
  - Statement by E. A. Rumely; C ........ 166
- New York leader
  - Lost Leader; E ........ 571
  - Two weeks' achievements; EP ........ 425
- New York Times
  - Ahead of the Times ........ 204
- New York university
  - Man's sphere; E ........ 29
- Newark museum association
  - Appeals for art in common things; EP .. 151
- News
  - How "news" is made. A newspaper man. 160
- Newspapers—England
  - Rothermere and Beaverbrook papers; EP. 450
- Newspapers—England. See also London Daily herald
- Newspapers—France
  - Joint action against the Quotidien; EP .. 282
- Newspapers—Italy
  - "Fascistization" of Italian press; IP ..... 305
- Newspapers—Russia
  - Soviet press. L. Talmy; S ........ 519
- Newspapers—United States
  - Boston, a journalistic poor-farm. O. G. Villard; [illegible] ........ 109
  - Factories of public opinion; E ........ 623
  - Gov. Russell on the press. L. M. Russell; C 62
  - Judge Parker vs. B. K. Wheeler; EP .. 620, 700
  - Labor's newspapers; E ........ 258
  - More North Carolina journalism. H. Coy; C ........ 242
  - New York pressmen's strike; EP ........ 366
  - Newspapers; E ........ 340
  - Our free press. J. F. Fishman; C ....... 18
  - Sale of the Marion Star and Tribune; EP. 75
  - Was Mencken right? S. Chase; C ........ 88
  - Washington, a capital without a Thunderer. O. G. Villard; S ........ 232
- Newspapers—United States. See also New York Evening mail; New York leader; New York times
- Nobel prizes
  - W. B. Yeats awarded literature prize; EP. 621
- Noise
  - London and White Plains; EP ........ 367
- Nonpartisan league. See National nonpartisan league
- Non-resistance
  - Did passive resistance fail? O. G. Villard; S ........ 600
  - End of passive resistance; I ........ 565
  - From the Book of Mormon. B. Hayes; C. 608
  - Mahatma Gandhi and Jesus of Nazareth. B. Watson; C ........ 713
  - Victory for passive resistance. J. H. Holmes; C ........ 439
- Norris, George W.
  - Thou shalt not despair; E ........ 728
  - Why Henry Ford wants Muscle Shoals; S .. 738
- North Dakota
  - North Dakota. J. H. Greene, and C. Hall; C ........ 268
  - North Dakota; a twentieth century Valley Forge. R. G. Paterson; S ........ 134
- Novels. See Fiction

O

- O you young eagles! E. L. Masters; P ....... 686
- O'Brien, Howard Vincent
  - Illinois; first province of the middle kingdom; S ........ 186
- Oedipus rex. Sophocles; D ........ 531
- Ogden, Helen
  - Non-sectarian student relief; C ........ 713
- Oglethorpe, James E.
  - Movement to bring remains to Georgia; EP 451
- Oklahoma
  - Anarchy in Oklahoma; E ........ 369
  - Governor and the Klan; EP ........ 338
  - Lingerie in Oklahoma. G. Williamson; C. 438
  - Mob violence; EP ........ 74
  - Oklahoma; low jacks and the crooked game. B. Rascoe; S ........ 34
  - Oklahoma talks back. J. L. Rader, S. B. Scott, S. De Leon, M. Coleman; C ...... 194
  - Oklahoma's klan-fighting governor. A. Blake; S ........ 353
  - Walton and the Farmer-Labor league; EP. 150
  - Walton's attempted dictatorship; EP ..... 450
- Oklahoma. See also Tulsa
- Old fisherman. Liu Tsung-Yüan; P ........ 646
- Ollivier, Marie Therese
  - Voice from 1870; C ........ 635
- Olmsted, Sophia Amson
  - Intelligence tests for tourists; C ........ 609
- Orchestras
  - Symphony players. A. L. Langley; M .... 67
- Orphans
  - Extinct orphan. A. Farr; C ........ 555
- Osmun, Leighton, and F. Dazey
  - Peter Weston. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ........ 359
- Outline of the world's outlines; Dt ........ 194
- Owen, Mary Alicia
  - What Lloyd George missed; C ........ 555
- Owen, Virginia
  - Only an I. W. W.; C ........ 18

P

- Pagan reinvokes the twenty-third psalm. R. L. Wolf; P ........ 607
- Palestine
  - Science in Jerusalem. J. Krimsky; C .... 637
- Palestine. See also Zionism
- Pan-American journalist
  - Is Pan-Americanism a joke—on us?; S .. 683
- Parents: gods, policemen or friends; E ....... 210
- Parkhurst, Genevieve
  - Federal divorce law; C ........ 298
- Parkman, Francis
  - Francis Parkman. C. W. Alvord; S ...... 394
- Passive resistance. See Non-resistance
- Paterson, Robert George
  - North Dakota; a twentieth century Valley Forge; S ........ 134
- Pattee, Fred Lewis
  - "Log" unseats "Mark Hopkins"; S ....... 55
- Pavlowa, Anna
  - Pavlowa; E ........ 480
- Peace
  - Bok peace plan offer; EP ........ 27
  - Hughes's path to peace; EP ........ 282
  - Law—not war; E ........ 103
- Peace. D. H. Lawrence; P ........ 393
- Peck, Gustav
  - Student government grows up; C ........ 384
- Peffer, Nathaniel
  - Chinese situation in a nutshell; C ........ 89
- Pelléas and Mélisande. M. Maeterlinck; D .... 746
- Pennsylvania justice. Report on McKeesport arrests ........ 381
- Pennsylvania railroad company
  - Company unions or national unions? a debate. P. Blanshard, S. Rea, N. P. Good; S ........ 79
  - Policy toward employees; EP ........ 2
- Periodicals
  - American review launched; EP ........ 75
  - Old magazines in demand. H. H. Hepler; C ........ 268
  - Who wants some magazines? H. H. Hepler; C ........ 39
- Periodicals. See also American monthly; Irish statesman
- Perkins, Worcester
  - Christ and the church today; C ........ 117
- Permanent court of international justice. See League of nations. Permanent court of international justice
- Pershing, John J.
  - Military training for women; EP ........ 150
- Peter Weston. F. Dazey, and L. Osmun; D .. 359
- Petroleum
  - Oil situation today. H. Silverman; IS .... 223
  - Price of gasoline. F. H. Allen; C .... 117, 217
- Petroleum reserves. See National petroleum reserves
- Pharisees and reformers. A. Meiklejohn; S .. 13
- Philippine Islands
  - Filipinos' side. M. M. Kalaw; S ........ 627
  - Gen. Wood and the election; EP ........ 424
  - Opposition to Gen. Wood; EP ........ 99, 450
- Picasso, Pablo
  - Picasso on fifth. H. J. Seligmann; A .... 714
- Pickens, William
  - Jim Crow here and there; C ........ 463
  - Jim Crow in Texas; S ........ 155
- Pickering, Hannah
  - Workers' faculties; IS ........ 533
- Pierce, David H.
  - Ku Kluxism in the schools; C ........ 18
- Pinchot, Amos
  - Railroads and the mechanics of social power; S ........ 429, 458, 488

Pinchot, Gifford
  Coal characters. W. Hard; S............ 294
  Pinchot for president. W. Hard; S...... 482
Pirandello, Luigi
  Floriani's wife. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ........ 469
Player queen. W. B. Yeats; D.............. 496
Po Chü-Yi
  To my brothers and sisters adrift in troubled times this poem of the moon; P ........ 645
Poems
  Bare almond trees. D. H. Lawrence..... 393
  Billers. A. Hamilton.................... 437
  Birth. J. Rorty.......................... 553
  Blacktail row. Liu Yü-hsi.............. 645
  Cobweb boy. R. L. Wolf................. 607
  Death-watch. V. Starrett................ 111
  Drum-beats. Lu Lun..................... 645
  Dwelling by a stream. Liu Tsung-Yüan.. 646
  Exile recalled. Liu Chang-Ch'ing........ 645
  Farewell to a militarist. Liu Chang-Ch'ing 645
  Farewell to Li Tuan. Lu Lun........... 646
  Flower-vendor. A. Hamilton............. 162
  Forever. Liu Chung-Yung................ 645
  From the city-tower of Liu-Chou. Liu Tsung-Yüan ........ 646
  Ghosts. B. Marconnier.................. 711
  Humming-bird. D. H. Lawrence......... 393
  Imperial conference. Li Shang-Yin....... 645
  Impressions. W. Snow.................. 739
  O you young eagles! E. L. Masters...... 686
  Old fisherman. Liu Tsung-Yüan......... 646
  Pagan reinvokes the twenty-third psalm. R. L. Wolf........ 607
  Peace. D. H. Lawrence.................. 393
  Poetaster. B. Thompson................. 397
  Political prisoner. Lo Pin-Wang......... 646
  Reunion. E. A. Robinson................ 514
  Simplest way. Liu Tsung-Yüan......... 645
  Song overheard on the highway. A. Hamilton ........ 216
  Stopping at a friend's farm-house. Mêng Hao-Jan ........ 646
  Swallows pass through Rome. L. Speyer. 63
  Three score and ten. Mêng Hao-Jan.... 646
  To a baby. M. Bodenheim............... 185
  To my brothers and sisters adrift in troubled times. Po Chü-Yi............ 645
  To my retired friend Wêi the eighth-born. Tu Fu........ 646
  Tropic. D. H. Lawrence................ 393
  Two portraits. M. Bodenheim............ 10
  Woodsman. G. Taggard.................. 464
Poetaster. B. Thompson; P................ 397
Poetry
  Nation's poetry prize..506, 556, 586, 614, 670, 692, 718, 746
Poets
  Poets resident and state laureates; EP.. 569
Poincaré, Raymond
  Franco-British alliance; EP.............. 150
Polakov, Walter N.
  Curse of work; S........................ 506
Poland
  Poland, a danger spot. R. Dell; IS...... 96
Polar exploration
  Capt. MacMillan's radio and movie; EP.. 543
Political parties. See also Labor party
Political parties—Italy
  Labor disunion in Italy; I................ 202
Political parties—Spain
  Spanish labor limps; I................... 448
Political parties—United States
  Political confusion; E.................... 154
  What is a third party?; E............... 50
Political prisoner. Lo Pin-Wang; P......... 646
Political prisoners
  Amnesty demanded; EP................. 619
  Chileans condemn "Yankee justice"; I..... 26
  Christmas in prison. Workers prison relief committee; C........ 713
  Conditional amnesty; EP................. 48
  Freedom and Mr. Harding; E............ 6
  German spy freed, politicals still in; EP. 594
  Irish prisons; E......................... 454
  Mexico pensions a political prisoner; I.... 176
  Political prisoners in the Rhineland and the Ruhr. K. Francke; IS............ 638
  Reading for political prisoners. W. T. Brown; C........................89, 327
  Release of federal prisoners; EP.......... 725
  Republican prisoners in the Irish Free State; I........ 471
  Still in jail; EP.......................... 207
Poppy. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D.......... 304
Porto Rico
  Progress (and poverty) in Porto Rico. A. Warner; S.......................158, 189
Potashnick, S.
  "Let freedom ring!"; C.................. 18
"Pound breach" in Washington; EP.......... 700
Power. See also Superpower
Presidential campaigns—1924
  Candidates and issues; EP............... 501
  Coolidge-for-President clubs; EP......... 337
  Entering the primaries; EP.............. 699
  Good old squirrel cage. W. Hard; S.... 351
  Johnson and McAdoo enter contest; EP.. 593
  Pinchot challenges Coolidge; EP.......... 449
  Pinchot for president. W. Hard; S...... 482
Presidential primaries. See Primaries, Presidential Presidents—United States
  Coolidge holds short sentence record; EP. 676
  On criticizing the President. W. G. McAdoo; C........ 384
  On exalting the president; an open letter; E ........ 207
Primaries, Presidential
  Presidential primaries. B. S. Rodey; C.. 165
Princeton university
  Class attendance not compulsory; EP..... 451
Prison labor
  Forward, march!; E..................... 342
Prisoners
  Appeal for clemency. A. S. Blackwell; C. 741
Prisoners. See also Political prisoners
Prisons. See also Convict labor
Prisons—Ireland
  Irish prisons; E........................ 454
  Republican prisoners in the Irish Free State; I........ 471
Prisons—United States
  Georgia and needed reforms; EP......... 178
Privacy; Dt................................ 490
Prize-fighting
  Etiquette of big business. S. Chase; C.. 383
  Kearns and the Shelby fight; Dt.......... 61
  Methodist church asks suppression; EP.. 227
  Our town and the championship bout. G. Robinson; S........ 16
Progressives progress. W. Hard; S.......... 712
Prohibition—United States
  Graft and non-enforcement; EP.......... 449
  Klan and the bottle; E.................. 570
  White, protestant, and dry. W. Hard; S. 461
Propaganda
  "Selling" us another war. F. J. Libby; S ........ 315
Protestant Episcopal church
  Stirrings of progress; EP............... 726
"Prurient prude." G. I. Colbron; C.......... 241
Psychical research
  Committee to explain the occult world; EP 677
Public debts. See Debts, Public
Public schools—United States
  Ready to learn; E....................... 312
Puppets of Teatro dei Piccoli; D............. 331

Q

Queen Victoria. W. P. Eaton, and D. Carb; D ........ 672

R

Rader, Jesse Lee
  Oklahoma talks back; C................. 194
Radicals and radicalism
  Leo Granoff, the boy Trotzky; EP........ 677
Radium
  Discovered in Turkestan; EP............ 311
Railroad shopmen's strike, 1922
  Injunction made permanent; EP......... 100
Railroads
  Electricity for railroads. J. G. Lyne; C.. 298
Railroads—Cuba
  Tarafa railroad bill; EP................. 206
Railroads—United States
  Beer and bigger things; E............... 479
  Deadly grade crossing; E................ 369
  Little old New England. W. Hard; S.... 435
  Railroads and the mechanics of social power. A. Pinchot; S.........429, 458, 488
Railroads and state—United States
  Can the government run railroads? A. Pinchot; S........ 429
  Pools of power. A. Pinchot; S.......... 488
Raisuli married; EP........................ 151
Ralph, Alan
  "It returns him to you a better man"; S. 156
Rascoe, Burton
  Oklahoma; low jacks and the crooked game; S........ 34
Rathom, John R. Obituary; EP............. 726
Rea, Samuel
  Railroad's reply; S...................... 80
Reading. See also Books and reading
Reason in fiction; E........................ 453
Reformers and pharisees. A. Meiklejohn; S.. 13
Reisiger, Hans
  Appeal from Stefan Zweig. S. Zweig; C.. 741
Relief work
  America in the fog; E.................. 544
  Important Russian relief. J. N. Rosenberg; C........ 88
  Misrepresentation hinders Russian relief; EP ........ 701
  Prompt aid for Japan; EP.............. 281
  Russia's need; EP...................... 282
  Shall we do nothing? E. Marbury; C.... 740
Reparations. See Germany—Reparations
Republican national convention
  Representation of southern states; EP.... 725
Resnikov, Philip S.
  "Bah"; C................................ 327
Reunion. E. A. Robinson; P................. 514
Rhode Island—Education
  Gallic war in Rhode Island. R. C. Dexter; S........ 215
Rice, Charles
  Are the Russians cruel?; C............. 327
Rinehart, Mary Roberts
  Breaking point. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ........ 273
Robert, Carl
  To students of Carl Robert. W. W. Hyde; C ........ 63
Robinson, Boardman
  The dictator (cartoon).................. 293
  International puzzle: who has the ball? (cartoon) ........ 507
  Poincaré (cartoon)...................... 352
Robinson, Edwin Arlington
  Reunion; P.............................. 514
Robinson, G.
  Our town and the championship bout; S.. 16
Robinson, William J.
  "It shall not be again"; C.............. 464
Robson, William A.
  Stray thoughts on a college pilgrimage; S ........ 108
Rodey, B. S.
  Presidential primaries; C................ 165
Rogers, William L.
  War the agency of law; EP............ 150
Roosevelt, Theodore, Jr.
  Roosevelt and the Klan; EP............ 677
Rorty, James
  A birth; P.............................. 553
Rosemary school, Greenwich, Conn.
  Trial by fire; E......................... 679
Rosenberg, James N.
  Important Russian relief; C............. 88
Rosenfeld, Morris. Obituary; EP............ 3
Rostand, Edmond
  Cyrano de Bergerac. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D........ 587
Roy, Basanta Koomar. See Basanta Koomar Roy
Royal fandango. Z. Akins; D................ 614
Ruhr Valley—French invasion
  British lion helpless; EP................ 149
  British note; EP........................ 99
  Collapse of the unholy alliance; E........ 180
  Death of a nation; E.................... 368
  Debate audiences disapprove; EP........ 449
  France in the Palatinate; I.............. 724
  French military orders; EP............. 73
  Incredibly severe sentences; EP.......... 149
  Military heel; I.......................... 592
  Neither peace nor victory; E............ 339
  Passive resistance; EP................47, 281
  Poincaré's terms; EP.................... 1
  Political prisoners in the Rhineland and the Ruhr. K. Francke; IS............ 638
  Results; EP.............99, 177, 205, 449, 699
  Should the United States occupy France?; E ........ 228
  Whither France? Whither Germany?; E. 76
Rumania
  New constitution of Rumania; I.......... 274
Rumely, Edward A.
  Statement; C............................ 166
Russell, Bertrand
  Slavery or self-extermination; S.......... 32
Russell, George W.
  Hunger strike in Ireland; IS............ 589
Russell, Lee M.
  Gov. Russell on the press; C............ 62
Russia
  After six years of bolshevism; EP........ 501
  B. K. Wheeler and the Civic federation; EP ........ 594
  Commercial and financial outlook; EP.... 337
  Helping Russia help herself; I........... 694
  Jews under the soviet regime. L. Talmy; IS ........ 533
  Joffe in Japan; IP...................... 70
  Land of leisure. M. Eastman; S......... 515
  Methodists and the soviet church; EP.... 594
  Mexico in Russia; IP.................... 566
  New Russian women. M. Marx; S....... 508, 549, 589
  Romanoff methods of rule; EP........... 621
  Russian cooperatives; I.................. 536
  Russia's era of revival. I. J. Hoorgin; S. 516
  Swiss assassin of soviet envoy acquitted; EP ........ 620
  Truth about Russia breaking; E.......... 6
  Workers' faculties. H. Pickering; IS.... 533
Russia—All-Russian agricultural exposition
  Lenin and the prize pig. D. Brewster; S. 510
Russia—Constitution
  Russia's new constitution; I............ 173
Russia—Economic conditions
  Russia's economic revival. A. M. Krasnochokov; IS........ 60
Russia—Education. See Education—Russia
Russia—Foreign relations
  Hughes fears recognition; EP........... 100
  Making friends in the Pacific; IP........ 364
  Russia and the Bulgarian reaction; I.... 447
Russia—National characteristics. See National characteristics, Russian Russia—Relief work. See Relief work
Russian-American industrial corporation
  RAIC declares a dividend. S. Hillman; C ........ 524

S

- S., T. W.
  - From a willing correspondent; C........ 609
- Saar Valley
  - Trouble on the Saar; I.................. 124
- Sabatai Zevi; D.......................... 359
- Sailing
  - Crossing Atlantic in 30-foot boat; EP.... 310
- Saintsbury, George
  - Saintsbury. L. Lewisohn; S............. 634
- Salvador
  - Commercial defends Hughes's loan agreement; EP.............................. 503
  - Lansing and the loan; EP............... 541
  - Mr. Hughes admits everything; E........ 479
  - Mr. Hughes makes a secret alliance; E.. 452
  - $6,000,000 loan; EP..................... 365
- Samoa
  - Tyranny in American Samoa; I.......... 26
- Sampter, Jessie E.
  - Voice from Jerusalem; C................ 241
- Sanborn, Pitts
  - Battistini; M............................ 248
  - Elder singers; M........................ 122
  - Victor Maurel, singing actor; M.......... 671
- Sandburg, Carl
  - Two sweetheart dippies (story).......... 15
- San Quentin
  - Books for San Quentin. W. T. Brown; C. 327
- Santo Domingo. See Dominican Republic
- Sarjyut Shankerlal
  - Gandhi's life in prison; IP............... 24
- School of opinion, Siasconset, Mass.
  - Subject for 1923 session; EP............ 179
- School tyranny in Seattle. W. Foote; C...... 18
- Schools
  - Ku Kluxism in the schools. D. H. Pierce; C .................................... 18
  - Trial by fire; E.......................... 679
- Schools. See also Colleges and universities
- Schools, Experimental
  - Seas of democracy; E.................. 704
- Schreiber, David
  - Poles protect "their" Jews; C.......... 741
- Schultze, Ernst
  - Leipzig's need; C....................... 195
- Schulze-Gaevernitz, Gerhart von
  - Visit to United States; EP.............. 621
- Scott, Susan B.
  - Oklahoma talks back; C................ 194
- Scott, Temple
  - Cézanne; A............................. 172
- Seattle, Washington
  - School tyranny in Seattle. W. Foote; C. 18
  - Strikes and bootleggers; EP............. 338
- Seitz, Don C.
  - Protest against Indiana imperialism; C.. 439
  - Where pie is king; S.................... 732
- Seligmann, Herbert J.
  - About art; C............................ 384
  - Picasso on fifth; A..................... 714
- Sergeant, Elizabeth Shepley
  - Dining in New Mexico; S............... 733
  - New Mexico; a relic of ancient America; S .................................... 577
- Servant problem solved; E................ 52
- Shakespeare, William
  - Hamlet. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D.... 718
- Shame woman. L. Vollmer; D.............. 587
- Shaw, George Bernard
  - Shewing-up of Blanco Posnet. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D....................... 496
- She would be! A. N. Lyons (story)......... 606
- Sherman, Stuart Pratt
  - "Quite unintelligible" Emerson. J. E. Spingarn; C.......................... 140
- Shewing-up of Blanco Posnet. G. B. Shaw; D .................................... 496
- Ships
  - Personality of ships; E.................. 505
- Shipwrecks
  - Amy Turner and the Trevessa; Dt...... 354
- Short stories
  - Far cry. Z. Gale........................ 112
  - Hack driver. S. Lewis.................. 211
  - Hungry souls. T. Mann................. 318
  - Mister God. M. Gorki................... 512
  - Mrs. Gladfelter's revolt. H. R. Martin.... 373
  - She would be! A. N. Lyons............. 606
  - This is life. E. S. Holding.............. 161
  - Two sweetheart dippies. C. Sandburg.... 15
  - Wiles of destiny. S. Asch............... 59
  - The woman. H. Barbusse.............. 262
- Silverman, Herman
  - Oil situation today; IS.................. 223
- Simplest way. Liu Tsung-Yüan; P.......... 645
- Sinclair, Harry F.
  - Supports both parties; EP.............. 502
- Sinclair, Upton
  - And the Los Angeles dock strike; EP.... 2
  - Protecting our liberties; S............... 9
- Singapore
  - Naval base for England; EP....150, 476, 726
- Singers
  - Elder singers. P. Sanborn; M........... 122
- Skeffington, Hanna Sheehy
  - Ireland; C............................... 62
- Slemp, Campbell Bascom, secretary to President; EP............................ 205
- Slocum, Joshua
  - Cap'n Josh Slocum; E.................. 370
- Smedley, Agnes
  - Starving Germany; S.................... 601
- Smertenko, Johan J.
  - Israel Zangwill; S....................... 483
- Smillie, Robert. Election; EP................ 1
- Smith, Elmer S.
  - Disbarment petition filed; EP........... 2
- Smith, Jessica
  - In the house of the Sugar King; S...... 518
- Snow, Wilbert
  - Impressions; P.......................... 739
- Soldiers' bonuses
  - Bonus legislation enough; EP........... 593
- Solitude and the Drifter; Dt................ 607
- Song overheard on the highway. A. Hamilton; P ..................................... 216
- Sophocles
  - Oedipus rex. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D. 531
- Sorolla, Joaquin. Obituary; EP............ 179
- South Africa of tomorrow; IP............... 279
- Southworth, Constant
  - When the franc joins the mark; S...... 321
- Spain
  - Should surrender African possessions; EP. 254
  - Spanish labor limps; I................... 448
- Spain—Labor and laboring classes. See Labor and laboring classes—Spain
- Spain—Politics and government
  - New military government; EP.......... 337
  - Revolt in Spain. S. M. Waxman; S...... 322
  - Spain today. R. A. Martínez, and S. M. Waxman; C.......................... 438
- Spectator (London)
  - Engages H. W. Massingham; EP........ 101
  - Spectator and Mr. Massingham. J. Brewer; C ................................... 384
- Spero. Sterling Denhard
  - "Reversing" Burleson's labor policy; S... 682
- Speyer, Leonora
  - Swallows pass through Rome; P......... 63
- Spingarn, J. E.
  - "Quite unintelligible" Emerson; C........ 140
- Spring cleaning. F. Lonsdale; D............ 614
- Stambuliiski, Alexander
  - Revolutionary days in Bulgaria. T. Berkes; S............................... 37
- Starrett, Vincent
  - Death-watch; P.......................... 111
- Steamships and steamboats
  - Big and the little at sea; E............. 209
- Steel industry
  - In the steel country. H. Gellert; S....604, 632
- Steinmetz, Charles Proteus
  - Curse of work. W. N. Polakov; S...... 506
- Steward. Gustavus Adolphus
  - "White"; S............................. 436
- Stillman, Clara G.
  - Florida; the desert and the rose; S...... 485
- Stinnes, Hugo
  - Hugo Stinnes denies it. Humann; C.... 383
  - Stinnes—and Stresemann. J. Lachenbruch; S ................................... 213
- Stone, C. L.
  - Jim Crowism; C......................... 298
- Stopping at a friend's farm-house. Mêng Hao-Jan; P.......................... 646
- Straus, Henrietta
  - De Pachmann solves some enigmas; M.... 303
  - Renaissance of English music in England; M ................................... 201
  - Roland Hayes; M........................ 718
  - Striking the hour; M.................... 410
- Street railroads
  - New Jersey strike; EP.................. 338
  - Trolley's battle for life; E.............. 284
- Strikes—Great Britain
  - Dock strike; EP........................ 100
  - London's dockland. An onlooker......... 265
- Strikes—United States
  - New York pressmen's strike; EP........ 366
  - Newspapers; E.......................... 340
  - Trolley's battle for life; E.............. 284
- Superpower
  - Hoover's plan; EP...................542, 620
- Swallows pass through Rome. L. Speyer; P. 63
- Swan. F. Molnar; D........................ 587
- Sylvain, George
  - Plea for Haiti; C........................ 525

T

- T., B.
  - More about tax-exempt securities; C..... 140
- T., L.
  - Jews under the soviet regime; IS........ 533
- Taft, Clinton J.
  - Casuistry and strategy; C.............. 526
- Taggard, Genevieve
  - Woodsman; P........................... 464
- Talmy, L.
  - Soviet press; S......................... 519
  - Yiddish literature; a product of revolt; S. 137
- Taraknath Das
  - Will Gandhi die in jail?; C.............. 740
- Tariff—Great Britain
  - British elections; E..................... 597
- Tariff—United States
  - Changing views of bankers; EP.......... 700
- Tarkington, Booth
  - Magnolia. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D.. 273
- Tarkington, Booth, and H. L. Wilson
  - Tweedles. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D... 273
- Tarnish. G. Emery; D....................... 444
- Taxation—Great Britain
  - Land tax law destroyed; EP............ 74
- Taxation—United States
  - Oliver iron mining co. case; EP.......... 593
  - Secretary Mellon's proposed changes; EP.. 568
- Taxation, Exemption from
  - More about tax-exempt securities. B. T.; C ..................................... 140
  - Word on tax exemptions. H. H. Furth; C. 61
- Teachers—Rating
  - Self-rating of principals; EP............. 310
- Tennessee university
  - Monkeying; E........................... 104
- Texas
  - Appeal for clemency. A. S. Blackwell; C. 741
  - Jim Crow in Texas. W. Pickens; S...... 155
  - Mob violence; EP........................ 74
- Thayer, William Roscoe. Obituary; EP....... 283
- These United States
  - Florida. C. G. Stillman; S.............. 485
  - Illinois. H. V. O'Brien; S.............. 186
  - Indiana. T. Dreiser; S.................. 348
  - Kentucky. B. L. Burman; S............. 83
  - Missouri. M. O. Hudson; S............. 431
  - Montana. A. Fisher; S.................. 290
  - Nebraska. W. S. Cather; S............. 236
  - New Mexico. E. S. Sergeant; S.......... 577
  - North Dakota. R. G. Paterson; S........ 134
  - Oklahoma. B. Rascoe; S................ 34
  - Washington. R. Whitaker; S............ 707
- These United States. For earlier articles see indexes to previous volumes
- This is life. E. S. Holding (story).......... 161
- Thomas, A. E.
  - Jolly Roger. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D. 304
- Thomas, Norman
  - Youth and the American colleges; S...... 106
- Thompson, Basil
  - In the Creole capital; S................. 732
  - Poetaster; P............................. 397
- Three little business men; D............... 331
- Three score and ten. Mêng Hao-Jan; P.... 646
- Time; D..................................... 718
- Tittmann, Edward D.
  - Arkansas's literary reputation; C........ 89
- To a baby. M. Bodenheim; P............... 185
- To my brothers and sisters adrift in troubled times this poem of the moon. Po Chü-Yi; P................................ 645
- To my retired friend Wêi the eighth-born. Tu Fu; P............................. 646
- Todd, Constance L.
  - Against Gorki; C........................ 384
- Toksvig, Fridtjof
  - United States of Europe; IS............. 386
- Tourists
  - Intelligence tests for tourists. S. A. Olmsted; C.............................. 609
- Trade unions—Italy
  - Labor disunion in Italy; I............... 202
- Trade unions—United States
  - Barbers' unions bar women; EP........ 543
  - Company unions or national unions? a debate. P. Blanshard, S. Rea, N. P. Good; S.............................. 79
  - Factories of public opinion; E........... 623
  - Obstacles in steel industry; EP.......... 542
  - Women and Negroes excluded. K. Fisher; C .................................. 636
- Tresca, Carlo
  - Anti-fascist weekly barred from mails; EP ................................. 207
  - Convicted for advertisement; EP.....676, 701
- Tropic. D. H. Lawrence; P................. 393
- Tu, Theodore B.
  - That typical American dinner; C........ 687
- Tu Fu
  - To my retired friend Wêi the eighth-born; P ................................... 646
- Tulsa, Oklahoma
  - When the troops took Tulsa. M. Coleman; S ................................... 239
- Turkey
  - Allied troops leave Constantinople; EP.. 423
  - Celebrates Lausanne treaty; EP.......... 127
  - Labor in Turkey; I...................... 566
  - Turkey and Armenia. A. Moss, and F. Gilliam; C........................... 140
- Tweedles. B. Tarkington, and H. L. Wilson; D ................................... 273
- Two portraits. M. Bodenheim; P............ 10
- Two sweetheart dippies. C. Sandburg; P.... 15

U

- Unemployment—Great Britain
  - Winter prospects serious; EP............ 226
- United mine workers of America
  - Ku Klux tactics; EP.................... 28
  - Stories of bolshevik menace; EP......... 310
- United States
  - People let down. W. Hard; S.......... 58
- United States. See also New England
- United States—Army
  - "It returns him to you a better man." A. Ralph; S............................. 156

United States—Cabinet
  Resignations in order; EP............... 149
United States—Congress
  Deaths and resignations; EP............. 621
  Extra sessions; EP...................... 178
  Major parties fear "radicals"; EP........ 726
  President and the progressives; E........ 703
  Progressives progress. W. Hard; S...... 712
United States—Constitution
  Remaking the constitution; E............ 286
United States—Customs service. See Customs service—United States
United States—Defenses
  Disarm the Mexican boundary; EP....... 541
  Expenditures for war, past and present; EP .............................. 675
  Gum and the army. S. T. Byington; C.. 463
United States—Foreign relations
  America worst. W. Hard; S............ 737
  Brazil naval mission should be recalled; EP .............................. 620
  Commercial defends Salvador loan agreement; EP.............................. 503
  Haiti appeals to the world; I............ 750
  Imperial America in Haiti; I............ 749
  Japan and the United States; I.......... 361
  Mr. Hughes admits everything; E........ 479
  Mr. Hughes makes a secret alliance; E.. 452
  Monroe doctrine—killed in its home. E. H. Gruening; S......................... 630
  Mussolini and Hughes; E................ 257
  "No policy of aggression"; E............ 679
  Recognition of Mexico; EP.............. 253
  Toward Britain. W. Hard; S............ 603
  Treaty with Turkey; EP................ 149
  Two significant cablegrams; I............ 566
  Ways of the Fathers. A. L.; C.......... 608
  Where Mexico stands; I.................. 305
United States—Foreign relations. See also Europe and the United States
United States—Indian affairs, Office of
  For the Indian's sake. O. G. V.; S...... 734
United States—National characteristics. See National characteristics, American United States—National petroleum reserves. See National petroleum reserves
United States—Navy
  California coast disaster; EP.........365, 425
United States—Politics and government
  Paradoxology. W. Hard; S.............. 554
  Political confusion; E.................. 154
  Straws and confetti. W. Hard; S........ 86
United States—Politics and government. See also Elections—United States; Enemy property; Political parties — United States; Presidents—United States; Primaries; United States—Congress
United States—Post office department
  "Reversing" Burleson's labor policy. S. D. Spero; S......................... 682
United States—Reclamation service
  Dismissal of A. P. Davis; EP............ 206
United States—Senate
  Those terrifying farmers. W. Hard; S.. 105
United States—Taxation. See Taxation—United States
United States—Veterans' bureau
  Mistreating our ex-service men. S. Danziger; S................................ 184
  Senate inquiry; EP...................503, 619
United States steel corporation
  Extra dividend and 8-hour day; EP...... 542
  Judge Gary indorses drama; EP......... 129

V

V., O. G.
  For the Indian's sake; S................. 734
Valparaiso university
  Change of management; EP............. 128
Van Doren, Mark
  Arabia Deserta; S........................ 648
Vanities; D................................ 412
Villard, Oswald Garrison
  Boston, a journalistic poor-farm; S...... 109
  Did passive resistance fail?; S........... 600
  End of the German empire; S............ 481
  England at the crossroads; S............ 625
  Germany's darkest week; S.............. 507
  Germany's political failures; S.......... 705
  Next war draws near; S................. 680
  Only hope; S............................ 371
  Red Saxony; S.......................... 573
  Washington, a capital without a Thunderer; S............................... 232
  What of the League?; S................. 455
Viner, Frances Klein
  Rest of West Virginia; C................ 354
  West Virginia article; C................. 195
Violence. See Force (violence)
Virgin Islands
  Life in the Virgin Islands; IP........... 26
  Misery in the Virgin Islands. Publicity committee. R. Francis, Chairman; C.. 165
  Our rule in the Virgin Islands. C. Holstein; C................................ 63
Vollmer, Lula
  Shame woman. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D ................................ 587
Von Kahr at the beer-hall; IP............. 722

W

Wages in New York state; EP............. 568
Wallas, Graham
  Dartmouth alumni lectures; EP.......... 49
Wallerstein, Bertha
  New emancipation of the Negro; S...... 263
Walsh, Frank P.
  Jim Crowism; C........................ 298
Walton, John Calloway
  Anarchy in Oklahoma; E................ 369
  Attempted dictatorship; EP.............. 450
  Governor and the Klan; EP............. 338
  Oklahoma's klan-fighting governor. A. Blake; S............................. 353
  Removal from office; EP................ [illegible]
War
  Law—not war; E........................ 103
  Next next war; E........................ 30
  "Selling" us another war. F. J. Libby; S ................................ 315
War debts. See Debts, Public
War memorials
  American legion post 113; EP........... 676
  France orders inscription removed; EP.. 569
  San Francisco site leased; EP........... 179
Warner, Arthur
  Progress (and poverty) in Porto Rico; S .............................158, 189
Warriner, Samuel D.
  Coal characters. W. Hard; S............ 294
Waseda university
  Japanese students show their opposition to militarism; IP......................... 44
  Students and militarism; EP............ 28
Washington, D. C.
  Intellectual Washington. G. F. Bowerman; C ................................ 439
  Washington, a capital without a Thunderer. O. G. Villard; S................ 232
Washington (state)
  Washington; the dawn of a tomorrow. R. Whitaker; S......................... 707
Watson, Blanche
  Books for Germany; C.................. 355
  Mahatma Gandhi and Jesus of Nazareth; C ................................ 713
Waxman, Samuel M.
  Revolt in Spain; S...................... 322
  Spain today; C......................... 438
Weeks, John Wingate
  Challenge to Henry Ford; E............. 453
Weiss, Albert P.
  Mr. Stuart Chase's Junk; C............. 116
West Virginia
  Ku Kluxism in the schools. D. H. Pierce; C ................................ 18
  Rest of West Virginia. F. K. Viner; C.. 354
  West Virginia article. F. K. Viner; C.... 195
Wheat
  Making wheat sober up. W. Hard; S.... 14
Whisker championship; EP................ 75
Whitaker, Robert
  Washington; the dawn of a tomorrow; S.. 707
White, William Allen
  Fish hook's disapproval; EP............ 179
  Supremacy of beefsteak; S.............. 731
Whitney, Charlotte Anita
  Ireland; C.............................. 62
Whole town's talking. J. Emerson and A. Loos; D............................. 304
Wiggin, Kate Douglas. Obituary; EP........ 227
Wiles of destiny. S. Asch (story).......... 59
Williams college institute of politics. See Institute of politics
Williamson, Guy
  Lingerie in Oklahoma; C............... 438
Wilson, Harry Leon, and B. Tarkington
  Tweedles. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D... 273
Wilson, P. W.
  Feels Massingham his superior; EP...... [illegible]
Wilson, Woodrow
  Advocates Christian brotherhood; EP..... 127
Windows. L. Lewisohn; D................. 469
Winsor, Mary
  Mischievous movie; C.................. 636
Wolf, Robert L.
  Cobweb boy; P......................... 607
  Pagan reinvokes the twenty-third psalm; P ................................ 607
Wolfe, W. W.
  Why they subscribe; C.................. 39
Woman
  Man's sphere; E........................ 29
  New program for women; E............ 285
  Woman's 75-year fight. A. S. Blackwell; S ................................ 53
Woman—Employment
  Barbers' unions bar women; EP......... 543
  Questions for the Woman's party. F. Kelley; C.............................. 241
  Wages in New York state; EP.......... 568
  Women and Negroes excluded. K. Fisher; C ................................ 636
Woman—Employment. See also Working girls and women
Woman—Equal rights
  Mischievous movie. M. Winsor; C........ 636
  Questions for the Woman's party. F. Kelley; C................................ 241
  Right to jail for speeders; EP........... 595
  Woman's party amendment; EP......... 129
Woman—law
  Woman without a country; E............ 730
Woman—Russia
  New Russian women. M. Marx; S...... 508, 549, 580
The woman. H. Barbusse (story)............ 262
Woman on the jury; D..................... 273
Women and politics
  First woman ambassador. F. Holbrook; C ................................ 39
Wood, Charles W.
  Challenge to The Nation; C.............. 556
Wood, Clement
  What Alabama offers; S................. 733
Wood, Leonard
  Filipinos protest; EP.................99, 450
Woodbridge, Benjamin M.
  Homely truth; C....................... 327
Woodsman. G. Taggard; P................. 464
Wooster, Ernest S.
  Inside a cooperative colony; S........... 378
Workers' education
  Workers' faculties. H. Pickering; IS.... 533
Workers' party
  Pennsylvania justice..................... 381
Workers prison relief committee
  Christmas in prison; C.................. 713
Working girls and women
  Contribution to family support; EP...... 129
World court. See League of nations. Permanent court of international justice
Wrangel Island expedition
  Ada Blackjack, lone survivor; EP........ 283
  Wrangel Island; I....................... 306

Y

Yacht racing
  Big and the little at sea; E............. 209
Yeats, William Butler
  Player queen. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D. 496
Yiddish literature
  Yiddish literature; a product of revolt. L. Talmy; S.......................... 137
Young, Art
  Looking on (cartoons).................7, 457
Young, J. M. Stuart
  "Love of liberty brought us here"; C.... 582
Youssopoff, Prince, admitted to United States; EP ................................ 619
Youth and the American colleges. N. Thomas; S ................................ 106
Youth movement
  From the Young Friends; I.............. 307
  German youth and the pagan gods. B. Allinson; S............................ 296

Z

Zaharoff, Sir Basil; Dt..................... 326
Zangwill, Israel
  Israel Zangwill. J. Smertenko; S........ 483
  Views about United States; EP......... 568
  Zionism controversy; EP................ 450
Zeigner, Ernst
  Red Saxony. O. G. Villard; S........... 573
Zionism
  Issues of third world congress; EP...... 179
  Zangwill controversy; EP................ 450
Zweig, Stefan
  Appeal from Stefan Zweig; C........... 741

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

| | |
|---|---|
| B | Book review |
| AN | Brief annotation |
| R | Reviewer |

A

- Adams, John Quincy
  - Life of William Shakespeare; B.......... 271
- Advance of the American short story. E. J. O'Brien; B.......... 243
- Die aera Bülow. J. Haller; B.......... 92
- Africa, Partition and colonization of. C. Lucas; B.......... 247
- After all. G. F. Hummel; B.......... 200
- Aiken, Conrad
  - Pilgrimage of Festus; B.......... 271
- Alciphron
  - Letters; AN.......... 745
- Allen, Edward E.; R.......... 199
- America and the Atlantic. G. A. Ballard; AN. 531
- American addresses. C. Weizmann; AN...... 222
- American government. F. A. Ogg and P. O. Ray; B.......... 272
- American intelligence, Study of. C. C. Brigham; B.......... 330
- American Jewish yearbook. v. 25; AN...... 469
- American literature, Classic. D. H. Lawrence; B.......... 398
- American literature, Some makers of. W. L. Phelps; B.......... 464
- American party system. C. E. Merriam; B.. 612
- American poetry since 1900. L. Untermeyer; AN.......... 670
- Americanism. W. T. Colyer; AN.......... 495
- Americans in eastern Asia. T. Dennett; B.. 357
- Angell, Katharine Sergeant; R..........66, 94
- Arlie Gelston. R. L. Sergel; B.......... 742
- Armên Ohanian. See Ohanian, Armên
- Armstrong, William, editor
  - Lillian Nordica's Hints to singers; B.... 440
- Arnold, William Harris
  - Ventures in book collecting; AN.......... 531
- Art of poetry. W. P. Ker; AN.......... 746
- Art of the prima donna and concert singer. F. H. Martens; B.......... 440
- Art spirit. R. Henri; B.......... 495
- As they are; French political portraits; B.... 666
- Asch, Nathan; R.......... 43
- Asquith, Herbert Henry
  - Genesis of the war; B.......... 745
- Astor, J. J., and others
  - Third winter of unemployment; B....... 652
- Atwood, Millard Van Marter
  - Country newspaper; B.......... 269

B

- B., D.; R.......... 529
- Bacheller, Irving
  - Scudders; AN.......... 247
- Back seat. G. B. Stern; AN.......... 410
- Bacourt, Pierre de, and J. W. Cunliffe
  - French literature during the last half-century; AN.......... 273
- Bagger, Eugene S.
  - Eminent Europeans; B.......... 40
- Ballard, G. A.
  - America and the Atlantic; AN.......... 531
- Balmont, Constantin
  - Visions solaires; B.......... 64
- Barnabé and his whale. R. Thévenin; AN... 746
- Barnes, Harry Elmer; R..........20, 121
- Barnouw, A. J.
  - Holland under Queen Wilhelmina; AN.. 614
- Barrie Marvell. C. Vince; B.......... 668
- Barry, Florence V.
  - Century of children's books; B.......... 560
- Bars and shadows. R. Chaplin; B.......... 219
- Barton, Alfred
  - World history for the workers; AN...... [illegible]
- Beals, Carleton
  - Mexico; B.......... 660
- Becker, Carl; R.......... 556
- Behaviorism and psychology. A. A. Roback; AN.......... 122
- Being respectable. G. H. Flandrau; B........ 66
- Belloc, Hilaire
  - On; B.......... 530
- Benét, Laura; R.......... 94
- Bennett, Arnold
  - Riceyman Steps; B.......... 717
- Bercovici, Konrad
  - Murdo; B.......... 43
- Bercovici, Konrad; R.......... 743
- Berguer, George
  - Some aspects of the life of Jesus; B..... 664
- Bermuda. A. F. Rider; AN.......... [illegible]
- Berridge, William A.
  - Cycles of unemployment; B.......... 743
- Best poems of 1922. T. Moult, editor; AN.. 531
- Bewer, Julius A.
  - Literature of the old testament; B....... 169
- Bezard, Julien
  - My class in composition; B.......... 742
- Bible, Story of the. H. W. Van Loon; B.... 714
- Bickersteth, Geoffrey L.
  - Poems of Leopardi; B.......... 143
- Bilder aus der letzten kaiserzeit . O. Hammann; B.......... 92
- Biology of death. R. Pearl; AN.......... 614
- Birds, beasts and flowers. D. H. Lawrence; B.......... 660
- Biriukov, Paul, editor
  - Tolstoy's love letters; B.......... 220
- Bismarck, Der missverstandene. O. Hammann; B.......... 92
- Blatch, Harriot Stanton, editor
  - Elizabeth Cady Stanton; B.......... 63
- Blei, Franz
  - Das grosse bestiarium der modernen literatur; B.......... 300
- Blind bow-boy. C. Van Vechten; B.......... 244
- Blunden, Edmund
  - Bonadventure; AN.......... 122
- Boas, George; R.......... 119
- Body of this death. L. Bogan; B.......... 494
- Boeckel, Richard
  - Labor's money; B.......... 466
- Bogan, Louise
  - Body of this death; B.......... 494
- Bok, Edward W.
  - Man from Maine; B.......... 302
- Bonadventure. E. Blunden; AN.......... 122
- Bone, David W.
  - Lookoutman; B.......... 558
- Book of Danish verse; B.......... 197
- Book of love. C. Vildrac; AN.......... 200
- Books and authors. P. Lubbock; B.......... 91
- Boule de suif. G. de Maupassant; B.......... 118
- Bourgeois, Emile, and L. André
  - Les sources de l'histoire de France, XVIIe siècle; AN.......... 67
- Boyd, Ernest; R..........244, 299, 406
- Boyd, Thomas
  - Through the wheat; B.......... 66
- Bradford, Gamaliel
  - Damaged souls; B.......... 196
- Bradley, H. Dennis
  - Eternal masquerade; AN.......... 200
- Bradley, Phillips; R..........221, 272, 356, 612
- Brainard, Annie M.
  - Evolution of public health nursing; B.... 529
- Brandes, Georg
  - Creative spirits of the nineteenth century; B.......... 399
  - Hellas einst und jetzt; B.......... 399
  - Main currents of nineteenth century literature; B.......... 399
- Bread. C. G. Norris; AN.......... 410
- Brentano, Frantz Funck-. See Funck-Brentano, Frantz
- Bridal wreath. S. Undset; AN.......... 200
- Brigham, Carl C.
  - Study of American intelligence; B....... 330
- Brighouse, Harold
  - Wrong shadow; B.......... 42
- Brighter intervals. G. Phillips; AN.......... 746
- Brown, Alice
  - Ellen Prior; AN.......... 614
- Brown, George Rothwell
  - Leadership of congress; B.......... 356
- Brown, William
  - Suggestion and medical analysis; AN..... 23
- Browne, Lewis; R.......... 23
- Budget of the United States, First year of. C. G. Dawes; B.......... 302
- Das bücher-dekameron. K. Edschmid; B..... 300
- Building the American nation. N. M. Butler; B.......... 528
- Bunin, Ivan
  - Village; B.......... 358
- Bunk. W. E. Woodward; B.......... 398
- Burden of unemployment. P. Klein; B....... 652
- Burgess, John W.
  - Recent changes in American constitutional theory; B.......... 656
- Burglar. In the clutch of circumstance; B.. 94
- Burman, Ben Lucien; R..........198, 408
- Burr, Anna Robeson
  - Wrong move; AN.......... 67
- Bury, John Bagnell
  - History of the later Roman empire; B.... 20
- Busby, Olive Mary
  - Studies in the development of the fool in the Elizabethan drama; B.......... 611
- Butler, Nicholas Murray
  - Building the American nation; B......... 528
- Bynner, Witter, translator
  - Book of love. C. Vildrac; AN.......... 200
- Byrne, Donn
  - Changeling and other stories; B.......... 655

C

- Cady, Lyman V.; R.......... 302
- Caillaux, Joseph
  - Whither France? Whither Europe?; B.. 22
- Calina, Josephine
  - Shakespeare in Poland; B.......... 611
- Canby, Henry Seidel; R.......... 649
- Canfield, Dorothy. See Fisher, Dorothy Canfield
- Carroll, Mollie Ray
  - Labor and politics; B.......... 167
- Carson, Gerald Hewes; R..........91, 666
- Castle conquer. P. Colum; B.......... 299
- Catchings, Waddill, and W. T. Foster. Money; B.......... 465
- Cather, Willa Sibert
  - Lost lady; B.......... 610
- Catherine de Médicis. P. Van Dyke; B...... 90
- Celestial omnibus. E. M. Forster; AN....... 247
- Century of children's books. F. V. Barry; B.. 560
- Chambers, Robert W.
  - Eris; AN.......... 444
- Changeling. D. Byrne; B.......... 655
- Chaplin, Ralph
  - Bars and shadows; B.......... 219
- Charm of the middle kingdom. J. R. Marsh; B.......... 302
- Chevrillon, André
  - Three studies in English literature; Kipling, Galsworthy, Shakespeare; B....... 65
- Chew, Samuel; R..........65, 196, 219, 559, 611
- Children astray. S. Drucker and M. B. Hexter; B.......... 272
- Children of the sun. W. J. Perry; B........ 609
- China. Charm of the middle kingdom. J. B. Marsh; B.......... 302
- Christ or Mars? W. Irwin; B.......... 654
- Christianity, Short history of. S. Reinach; B.. 358
- Church history to A. D. 461. B. J. Kidd; B.. 23
- Cicero
  - De senectute; De amicitia; De divinatione; translated by W. A. Falconer; B....... 441
- Cicero and his influence. J. C. Rolfe; B.... 441
- Cinder buggy. G. Garrett; AN.......... 692
- City block. W. Frank; B.......... 94
- Claghorn, Kate Holladay
  - Immigrant's day in court; B.......... 21
- Clarkson, Grosvenor B.
  - Industrial America in the world war; B.. 221
- Cleghorn, Sarah N.; R.......... 119
- Cloud castle. E. Thomas; AN.......... 562
- Cobb, Irvin S.
  - Laugh a day keeps the doctor away; AN.. 562
- Cocteau, Jean
  - Le grand ecart; B.......... 168
- Colum, Padraic
  - Castle conquer; B.......... 299
- Colyer, W. T.
  - Americanism, a world menace; AN...... 495
- Community newspaper. E. P. Harris and F. H. Hooke; B.......... 269
- Le compagnon. V. Margueritte; B.......... 467
- Conflict and dream. W. H. R. Rivers; B.... 141
- Conquistador. K. F. Gerould; AN.......... 172
- Contemporary verse anthology, Second. C. W. Stork, editor; AN.......... 746
- Control of industry. D. H. Robertson; B.... 716
- Control of wages. W. Hamilton and S. May; B.......... 493
- Costs and profits. H. B. Hastings; B....... 743
- Country newspaper. M. V. Atwood; B...... 269
- Crawford, John W.; R..........42, 66, 330
- Creative spirits of the nineteenth century. G. Brandes; B.......... 399
- Crime. C. Darrow; B.......... 94
- Crucibles of crime. J. F. Fishman; B........ 662
- Cults of Campania. R. M. Peterson; AN.... 746
- Cummings, E. E.
  - Tulips and chimneys; AN.......... 614
- Cunliffe, J. W., and P. de Bacourt
  - French literature during the last half-century; AN.......... 273
- Curtis, Cyrus H. K. Man from Maine. E. W. Bok; B.......... 302
- Cycles of unemployment. W. A. Berridge; B. 743
- Czechoslovakia, Financial policy of. A. Rasin; B.......... 246

D

- Damaged souls. G. Bradford; B.......... 196
- Damon, Samuel Foster, and R. S. Hillyer, translators
  - Book of Danish verse; B.......... 197
- Dance of life. H. Ellis; B.......... 19
- Dancer of Shamahka. A. Ohanian; AN...... 67
- Danish verse, Book of; B.......... 197
- Dargan, E. Preston, and W. A. Nitze
  - History of French literature; B.......... 93
- Darrow, Clarence
  - Crime; its cause and treatment; B........ 94
- Das, Taraknath. See Taraknath Das
- Davies, W. H.
  - Collected poems; second series; AN...... 692
- Davis, Elmer
  - Times have changed; AN.......... 144
- Davis, Jefferson, his life and personality. M. Schaff; AN.......... 66
- Dawes, Charles G.
  - First year of the budget of the U. S.; B. 302
- Day's journey. W. B. Maxwell; AN......... 331
- De amicitia. Cicero; B.......... 441
- De divinatione. Cicero; B.......... 441
- De senectute. Cicero; B.......... 441

Deep channel. M. P. Montague; AN... 410
De Ford, Miriam Allen; R... 219
Dell, Floyd; R... 650
Demonism verified and analyzed. H. W. White; B... 93
Dennett, Tyler
  Americans in eastern Asia; B... 357
Desert horizon. E. L. G. Watson; B... 169
Desolate splendour. M. Sadleir; B... 330
Dethronements. L. Housman; AN... 561
Die deutsche literatur unserer zeit. K. Martens; B... 300
Deutsche literaturgeschichte in einer stunde. A. Henschke; B... 300
Development of a youth. E. Haeckel; B... 527
Development of social theory. J. P. Lichtenberger; AN... 95
Development of the American short story. F. L. Pattee; B... 243
Dickensian inns and taverns. B. W. Matz; B... 198
Dickinson, Goldsworthy Lowes
  War; its nature, cause and cure; B... 167
Dickinson, Zenas Clark
  Economic motives; B... 328
Dillon, E. J.
  President Obregon, a world reformer; B.. 492
Dixon, Maynard
  Injun babies; AN... 668
Dr. Doolittle's post office. H. Lofting; B... 560
Dodd, Walter F.
  State government; B... 272
Dodd, Walter F., and Sue Hutchinson
  Government in Illinois; B... 245
Don Juan. L. Lewisohn; B... 649
Dostoievsky; letters and reminiscences
  S. S. Koteliansky and J. M. Murry, translators; B... 220
Doughty, Charles M.
  Travels in Arabia Deserta; B... 648
Dream and other poems. J. Masefield; AN.. 200
Drucker, Saul, and M. B. Hexter
  Children astray; B... 272
Duff, J. D., translator
  Memoirs of Alexander Herzen; B... 691
Dunsany, Lord
  Plays of gods and men; B... 95
  Plays of near and far; B... 95
Dyboski, Roman
  Rise and fall in Shakespeare's dramatic art; B... 611

E

Earle, Edward Mead
  Turkey, the great powers, and the Bagdad railway; B... 556
Earlham. P. Lubbock; B... 91
Early northern painters. Mrs. C. R. Peers; B... 408
Earp, J. Rosslyn; R... 529
Eckardstein, Hermann, freiherr von
  Lebenserinnerungen und politische denkwürdigkeiten; B... 92
Economic history. N. S. B. Gras; B... 442
Economic motives. Z. C. Dickinson; B... 328
Economics of the hour. J. St. L. Strachey; B... 716
Economics of unemployment. J. A. Hobson; B... 652
Edman, Irwin; R...141, 299, 440
Edschmid, Kasimir
  Das bücher-dekameron; B... 300
Education and training for social work. J. H. Tufts; B... 245
Elegy on Randolph's finger. W. Hemminge; AN... 359
Elizabethan drama, Fool in. O. M. Busby; B. 611
Ellen Prior. A. Brown; AN... 614
Ellis, Havelock
  Dance of life; B... 19
Ellis, S. M., editor
  Mid-Victorian Pepys; AN... 469
Eminent Europeans. E. S. Bagger; B... 40
Emperor's old clothes. F. Heller; B... 43
End of the House of Alard. S. Kaye-Smith; B... 689
England under the restoration. T. G. Stone; AN... 67
English grammar, Old. J. and E. M. Wright; AN... 144
English metre. E. Smith; AN... 359
English words and their background. G. H. McKnight; AN... 43
Erasmus. P. Smith; B... 651
Eris. R. W. Chambers; AN... 444
Die ermordung des erzherzogs Franz Ferdinand. S. Stanojevic; B... 142
Erskine, John
  Literary discipline; B... 168
Escapade. E. Scott; B... 141
Eternal masquerade. H. D. Bradley; AN... 200
Europe, 1878-1919. G. P. Gooch; B... 690
Europe in the Middle ages. I. L. Plunket; AN... 66
Europe since 1918. H. A. Gibbons; B... 443
Extemporary essays. M. Hewlett; B... 530
Eyles, Leonora
  Hidden lives; AN... 410

F

Famous single poems. B. E. Stevenson; AN. 562
Fan. W. H. Hudson; B... 530
Fantastica. R. Nichols; B... 650
Farewell to America. H. W. Nevinson; AN.. 144
Feet of clay. M. Tuttle; AN... 495
Fern lover's companion. G. H. Tilton; AN.. 23
Financial policy of Czechoslovakia. A. Rasin; B... 246
First year of the budget of the United States. C. G. Dawes; B... 302
Fish, Horace
  Teressa of Spain; B... 43
Fisher, Dorothy Canfield
  Raw material; AN... 331
Fishman, Joseph F.
  Crucibles of crime; B... 662
Fisk, Eugene Lyman
  Health building and life extension; AN.. 222
Flandrau, Grace H.
  Being respectable; B... 66
Fletcher, J. S.
  Markenmore mystery; AN... 562
Fool in the Elizabethan drama. O. M. Busby; B... 611
Forster, E. M.
  Celestial omnibus; AN... 247
Foster, William Trufant, and W. Catchings
  Money; B... 465
France, Les sources de l'histoire de. E. Bourgeois and L. André; AN... 67
Franck, Harry A.
  Wandering in northern China; B... 744
Frank, Glenn; R... 714
Frank, Tenney
  History of Rome; B... 20
Frank, Waldo
  City block; B... 94
  Holiday; B... 585
Frankau, Gilbert
  Woman of the horizon; AN... 247
Free thought and official propaganda. B. Russell; AN... 122
French literature, History of. W. A. Nitze and E. P. Dargan; B... 93
French literature, Landmarks in. L. Strachey; B... 198
French literature during the last half-century. J. W. Cunliffe and P. de Bacourt; AN. 273
French parties and politics. R. H. Soltau; B. 221
Friend at court. L. and E. Stern; AN... 273
From an American legation. I. N. Morris; AN... 746
From immigrant to inventor. M. Pupin; B.. 557
From McKinley to Harding. H. H. Kohlsaat; B... 356
From the deep of the sea. C. E. Smith; AN. 23
Frost, Robert
  New Hampshire; B... 715
  Selected poems; B... 715
Fuller, Henry B.; R... 689
Funck-Brentano, Frantz
  Middle ages; B... 121

G

G., L. S.; R...22, 142, 221
Galimathias. M. Josephson; AN... 122
Gandhi, the apostle. H. T. Muzumdar; B... 243
Gannett, Lewis S.; R... 666
Gardiner, A. G.
  Life of Sir William Harcourt; B... 402
Garrett, Garet
  Cinder buggy; AN... 692
Gebhart, Emile
  Mystics and heretics in Italy; AN... 122
Gehring, John George
  Hope of the variant; B... 120
Genesis of the war. H. H. Asquith; B... 745
Germany's capacity to pay. H. G. Moulton and C. E. McGuire; B... 404
Gerould, Katharine Fullerton
  Conquistador; AN... 172
Ghent, W. J.
  Reds bring reaction; AN... 172
Gibbons, Herbert Adams
  Europe since 1918; B... 443
Giichi Ono. See Ono, Giichi
Gilbert, W. S.
  Story of the Mikado; AN... 444
Girdle of Aphrodite; the love poems of the Palatine anthology; translated by F. A. Wright; B... 441
Gissing, George
  Private papers of Henry Ryecroft; Dt... 240
Giving and receiving. E. V. Lucas; AN... 172
Goldbeck, Eva; R...169, 199
Goldenveizer, A. B.
  Talks with Tolstoy; B... 220
Goldsmith, Alfred F., and C. Wells
  Bibliography of the works of Walt Whitman; AN... 359
Gooch, G. P.
  History of modern Europe, 1878-1919; B. 690
Gorman, Jean Wright and H. S., editors
  Peterborough anthology; AN... 222
Gosse, Edmund
  More books on the table; B... 219
Gotaro Ogawa. See Ogawa, Gotaro
Gottschalk, Louis R.; R...662, 690
Government in Illinois. W. F. and S. H. Dodd; B... 245
Government—strikebreaker. J. Lovestone; B. 198
Graffe, Dorothy; R... 560
Le grand ecart. J. Cocteau; B... 168
Grandgent, C. H.; R... 143
Gras, N. S. B.
  Introduction to economic history; B... 442
Graves, Robert
  Whipperginny; B... 400
Grey towers; AN... 331
Griffin, Solomon Buckley
  People and politics; B... 356
Das grosse bestiarium der modernen literatur. F. Blei; B... 300
Gruening, Ernest H.; R...492, 660
Gruening, Martha; R...63, 467

H

Hadley, Herbert S.
  Rome and the world today; B... 20
Haeckel, Ernst
  Story of the development of a youth; B.. 527
Haller, Johannes
  Die aera Bülow; B... 92
Hallström, Per A. L.
  Selected short stories; B... 197
Hamilton, Walton, and S. May
  Control of wages; B... 493
Hammann, Otto
  Bilder aus der letzten kaiserzeit; B... 92
  Der missverstandene Bismarck; B... 92
  Zur vorgeschichte des weltkrieges; B... 92
Handling of words. V. Lee; AN... 201
Hansen, Harry
  Midwest portraits; B... 558
Harcourt, Sir William, Life of. A. G. Gardiner; B... 402
Hardy, Arthur Sherburne
  Things remembered; AN... 303
Harford, Henry, pseudonym. See Hudson, William Henry
Harmonium. W. Stevens; B... 400
Harraden, Beatrice
  Patuffa; AN... 614
Harris, Emerson P., and F. H. Hooke
  Community newspaper; B... 269
Harrison, Hubert; R...247, 358
Harrison, Marguerite E.
  Unfinished tales from a Russian prison; B. 529
Hartt, Rollin Lynde
  Man himself; B... 664
Hastings, Hudson Bridge
  Costs and profits; B... 743
Haunch paunch and jowl; B... 743
Hawkeye. H. Quick; AN... 247
Hawtrey, R. G.
  Monetary reconstruction; B... 743
Hayes, Carleton J. H., and P. T. Moon. Modern history; AN... 95
Health building and life extension. E. L. Fisk; AN... 222
Heart's blood. E. M. Kelley; AN... 331
Hellas einst und jetzt. G. Brandes; B... 399
Heller, Frank
  Emperor's old clothes; B... 43
Helm, Jeanette
  Without clues; AN... 562
Hemminge, William
  Elegy on Randolph's finger; AN... 359
Hendrick, Burton J.
  Jews in America; B... 468
  Jews in America. Correction... 532
Henri, Robert
  Art spirit; B... 495
Henschke, Alfred
  Deutsche literaturgeschichte in einer stunde; B... 300
Herrick, Robert; R... 654
Herskovits, Melville J.; R... 689
Hertzler, Joyce Oramel
  History of Utopian thought; B... 197
Herzen, Alexander
  Memoirs; B... 691
Hewlett, Maurice
  Extemporary essays; B... 530
Hexter, Maurice Beck, and S. Drucker
  Children astray; B... 272
Hidden lives. L. Eyles; AN... 410
Hieroglyphics. A. Machen; B... 329
Hill, Caroline Miles, editor
  World's great religious poetry; B... 246
Hillyer, Robert S., and S. F. Damon, translators
  Book of Danish verse; B... 197
Hippocrates; translated by H. S. Jones; B... 441
Hirst, Francis W.
  Paper moneys of Europe; B... 743
History, Modern. C. J. H. Hayes and P. T. Moon; AN... 95
Hobson, John Atkinson
  Economics of unemployment; B... 652
  Incentives in the new social order; B... 328
Holiday. W. Frank; B... 585
Holland under Queen Wilhelmina. A. J. Barnouw; AN... 614
Holmes, John Haynes; R... 664

- Holt, Winifred
  - Light which cannot fail; B.... 199
- Hooke, Florence Harris, and E. P. Harris
  - Community newspaper; B.... 269
- Hope of the variant. J. G. Gehring; B.... 120
- Horne, E. A.
  - Political system of British India; AN.... 614
- Horwill, Herbert W.; R..41, 144, 167, 402, 586, 745
- House, Roy Temple; R....64, 171, 359
- House of the enemy. C. Mallarmé; AN.... 531
- Housman, Laurence
  - Dethronements; AN.... 561
- Hudson, William Henry
  - Fan; B.... 530
- Hummel, George F.
  - After all; B.... 200
- Hunt, Leigh
  - Poetical works; AN.... 43
- Hunter, Rex; R.... 121
- Huxley, Aldous
  - On the margin; B.... 530

I

- Illinois, Government in. W. F. and S. H. Dodd; B.... 245
- Immigrant's day in court. K. H. Claghorn; B.... 21
- In the clutch of circumstance. A burglar; B. 94
- Incentives in the new social order. J. A. Hobson; B.... 328
- India in world politics. Taraknath Das; B.. 22
- Industrial America in the world war. G. B. Clarkson; B.... 221
- Industrial democracy. G. Plumb and W. G. Roylance; B.... 328
- Injun babies. M. Dixon; AN.... 668
- Irwin, Will
  - Christ or Mars?; B.... 654
- Isles of illusion. B. Lynch, editor; B.... 494
- Italian painting. F. J. Mather, Jr.; B.... 408

J

- J. Hardin & Son. B. Whitlock; B.... 654
- Jackson, Holbrook
  - Occasions; B.... 121
- Japan, Military industries of. U. Kobayashi; AN.... 67
- Jessup, Alexander, editor
  - Representative American short stories; B.. 243
- Jesus Christ. Some aspects of the Life of Jesus. G. Berguer; B.... 664
- Jesus Christ. The man himself. R. L. Hartt; B.... 664
- Jewish yearbook, American. v. 25; AN.... 469
- Jews in America. B. J. Hendrick; B.... 468
- Jews in America. B. J. Hendrick. Correction.... 532
- Jews in Egypt and in Palestine under the Fatimids. J. Mann; B.... 23
- Josephson, Matthew
  - Galimathias; AN.... 122
- Jung, C. G.
  - Psychological types; B.... 440

K

- Kangaroo. D. H. Lawrence; B.... 526
- Kaye-Smith, Sheila
  - End of the House of Alard; B.... 689
  - Tramping methodist; B.... 94
- Kelley, Ethel M.
  - Heart's blood; AN.... 331
- Kelley, Florence; R.... 272
- Ker, William Paton
  - Art of poetry; AN.... 746
- Ketterlinus, Eugenia; R.... 302
- Kidd, Beresford James
  - History of the church to A. D. 461; B.. 23
- Kitchen porch. G. P. Krapp; B.... 560
- Klabund, pseud. See Henschke, Alfred
- Klein, Philip
  - Burden of unemployment; B.... 652
- Knee-high to a grasshopper. A. and D. Parrish; B.... 560
- Kobayashi, Ushisaburo
  - Military industries of Japan; AN.... 67
- Kohlsaat, Herman H.
  - From McKinley to Harding; B.... 356
- Koren, John; R....94, 197
- Krapp, George Philip
  - Kitchen porch; B.... 560
- Kreymborg, Alfred
  - Less lonely; B.... 400
- Krock, Arthur B., compiler
  - Editorials of Henry Watterson; AN.... 444
- Krutch, J. W.; R....90, 168, 526, 610, 655, 717
- Kuczynski, R. R.; R.... 404
- Kultur un' civilizacia. W. Nathanson; B.... 121

L

- L., L.; R....270, 399
- Labor and politics. M. R. Carroll; B.... 167
- Labor's money. R. Boeckel; B.... 466
- Landmarks in French literature. L. Strachey; B.... 198
- Lascelles, Ernita
  - Sacrificial goat; B.... 559
- Late Mattia Pascal. L. Pirandello; B.... 408
- Laugh a day keeps the doctor away. I. S. Cobb; AN.... 562
- Lawrence, David Herbert
  - Birds, beasts and flowers; B.... 660
  - Kangaroo; B.... 526
  - Studies in classic American literature; B.. 398
- Leadership of congress. G. R. Brown; B.... 356
- Lebenserinnerungen und politische denkwürdigkeiten. Freiherr H. von Eckardstein; B.... 92
- Lee, Vernon, pseudonym (Violet Paget)
  - Handling of words; AN.... 201
- Left leg. T. F. Powys; B.... 358
- Legislative procedure. R. Luce; B.... 356
- Lengyel, Emil; R....170, 246, 301, 357
- Leopardi, Poems of. G. L. Bickersteth; B.. 143
- Lermontov, Sheaf from. J. J. Robins, translator; AN.... 222
- Less lonely. A. Kreymborg; B.... 400
- Lévy-Bruhl, Lucien
  - Primitive mentality; B.... 689
- Lewisohn, Ludwig
  - Don Juan; B.... 649
- Lewisohn, Ludwig; R....19, 95, 141, 558, 634
- Lichtenberger, James P.
  - Development of social theory; AN.... 95
- Life, Poems from; AN.... 95
- Light which cannot fail. W. Holt; B.... 199
- Lilienthal, David E.; R....466, 716
- Lind, John E.; R.... 120
- Lindquist, G. E. E., editor
  - Red man in the United States; B.... 218
- Literary discipline. J. Erskine; B.... 168
- Literature of the old testament. J. A. Bewer; B.... 169
- Little tigress. W. Smith; AN.... 468
- Little Tom. V. Tille; AN.... 247
- Lloyd George, David
  - Where are we going?; B.... 745
- Lofting, Hugh
  - Dr. Dolittle's post office; B.... 560
  - Story of Mrs. Tubbs; B.... 560
- Logic. H. B. Smith; B.... 330
- Lookoutman. D. W. Bone;; B.... 558
- Lord, Chester S.
  - Young man and journalism; B.... 269
- Lost lady. W. Cather; B.... 610
- Louis Napoleon and the recovery of France. F. A. Simpson; B.... 196
- Louis Napoleon and the recovery of France. F. A. Simpson. Voice from 1870. M. T. Ollivier; C.... 635
- Lovestone, Jay
  - Government—strikebreaker; B.... 198
- Lovett, Robert Morss; R.... 584
- Lubbock, Percy
  - Earlham; B.... 91
  - Roman pictures; B.... 668
- Lucas, Charles
  - Partition and colonization of Africa; B.. 247
- Lucas, Edward Verral
  - Giving and receiving; AN.... 172
- Lucas-Dubreton, J.
  - Le roi sauvage; B.... 359
- Lucatelli, Luigi
  - Teodoro the sage; B.... 301
- Luce, Robert
  - Legislative procedure; B.... 356
- Lutz, Hermann; R.... 92
- Lyeskov, Nicolai
  - Sentry and other stories; B.... 358
- Lynch, Bohun, editor
  - Isles of illusion; B.... 494
- Lynd, Robert
  - Books and authors; B.... 91

M

- Mabell, Countess of Airlie
  - Lady Palmerston and her times; B.... 144
- McCartney, Eugene S.
  - Warfare by land and sea; B.... 441
- McClintock, Walter
  - Old Indian trails; B.... 218
- MacCorkle, William A.
  - Personal genesis of the Monroe doctrine; B.... 199
- MacDonald, William
  - Reconstruction in France; AN.... 95
- MacDonald, William; R....170, 199, 245, 443, 528
- McGraw, John J.
  - My thirty years in baseball; B.... 40
- McGuire, C. E., and H. G. Moulton
  - Germany's capacity to pay; B.... 404
- Machen, Arthur
  - Hieroglyphics; B.... 329
  - Shining pyramid; AN.... 247
  - Things near and far; AN.... 172
- Mackenzie, F. A.
  - Russia before dawn; B.... 529
- McKnight, George H.
  - English words and their background; AN. 43
- Macy, John; R.... 398
- Mademoiselle Fifi. G. de Maupassant; B.... 118
- Magidoff, Jacob
  - Der spiegel von der East Side; AN.... 247
- Main currents of nineteenth century literature. G. Brandes; B.... 399
- Malady of Europe. M. E. Ravage; B.... 301
- Mallarmé, Camille
  - House of the enemy; AN.... 531
- Man from Maine. E. W. Bok; B.... 302
- Man himself. R. L. Hartt; B.... 664
- Mann, Jacob
  - Jews in Egypt and in Palestine under the Fatimids; B.... 23
- Manuscript of youth. D. Patrick; AN.... 410
- Marching on. R. Strachey; B.... 493
- Margueritte, Victor
  - Le compagnon; B.... 467
- Markenmore mystery. J. S. Fletcher; AN.... 562
- Marks, Henry K.
  - Undertow; AN.... 745
- Marsh, Frank Burr
  - Founding of the Roman empire; B.... 20
- Marsh, James Reid
  - Charm of the middle kingdom; B.... 302
- Martens, Frederick H.
  - Art of the prima donna and concert singer; B.... 440
- Martens, Kurt
  - Die deutsche literatur unserer zeit; B.... 300
- Masefield, John
  - Dream and other poems; AN.... 200
- Massingham, H. J.
  - Untrodden ways; AN.... 495
- Masson, Thomas L.
  - Our American humorists; AN.... 122
- Masters, Edgar Lee
  - Nuptial flight; B.... 270
- Mastro-Don Gesualdo. G. Verga; B.... 406
- Mathematics. D. E. Smith; B.... 441
- Mather, Frank Jewett, jr.
  - History of Italian painting; B.... 408
- Matz, Bertram Waldrom
  - Dickensian inns and taverns; B.... 198
- Maupassant, Guy de
  - Collected novels and stories; B.... 118
- Maxwell, W. B.
  - Day's journey; AN.... 331
- May, Stacy, and W. Hamilton
  - Control of wages; B.... 493
- Mayer, Edwin Justus
  - Preface to life; B.... 691
- Mead, Lucia Ames
  - Justice to Chicago; C.... 491
- Médicis, Catherine de. P. Van Dyke; B.... 90
- Men like gods. H. G. Wells; B.... 90
- Mencken, Henry Louis; R.... 40
- Merriam, Charles Edward
  - American party system; B.... 612
- Mexican nation. H. I. Priestley; B.... 492
- Mexico. C. Beals; B.... 660
- Mexico, Social revolution in. E. A. Ross; B.. 492
- Mi campagña hispano-americana. M. Ugarte; B.... 171
- Mid-Victorian Pepys. S. M. Ellis, editor; AN. 469
- Middle ages. F. Funck-Brentano; B.... 121
- Midwest portraits. H. Hansen; B.... 558
- Mikado, Story of the. W. S. Gilbert; AN.... 444
- Military industries of Japan. U. Kobayashi; AN.... 67
- Mill, John Stuart
  - On liberty; B.... 19
- Millay, Kathleen; R.... 197
- Miller, Herbert Adolphus; R.... 21
- Miller, Spencer, jr.; R.... 662
- Monetary reconstruction. R. G. Hawtrey; B.. 743
- Money. W. T. Foster and W. Catchings; B.. 465
- Monroe doctrine. W. A. MacCorkle; B.... 199
- Montague, Margaret Prescott
  - Deep channel; AN.... 410
- Montesquieu, Baron de
  - Persian letters; translated by J. Davidson; AN.... 561
- Moon, Parker Thomas, and C. J. H. Hayes
  - Modern history; AN.... 95
- Moore, Anne Carroll; R.... 651
- More books on the table. E. Gosse; B.... 219
- More lives than one. C. Wells; AN.... 495
- Morris, Ira Nelson
  - From an American legation; AN.... 746
- Moult, Thomas, editor
  - Best poems of 1922; AN.... 531
- Moulton, H. G., and C. E. McGuire
  - Germany's capacity to pay; B.... 404
- Muir, Ramsay
  - Politics and progress; AN.... 273
- Munroe, James Phinney
  - Life of Francis Amasa Walker; B.... 143
- Murdo. K. Bercovici; B.... 43
- Murry, John Middleton
  - Problem of style; B.... 171
- Mussey, Henry Raymond; R....167, 245, 302, 328, 442, 465, 493, 652, 743
- My class in composition. J. Bezard; B.... 742
- My thirty years in baseball. J. J. McGraw; B.... 40
- Mystics and heretics in Italy. E. Gebhart; AN. 122

N

Napoleon III. See Louis Napoleon
Nathan, Robert
  Puppet master; AN.................... 669
Nathanson, William
  Kultur un' civilizacia; B................ 121
Nearing, Scott; R.......................... 198
Negro soldiers. C. H. Williams; AN.......... 669
Neighborhood in nation-building. R. A. Woods; B .................................. 245
Neilson, William Allan; R.................. 271
Nevinson, Henry W.
  Farewell to America; AN................ 144
New Hampshire. R. Frost; B................ 715
New York city. A. F. Rider; AN............ 303
Newspapers and the historian. L. M. Salmon; B .................................. 269
Nichols, Robert
  Fantastica; B.......................... 650
Nicoll, Mrs. Allardyce. See Calina, Josephine
Nicolson, Harold
  Tennyson; B............................ 559
Nineteen hundreds. H. Wyndham; B........ 91
Nitze, William, and E. P. Dargan
  History of French literature; B........... 93
Noble, Richmond
  Shakespeare's use of song; B............ 611
Nordica, Lillian
  Hints to singers; B..................... 440
Norris, Charles G.
  Bread; AN.............................. 410
La notion d'espace. D. Nys; B.............. 119
Nuptial flight. E. L. Masters; B............ 270
Nys, D.
  La notion d'espace; B................... 119

O

Obregon, a world reformer. E. J. Dillon; B. 492
O'Brien, Edward J.
  Advance of the American short story; B. 243
Occasions. H. Jackson; B.................. 121
Ogawa, Gotaro
  Expenditures of the Russo-Japanese war; AN .................................. 67
Ogg, Frederic A., and P. O. Ray
  Introduction to American government; B. 272
Ohanian, Armên
  Dancer of Shamahka; AN................ 67
Old Indian trails. W. McClintock; B......... 218
Old testament, Literature of the. J. A. Bewer; B .................................. 169
On liberty. J. S. Mill; B.................. 19
On the margin. A. Huxley; B.............. 530
Ono, Giichi
  Expenditures of the Sino-Japanese war; AN .................................. 67
Our American humorists. T. L. Masson; AN. 122
Our changing constitution. C. W. Pierson; B. 221
Out of the past. R. W. Postgate; AN........ 495
Outlaw's diary. C. Tormay; B.............. 170
Owen, John
  Robert Gregory; B...................... 585
Oxford bibliographical society
  Proceedings and papers. v. 1, part 1; B. 611

P

Paget, Violet. See Lee, Vernon (pseudonym)
Palatine anthology. Girdle of Aphrodite; B.. 441
Palmerston, Lady, and her times. Mabell, Countess of Airlie; B.................. 144
Paper moneys of Europe. R. G. Hawtrey; B. 743
Parrish, Anne and Dillwyn
  Knee-high to a grasshopper; B.......... 560
Parrott, T. M.
  "Problem of Timon of Athens"; B....... 611
Parsons, Alice Beal; R..................... 494
Partition and colonization of Africa. C. Lucas; B .................................. 247
Patrick, Diana
  Manuscript of youth; AN................ 410
Pattee, Fred Lewis
  Development of the American short story; B .................................. 243
Patuffa. B. Harraden; AN.................. 614
Pearl, Raymond
  Biology of death; AN.................... 614
Pearson, Henry G.; R...................... 143
Peers, Mrs. C. R.
  Early northern painters; B.............. 408
People and politics. S. B. Griffin; B......... 356
Perry, W. J.
  Children of the sun; B.................. 609
Persian letters. Baron de Montesquieu; AN.. 561
Personal genesis of the Monroe doctrine. W. A. MacCorkle; B.................. 199
Peterborough anthology; AN................ 222
Peterson, Roy Merle
  Cults of Campania; AN.................. 746
Petrie, W. M. Flinders
  Social life in ancient Egypt; AN......... 670
Petronius Arbiter
  Satyricon; translated by J. M. Mitchell; B. 441
Pettit, Walter W.; R....................... 527
Phelps, William Lyon
  Some makers of American literature; B.. 464
Phillips, Gordon
  Brighter intervals; AN.................. 746
Philosophy of civilization. R. H. Towner; AN. 746
Pierson, Charles W.
  Our changing constitution; B............ 221
Pilgrimage of Festus. C. Aiken; B.......... 271
Pirandello, Luigi
  Late Mattia Pascal; B.................. 408
Plays of gods and men. Lord Dunsany; B.. 95
Plays of near and far. Lord Dunsany; B.... 95
Plumb, Glenn E., and W. G. Roylance
  Industrial democracy; B................. 328
Plunket, Ierne L.
  Europe in the Middle ages; AN.......... 66
Poems from Life; AN...................... 95
Poetry. Best poems of 1922; AN............ 531
Poetry, World's great religious. C. M. Hill, editor; B........................... 246
Political system of British India. E. A. Horne; AN .................................. 614
Politics and progress. R. Muir; AN......... 273
Polybius; translated by W. R. Paton; B...... 441
Postgate, R. W.
  Out of the past; AN..................... 495
Powell, Thomas Reed; R.................... 656
Powys, John Cowper
  Suspended judgments; B................ 65
Powys, Llewelyn
  Thirteen worthies; B................... 65
Powys, T. F.
  Left leg; B............................ 358
Preface to life. E. J. Mayer; B............ 691
Priestley, Herbert Ingram
  Mexican nation; a history; B........... 492
Primitive mentality. L. Lévy-Bruhl; B...... 689
Private papers of Henry Ryecroft. G. Gissing; Dt........................... 240
Problem of style. J. M. Murry; B........... 171
"Problem of Timon of Athens." T. M. Parrott; B............................ 611
Proserpine and Midas. M. Shelley; AN...... 359
Prospects of industrial civilization. B. and D. Russell; B....................... 585
Psychoanalysis and suggestion therapy. W. Stekel; AN........................ 144
Psychological types. C. G. Jung; B.......... 440
Psychology and politics. W. H. R. Rivers; B. 141
Psychology of the criminal. M. H. Smith; B. 94
Public health nursing, Evolution of. A. M. Brainard; B......................... 529
Pupin, Michael
  From immigrant to inventor; B.......... 557
Puppet master. R. Nathan; B.............. 669

Q

Queen, Stuart Alfred
  Social work in the light of history; B.... 245
Quick, Herbert
  Hawkeye; AN.......................... 247

R

Random studies in the romantic chaos. F. A. Waterhouse; B..................... 612
Raphaelson, Sampson; R.................... 691
Rascoe, Burton; R......................... 464
Rasin, Alois
  Financial policy of Czechoslovakia during the first years of its history; B........ 246
Ravage, Marcus Eli
  Malady of Europe; B.................... 301
Raw material. D. C. Fisher; AN............ 331
Ray, P. Orman, and F. A. Ogg
  Introduction to American government; B. 272
Raymond, E. T.
  Life of Lord Rosebery; B................ 586
Recent changes in American constitutional theory. J. W. Burgess; B............ 656
Reconstruction in France. W. MacDonald; AN. 95
Red man in the United States. G. E. E. Lindquist, editor; B.................. 218
Redman, Ben Ray; R....................118, 612
Reds bring reaction. W. J. Ghent; AN...... 172
Reinach, Salomon
  Short history of Christianity; B.......... 358
Representative American short stories. A. Jessup, editor; B.................... 243
Return of Frank Clamart. H. C. Rowland; B .................................. 42
Rice, A. H.; R............................ 441
Riceyman Steps. A. Bennett; B............ 717
Rider, Arthur Fremont
  Rider's Bermuda; AN.................... 303
  Rider's New York city; AN.............. 303
  Rider's Washington; AN................. 303
Rinaker, Clarissa; R....................... 744
Rise and fall in Shakespeare's dramatic art. R. Dyboski; B......................... 611
Rivers, William Halse Rivers
  Conflict and dream; B................... 141
  Psychology and politics; B.............. 141
Roback, A. A.
  Behaviorism and psychology; AN........ 122
Robert Gregory. J. Owen; B................ 585
Robertson, D. H.
  Control of industry; B.................. 716
Robins, Elizabeth
  Time is whispering; B.................... 42
Rodd, Sir James Rennell
  Social and diplomatic memories, 1884-1895; B .................................. 41
  Social and diplomatic memories. Second series; AN.......................... 670
Le roi sauvage. J. Lucas-Dubreton; B....... 359
Rolfe, John C.
  Cicero and his influence; B.............. 441
Roman empire, Founding of the. F. B. Marsh; B .................................. 20
Roman empire, History of the later. J. B. Bury; B.............................. 20
Roman pictures. P. Lubbock; B............. 668
Rome, History of. T. Frank; B.............. 20
Rome and the world today. H. S. Hadley; B.. 20
Rootabaga pigeons. C. Sandburg; B......... 651
Rosebery, Lord. E. T. Raymond; B.......... 586
Ross, Edward Alsworth
  Russian soviet republic; B............... 527
  Social revolution in Mexico; B........... 492
Rowland, Henry C.
  Return of Frank Clamart; B............. 42
Roylance, William G., and G. Plumb
  Industrial democracy; B................. 328
Russell, Bertrand
  Free thought and official propaganda; AN. 122
Russell, Bertrand and Dora
  Prospects of industrial civilization; B.... 585
Russia before dawn. F. A. Mackenzie; B.... 529
Russian soviet republic. E. A. Ross; B...... 527
Russo-Japanese war, Expenditures of the. G. Ogawa; AN.......................... 67

S

Sacrificial goat. E. Lascelles; B............ 559
Sadleir, Michael
  Desolate splendour; B.................. 330
Sailor town days. C. F. Smith; B........... 558
Saintsbury, George
  Collected essays and papers; B.......... 634
Salmon, Lucy Maynard
  Newspapers and the historian; B......... 269
Salpeter, Harry; R......................198, 559
Salverson, Laura Goodman
  Viking heart; AN....................... 746
Sanborn, Pitts; R.......................... 440
Sandburg, Carl
  Rootabaga pigeons; B................... 651
Santayana, George
  Scepticism and animal faith; B.......... 299
Satyricon. Petronius Arbiter; B............ 441
Sayers, Dorothy L.
  Whose body?; AN....................... 247
Scepticism and animal faith. G. Santayana; B .................................. 299
Schaff, Morris
  Jefferson Davis; his life and personality; AN .................................. 66
Scheifley, William H.; R.................90, 196
Schreiner, Olive
  Stories, dreams and allegories; AN....... 222
Scott, C. Kay
  Sinbad; B.............................. 120
Scott, Evelyn
  Escapade; B........................... 141
Scott, Temple; R.....................19, 408, 609
Scudders. I. Bacheller; AN................ 247
Seaver, Edwin; R......................171, 329
Second contemporary verse anthology. C. W. Stork, editor; AN...................... 746
Self healing through autosuggestion. C. F. Winbigler; AN......................... 43
Seligmann, Herbert J.; R............43, 120, 220
Sentry. N. Lyeskov; B...................... 358
Sergeant, Elizabeth Shepley; R............. 218
Sergel, Roger L.
  Arlie Gelston; B....................... 742
Seven for a secret. M. Webb; AN........... 410
Shakespeare, William. J. Q. Adams; B.... 271
Shakespeare. In commemoration of the first folio tercentenary; B................... 611
Shakespeare. "Problem of Timon of Athens." T. M. Parrott; B..................... 611
Shakespeare in Poland. J. Calina; B......... 611
Shakespeare's dramatic art. R. Dyboski; B.. 611
Shakespeare's use of song. R. Noble; B...... 611
Shay, Frank, editor
  Treasury of plays for men; AN.......... 614
Shelley, Mary
  Proserpine and Midas; AN.............. 359
Shining pyramid. A. Machen; AN........... 247
Shipley, Joseph T.; R....................... 168
Short stories, Representative American. A. Jessup, editor; B.................... 243
Short story, Advance of the American. E. J. O'Brien; B.......................... 243
Short story, Development of the American. F. L. Pattee; B........................ 243
Showerman, Grant; R...................... 668
Sidelights on Negro soldiers. C. H. Williams; AN .................................. 669
Simpson, Frederick Arthur
  Louis Napoleon and the recovery of France; B.......................... 196
  Louis Napoleon and the recovery of France. Voice from 1870. M. T. Ollivier; C.... 635

- Simpson, Herman; R. ........ 40
- Sinbad. C. K. Scott; B. ........ 120
- Sinclair, May
  - Uncanny stories; B. ........ 655
- Singers, Hints to. L. Nordica; B. ........ 440
- Singing. Art of the prima donna and concert singer. F. H. Martens; B. ........ 440
- Sino-Japanese war, Expenditures of the. G. Ono; AN. ........ 67
- Smertenko, Clara Millerd; R. ........ 495, 527
- Smertenko, Johan J.; R. .43, 93, 121, 200, 243, 358, 468, 585, 668, 691
- Smith, C. Fox
  - Sailor town days; B. ........ 558
- Smith, Charles Edward
  - From the deep of the sea; AN. ........ 23
- Smith, David Eugene
  - Mathematics; B. ........ 441
- Smith, Egerton
  - Principles of English metre; AN. ........ 359
- Smith, Henry Bradford
  - First book in logic; B. ........ 330
- Smith, M. Hamblin
  - Psychology of the criminal; B. ........ 94
- Smith, Preserved
  - Erasmus; B. ........ 651
- Smith, Wallace
  - Little tigress; AN. ........ 468
- Social and diplomatic memories. Sir J. R. Rodd; B. ........ 41
- Social and diplomatic memories. Second series. Sir J. R. Rodd; AN. ........ 670
- Social life in ancient Egypt. W. M. F. Petrie; AN ........ 670
- Social revolution in Mexico. E. A. Ross; B. . 492
- Social work, Education and training for. J. H. Tufts; B. ........ 245
- Social work in the light of history. S. A. Queen; B. ........ 245
- Soltau, Roger H.
  - French parties and politics; B. ........ 221
- Some makers of American literature. W. L. Phelps; B. ........ 464
- Some newspapers and newspapermen. O. G. Villard; B. ........ 584
- Son at the front. E. N. J. Wharton; B. ........ 398
- Soule, George; R. ........ 221, 328, 585
- Der spiegel von der East Side. J. Magidoff: AN ........ 247
- Stanojevic, Stanoje
  - Die ermordung des erzherzogs Franz Ferdinand; B. ........ 142
- Stanton, Elizabeth Cady, as revealed in her diary, letters, and reminiscences; B. ... 63
- Stanton, Theodore, editor
  - Elizabeth Cady Stanton; B. ........ 63
- State government. W. F. Dodd; B. ........ 272
- Stekel, Wilhelm
  - Psychoanalysis and suggestion therapy; AN ........ 144
- Stephens, Winifred
  - Women of the French revolution; B. ........ 662
- Stern, G. B.
  - Back seat; AN. ........ 410
- Stern, Leo and Elizabeth
  - Friend at court; AN. ........ 278
- Stevens, Wallace
  - Harmonium; B. ........ 400
- Stevenson, Burton E.
  - Famous single poems; AN. ........ 562
- Stone, Thora G.
  - England under the restoration; AN. ........ 67
- Stonecrop. C. Tormay; B. ........ 199
- Stork, Charles Wharton, editor
  - Second contemporary verse anthology; AN. 746
- Story of Mrs. Tubbs. H. Lofting; B. ........ 560
- Story of the development of a youth. E. Haeckel; B. ........ 527
- Strabo
  - Geography; translated by H. E. Jones; B. 441
- Strachey, John St. Loe
  - Economics of the hour; B. ........ 716
- Strachey, Lytton
  - Landmarks in French literature; B. ........ 198
- Strachey, Ray
  - Marching on; B. ........ 493
- Straus, Oscar S.
  - Under four administrations; B. ........ 170
- Study of American intelligence. C. C. Brigham; B. ........ 330
- Suckow, Ruth; R. ........ 742
- Suggestions and medical analysis. W. Brown; An ........ 23
- Suspended judgments. J. C. Powys; B. ........ 65
- Swinnerton, Frank
  - Young Felix; B. ........ 717

T

- Taraknath Das
  - India in world politics; B. ........ 22
- Temple and other poems. A. Waley, translator; AN. ........ 692
- Tennyson. H. Nicolson; B. ........ 559
- Teodoro the sage. L. Lucatelli; B. ........ 301
- Terassa of Spain. H. Fish; B. ........ 43
- That pig Morin. G. de Maupassant; B. ........ 118
- Thévenin, René
  - Barnabé and his whale; AN. ........ 746
- Things near and far. A. Machen; AN. ........ 172
- Things remembered. A. S. Hardy; AN. ........ 303
- Third winter of unemployment. J. J. Astor, and others; B. ........ 652
- Thirteen worthies. L. Powys; B. ........ 65
- Thomas, Edward
  - Cloud castle; AN. ........ 562
- Thomas, William I.
  - Unadjusted girl; B. ........ 119
- Three studies in English literature. A. Chevrillon; B. ........ 65
- Through the wheat. T. Boyd; B. ........ 66
- Tille, V.
  - Little Tom; AN. ........ 247
- Tilton, George Henry
  - Fern lover's companion; AN. ........ 23
- Time is whispering. E. Robins; B. ........ 42
- Times have changed. E. Davis; AN. ........ 144
- Tolstoy, Talks with. A. B. Goldenveizer; B. 220
- Tolstoy's love letters; with a study of the autobiographical elements in Tolstoy's work. P. Biriukov; B. ........ 220
- Tormay, Cécile
  - Outlaw's diary; B. ........ 170
  - Stonecrop; B. ........ 199
- Towner, R. H.
  - Philosophy of civilization; AN. ........ 746
- Tramping methodist. S. Kaye-Smith; B. ........ 94
- Trausil, Hans, translator
  - Ein zweig vom schlehdorn; irische dichtungen; AN. ........ 359
- Travels in Arabia Deserta. C. M. Doughty; B ........ 648
- Treasury of plays for men. F. Shay, editor; AN ........ 614
- Trend of history. W. K. Wallace; B. ........ 142
- Tufts, James H.
  - Education and training for social work; B ........ 245
- Tulips and chimneys. E. E. Cummings; AN. 614
- Turkey, the great powers, and the Bagdad railway. E. M. Earle; B. ........ 556
- Tuttle, Margaretta
  - Feet of clay; AN. ........ 495

U

- Ugarte, Manuel
  - Mi campaña hispano-americana; B. ........ 171
- Unadjusted girl. W. I. Thomas; B. ........ 119
- Uncanny stories. M. Sinclair; B. ........ 655
- Under four administrations. O. S. Straus; B. 170
- Undertow. H. K. Marks; AN. ........ 745
- Undset, Sigrid
  - Bridal wreath; AN. ........ 200
- Unemployment, Burden of. P. Klein; B. ........ 652
- Unemployment, Cycles of. W. A. Berridge; B. 743
- Unemployment, Economics of. J. A. Hobson; B ........ 652
- Unemployment, Third winter of. J. J. Astor, and others; B. ........ 652
- Unfinished tales from a Russian prison. M. E. Harrison; B. ........ 529
- United States—Constitution
  - Recent changes in American constitutional theory. J. W. Burgess; B. ........ 656
- Untermeyer, Louis
  - American poetry since 1900; AN. ........ 670
- Untrodden ways. H. J. Massingham; AN. ... 495
- Ushisaburo Kobayashi. See Kobayashi, Ushisaburo
- Utopian thought, History of. J. O. Hertzler; B ........ 197

V

- Van Doren, Carl; R. ........ 398, 651
- Van Doren, Mark; R. .....271, 400, 494, 530, 648, 660, 715
- Van Dyke, Paul
  - Catherine de Médicis; B. ........ 90
- Van Loon, Hendrik Willem
  - Story of the bible; B. ........ 714
- Van Vechten, Carl
  - Blind bow-boy; B. ........ 244
- Ventures in book collecting. W. H. Arnold: AN ........ 531
- Verga, Giovanni
  - Mastro-Don Gesualdo; B. ........ 406
- Victorian literature. S. T. Williams; B. ........ 666
- Viking heart. L. G. Salverson; AN. ........ 746
- Vildrac, Charles
  - Book of love; AN. ........ 200
- Village. I. Bunin; B. ........ 358
- Villard, Fanny Garrison; R. ........ 493
- Villard, Oswald Garrison
  - Some newspapers and newspapermen; B. . 584
- Villard, Oswald Garrison; R. ........ 269, 356
- Vince, Charles
  - Barrie Marvell; B. ........ 668
- Visions solaires. C. Balmont; B. ........ 64
- Vladeck, B. Charney; R. ........ 557

W

- Waley, Arthur, translator
  - Temple and other poems; AN. ........ 692
- Walker, Francis Amasa, Life of. J. P. Munroe; B. ........ 148
- Wallace, William Kay
  - Trend of history; B. ........ 142
- Wandering in northern China. H. A. Franck; B ........ 744
- War; its nature, cause and cure. G. L. Dickinson; B. ........ 167
- Warfare by land and sea. E. S. McCartney; B ........ 441
- Warner, Arthur; R. ........ 558
- Washington. A. F. Rider; AN. ........ 303
- Waterhouse, Francis A.
  - Random studies in the romantic chaos; B ........ 612
- Watson, Blanche; R. ........ 22, 243
- Watson, E. L. Grant
  - Desert horizon; B. ........ 169
- Watterson, Henry, Editorials of. A. B. Krock, compiler; AN. ........ 444
- Webb, Mary
  - Seven for a secret; AN. ........ 410
- Weizmann, Chaim
  - American addresses; AN. ........ 222
- Wells, Carolyn
  - More lives than one; AN. ........ 495
- Wells, Carolyn, and A. F. Goldsmith
  - Bibliography of the works of Walt Whitman; AN. ........ 359
- Wells, Herbert George
  - Men like gods; B. ........ 90
- Wharton, Edith Newbold Jones
  - Son at the front; B. ........ 398
- Where are we going? D. Lloyd George; B. . 745
- Whipperginny. R. Graves; B. ........ 400
- White, Hugh W.
  - Demonism verified and analyzed; B. ........ 93
- Whither France? Whither Europe? J. Caillaux; B. ........ 22
- Whitlock, Brand
  - J. Hardin & Son; B. ........ 654
- Whitman, Walt. Bibliography. C. Wells, and A. F. Goldsmith; AN. ........ 359
- Whose body? D. L. Sayers; AN. ........ 247
- Williams, Charles H.
  - Sidelights on Negro soldiers; AN. ........ 669
- Williams, Stanley T.
  - Studies in Victorian literature; B. ........ 666
- Winbigler, C. F.
  - Self healing through autosuggestion; AN. 43
- Without clues. J. Helm; AN. ........ 562
- Woman of the horizon. G. Frankau; AN. ... 247
- Woman's life. G. de Maupassant; B. ........ 118
- Women of the French revolution. W. Stephens; B ........ 662
- Wood, Clement; R. ........ 93, 169, 246, 330
- Woodbridge, Homer E.; R. ........ 742
- Woods, Robert A.
  - Neighborhood in nation-building; B. ........ 245
- Woodward, W. E.
  - Bunk; B. ........ 398
- Woodward, W. E.; R. ........ 654
- World history for the workers. A. Barton; AN ........ 66
- World's great religious poetry. C. M. Hill, editor; B. ........ 246
- Wright, F. A., translator
  - Letters of Alciphron; AN. ........ 745
- Wright, Joseph and E. M.
  - Old English grammar; AN. ........ 144
- Wrong move. A. R. Burr; AN. ........ 67
- Wrong shadow. H. Brighouse; B. ........ 42
- Wyndham, Horace
  - Nineteen hundreds; B. ........ 91

Y

- Young, Howard Irving; R. ........ 301, 530
- Young, Kimball; R. ........ 142, 330
- Young Felix. F. Swinnerton; B. ........ 717
- Young man and journalism. C. S. Lord; B. . 269

Z

- Zinnecker, W. D.; R. ........ 300
- Zur vorgeschichte des weltkrieges. O. Hammann; B. ........ 92
- Ein zweig vom schlehdorn. H. Trausil, translator; AN. ........ 359

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 4, 1923 No. 3026

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS ... 1
EDITORIALS:
The Liberty Above All Others ... 4
A Chapter Ends at Amherst ... 5
Truth About Russia Breaking ... 6
Freedom and Mr. Harding ... 6
LOOKING ON. By Art Young ... 7
FREE SPEECH: THE VITAL ISSUE. By William E. Borah ... 8
PROTECTING OUR LIBERTIES. By Upton Sinclair ... 9
TWO PORTRAITS. By Maxwell Bodenheim ... 10
"SWEET LAND OF LIBERTY" ... 11
THE ISSUES AT AMHERST. By John Merriman Gaus ... 12
PHARISEES AND REFORMERS. By Alexander Meiklejohn ... 13
MAKING WHEAT SOBER UP. By William Hard ... 14
THE TWO SWEETHEART DIPPIES. By Carl Sandburg ... 15
OUR TOWN AND THE CHAMPIONSHIP BOUT. By G. Robinson ... 16
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter ... 17
CORRESPONDENCE ... 18
BOOKS:
The Democrat's Handbook. By Ludwig Lewisohn ... 19
The Dance of Life. By Temple Scott ... 19
Eternal Rome. By Harry Elmer Barnes ... 20
The Case of the Immigrant. By Herbert Adolphus Miller ... 21
For the Freedom of India. By Blanche Watson ... 22
Caillaux on Europe. By L. S. G. ... 22
Monumental Scholarship. By Lewis Browne ... 23
Books in Brief ... 23
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Gandhi's Life in Prison ... 24
Chileans Condemn "Yankee Justice" ... 26
Tyranny in American Samoa ... 26
Life in the Virgin Islands ... 26

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
LEWIS S. GANNETT ERNEST H. GRUENING
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY, MANAGING EDITOR
JOHN MACY, LITERARY EDITOR
IRITA VAN DOREN, ADVERTISING MANAGER
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
JOHN A. HOBSON ANATOLE FRANCE H. L. MENCKEN
FRIEDRICH WILHELM FOERSTER ROBERT HERRICK
CARL VAN DOREN NORMAN THOMAS

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: Ernest Thurtle, 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N. W. 4, England.

WARREN HARDING has, as he puts it, "revealed the hopeful anticipations of my mind and the trustful longings of my heart." That is just about what his speech-making and his statesmanship amount to. Unfortunately, trustful longings do not get a man or a nation very far. Mr. Harding's longings seem to direct themselves chiefly to a pathetic desire to please everybody. In Kansas, old home of prohibition, he catered to the dries; in St. Louis, where wet Germans abound, he was silent on the liquor issue, paying a pleasant but cautious tribute to the German Republic. He made an eloquent plea for a kindly light to lead us on to the World Court, but prefaced it with suggestions of reservations which will effectively scotch his own proposal to join the court. The poor dear man has painfully sought to be nice to everybody—to join the court without joining it, to pardon the political prisoners without letting them out of jail; he has praised the American farmer and painted a touching picture of his rise from frontier hardships—but without indorsing the farmers' proposals of remedies for their present poverty. He has kissed babies, driven a tractor (not a Ford tractor, as the New York World's correspondent observed), and beamed and smiled and shaken hands until his lips were sunburned and his hand swollen and inflamed. He has tried hard. But we suspect that he has not won a vote from Henry Ford or a supporter from Robert La Follette; the Western voter is in no mood to be content with the hopeful anticipations and trustful longings even of a presidential heart. He is, in fact, sick of soothing syrup.

POINCARE is budging, but it will be a sorry day for Europe if Stanley Baldwin agrees to cooperate with him before he has budged further. The French Premier, faced by Belgium's defection, a hostile Senate at home and a growing opposition in the Chamber, and defeats in by-elections, has modified his previous demands and is now ready to withdraw his soldiers from the Ruhr, maintaining only a civilian occupation, if the Germans will give up their passive resistance and agree to pay reparations. He has not yet made clear what he means by paying—he still talks in impossible terms—or what he means by civilian occupation. If he means a perpetuation of the slave regime which General Degoutte is trying to establish—he has decreed fifteen-year jail sentences for men who refuse to work for him—the Germans are hardly likely to accept it. Passive resistance is forcing a Power with unlimited troops at its command to compromise if not yet to yield. Two great dangers remain—that passive resistance will degenerate into guerrilla warfare, and that unemployment and hunger will bring about civil war.

BEFORE the next war, the next war code. You cannot start playing any game unless its rules have already been drawn up. So "the best combined thought" of an international commission of jurists, established under a resolution of the Washington Arms Conference, has formulated a code to regulate the use of radio and aircraft in warfare—a problem discussed by M. W. Royse in The Nation last May—and its recommendations are submitted for embodiment in treaties between the five great Powers. Here, then, is further occupation for the next session of a Senate that might otherwise find time hanging heavily on its hands. The adoption of the sixty-two articles proposed by the commission will doubtless clarify and settle, in many respects, the orthodox doctrine of what is reasonable, courteous, and humane treatment of your enemy. When the Great War broke out, for instance, the restrictions on the aerial bombardment of cities had to be inferred, by extension, from the laws of naval bombardment. Henceforth there will be chapter and verse in an authorized textbook to appeal to in any controversy whether such and such an air raid was justified. The new aircraft rules follow closely the lines of the old naval bombardment rules, and will probably be neither more nor less effective than they in protecting the civil population.

CONGRATULATIONS to the British Parliament and to Morpeth! A by-election in that constituency—which, in 1874, returned the first Labor member in the person of Thomas Burt—has strengthened the moral and intellectual caliber of the present House by the addition to it of Robert Smillie. Shunning publicity and averse to frequent speech, Mr. Smillie has gained his great influence by combining with his masterly knowledge and grasp of labor problems the rare gifts of sanity of judgment, sincerity, and simplicity. He worked in the pit in his youth, and today he still dwells inconspicuously among his own people, occupying a small cottage in the center of the Mid-Lanark mining district. His fidelity to conviction has stood many tests, notably the offer of a seat in Lloyd George's cabinet as food controller. His refusal so piqued the Premier that he attacked Robert Smillie by name in his sensational Old Kent Road speech at the 1918 election. But the group of Pliables that Lloyd George gathered around him could be no fitting company for the man who, on the introduction of conscription, had accepted election as the first president of the National Council for Civil Liberties. As a Labor spokesman whose internationalism springs not from emotion only but from knowledge and reason, Robert Smillie will contribute an element of special value to the parliamentary discussions of the European situation.

IF the agitation for a Federal anti-lynching bill had anything to do with the spirit shown by the county sheriff, the city firemen, and the State guardsmen in Savannah, Georgia, on June 20, then we hope that anti-lynching bills will be regularly debated at every session of Congress. A determined mob of 2,000 citizens attempted to storm the jail and lynch an eighteen-year-old Negro boy charged with rape. Sheriff Merrit W. Dixon collected a few deputies and warned the oncoming mob that the first man trying to enter the gate would be shot. The mob stood its ground. A sousing with fire hose still did not break it up. It hurled bricks and stones at the sheriff's party, and even shot at them. Finally a detachment of guardsmen firing over the heads of the mob dispersed it. One man was killed. At the request of Savannah's mayor the city was put under martial law, and the Negro boy is still safe in jail. It shows—as has been shown before—that a sheriff with red blood in his veins can maintain the dignity of his position and prevent a lynching despite the most embittered mob. Fifty members of the mob were arrested by the military authorities; sixteen were held. These men were caught red-handed; if the people of Savannah see to it that they are punished as they should be we shall take new heart. Something seems to be happening in the South; in the first six months of 1923 only one-third as many lynchings occurred as in the first half of 1922. There is just one way for the South to prove that a Federal anti-lynching bill is unnecessary—that is to stop lynching.

THERE is no reason to suppose that the Pennsylvania Railroad will be influenced to change its policy toward its employees by the rebuke of the Railroad Labor Board. The Pennsylvania's refusal to recognize any labor organization other than its own company union is rooted in the same obstinacy and the same disregard of public opinion as the retention of the twelve-hour day by the United States Steel Corporation. But although the Pennsylvania may care nothing for the judgment either of the Railroad Labor Board or of the public, it does care about future railroad legislation in the United States. It may be influenced by the suggestion that this flouting of the will of Congress is likely to increase the pressure for compulsory arbitration of labor disputes on the railroads. The Supreme Court's decision in the case of the Kansas Industrial Court does not close this possibility. And compulsory arbitration is as distasteful to the railroads, the Pennsylvania included, as it is to their employees.

IN trespassing upon private property and illegally arresting a group of persons about to hold a meeting in connection with the Los Angeles dock strike, it is fortunate that the police gathered in, among others, so pertinacious an individual as Upton Sinclair; for it is a foregone conclusion that they will want to let go before he does. The original charges of inciting a riot and addressing an unlawful assemblage have already been dismissed and the police have substituted a charge of—vagrancy! "The law is an ass," somebody once remarked in his spleen. Doubtless it is at times, but not nearly so often as those who in ignorance, or as tools of interested persons, misuse it. When we contemplate the antics of the chief of police of Los Angeles we are deterred from characterizing him as an ass only through fear that such a comparison would lay us open to damages from every self-respecting donkey in Christendom.

FROM time to time there has been much criticism of the legal profession on the ground that, as it is alleged, an advocate will sometimes appeal earnestly for the acquittal of a defendant whom he really believes to be guilty. A strange comment on this popular demand for sincerity has been supplied by certain members of the profession in the State of Washington, who seem to hold that only the lawyer who disbelieves in his client's innocence is ethically justified in appearing on his behalf. Elmer S. Smith, a local attorney in good standing, has been defending various members of the I.W.W. when prosecuted in the State courts. In so doing he has not been merely speaking from a brief, but has evidently pleaded his cases con amore, for he has himself addressed I.W.W. meetings and otherwise taken part in I.W.W. propaganda. By thus associating himself so closely with the cause of his clients he has been guilty, it is contended, of moral turpitude such as to unfit him for the practice of the law, and a petition for his disbarment has accordingly been filed. The formal "complaint" recounts a miscellany of offenses charged against the I.W.W., and asserts that Mr. Smith, "having knowledge of all these things," has nevertheless "used his talents and energies" in furtherance of their cause. Therefore he should be disbarred.

BUT, if the charges brought against Mr. Smith are true, he is liable to prosecution under the criminal syndicalism law, and should be tried under that statute. Why is that course not taken? The proper tribunal to pronounce upon his conduct is, in the first instance, a criminal court and not a committee of lawyers. Incidentally, this "complaint," an elaborate and melodramatic document, presents a few curious features. In marshaling its indictment of Mr. Smith it mentions that he has been twice acquitted on charges of being accessory to murder—which reminds one of how the typical Babu applicant for a post is wont to include among his qualifications a list of the examinations in which he has failed. Again, Mr. Smith is accused of violating his professional oath as a lawyer in the State of Washington, wherein, among other things, he promised that he "would never reject, from any consideration personal to himself, the cause of the defenseless or oppressed." (Does this pledge, one wonders, bind lawyers in other States?)

There is a further touch of unconscious humor in the fixing of July 5—the nearest available date to Independence Day—as the time when the "complaint" is to be heard before the State Board of Law Examiners. The Comic Spirit has evidently played a part in the drafting of this document, but to Mr. Smith it is a serious matter. It also gravely concerns everyone who is jealous for the traditions of the American bar.

"AND, to be frank," says Mr. P. W. Wilson, the English journalist, frankly in the New York Times of June 16, "I have always felt that a man like Massingham [formerly of the London Nation] is my superior." Well, to be as frank, we think Mr. Wilson right; and this gives us particular pleasure since, so far as we can remember, it is the first time we have ever been able wholeheartedly to agree with a single opinion of that most prolific dispenser of opinions as to what and how we Americans should think.

SOME day a Carnegie or Rockefeller foundation, eager to exploit new intellectual mines, will subsidize the annual issue of a publication containing all the commencement addresses—including, of course, baccalaureate sermons—delivered at American colleges and universities. Yes, all of them, from Abilene College, Texas, to York College, Nebraska. What is wanted is not a selection of gems, but a faithful record, without picking or choosing, of the oratorical portion of the commencement exercises of every institution of higher learning in the land. Such a compilation would display before the reader, as nothing else could, a panorama of the educational, social, political, and religious ideals of the time, which to later generations would perhaps be of even greater interest than to contemporaries. Meanwhile, even such brief extracts and summaries as appear in the daily press throw some light on present-day tendencies. It is significant that this year so many speakers—including men so diverse as W. G. McAdoo and presidents Farrand, Faunce, and Hibben—warned their readers against intolerance and fear of the truth. Dr. Hibben especially denounced the attack on Dr. Fosdick, who himself, speaking at Michigan, made a ringing plea for independence of thought and action, and declared that the idea that the voice of the people was the voice of God was "largely nonsense." At Dartmouth, Dr. W. P. Merrill went so far as to welcome the widespread evidences of the weakening of authority, alike in church and state.

AMONG other notable deliverances were Dr. Gray's timely protest at Bates College against the mass production of standardized graduates, Dr. Lowell's discriminating remarks at Harvard on success and failure, and Dr. Angell's wise comments at Yale on the services and limitations of science. The national division of opinion on America's international duty is reflected in the commencement addresses, from which one might gather arguments for almost every variety of isolation or cooperation. The freak performances of this season of academic oratory seem to have been contributed by Secretary Weeks. At Norwich he harked back to the "straight-shooting type" of colonial days as the ideal citizen whom young America of the present time should emulate. At Brown he was more modern in his outlook by a century or so. "History," he is reported as saying, "has fully demonstrated the wisdom of those rather conservative methods which have guided the nation since the days of 1776." What was good enough for his great-great-grandfather is good enough for Secretary Weeks. With this conviction of the infallibility and miraculous prescience of the ancients, it is no wonder that he came down heavily on those agitators and reformers who wish to modify the system of government inherited by us from the Revolutionary period. These utterances of his, however, are of so different a tone from the general run of commencement addresses that the analogy they naturally suggest is to the croakings of a raven on a lonely bough.

ROTA RINALDI, eleven and a half years old, has composed an oratorio and conducted the orchestra and chorus in a public performance of his work at Milan. His mother has decided, perhaps wisely, to take him out of the conservatory of music and send him to a common school so that he may grow up like other children. The story of child prodigies is not always happy. There is the danger that their genius may burn out their little bodies before they develop. Sometimes, however, they continue their growth to mature mastery. When Paganini first astonished an audience at the age of nine he was already prematurely old and deformed from too much fiddling; he was unrivaled all his life. Josef Hofmann, at the age of forty-six a notable pianist and a man of wide scientific interests, appeared first in public at the age of six. Mozart composed his first published work in his sixth year, and in his eighth wrote ten sonatas. He remained a prodigy, the most prolific and one of the greatest composers of all time. Perhaps the amount of work he did hastened his death at thirty-six. There have been child wonders in other arts and sciences: the exquisite Marjorie Fleming, Walter Scott's pet; our little contemporary, Hilda Conkling, a gifted poet; John Stuart Mill, who began to read Greek at the age of three and in spite of that lived to be a wise man. We await with trembling admiration the further career of young Rinaldi.

MORRIS ROSENFELD, who died on June 22 at the age of sixty, leaped into fame just twenty-five years ago by the publication of his "Songs from the Ghetto." He had been for years an operative in the sweatshops of the East Side and his Yiddish verses gave an intense and moving expression to the suffering of the Jewish proletarian. His poetical activity has been steady ever since and he was, undoubtedly, one of the best read and best beloved of all poets who use the Yiddish language. The importance of his poetry was in its substance, in the new world it opened and added to the domain of verse. The famous "Songs from the Ghetto," at all events, had no artistic originality. They employed the exact forms and devices of Heine and the minor German Romantic lyrists and balladists. They were intenser in feeling than some of their models and got a certain edge and tang from the resources of the Yiddish vocabulary. They were not creative in the deeper sense. But they did a magnificent service in expressing to the world at large the thoughts and aspirations of a proletariat that never permitted its soul to be submerged with its body in the slavery of industrialism.

WE take pleasure in calling attention to the review in our book section of an essay which has attracted a good deal of attention in England. The essay is by one John Stuart Mill, and is apropos at this time in connection with free speech and personal liberty.

The Liberty Above All Others

THE liberty to know, to utter, and to argue, and to argue freely according to conscience, is, as Milton said, above all other liberties. It is the foundation of the civil liberty of the citizen. It guarantees his right to state his grievances and to propose his remedies, and, because it guarantees that right, it tends to minimize the chance of disorderly change. Civil liberty means toleration for the opinions of others. It means toleration for the opinions not merely of those with whom the majority agree, but of those also whose words are believed to be fraught with danger and despair. It means not only that the rich, the wise, and the good shall speak, but that the despised, the fool, and the poor man shall also be heard.

Toleration, be it said, does not mean agreement. Because we believe that all voices should be heard, it does not follow that we are to agree with every folly that is uttered. Toleration means a humility of spirit that is willing to concede that the other fellow may be right. It means a capacity to understand that desirable progress in this tentative world can come only through free trade in ideas. Most of all it means a concern for the rights of others, for only when the rights of the most despised among us are secure can the market-place of the mind be kept open.

The capacity of a people to insure and to possess civil liberty and toleration is the measure of the civilization to which they have attained. Freedom, happiness, knowledge, these are the goals of civilization, and they are born of the opportunity to experience life, as truly for whole peoples as for individuals. If that opportunity be broad, success will follow. And who can doubt that the capacity for civil liberty and toleration is the precise measure, alike for community and individuals, of the opportunity to live fully?

It is wise, then, from time to time for a people to consider their condition regarding civil liberty. How do we of these United States fare? A glance first at the past will perhaps not be amiss. At the time when the American Colonies were achieving their independence of Great Britain, the phrases of civil liberty were upon the lips of every patriot. Civil liberty was an integral part of the political philosophy for which the American Revolution was fought. And yet, although that war was fought for political freedom, the civil liberty of the Tory minority which opposed independence received scant consideration. The Civil War, too, was fought for freedom—for the freedom of an enslaved race, but again the minority which believed in the right of the South to secede received short shrift. When the United States entered the Great War, civil liberty and tolerance left us once more. The minority of opposition—radical for the most part—were vindictively put upon.

But these violations of the principle of civil liberty occurred during war, and war, almost by definition, is a step back from the ways of civilization. We can judge better of the reality of civil liberty by its condition after war has passed and in time of peace. And there is a striking parallel to be found between the history of the years just passed and American history of a century and a quarter ago.

In 1798 Europe was arrayed against France, shaken and torn by revolution. The gospel of liberté, egalité, fraternité was feared in every land. French radicalism sent its propagandists abroad, and in many lands its sympathizers and advocates made themselves hated. Our country was not exempt. Genêt had come to our shores, and voices, often in high places, expressed sympathy for revolutionary France. The Federalist Party, then in power, became greatly exercised. The Chief Justice of Massachusetts denounced "the French system-mongers, from the Quintumvirate of Paris to the Vice-President" (Jefferson) as "apostles of atheism and anarchy, bloodshed and plunder." In such a mood of excitement Congress passed the Sedition Act of 1798 and prosecutions under it followed. None of the sentences exceeded eighteen months, but they aroused the resentment of the people, and at the next election the Federalists were swept from office and the obnoxious act perished. Jefferson's vigorous and pungent condemnation of the act and Madison's carefully reasoned demonstration of its inconsistency with American principles of government, make it abundantly clear that civil liberty was then a reality in American political life. Indeed, the fate of the Sedition Act is a chapter of American history that we should regard with pride.

Turn now to the years following the World War. Europe is again in tumult, and revolution is once more abroad. The great Powers now unite against Moscow, and Russian radicalism spreads its propaganda wherever it may. Its new political and economic philosophy is hated and feared as was the French in 1798. In the United States, farthest removed from the seat of contagion, and safest, because our people have not suffered as have the peoples of Europe, the excitement and fear of the new radicalism have run highest. Our State legislatures have enacted criminal-syndicalism, criminal-anarchy, and sedition laws until these statutes, which have the same quality as the old Sedition Act, are the law of no less than thirty-nine States. Prosecutions under them have followed aplenty, and the sentences meted out have not been light. Instead of eighteen months they have run as high as five to ten years, and the trials have been numbered by the score, as against the ten trials under the Act of 1798.

The history of a century ago would have led us to expect a wave of resentment against these infringements of civil liberty, but the wave of resentment has not come. The more intelligent of our daily newspapers are now urging the repeal of these laws, but for four years hysterical fear in dealing with radical minorities has replaced toleration and discussion. Reports of a sensational State trial for merely being present at an alleged seditious gathering in Michigan were in the daily news but a few weeks ago, and but last May nine men and women were indicted under the Pennsylvania sedition law for membership in a forbidden organization. The tide is receding, but it has still very far to go.

What shall be said of this contrast between 1798 and 1923? What needs saying is that a contrast exists—that the average American of 1923 is less concerned about the condition of civil liberty than the average American of 1798. That this is not altogether his fault is doubtless true. He has been told so many times that the sedition prosecutions of the present are necessary for his safety that he has come to believe it. But, unless his country is to suffer irreparable injury, it behooves him to shake himself out of his assurance, to examine the situation for himself, and then to take thought as to the future.

A Chapter Ends at Amherst

THERE was a sound of revelry by day and night. Amherst's chivalry had gathered for commencement. Alumni had come back for a season, parents had turned up two by two, interested girls by ones and dozens. The professors were really relieved and relatively merry. Then, out of an unclouded sky, broke the storm which had for a long time been threatening. President Meiklejohn resigned his post and the trustees accepted his resignation, having first asked for it. The news, more or less expected, went across the continent; reporters dashed to the scene for more details; the story adorned the first pages of metropolitan dailies. Enthusiastic rumors went out to the effect that the graduating class would refuse to graduate and that the members of the faculty in favor of President Meiklejohn would resign in a body. Nothing quite so impressive happened. Mr. Meiklejohn told the devoted boys that "This is my fight, not yours." At commencement thirteen students left the hall without their diplomas, to the accompaniment of cheers from the spectators. Half a dozen teachers have resigned and others will, or will be forced to do so.

This is the outward end of a chapter. Eleven years ago the trustees in calling Mr. Meiklejohn to the presidency of Amherst understood that they were bound for something of an adventure. He made it clear then, as he has made it clear regularly since, that he believed in experiment in education and that he was at many points out of sympathy with certain older traditions of Amherst and of other American colleges. He has worked ceaselessly to bring it about that the students of Amherst might learn something about the changes which are going on in the world instead of being held to the intellectual goose-step which the old guard everywhere prefers. He has attracted to Amherst some of the most promising young teachers in the country. He has worked with his advisers to bring the curriculum into touch with the thoughtful life of our times. He has been a conspicuous element in making Amherst deserve to be called our liberal college. And now, after a decade of the experiment, his trustees have lost courage and have stubbornly turned back to safe ground.

Let no one be deceived by the smoke screen which, as always in such cases, is being thrown out by the trustees. They say that President Meiklejohn was a bad executive, arbitrary and inconsiderate; they hint that he personally spent more money than he should have done and thus embarrassed the reputation of the college in the neighborhood; they find, that is, the petty reasons which their kind can always find in an emergency. To answer them it is sufficient to ask what they would have done if President Meiklejohn had at every point agreed with the majority of them in their notion of what the policy of Amherst ought to be. Then of course he might have been as arbitrary as Mussolini, provided it was the liberal elements he rooted out. He might have been as inconsiderate as Mussolini—toward the dissenters. As to his personal expenses, whatever may be the facts of this difficult matter, his trustees would have had no difficulty had President Meiklejohn, again, been Mussolini. They have had enough experience in covering up the little extravagances of presidents of banks and insurance companies and railroads and factories. What they could not stand was a liberal president.

They did not, it seems, want a liberal college after all. Back in 1912, when they thought they did, there was a Progressive movement. It was not particularly intelligent, but it was reasonably fashionable, and even a trustee could go with it and not lose caste. Since then, however, there has been a war of stupendous magnitude, a flare of temporary idealism, a morose reaction. In that reaction the mind is distrusted in America as it has perhaps never been before. "Americanism" and fundamentalism are trying to force the nation back from the courageous ways of thought into the lazy ways of habit. The trustees of colleges are of course peculiarly susceptible to such flutterings of timidity because they are among the most ill-informed of men in any form of education except that of perpetuating the special type to which they themselves belong. The conversation of one of the Amherst trustees, in most respects a liberal and enlightened man, and an essentially decent man, led Lord Robert Cecil lately to express his incredulity that such ignorance as this trustee displayed could possibly exist in a modern civilization. And it was one of the trustees of Amherst, incidentally Vice-President of the United States, who only a year or so ago published an attack on liberalism in the women's colleges as stupid as it was absurd. No wonder, with such men among them, that the Amherst trustees finally drove President Meiklejohn out.

To put the matter more accurately, they did not want a liberal college enough to pay for it. They might have been willing and able to raise the money, but they could not raise the courage and intelligence necessary. To make an Amherst such as they might have had they found they must shock that great mass of the alumni which, as with all colleges, hangs like a sentimental millstone around the neck of the institution. To make an Amherst such as they might have had they found they must shock that considerable portion of the faculty which, as with all faculties, sits tight in its safe chair and schemes against any changes whatsoever, good, bad, or dubious. The trustees found they must pay for a liberal college by choosing teachers who now and then might get themselves talked about in the world as the holders of novel doctrine; they found they must pay for it by making it easy for the students to become questioners of the established order in theology, politics, art, morals—even in business; they found they must contribute to the upkeep of a college which would pretty surely mystify the trustees by its opinions and attitudes. And these things seemed too dear a price to pay! Had these men been anything but timid, shortsighted trustees, they must have seen that no price is too high to pay for what they had already in 1923 gone a long way toward developing. You cannot pay too much for liberty, for the free exercise of the intelligence, for the untrammeled quest for truth and beauty. Amherst had been made in a decade the most interesting and most distinctive of all the smaller New England colleges. It had developed rare eagerness for learning in its students. Now, apparently, it is to go back to the good old tradition. But it will not be the old tradition of devoted scholars, teachers, missionaries in which the college grew up. To something of that older tradition President Meiklejohn was helping it to return. Amherst will go back, if the trustees now have their way, to the intermediate stage and be once more, and increasingly, a country club for fine young gentlemen.

Truth About Russia Breaking

SLOWLY, but surely, Russia is losing the pariah stigma. In Denmark both houses of Parliament, by large majorities, have ratified a commercial agreement with her. Tokio, too, has opened negotiations with Moscow for the resumption of official relations. While the feeling of this country is a long way yet from being sympathetic to Russia, there are signs of a steady breaking down of anti-Soviet prejudice. This change of attitude is clearly reflected in the press, which nowadays finds it expedient to give prominent space to pro-Soviet statements. The New York Times, for instance, recently published a cabled interview with Irving T. Bush, of the New York Chamber of Commerce, which, if it had appeared a few months ago, would assuredly have led to the exclusion of that journal from the library of Clark University. This American business man, not hitherto classed among the "Reds," expresses himself as convinced of the stability of the Soviet Government, and asserts that not one American in ten thousand has any idea of the order and generally good conditions prevailing in Moscow. The Russian leaders, with whom he was able to talk "quite frankly and without mincing words," struck him as "intelligent, courageous, and sincere in their desire to better the Russian people." To appreciate what this testimonial means, one has to remember that there have been occasions in American history—some, perhaps, not very remote—when a candid foreign visitor might have hesitated to pay an equal tribute to the political leaders of the United States.

Again, two leading American Methodists, Bishop Edgar Blake, who directs the Methodist work in France, and Dr. Lewis P. Hartman, editor of Zion's Herald (Boston), have sent home remarkable reports of their visit to the All-Russian Council of the Orthodox Church. People who have swallowed sensational tales of the reduction of the Russian Church to destitution through Soviet robbery will read with amazement Dr. Hartman's account of the dazzling scene at the opening ceremony in the Moscow Cathedral—the altar blazing with jewels and gold, and so on. The Boston editor testifies that, on examining churches from which treasures had been taken, he found that in no case had the ikons, crosses, banners, or other religious symbols been disturbed. The Government had done no more than commandeer superfluous gold and precious stones that served merely as ornaments, and had used them for the purchase of much-needed food.

How Bishop Blake was impressed by what he saw and heard may be understood from his address to the council. "Russia," he declared, "is in the midst of a stupendous social experiment. For the first time in human history a political government has dedicated itself to the service of the common people." He did not see how the church of Jesus Christ could hold back from "an adventure so full of possible good to mankind." Accordingly, he offered unreservedly such assistance as American Methodism could give. The immediate outcome was a pledge of $50,000 to aid a program for the education of the Russian priesthood. Whether Bishop Blake had authority to make such a pledge is a matter of denominational concern. What should interest the general public is that such favorable reports on the Russian situation should have been made by the American visitors and published so fully in the Methodist press.

Freedom and Mr. Harding

SOMEWHERE out on the fertile plains of Kansas, Warren G. Harding, a rich man and the President of the United States, puts in an hour or so running a threshing machine, shakes hands with the farm owner and talks with him "man to man," and enrols himself as a "member of the farm bloc." A performance like this does not, however, effect the transubstantiation of Mr. Harding into a dirt farmer. He might quite as convincingly claim to be a mother every time he kisses a voter's baby; for Mr. Harding's gesture, even though the sun was hot, is likely to impress few people—certainly few farmers or workers. Mr. Harding is mentally a million miles away from the farmer or the worker, and that is why his other recent gesture of amiability, the "pardoning" of twenty-seven political prisoners, was executed with such infinitely bad grace.

Men were jailed under special war-time acts in America for speaking their convictions against war. Some of them were jailed under these acts after the war was over and when even the pitiful excuses conjured up by hysteria and fear were gone. While other governments released their political prisoners, our government went on sending them to jail. When our government released "enemy aliens" who had plotted actual destruction to American ships and lives, it left in jail the men who had only disbelieved in war and said so. Finally, grudgingly, a few at a time, it began to release the pacifists and radicals, keeping in jail those whose economic views it particularly disliked. And now, with Independence Day in the offing and a hostile West to face and to win, President Harding releases twenty-seven more, with this reservation:

> That they be law-abiding and loyal to the government of the United States and not encourage, advocate, or become wilfully connected with lawlessness in any form, and upon the further condition that if any of such persons violate the foregoing conditions, such commutation will be immediately revoked, and the prisoner returned to the penitentiary where he is now confined.

Which means that unless these men permanently live up to Department of Justice standards of "loyalty" they can be thrust back into jail without the formality of a trial. They are neither free nor pardoned.

Meanwhile even this poor portion of freedom is withheld from twenty men whose offense was in fact similar, but whom the government will hold on the ground that they are said to have conspired to prevent the free flow of supplies to the government for war purposes. It is withheld from one man, F. J. Gallagher, because "he was the cause of several strikes in the oil fields during the war. . . ." It is withheld, without explanation, from Nicholas Zogg and from Librado Rivera, the brave little Mexican friend of Francesco Magon, who published in his Spanish paper at Los Angeles a manifesto calling upon the peoples of the world to unite against war.

President Harding may hold babies and drive threshing machines, he may talk about the glories of the United States and the infinite wisdom and loving-kindness of the present Administration, but the people of the West, from Kansas to Alaska, should not be too far beguiled by his words or his acts or his "ice-cream pants." They should challenge his right to ask their support or talk of freedom as long as twenty-three men remain in Federal jails to prove the futility of such words.

Looking On

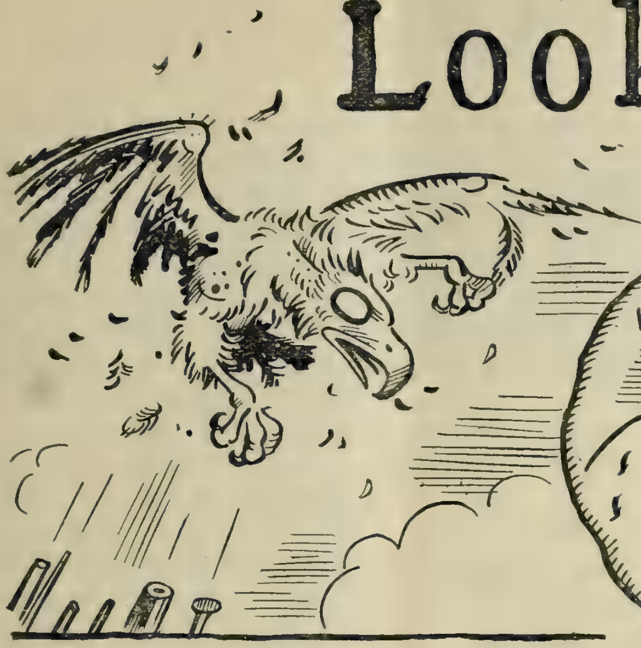
July 4 1923

BY Art Young



— DAILY BATTLE —
OLD BIRD OF FREEDOM AGAINST
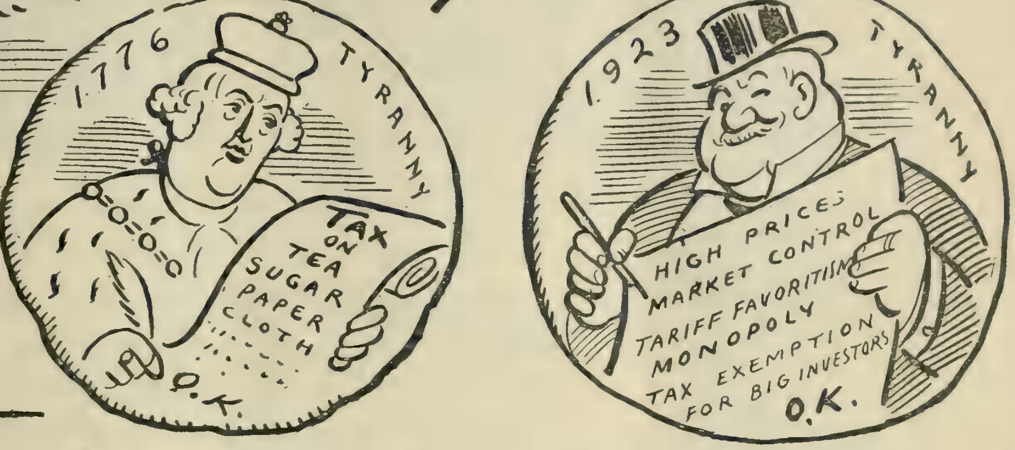
CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE, MILITARISM, CORRUPT POLITICS, KU KLUX KLAN, ART, DRAMA AND RELIOUS BIGOTRY, AND THE COMMERCIALIZED PRESS.

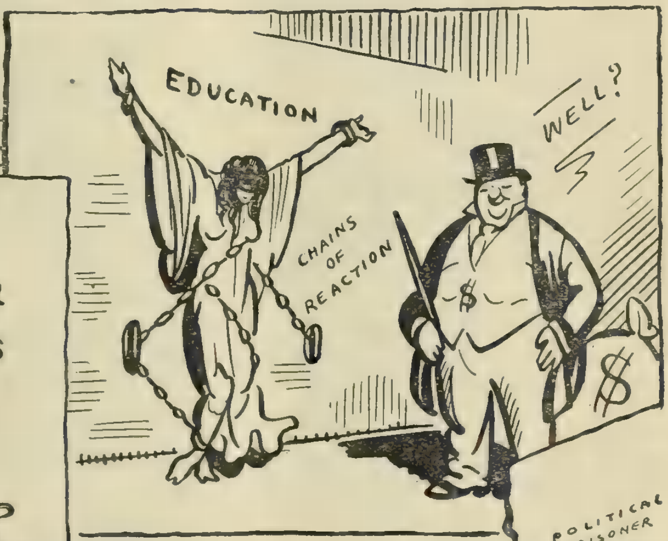


1776
TYRANNY
TAX ON TEA SUGAR PAPER CLOTH
O.K.
1923
TYRANNY
HIGH PRICES
MARKET CONTROL
TARIFF FAVORITISM
MONOPOLY
TAX EXEMPTION FOR BIG INVESTORS
O.K.

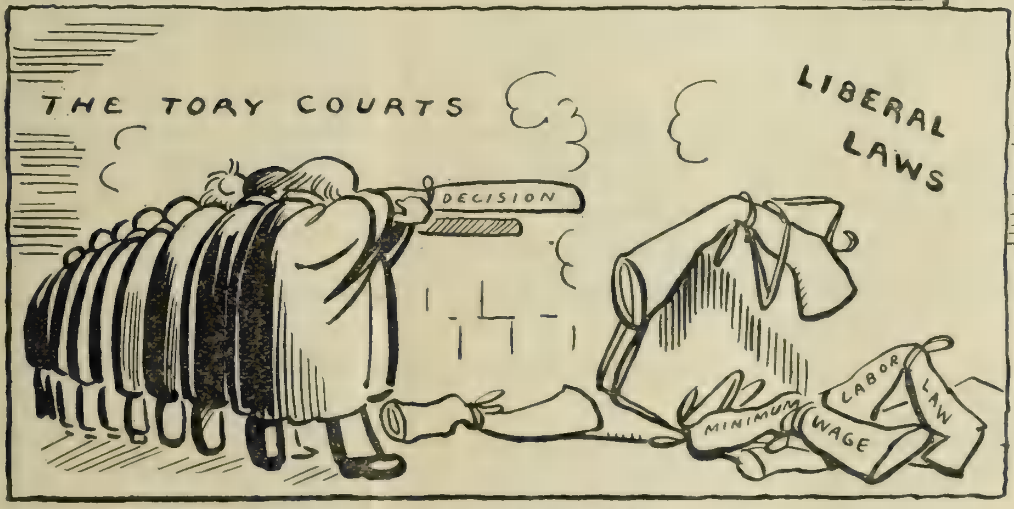
KING GEORGE III

KING COMMERCIALISM

THE SEAL OF AUTHORITY IS DIFFERENT — BUT



EDUCATION
CHAINS OF REACTION
WELL?
$
$



THE TORY COURTS
LIBERAL LAWS DECISION
MINIMUM WAGE LABOR LAW

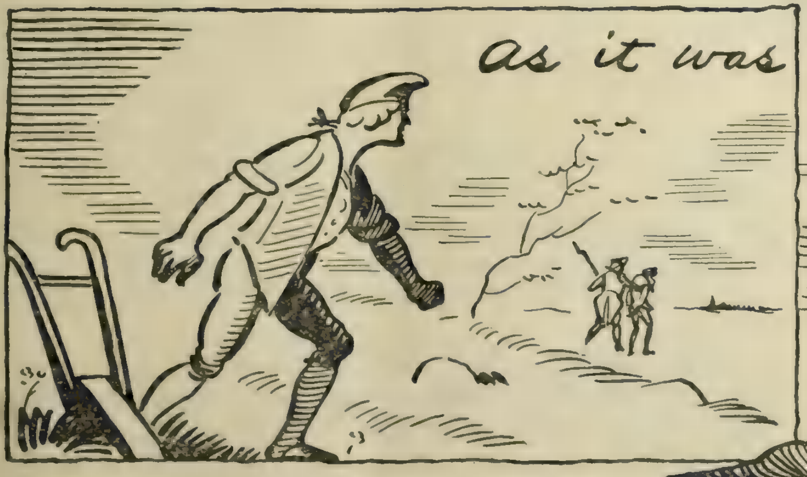
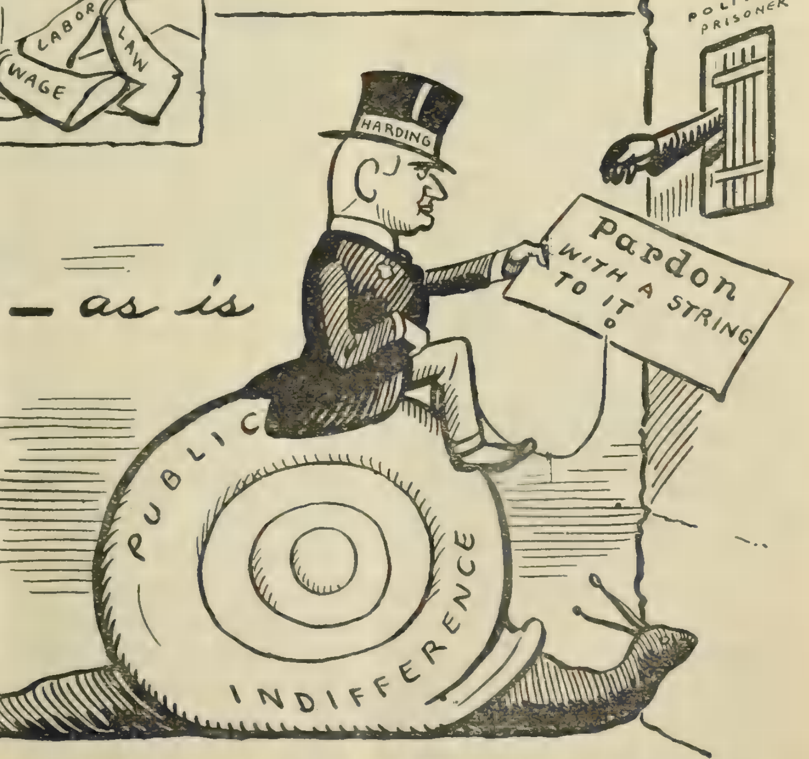
THE SPORT OF JUDGES
'SHOT AT SUNRISE'

as it was — as is



ON THE MINUTE, IN DEFENSE OF LIBERTY



POLITICAL PRISONER
HARDING
Pardon WITH A STRING TO IT.
PUBLIC INDIFFERENCE

MORE THAN THREE YEARS ON THE WAY.

Free Speech: The Vital Issue[*]

By WILLIAM E. BORAH

A GREAT American once said: "You may chain down all human rights but leave the right of speech free and it will unchain all the rest." This is not mere eloquence; it is the plain statement of a simple and fundamental principle of free government. I sometimes think that the most vital provision of the Constitution of the United States is the First Amendment.

Our institutions have had a severe test in the last few years. War is the great enemy of orderly and free government. It undermines respect for law. It treads down constitutional guaranties. It disregards the assurance of civil liberty. When war is on, these things are difficult to avoid. But certainly when war is over it is the highest duty of a free people to get back to the great underlying principles of constitutional government — to put the practices and habits of war, the hatred, the bitterness, the intolerance, and the arbitrary spirit of war behind us and live in the light of the future.

I think it deeply regrettable that we procrastinate in this work of getting back to constitutional government. It cannot be other than a matter of profound regret to all who believe in the great guaranties of the Constitution that even five years after the war men still lie in prison because of the views they expressed touching that conflict. We are the only nation engaged in the war which still claims its political prisoners, which still holds men in prison for expressions of opinion. What interest is served by such a course? What benefit is derived from establishing such a precedent?

> Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.—Constitution of the United States.
>
> Chief of Police Oaks, Los Angeles, California, to Upton Sinclair:
>
> "Constitution or no Constitution, you're not going to speak in San Pedro."—Los Angeles Record, May 16, 1923.
>
> Chief of Police, Martins Ferry, Ohio, when the Mayor refused a permit to J. P. Cannon to speak on Russia.
>
> Chief of Police: "We don't need no law to stop bolshevik meetings, and there ain't going to be none held here."
>
> Cannon: "That is in violation of the Constitution."
>
> Chief of Police: "All right, if that's the case, it is sure going to be violated. By God, this is the United States, and you can't have no meetings here."—Oklahoma Leader, May 14, 1923.

There is no subject of deeper concern in these days than that of preserving these civil rights of the citizen. It is a matter which relates directly and immediately to the welfare, the security, and the happiness of all. But while all are concerned, it is especially of the highest concern to the average citizen. The man of influence and of uncommon ability, the man of commanding wealth, may secure his rights under any condition or under any kind of government sufficient to make life comfortable, or at least endurable. But the average man or woman, the man or woman in the ordinary walks of life, finds security only and alone in the great charter itself, a charter binding upon the courts and the Congress, upon majorities and minorities, upon the rich and the poor. And those who are not willing to live up to the Constitution and to its guaranties of civil rights are not true Americans—they have not the slightest conception of the underlying principles of free institutions.

It is easy to believe in our Constitution and the principles of right which it guarantees when it fits our case—the great test comes in applying its principles to others. Everybody believes in free speech as guaranteed by the First Amendment of the Constitution when he is the one making the speech—the supreme test comes when we are called upon to apply its principles when the other man is making the speech. Everybody believes in the right of peaceable assemblage—but the test comes when you are looking upon the gathering of those who hold a different view.

The assaults in these days upon the Constitution, and particularly upon the Bill of Rights, are persistent and insidious, as tireless as they are reprehensible. They are made under all kinds of specious pleas and for all kinds of purposes and with all kinds of proclaimed good intentions. But however made or by whomsoever made or for whatsoever purpose men who really believe in a representative republic will resist these aggressions whenever and however and by whomsoever made. We cannot afford to barter these rights or sacrifice them for any purpose or under any circumstances. It may sometimes seem advisable to do so for a day or to meet some particular emergency, but in the end it will prove a costly experiment.

When I look back upon those stately figures in the formative days of the republic, contemplate their vision, their faith, their breadth of thought and tolerance, I can think of no greater boon for our country than that their example shall continue to be our guide and inspiration in these days of vexed questions and great problems.

---

[*] Copyright, 1923, The Nation, Inc.

Protecting Our Liberties

By UPTON SINCLAIR

AMERICA has a grave question to consider at the present minute. Can we preserve the constitutional rights which have been handed down to us by our ancestors? And if so, how shall we set about it? It is no exaggeration to say that these rights are, for practical purposes, non-existent in America at the present time. The rich and prominent, of course, can protect themselves; even a Socialist author, if he happens to be well known, will be released from jail after his arrest; but the average American citizen no longer has any right which a police official is bound to respect. He can be arrested, thrown into jail, and held incomunicado for days, or weeks, or months, as the police authorities see fit. His home will be raided, and his belongings scattered about on the floor, or confiscated, or burned. He will be tortured in jail, to make him give evidence against himself—a procedure not merely in violation of constitutional provisions, but in violation of one of the most fundamental principles of Anglo-Saxon law, which in England and other civilized countries has been respected for many centuries.

Needless to say, of course, the common citizen is deprived of the right to strike, and especially of the right to win a strike. All over this country at the present time the police serve as strike-breaking agencies at the behest of the big-business interests. They forbid picketing, they make mass arrests of the leaders, they raid union offices and close them, they forbid public assemblies and deny the strikers an opportunity to consult together and to act, or even to exist, as an organization. In all these procedures the courts back them up, and the American workingman is reduced to a condition similar to that of serfs in old-time Russia or of peasants in France prior to the revolution. And these things are done not merely in semi-barbarous parts of the country, such as southern California; they are done in places as widely scattered as the States of Washington, and Idaho, and Kansas, and Louisiana, and Pennsylvania, and West Virginia. What can the average citizen do about it?

As an individual he can, of course, do nothing. If he tries to do anything, he is immediately dubbed a Red and falls victim to the police brutalities above described. The only thing the average citizen can do is to organize; he must become part of a great body of people, and this organization must be founded upon wise principles, a plan of procedure so carefully chosen as to make it impossible for the thugs and bullies of big business to overcome it. We are proceeding to do this here in southern California; we are doing it thoroughly and making a real job of it. Knowing that the same need exists in other parts of the country, we think it worth while to make our method of procedure known to others, so that groups of citizens may profit by the lessons we have learned, and may protect their civil liberties and become once more the citizens of a republic, instead of the slaves of an industrial empire.

The American Civil Liberties Union is a national organization, formed four or five years ago to educate the people to the meaning of civil rights and to help them in the struggle to maintain these rights. This union has done good work in the publication of educational literature and in the raising of test cases to bring the facts before the public. We have proceeded to organize the southern California branch of the American Civil Liberties Union. We have held a series of five mass meetings; our free-speech demonstration at San Pedro was attended by not less than 15,000 people, and there have been four meetings at the Walker Auditorium in Los Angeles, from the first three of which thousands of people had to be turned away for lack of room. We have obtained the pledges of some 500 people to join our organization. Recently we held our first organization meeting; we did not try to get a crowd for this meeting, but invited only the people who had agreed to join, so that we could get down to business and get practical work done. At these various meetings we have taken in something over $700, and we are now starting a campaign to raise a large fund to make possible our permanent organization. We are going to have a salaried organizer, a man who is competent both to lecture and to write about our work; we are going to have an office and

No person shall be . . . deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.—Constitution of the United States.

General Pat Hamrock, Denver, Colorado, when Rangers deported W. Z. Foster:

"We consulted no law."—Federated Press, January 6, 1923.

Mayor of Bellaire, Ohio, on admitting that H. M. Wicks had been arrested without any charge having been made against him:

"It is not what he has done, but what he might do."—Reading Labor Advocate, May 12, 1923.

Judge in Seattle, Washington, in the case of Tom O'Mara, Tom Smith, and others, arrested February 14 for selling I.W.W. papers in Centralia.

Judge: "I suppose you will plead not guilty, but I will find you guilty now."

Question: "Do constitutional rights count in Centralia at all?"

Judge: "No. Constitutional rights do not count at all."—Industrial Worker, March 10, 1923.

a stenographer; we are going to print literature and distribute it, and hold meetings and conduct debates and an open forum, to which we shall invite the enemies of civil liberties for exhibition purposes.

There are many groups of people formed for the purpose of bringing about industrial changes; and these people apparently cannot get together upon a program. But there is one platform upon which it should be possible to get every true American to stand, and that is the platform of free discussion of our problems. This ideal was carefully embodied by our forefathers in the fundamental law of our nation, and of every one of our separate States. There are constitutional provisions, granting to the people the rights of freedom of speech and of the press, also the right to assemble and petition the government for redress of grievances. This is the true 100 per cent Americanism, and we have taken this for our sole program. We are taking pains to make clear that we have nothing to do with any labor union or political party or religious creed; we are taking our stand upon the simple elementary right of all sides to have a hearing and to be protected by the law while they are setting forth their ideas. On that platform we can get a great many people of all classes to stand; and having got them, we mean to see that the authorities do actually obey the law, and do actually permit every person in the community to exercise his constitutional rights.

Americans, as a rule, especially the new variety of 100 per cent business men, do not realize what is the fundamental law of the United States and what were the principles of the founders of our nation. We are getting out a leaflet to inform them. We are going to teach the Bill of Rights to the public—and nobody is going to put us in jail for doing it, because we have on our executive committee three clergymen, two lawyers, a doctor, and two or three prominent club ladies; we are going to get a great number of such people, and whenever we meet we shall have such an array of wealth and fashion upon our platform that the police and prosecuting authorities will be awed into decency. You should have seen how good they were down at San Pedro, where we had two authors, two journalists, two millionaires, two lawyers, and two men who had served as officers of our army in France—all assuring the strikers that there is really a difference between present-day America and old-time Russia!

We are going to have at least 2,000 dues-paying members, and at least 10,000 people interested in our work, to whom we can send information about violations of civil rights as they occur. We have named fourteen committees—and these are not going to be mere names; they consist of people who mean business, and each one has a chairman who is going to plan and see that things are done. We think it a little tribute to our effectiveness that from the day of our free-speech rally at San Pedro not a single striker has been arrested; and recently the courts have released 300 who were charged with "blocking the sidewalks." Also they have released eighteen who were charged with displaying a red flag, along with a dozen other flags, including the American. Police Court Judge Crawford stated that all red-flag showers ought to be sent to jail, but unfortunately for him the Supreme Court of the State had held the red-flag ordinance unconstitutional! The violators of this unconstitutional ordinance had only been held in jail three weeks. We are so much encouraged by this decision that we are now going to try to get the release of the restaurant proprietor who was dragged out from behind his counter and jailed for feeding the strikers—that was "prolonging the strike"!

One of the wealthy club ladies who is working quietly to help our organization tells us that the thing which most disturbs the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association is the publicity we have managed to get all over the country. They are sensitive about this, because they are trying to sell our climate to "come-ons" from the East, and they don't like to have it known that people who come to southern California are likely to be thrown into jail for trying to read the Constitution of the United States.

That is the way to tame these 100 per cent rowdies—to put the fear of the American people into their greedy souls!

Two Portraits

By MAXWELL BODENHEIM

I

Office Girl

Within an office, whose exterior
Resembles an ultra-conservative mind,
She battles with the avaricious words
Of a meager petrified man.
Her face is brown stagnation
But it has not succeeded
In drowning a barely breathing wistfulness.
Bravery is fear
Sneering at itself,
And her life is ever hovering
Upon the edge of this condition.
Yet her obscurity
Is an important atom
In the mysterious march of time.

II

Envious Poet

Seraphic and relaxed you take
Your novel, with uncertain thumbs,
As one who lingers over cake
And dreads the thought of final crumbs.

(Frown at my precious sorcery
And label me an envious elf,
If human beings could agree
Their boredom might revenge itself!)

O youthful housewife weighing grains
Of joy upon your empty smile,
The total of my bolder gains
Is but a more impressive guile.

Your serious child wins the alert
And limpid art of playing tag
While your emotions rest inert,
Like dried fruit in a paper bag.

And yet I envy both of you
And wish that I could also find
The mildness of your fancied view,
Where feelings dance and thoughts are kind.

"Sweet Land of Liberty"

(From Bulletins of the American Civil Liberties Union)

Beyond the Law

Alabama. After protecting himself against a mob for six hours, John King, Negro miner of Helena, was lynched on May 10 by men whom he had accused of taking money from his pay envelope.

The Crime of Quitting Work

Arkansas. The joint executives of the sixteen standard railway brotherhoods have offered a reward of $5,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the parties connected with the lynching of E. C. Gregor, striking shopman, at Harrison, Arkansas, last January. A legislative investigating committee of the State has whitewashed the citizens' mob which committed the crime and has been unable to fix the responsibility on individuals. It did find, however, that the lynching followed a conference of twelve leaders of the mob at the Harrison Rotary Club.

Boys Will Be Boys

New York. Students of Columbia University kidnapped William Werner, graduate student, on May 17, took him out of the city in an automobile and beat him, encouraged by policemen who were told that he was being punished for lack of patriotism. Werner had written a letter to the university daily defending freedom of speech and press in a local issue.

The Supreme Offense

Arkansas. Two delegates of the Agricultural Workers' Industrial Union were menaced by a mob of citizens of Bald Knob on May 15 and, after being searched twice for evidence against them, were forced to leave town. They were accused of agitating for higher wages for berry pickers.

Law and Order

California. More than 400 members of the I.W.W. were arrested in San Pedro on May 14 for holding meetings in connection with the harbor strike.

Excessive Bail

Pennsylvania. After a hearing before Justice of the Peace Riley at Pittsburgh, Fred Merrick, arrested with twenty-three others at the Labor Lyceum on April 27, was released on $10,000 bail pending trial under the Flynn anti-sedition act of Pennsylvania.

An I.W.W. Has No Friends

New Jersey. Two members of the Industrial Workers of the World, Boorus and Romero, arrested at Hoboken on May 2 for holding up government mails, were convicted on hearsay evidence of attendance at an I.W.W. meeting by United States Commissioner Besson on May 10 and held in $500 bail for the grand jury.

Our Democratic Navy

California. Five men were injured, one seriously, in race rioting between white and Filipino sailors of the battle fleet in Los Angeles harbor on May 27. The ejection of a white man from a Filipino dance hall precipitated the riot, which police were unable to manage.

Upholding the Law

New York. Immediately following the signing of the anti-masking bill by Governor Smith the Klan defied the new measure on May 27 by initiating 789 members at a large meeting at Eastport, L. I.

Always Fair Prey

California. Two members of the Industrial Workers of the World, Albert Stingeland and William Flanagan, were convicted of criminal syndicalism at Sacramento on May 18.

More of the Same Thing

Idaho. Six members of the I.W.W. were recently arrested on criminal syndicalism charges at Pocatello.

For Telling the Whole Truth

California. The Appellate Court on May 23 handed down a decision sustaining the conviction of ten witnesses who were arrested at the Casdorf-Firey trial in April, 1922, for admitting membership in the I.W.W.

Our Super-Government

Ohio. The hall in Columbus in which Eugene Debs was to speak on June 22, for which deposit money had been accepted, was refused to the Debs committee on June 1 by order of the American Legion and the Chamber of Commerce.

Subservient Police

New Jersey. Passaic police on May 28 seized Lorenzo De Mario, Amalgamated Clothing Workers' representative, and placed him on a train for New York with orders not to return. His offense consisted of talking organization to the workers.

The War Is Over

California. Ex-service men took Frank Siceri from his home in Los Angeles on the night of June 5, bound him to a post, and beat him unconscious with a wire cable. They left a note accusing police of indifference in failing to prosecute him for an alleged assault upon a young woman.

The Defenseless Race

Florida. The body of Henry Simmons, Negro, was recently found riddled with bullets and hanging to a tree near Palm Beach. He was suspected of having shot and killed Policeman J. N. Smith.

Did Peter Cooper Turn in His Grave?

New York. The director of Cooper Union in New York City denied the use of the hall to the Anti-Fascisti Alliance of North America on the ground that the meeting threatened "to involve riotous proceedings."

Our Solons

Michigan. The act to repeal the State criminal syndicalism law was killed in committee before the recent adjournment of the legislature in spite of the united action of labor bodies to force it into the open and insure its passage.

Social Item from Goose Creek

Texas. Henry Haeker of Goose Creek was kidnapped on the night of June 14 by masked men, taken to the woods, and beaten over the head. No cause for the attack is known.

Shades of William Penn!

Pennsylvania. Girolamo Valenti and Birch Wilson, Socialist speakers, were prevented from addressing a meeting in Old Forge for the second time in a week on June 13, when they were ordered from the town by Burgess Costanzo.

So This Is Justice!

Washington, D. C. Because the papers proving his Canadian citizenship were seized by the Government in 1917, Archie Sinclair, I.W.W. political prisoner freed on December 31, 1922, by order of President Harding, cannot be deported to Canada and may be forced to return to Leavenworth penitentiary to finish a ten-year sentence.

The Issues at Amherst

By JOHN MERRIMAN GAUS

PRESIDENT MEIKLEJOHN had attempted to define the function of the liberal college. His inaugural address was devoted to this. He had stated and restated his suggestions to trustees and faculty as well as the general public in a series of papers and reports, and had discussed it with undergraduates on many occasions—notably the Chapel addresses at the opening of the fall term. Many of these papers are conveniently found in his book, "The Liberal College." Disagreement, discussion, clarification of issues have been deliberately sought by the president. But there were many people who were unable to disagree in this wholesome and healthy way.

The president was brought to Amherst by the trustees to build up a stronger faculty. It was a situation clearly recognized even among those of us who were students here at the time. The selection of personnel for the purpose of developing larger policy is the essence of administration. A part of President Meiklejohn's thesis was that the president should be only the agent of a controlling and dominant faculty, with the board of trustees playing no part in the determination of educational policy; yet he had been brought to Amherst to change the faculty for the better. Here was, obviously, a dilemma. There was an inherent and essential conflict; and if the trustees at any time should no longer support the president in the task which they brought him to Amherst to accomplish, his work would be blocked.

The new men brought to Amherst by President Meiklejohn included many younger men; and some of the older settlers in Amherst did not approve the attempt to give young men a share in the determination of educational policy. The methods of these younger men, in closer touch with the students, frequently approached those described by Walton Hamilton in his address published in The Nation for June 20, as treating education as an adventure. They were more largely engaged in research in their respective fields, and viewed Amherst as a part of the larger enterprise of learning rather than as a single tradition. Instead of welcoming this infusion of new blood, instead of doing their full share to create an understanding and a synthesis of ages and outlooks, some of the older teachers were embittered and some of the new were impatient.

One cannot ignore, too, the kind of social life that develops in a small college town. It has something of the atmosphere so brilliantly described by Hugh Walpole in "The Gods and Mr. Perrin." Most small colleges recruit their teaching staff largely from among alumni. President Meiklejohn was not an Amherst man. Many of the people he brought to Amherst were not Amherst men. Into a relatively settled and fixed society these new men came; and feelings that were already hurt by the failure to reappoint certain former faculty members were not receptive, always, to the newcomers. And the possibilities of gossip and rumor in a village are notorious. One of my neighbors looks upon the controversy as centering upon the failure of four of the new men to keep their lawns mowed!

The policy of the president of extending responsibility to the students for their activities and conduct has brought much criticism. This policy was inaugurated with the establishment of the student council in 1913, and has continued to the creating in 1922 of the committee of seven (selected from and by the seniors) who are responsible in matters of student conduct affecting the college's name.

In terms of policy, of personnel, of curricular changes, of attitude toward teaching and research, of relations with students, here was an experiment in education which possessed the virtues and defects of experiment. New courses, new men, new relationships had to be integrated with the best in the old. In addition to the strains of the period of readjustment came those of war time; and there was opposition to the idea that a college should continue its study and teaching in war as well as peace.

It was only by lifting the issues to the plane of educational policy that progress could be made; and meanwhile large numbers of alumni grew increasingly hostile to those policies. The development of the curriculum had included the building up of the work in the humanistic sciences—politics, economics, philosophy, history of religions—to a closer approach to equality with the natural sciences and languages and literature, and this caused some disapproval. The president's views on athletics (most recently set forth in the Atlantic Monthly for November, 1922) angered many. Some held to the sentimental belief that the college and personnel of their particular day should be restored so far as possible, and that change was necessarily bad. The work of the college was viewed, again, as antagonistic to some conceptions of religion and morals; teaching was destructive. The establishment of classes in collaboration with the central labor unions of Holyoke and Springfield was put down to the account of "radicalism." In fact the whole gamut of rumor, gossip, sentiment, prejudice, and fear was run by a variety of critics. What was surprising was the number of busy men of affairs among the alumni who made a deliberate effort, on the other hand, really to understand and appraise the work that was being attempted at Amherst. But on the whole the alumni were critical—and ill-informed.

What shall be the kind of teaching and the nature of the curriculum of the liberal college? What shall be the government of the college—trustees, faculties, students? Where does a college president fit in a scheme of government? How can teaching be improved and faculties recruited for the task of teaching in the liberal college without becoming settled and unimaginative? On all these matters American opinion today is confused and vague. President Meiklejohn had spoken clearly and frankly; the board of trustees and a majority of the faculty disagreed with him; and he has had to go. I do not see how men who are busily engaged in their various enterprises were competent to go behind the superficial aspects of a controversy and appraise adequately the educational policy, reflected through changes in personnel and curriculum. The statements made by some opponents of President Meiklejohn that they approve his policies but not the administration of those policies is answered by this fact: most of those who have been working toward those policies as teachers are leaving, and those who have opposed remain. Amherst, through its governing organization, has made its deliberate choice; the consequences strike beyond the particular college into the broader field of education.

Pharisees and Reformers

By ALEXANDER MEIKLEJOHN

What follows is part of the baccalaureate address delivered at Amherst College on June 17. Dr. Meiklejohn's resignation of the presidency of the college two days later is the subject of a signed article on the opposite page and of an editorial on page 4 of this issue. At the commencement exercises of June 20, twelve members of the senior class and one graduate student refused to accept their diplomas as a protest against the action of the trustees in forcing Dr. Meiklejohn out of office.

IS OUR WORLD CHRISTIAN? I am inclined to answer yes and no; to say, it is, but also, it is not. And yet I think a truer answer can be given. I think that in the only sense in which such men as we can take a moral creed we do accept the Christian teaching. In this we do as Buddhists do, and as Mohammedans. We take the teaching as our goal but fall far short of reaching it in acts, in working principles.

And this is not an accident which comes from our peculiar weakness. It is the fate of every man, of every people. It is the essential quality of human living. Forever there is fixed in man the gulf which Jesus found. Forever men are torn asunder in just the way that we have found ourselves to be. May I explain?—and then my sermon will be done.

I have complained against the world that Jesus was killed by it as soon as people thought they knew what he was teaching. And yet the selfsame world has kept that teaching in its mind, has talked of him and of his words for these 2000 years, has thought of him more than of any other man whom it has known. What shall you say of such a funny, baffling world as this—a world that slays a man, just as the Greeks slew Socrates, and then defines its very mind and spirit in terms of him?

The answer to the riddle lies in the very nature of a man. We are not one but two. Much of our modern thinking about men is over simple in its explanation. Man is by nature of the type of a dilemma. He is himself, but also he can think and plan about himself. And thought is foreign to the nature which it thinks about. So man is foreign to himself. In many ways, of which I must not stop to speak just now, thought is abstract; it leaves the vivid actual concrete world of things and human situations; it deals with principles and universals. By means of these men hope to change themselves, or, as they said in olden days, to save their souls. Man by his thought, his insight, is leading, dragging up from out the depths, himself. And though it is himself who leads, he follows most reluctantly.

At every step along the road which men have trod, the hill which they have climbed, there has been conflict. Always the man of active type, the man of common sense, believes that he has reached the goal. This is the place where men should live, he thinks, here they should settle down, master the country, reap its fruits, and live their lives in peace. But always men have found that in the spirit of man there is no peace in this inactive sense. The man who does not climb slips back. Nothing can be more clear than that a thought accepted, put in action, and kept free from criticism, becomes with every day less true, less vital—becomes more false. A thought believed and only that, becomes unworthy of belief. And so man ever goads himself again to travel the winding road. His life is not a state; it is a process.

And now before I say my final word to you I must return again to talk of Pharisees, to try to do them justice. They are the men whom critics criticize. That is their function. They represent the action in our common life. They make the world go round; they make the institution run; they get things done according to the wisdom which the past has given. And meanwhile other men, so-called reformers, find fault with what they do—and there is fault enough to find.

But are they made of different stuff—these two? Is one side right, the other wrong? May one of them destroy the other from the earth, sweep it aside, and take the world in charge? I do not think so. Both groups are men and every man has both these attitudes within himself. To make our life complete each side must play its part. I know reformers who complain with bitterness because men will not change the world at once as they demand. They seem to me to argue in this vein: "I wish to differ from every other man and yet I ask that all the other men should see that I am right—and do it quickly." I often wish they had, or shall I say, I often wish we had a better sense of humor.

But what of Pharisees again? They are the men of common sense. I wish they had more sense, could see more clearly the need of criticism of what they do. I wish that both these groups could see how silly and futile each would be without the other. And yet it will not do to wish too hard, to set one's heart on having peace, the peace that comes with understanding. These two will never understand each other. Our human life will never understand itself. But it will always try; and as it tries it will succeed. But if it stopped from trying, the human spirit would be dead.

Members of the graduating class: I have tried in these last words to tell you of the road that you must go. I send you out not in the search for things that men can own, but in the search for self, for your own lives, and for the lives of other men. I charge you that you seek to find what human life can be, and that you make the search with high intelligence and sober common sense. You will not reach the goal. Your life is stretched between the least that lies behind and the achievement still before of which each vision that we get seems only a glimmer of the truth that men will some day win. I bid you as you go keep fellowship with other men; no matter what they do, no matter what they say or think, they are your fellows in the common task. You should regard them as you do regard yourself.

I have no fear of your discouragement at what I have said. You do not dread the unending road. What I do fear for you is just that lethargy of spirit that cuts man's life in two, that lets our double nature fall apart. Beware of that.

We send you forth on high adventure. This college loves the life of man and it has tried to make you ready for that life. Go forth and play your part and be you worthy of the college which has tried to teach you how to play.

Making Wheat Sober Up

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THE most important political event of the moment went by with little notice. Happening to be in Chicago in the neighborhood of the Sherman Hotel, I walked into it.

There were met there a large number of political and commercial and industrial doctors to consider the sad case of wheat. The occasion was called the National Wheat Conference. The dark, lean, vivid face of Congressman Anderson of Minnesota appeared in the chief place about the operating table. Anderson presided. Back of him was the figure of Governor Preus of Minnesota, blond, firm, trim, controlled. Preus is running on the Republican ticket in Minnesota for United States Senator against a Farmer-Labor candidate whose followers grow wheat so unprofitably that perhaps they may succeed in carrying the State against Preus. Back of Preus was James F. Bell of Minnesota, a distinguished miller, rich, suave, alert, broad-eyed, taking a wide view of the milling business and determined to do something to improve the prospects of wheat and to moderate the feelings of the wheat farmer.

Brought together by these gentlemen, were numerous other representatives of politics and of business from as far east and south as Georgia and from as far west and north as Oregon. Senator Copeland came from New York. Governor Nestos came from North Dakota. George C. Jewett, cooperative seller of some thirty or thirty-five million bushels of wheat from the Rocky Mountain and Pacific Slope Northwest, came. So did many bakers—gentlemen who used to be mere rule-of-thumb tradesmen but who are now on their way to being scientists. At their head was Dr. H. E. Barnard, director of their bread laboratory, their bread research institution, where numerous university graduates devote themselves to devising a bread more nutritious than poor dear mother ever baked.

Moreover, there were railroad managers, and packers, and Ben Marsh, the pallid and untiring scourge of railroad managers and packers and millers and middlemen. He on the first day of the conference rose to testify against unrighteousness and boldly and conscientiously and truthfully declared that the membership of the conference had been picked to be conservative or—to put it more conventionally—"stacked against the people."

Myself, having heard "the people" try to solve the wheat problem many times, I enthusiastically prepared to witness the novelty of a solution of it by the conservatives. That conservative solution is long overdue. The rural radical revolt, if studied geographically, is seen to center indubitably on the support of farmers made wretched and angry by unprofitable wheat. I would that Ben Marsh could induce prosperous farmers to take as sublime and as drastic an interest in the public welfare and in politics as is shown by impoverished farmers. In the Bible Jeshurun waxes fat and kicks. In uninspired secular political life, as the horny-handed hero of our basic business, he kicks only when he wanes lean.

Explaining his leanness, there came to this conference a man who is half of him the world's supreme warehouse of food facts and the other half of him the only known equivalent of Albert Lasker and Herbert Bayard Swope put together in number of dynamic mental throbs per minute. This man is Alonzo Taylor, former chief food expert for Herbert Hoover in the United States Food Administration and now chief manager of the Food Research Institute in Leland Stanford University.

Dr. Taylor put the National Wheat Conference on a foundation of ascertained and highly uncomfortable but presumably ultimately useful—because now recognized and acknowledged—truth. He tore all the sweet disguising veils away from the homely, rough fact that the American wheat farmer is now growing a great deal more surplus wheat than Europe, by any device of advanced credits or of settled reparations or of funded debts, can possibly be induced to take.

He showed that Europe is at this moment taking its full peace-time quota of imported wheat. He showed that Russian agricultural exports into Western Europe are beginning to revive. He showed that a disorganized Europe, where transportation had weakened and where impediments to commercial intercourse across national boundaries had strengthened, was more likely to import our present wheat surplus than a revived and restored Europe would be when full railroad service and full and ready internal international transit had been resumed. He dispelled totally the idea of a reconstructed Europe as the consumer of the surplus wheat grown on our recently enormously expanded wheat acreage.

The conference did not seem to think it seemly to pass a resolution requesting Mr. Secretary Hughes to please keep Europe in a disorganized condition in order that it might be obliged to import more American wheat to take the place of an existing but untransportable and unavailable local product. It accordingly left Europe alone. It did not ask Mr. Hughes to do anything about it whatsoever. Finding that Europe could not come forward to give any further "help" to the American farmer, the conference abandoned all recent American agricultural political traditions and showed no interest whatsoever in American "help" for struggling, suffering Europe.

All governmental, all political, devices for solving the wheat grower's present woes were shattered by Dr. Taylor. The American wheat acreage must be accommodated to American needs, with no more dependence on Europe's needs and demands than was customary before the war. Along with this tendency toward contraction, however, there must at the same time be an opposite tendency toward trying to expand the domestic internal American wheat market. Americans are eating less wheat than formerly. The wheat trade and the flour trade and the baking trade must entice them back to their original wheat appetites. Finally, the wheat farmers must sell more of their wheat through cooperative associations which will give that wheat a better grading and which will see to it that only the right grades are offered to the public.

Against international and national political expedients of all sorts, this program now stands out as the one toward which the anti-radical saviors of the basic part of Amerca's basic cereal industry will flock. It means that the conservatives have a program. It means that what with this program, and what with the program of the radicals, and what with the competition between them, the radicalism of the wheat farmers will probably within a few years be turned to prosperity. And to conservatism?

The Two Sweetheart Dippies

How They Sat in the Moonlight on a Lumber-Yard Fence and Heard About the Sooners and the Boomers

By CARL SANDBURG

NOT so very far and not so very near the Village of Liver and Onions is a dippy little town where dippy people used to live.

And it was long, long ago the sweetheart dippies stood in their windows and watched the dips of the star dippers in the dip of the sky. It was the dippies who took the running wild oleander and the cunning wild rambler rose and kept them so the running wild winters let them alone.

"It is easy to be a dippy . . . among the dippies . . . isn't it?" the sweetheart dippies whispered to each other sitting in the leaf shadows of the oleander, the rambler rose.

The name of this dippy town came by accident. The name of the town is Thumbs Up, and it used to be named Thumbs Down, and expects to change its name back and forth between Thumbs Up and Thumbs Down.

The running wild oleanders and the running wild rambler roses grow there over the big lumber yards where all the old lumber goes. The dippies and the dippy sweethearts go out there to those lumber yards and sit on the fence moonlight nights and look at the lumber. The rusty nails in the lumber get rustier and rustier till they drop out. And whenever they drop out there is always a rat standing under to take the nail in his teeth and chew the nail and eat it.

For this is the place the nail-eating rats come to from all over the Rootabaga country. Father rats and mother rats send the young rats there to eat nails and get stronger. If a young rat comes back from a trip to the lumber yards in Thumbs Up and he meets another young rat going to those lumber yards, they say to each other: "Where have you been?" "To Thumbs Up." "And how do you feel?" "Hard as nails."

Now one night two of the dippies, a sweetheart boy and girl, went out to the big lumber yards and sat on the fence and looked at the lumber and the running wild oleanders and the running wild rambler roses. And they saw two big rusty nails, getting rustier and rustier, drop out of the lumber and drop into the teeth of two young rats. And the two young rats sat up on their tails there in the moonlight under the oleanders, under the roses, and one of the young rats told the other young rat a story he made up out of his head. Chewing on the big rusty nail and then swallowing, telling more of the story after swallowing and before beginning to chew the nail again, this is the story he told—and this is the story the two dippies, the two sweethearts sitting on the fence in the moonlight, heard:

Far away where the sky drops down and the sunsets open doors for the nights to come through—where the running winds meet, change faces, and come back—there is a prairie where the green grass grows all around. And on that prairie the gophers, the black and brown-striped ground squirrels, sit with their backs straight up, sitting on their soft paddy tails, sitting in the spring-song murmur of the south wind, saying to each other: "This is the prairie and the prairie belongs to us."

Now, far back in the long time the gophers came there, chasing each other, playing the-green-grass-grew-all-around, playing cross tag, hop tag, skip tag, billy-be-tag, billy-be-it.

The razorback hogs came then, eating pignuts, potatoes, pawpaws, pumpkins. The wild horse, the buffalo, came. The moose, with spraggly branches of antlers spreading out over his head, the moose came—and the fox, the wolf. The gophers flipped a quick flip-flop back into their gopher holes when the fox, the wolf, came. And the fox, the wolf, stood at the holes and said: "You look like rats, you run like rats, you are rats, rats with stripes. Bah! you are only rats. Bah!"

It was the first time anybody said "Bah!" to the gophers. They sat in a circle with their noses up, asking: "What does this 'Bah!' mean?" And an old timer, with his hair falling off in patches, with the stripes on his soft paddy tail patched with patches, this old gopher said: "'Bah!' speaks more than it means whenever it is spoken."

Then the sooners and the boomers came, saying "Bah!" and saying it many new ways, till the fox, the wolf, the moose, the wild horse, the buffalo, the razorback hog picked up their feet and ran away without looking back.

The sooners and boomers began making houses, sod houses, log, lumber, plaster-and-lath houses, stone, brick, steel houses, but most of the houses were lumber with nails to hold the lumber together to keep the rain off and push the wind back and hold the blizzards outside.

In the beginning the sooners and boomers told stories, spoke jokes, made songs, with their arms on each other's shoulders. They dug wells, helping each other get water. They built chimneys together, helping each other let the smoke out of their houses. And every year the day before Thanksgiving they went in cahoots with their post-hole diggers and dug all the post holes for a year to come. That was in the morning. In the afternoon they took each other's cistern cleaners and cleaned all the cisterns for a year to come. And the next day, on Thanksgiving, they split turkey wishbones and thanked each other they had all the post holes dug and all the cisterns cleaned for a year to come.

If the boomers had to have broom corn to make brooms, the sooners came saying: "Here is your broom corn." If the sooners had to have a gallon of molasses, the boomers came saying: "Here is your gallon of molasses." They handed each other big duck eggs to fry, big goose eggs to boil, purple pigeon eggs for Easter breakfast. Wagon loads of buff banty eggs went back and forth between the sooners and boomers. And they took big hayracks full of buff banty hens and traded them for hayracks full of buff banty roosters. And one time at a picnic one summer afternoon the sooners gave the boomers a thousand golden ice tongs with hearts and hands carved on the handles. And the boomers gave the sooners a thousand silver wheelbarrows with hearts and hands carved on the handles.

Then came pigs, pigs, pigs, and more pigs. And the sooners and boomers said the pigs had to be painted. There was a war to decide whether the pigs should be painted pink or green. Pink won.

The next war was to decide whether the pigs should be painted checks or stripes. Checks won. The next war after that was to decide whether the checks should be painted pink or green. Green won.

Then came the longest war of all, up till that time. And this war decided the pigs should be painted both pink and green, both checks and stripes.

They rested then. But it was only a short rest. For then came the war to decide whether peach pickers must pick peaches on Tuesday mornings or on Saturday afternoons. Tuesday mornings won. This was a short war. Then came a long war—to decide whether telegraph-pole climbers must eat onions at noon with spoons or whether dishwashers must keep their money in pig's ears with padlocks pinched on with pincers.

So the wars went on. Between wars they called each other goofs and snoofs, grave robbers, pickpockets, porch climbers, pie thieves, pie-face mutts, bums, big bums, big greasy bums, dummies, mummies, rummies, sneezicks, bohunks, wops, snorkies, ditch diggers, peanuts, fatheads, sapheads, pinheads, pickle faces, horse thieves, rubbernecks, big pieces of cheese, big bags of wind, snabs, scabs, and dirty sniveling snitches. Sometimes when they got tired of calling each other names they scratched in the air with their fingers and made faces with their tongues out, twisted like pretzels.

After a while, it seemed, there was no corn, no broom corn, no brooms, not even teeny sweepings of corn or broom corn or brooms. And there were no duck eggs to fry, goose eggs to boil, no buff banty eggs, no buff banty hens, no buff banty roosters, no wagons for wagon loads of buff banty eggs, no hayracks for hayrack loads of buff banty hens and buff banty roosters. And the thousand golden ice tongs the sooners gave the boomers and the thousand silver wheelbarrows the boomers gave the sooners, both with hearts and hands carved on the handles, they were long ago broken up in one of the early wars deciding pigs must be painted both pink and green with both checks and stripes. And now, at last, there were no more pigs to paint either pink or green or with checks or stripes. The pigs, pigs, pigs were gone.

So the sooners and boomers all got lost in the wars, or they screwed wooden legs on their stump legs and walked away to bigger, bigger prairies, or they started away for the rivers and mountains, stopping always to count how many fleas there were in any bunch of fleas they met. If you see anybody who stops to count the fleas in a bunch of fleas, that is a sign he is either a sooner or a boomer.

So again the gophers, the black-and-brown-striped ground squirrels, sit with their backs straight up, sitting on their soft paddy tails, sitting in the spring song murmur of the south wind, saying: "This is the prairie and the prairie belongs to us."

Far away today where the sky drops down and the sunsets open doors for the nights to come through—where the running winds meet, change faces, and come back—there the gophers are playing the-green-grass-grew-all-around, playing cross tag, skip tag, hop tag, billy-be-tag, billy-be-it. And sometimes they sit in a circle and ask: "What does this 'Bah!' mean?" And an old timer answers: "'Bah!' speaks more than it means whenever it is spoken."

That was the story the young rat under the oleanders, under the roses, told the other young rat while the two sweetheart dippies sat on the fence in the moonlight looking at the lumber and listening. The young rat who told the story hardly got started eating the nail he was chewing, while the young rat that did the listening chewed up and swallowed down a whole nail.

As the two dippies on the fence looked at the running wild oleander and the running wild rambler roses over the lumber in the moonlight, they said to each other: "It's easy to be a dippy . . . among the dippies . . . isn't it?" And they climbed down from the fence and went home in the moonlight.

Our Town and the Championship Bout

By G. ROBINSON

OUR TOWN is the closest town of any size to Shelby, where on July 4 Jack Dempsey, world's heavyweight champion, will defend his title against Tommy Gibbons of St. Paul.

Gibbons has established training quarters in Our Town, a decision reached after a visit when the city brass band, the fire truck, and most of the inhabitants met the heavyweight aspirant at the train and followed him in admiring throngs as he was shown the advantages Our Town possessed for the establishment of ideal training quarters—and incidentally after a substantial sum of money for the purchase of tickets to the fight had been promised. Our Town must raise $25,000. There has been no indication that the quota will not be met. Indeed tickets are very much in demand, for everyone is going to the bout, perhaps the only championship boxing match we will ever be privileged to see. Recently there appeared signs in all of the hotels in the enterprising little town of Shelby that after the first of June rooms would be $15 a day. That doesn't bother us. We shall merely pack up the flivver and pay a dollar a foot or more for sleeping space on the prairie.

The mere fact that Tommy Gibbons will train in our midst is enough to make us happy. We like to think of the nation-, yea world-wide, advertising Montana is getting by successfully putting across such a stupendous thing as a World's Championship bout. Then, too, Shelby is only 105 miles from Our Town, and when the eyes of the sporting world are focused on that place Our Town will be within the visual range.

Our Town is situated in what is known as the dry-land farming section of Montana. For miles the prairies are dotted with the forsaken shacks of farmers who have given up after years of struggling against hot winds that sear the grain to shriveled spears before it is ten inches high, grasshoppers that come in clouds and leave the land as bare as an alkali flat, hail that beats even the tough sage-brush into the ground, or weeks of moistureless days that leave the country gasping in brown desolation.

Within the past two years two banks in Our Town have failed and at least six others in smaller towns in the county have been forced to close their doors. One loan company has foreclosed 100 farm mortgages during the past year, and at one session of our district court twenty-seven foreclosures were signed. More than half of our taxpayers have been delinquent for three years. There are five grade-schools in the town, attended by 600 children. These schools closed after an eight months' term this year because of inadequate funds. Seventy-five per cent of the teachers in our grade schools have refused to return next year because the school board will require them to teach nine months' school for eight months' wages; that is, they will receive the same salary as they did the past year and will have to teach nine months in order to keep our schools on the accredited list in the State. The Red Cross has not had enough money to pay the telephone bill and the secretary has worked on civilian relief and soldier compensation cases for two months without one penny of her salary.

The County Agent, whose job it was to organize the farmers in the county, to give demonstrations on various farm subjects, to help the farmers build reservoirs and ditches to hoard the scant spring rainfall, to discover new ways of making dry-land farming pay, resigned his position in January and as an economy move it has been decided that his place will remain vacant. Because of a cut in the appropriation by the legislature to the State University the work of the experiment farm, which is a branch of the Agricultural College, has been reduced by half.

Already from the farming communities come reports that the grasshoppers have appeared in such numbers that many farmers have abandoned all hope of a crop again this year—the seventh in succession. Many stopped their spring seeding. Next fall still more farms will be deserted. The fence posts will be hauled miles to be used as firewood by some farmer more courageous—or more unfortunate in that he has no other place to go. And the range cattle will find shelter in the weathering shacks.

But we in Our Town are all going to the big fight at Shelby. We along with all the other towns in Montana are going to get our share of pleasure for our share of the $300,000 paid Jack Dempsey for risking his title. We are going to show Tommy, as we already familiarly call the challenger, that we know how to entertain a celebrity. He will be asked to speak to our school children, our Rotary, our Welfare Club, and our woman's clubs.

The night before Tommy Gibbons leaves for Shelby we will, in all probability, put on a huge celebration with free ice cream and confetti and a gorgeous display of fireworks, costing, we will boast, such and such a sum of money in cold cash but worth every penny of it; for we are showing that our hearts are in the right place, and We Are Putting Our Town on the Map.

Contributors to This Issue

William E. Borah is Senator from Idaho.

Upton Sinclair is the author of "The Goose-Step."

John Merriman Gaus has just resigned as associate professor of political science at Amherst College.

Alexander Meiklejohn has just resigned as president of Amherst College.

Carl Sandburg is known for his verse and fiction.

G. Robinson is a Montana journalist.

In the Driftway

FROM time to time the Drifter has had considerable fear for the future of this nation. Things seemed generally to be going to rack and ruin, and the old traditions of plenty and generosity and neighborliness have seemed far away. Recently, however, his faith was restored. Man, it appears, is not only lavishly provided with sustenance but he is willing, even anxious, to dispense it bountifully. At least, this is the state of affairs at country hotels. They are all about alike, the Drifter finds: long and low, with potted geraniums along the front windows. Dinner is served at twelve sharp; none of your new-fangled lunches at midday and dinner at 7:30. The proprietor himself presides behind the desk and himself conducts you to the dining-room. Nor does a three-day growth of beard detract from his hospitality. The waitresses are evidently his daughters and it is they who bear the plenty to the famished guests.

* * * * *

WITH the soup come young delectable onions, rhubarb, raw cabbage, and prunes. The meat follows, accompanied by the inevitable potato and the verdant pea. There is milk to drink and soft ginger cakes to nibble at in between, and for dessert three kinds of pie and rice pudding! The Drifter has a feeling that he has left out one or two things but the essentials are recorded. And each one is properly seasoned, perfectly cooked, and nicely served. Having partaken a little too lavishly at the beginning, the Drifter finds himself unable to eat the pie. Swaggering slightly he makes his way back to the desk. "What," says he, "is the price of that princely repast?" "Seventy-five cents," replies his host with a kind smile, and the Drifter pays with pleasure.

* * * * *

THIS is the way he dined half-way across the country. In New York City food seems scarce and the money to buy it scarcer. Out in the country there is more than enough for everyone, and everyone is able to enjoy it. This generosity and courtesy goes hand in hand with the twelve o'clock dinner hour—and with the nineteenth-century system of interior decoration. No cretonne covers hide the good oak chairs. The walls are frankly light blue with not one red peacock or spotted canary to mar their smooth, clean surface. A few still lifes do hang about, to be sure: a box of strawberries turned on its side; a bowl of oranges; a glassy-eyed fish or two. But on the whole the only decoration is cleanliness and order. The tablecloths and curtains are snowy white; the thick, substantial china shines; a faint smell of soap recently applied hangs over the whole room.

* * * * *

THE sight of a room like this demonstrates how little the twentieth century means to the great mass of the people. Their sons and daughters may go to the cities and become "modern." If they stay in the towns they will observe the old ways. They may have automobiles and electric lights, but golden-oak is still their favorite furniture and doughnuts for breakfast still follow the bacon and eggs. They have not even lost their faith in government, and the President of the United States is a good man who fills a hard job as well as he can. The Drifter

Correspondence

Only an I.W.W.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The columned walls of the chapel of the Los Angeles crematory softly echoed a new burial ritual on the afternoon of June 2, when young Paul Borgen, martyr I.W.W., was borne to his final rest by his fellow-workers of the Marine Transport Workers of the Los Angeles harbor.

The Rev. Fred R. Wedge, Presbyterian minister, who served twelve days in jail for active sympathy in the harbor strike at San Pedro, preached a sermon having the new proletarian interpretations of the life and words of the Industrial Worker of Nazareth, the migratory worker of Galilee.

Then the shock-troops of the great non-resistant strike, broad-shouldered stevedores and longshoremen and deep-water seamen, rose. They were all fresh from jail and stockade, 300 having been released the day before. Led by the tuneful voice of fellow-worker Duke, the voice which was one of the balance wheels of the strike, they sang as the early Christians in their caves and catacombs must have sung, the "Prison Hymn" of the I.W.W.:

In California's darkened dungeons,
For the O.B.U.,
Remember you're outside for us
While we're inside for you.

Then they swung to "Solidarity Forever" and, gathering volume, swept into the martial strains and tragic lines of "The Red Flag."

Borgen was arrested in a raid on an I.W.W. hall in December, and remained in jail sixty-five days with no complaint filed against him. During that time he lost forty pounds in weight. He was finally released without trial only to go to the hospital and die in a few days of pneumonia, contracted, it is believed, from sleeping on the cold floor of the crowded prison.

Los Angeles, June 15 Virginia Owen

School Tyranny in Seattle

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Some eight or ten high-school teachers were nonplussed recently when they received the following letter:

> I am directed by the board of education to inform you that your name will be withheld from the list of teachers elected until an investigation is completed relative to a meeting of teachers that was held the last of June or the first of July, 1922, at which time a statement was prepared denouncing the board for certain action relative to salaries.
>
> I hope this investigation will be completed within a few days.
>
> Very sincerely yours,
> T. R. Cole, Superintendent.

Some of the teachers sought enlightenment of the board members as to the nature of the evidence against them. These gentlemen informed the teachers that in a certain meeting, date uncertain, the accused teachers, acting for the High School Teachers' League, adopted a resolution denouncing the board for cutting wages, a copy of which resolution they were supposed to have transmitted to the Central Labor Council of Seattle, or to one of the affiliated groups of that body. Teachers inquiring at the office of the secretary of the Central Labor Council were told that no communication from the high-school teachers had ever been received there.

Board members further informed the teachers that copies of the alleged resolutions had come many months before to three members of that body: to Ebenezer Shorrock, banker; to W. J. Santmyer, Stone and Webster engineer, and to E. F. Taylor, Northwest representative of Dodd, Mead and Company, all notorious for their antagonism toward the teachers. The copies were typewritten, and the signatures were also typewritten. Only a little less than a year ago the board unanimously approved a resolution to disregard every communication bearing a typewritten signature! When the teachers requested that the board allow them to see the copies of the resolution, they were told that they had been lost!

Unable to produce evidence—even anonymous testimony with a typewritten signature, which their own rules forbade them to consider—the board finally, after a delay of two weeks, sent the teachers their contracts. But the contracts were not accompanied by an apology for the false and baseless accusation. This is certainly due the teachers since some of them have worked faithfully in the system for more than fifteen years, and particularly since no resolution denunciatory of the board of education has ever been introduced in a meeting of the high-school teachers of Seattle.

And what have the Seattle papers said about all of this? Not a syllable. The Seattle Daily Times which "Prints all the News That's Fit to Print" has the entire story, has had it for two weeks from both the president of the board and from the high-school teachers, but has said nary a word.

Seattle, Washington, May 15 Webb Foote

Ku Kluxism in the Schools

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Through the influence of the Ku Klux, Catholic teachers in the Clarksburg (West Virginia) Independent School District and the adjacent Coal District schools are being refused positions for next year. Among those dismissed is a Miss ——, an efficient principal at Tiessing. She has been in the service of the district for a number of years, but the board of directors of Coal District suddenly finds her religion is a barrier. Another to be dismissed is Miss ——, librarian of Victory high school, Coal District. A third whose position is in danger (I do not yet know whether she was reappointed) is Miss ——, teacher of French in Victory high school. These splendid women, and others as well, are slated for dismissal. They are Catholics and the Ku Klux is in the saddle.

Akron, Ohio, June 4 David H. Pierce

Our Free Press

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I was very much interested in your recent editorial concerning the refusal of two Detroit papers to take an advertisement featuring your article on Why Henry Ford Should Not Be President. My publishers have had a similar experience concerning my book, "Crucibles of Crime," which is an exposé of the iniquitous county-jail system in America. The book covers the jails of practically every State in the Union. When advertisements of the book were submitted to the Daily Democrat, Tallahassee, Florida, and the Herald of Miami, Florida—the advertisements setting forth that Florida jails were discussed—both of these papers refused to run it.

New York, June 13 Joseph F. Fishman

"Let Freedom Ring!"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Permit me to express through your magazine my deep gratitude to the American Legion posts of San Francisco and to the Better America Federation of California for permitting Feodor Chaliapin to appear in two concerts in San Francisco. I hope that the Chaliapin recitals will not prove detrimental to the form of our government, just as the performance of the Moscow Art Theater in New York did not affect the stability of our government. It is indeed a gratifying combination of affairs to grant music lovers the right to pursuit of happiness and at the same time leave our patriotism intact.

Sacramento, California, June 1 S. Potashnick

Books

The Democrat's Handbook

On Liberty. By John Stuart Mill. London: J. W. Parker and Son. 1859. 2s. 6d.

THIS brief but weighty treatise is the work of the distinguished author of the "Principles of Political Economy." Mr. Mill, as is generally known, is the son of the late James Mill, who was co-founder with the late Jeremy Bentham of that school of political and moral philosophy commonly called the utilitarian. We preface our remarks thus lest our readers, astounded at some of the extremes to which Mr. Mill's reasoning leads him, may think his doctrines the result of French extravagance or the vanities of German idealism. Whatever he professes is drawn from those great traditions of the Anglo-Saxon race which have made the polities founded by the members of that race the admiration and envy of the world.

It is the purpose of Mr. Mill in this work to inquire into "the nature and limits of the power which can legitimately be exercised by society over the individual." That there is such a power he, like all thinking men, takes for granted. But he is animated chiefly by his fear of the exaggeration and undue exertion of that power. Those who have fondly believed that democracy, by making the rulers the delegates of the people, has gone far to curb the injustice which society may inflict on its members, will receive a rude shock if they will follow the able reasoning of Mr. Mill. He points out that protection "against the tyranny of the prevailing opinion" is much more sorely needed than protection against that of the magistrate, and that no liberty is worthy of the name that does not leave free "all that portion of a person's life and conduct which affects only himself, or if it affects others only with their free, voluntary, and undeceived participation." To that portion of individual liberty he assigns the conscience, all tastes and pursuits, and the right of the like-minded to combine.

Nor is this all. Mr. Mill insists that the right publicly to proclaim the promptings of one's conscience and the deductions of one's reason is absolute in its nature and can be abrogated by no conceivable circumstances. For, he reasons, to silence any discussion or forbid the expression of any opinion on any pretext is to assert the infallibility of that state or majority which issues the edict. But such an assertion is manifestly absurd. We must indeed, for purposes of action, assume the truth of what opinion we hold. But the very condition which gives us the right to make that assumption is that others may have "complete liberty of contradicting and disproving our opinion." In a long and affecting passage Mr. Mill shows that it was men who were zealous only for their opinion, careless of truth, and intolerant of discussion, good conservative patriots and citizens, who gave Socrates the hemlock and condemned Jesus to the Cross. Hence he sees in such intolerance and in the possibility of the silencing of any opinion or shade of opinion the gravest danger that threatens the corporate life of mankind. In the modern democracies of English speech "the yoke of public opinion is perhaps heavier," Mr. Mill asserts, than it has sometimes been under governments oligarchic or even autocratic in form. The tyranny of the majority over the minority he esteems the most immediate menace of our moral and political life. The majority, conscious of its power, is but little likely to inquire into the truth of its opinions and hence, according to Mr. Mill, "if either of two opinions has a better claim than the other, not merely to be tolerated, but to be encouraged and countenanced, it is the one which happens in the particular time and place to be in a minority." Any one who has followed Mr. Mill's reasoning thus far will not be astonished at the ultimate conclusion to which that reasoning leads him: "If all mankind minus one were of one opinion, and only one person were of the contrary opinion, mankind would no more be justified in silencing that one person than he, if he had the power, would be justified in silencing mankind."

Those who are somewhat conversant with the utilitarian philosophy will not suppose that Mr. Mill argues for liberty on merely abstract grounds. What he fears for modern society under the tyranny of majorities is the increasing "danger of mediocrity," the elimination of powerful and original and creative characters, a dead uniformity of taste and opinion and method of life that will finally lead to a more than Chinese stagnation. "The pinched and hide-bound type of human character" the universalizing of which is, Mr. Mill thinks, the aim of the forces of open and stealthy Calvinism in our civilization, will never fare forth to "discover new truths" or "commence new practices." Yet it is only by discovering new truths and commencing new practices that progress, nay, that the essential life of civilization can be sustained. There is little hope for a society or a government that does not permit or countenance "different experiments of living," "freedom and variety of situations," "individual vigor and manifold diversity." To the timid and conventional this will seem a dangerous doctrine. It is their own timidity that misleads them. "The danger which threatens human nature is not the excess, but the deficiency, of personal impulses and preferences." Not only will genius and so progress perish in a society which insists on sameness and rigidity of thought and action, but also the happiness of the individual. For "it is the privilege and proper condition of a human being to use and interpret experience in his own way."

We have left ourselves no space to animadvert upon Mr. Mill's particular applications of the doctrines he upholds. It can be said for him that he is wanting in neither logic nor intrepidity. Regarding "all restraint qua restraint as evil" he pleads for the right of men to break all engagements that have become devoid of inner meaning and survive as mere forms, and hence asserts that "the most important of these engagements, marriage, having the peculiarity that its objects are frustrated unless the feelings of both parties are in harmony with it, should require nothing more than the declared will of either party to dissolve it."

We can promise our readers rich instruction and entertainment from the perusal of this little work. Stimulating it may be to them; it should cause no astonishment to the citizens of a republic whose fundamental charter guarantees "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." LUDWIG LEWISOHN

The Dance of Life

The Dance of Life. By Havelock Ellis. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

THE seven essays which comprise this book are rich in the gold of suggestive thought and fulfilled of the power of expression. With a sanity of mind that is rare among his contemporary adventurers in the fields of philosophy, Mr. Havelock Ellis tells us of his own attitude toward life, and in the telling invites us to take our stand with him. So lucid is the exposition and so appealing is the invitation that the impression is left on us of a book which the world will not lightly pass by. This book is not the tale of a traveler's survey of a country he has viewed from a Pisgah height of distance; it is, in the best sense, the account of an actual sojourn, of a life really lived in a land where work is but a means to an end, and where the end itself is lost in the joy of living. For Mr. Ellis has been writing this book for the past fifteen years.

Mr. Ellis is not a philosopher in the academic sense; he is a humanist in the living sense. He has learning, but he has wisdom, the wisdom of the cultured mind that distils the perfume of the relations between things. He presents the truth rationalized both of poetry and religion. What the artist and the mystic have seen as in a glass darkly is here brought into the common light of day and shown by its beauty to be of the essential values of life for all. He begins by pointing out that alike the joy of accomplishment, the ecstasy of contemplation, and the enhancement of thought are the results of a rhythmic movement which is in the very nature of existence, and which may be symbolized as dancing. Rhythm and harmony are of the essence of every process by which nature and human nature unfold themselves. In the movements of the waves on the shore, in the combinations of the elements into compounds, in the motions of the stars, in the growth of plants and organized living things, in the activities of man's thinking and dreaming and aspiring there is evinced a movement which is rhythmic and harmonious. This movement of life, both in its material and spiritual aspects, can be appreciated but not measured. It is only when we view it as art that we precipitate its values. By any other method of measurement the complex of intellectual, material, and moral facts which we call civilization is deprived of its validity and stability. The lesson taught by history is that civilizations flourish and then die. They are "a spiritual senility, an end which with inner necessity is reached again and again." Viewed from their intellectual side, their so-called "progress" winds up in the defeat of the creative instinct by the possessive instinct, and results in misery and suicide.

All our civilizations have been measured by quantitative standards—the abstractions of unreality—and the results of our measurements have been but the unreality of abstractions. We must now distinguish between a civilization of quantity and one of quality. A civilization of quality cannot be measured; it can only be evaluated, and the method of evaluating is the method of art.

Art cannot be defined, because it is infinite. But whatever we may mean by the word, it connotes the process which makes it the natural midwife of nature. It is man's way of assisting nature in its evolutionary work. "It is the reality of what we imperfectly term 'morality'." There are two aspects to this human faculty—the creative and the contemplative. The one is concerned with making, and the other with enjoying. One is art proper, the other is aesthetics. Art does the work; aesthetics evaluates its qualities. If it is the province of art to realize beauty, it is the function of aesthetics to see and appreciate beauty. This seeing of beauty is a contemplative exercise and is akin to that of the mystic in religion, to the poet in literature, and to the lover in life. The development of this aesthetic sense is indispensable if civilization is to pass safely through its critical period, and attain any degree of persistence. The cultivation of this faculty for distinguishing qualities and enjoying them is as necessary as was the development of the optic nerve for distinguishing separate objects by means of sight, and our evolutionary energy must be directed consciously to that end. For in the power to draw joy from the images of things without possessing them lies the fuller life of man's future. The mere possession of the thing is a barren relationship to which neither the possessor nor the possessed contribute their essential values. But in the enjoyment of the thing's beauty both are involved in an experience of joy. It is this experience also which confers on the relationship the characters of morality. The aesthetic power is egoistic, but unlike other egoisms it leads to no destructive struggles.

"Its powers of giving satisfaction are not dissipated by the number of those who secure that satisfaction. Aesthetic contemplation engenders neither hatred nor envy. Unlike the things that appeal to the possessive instinct, it brings men together and increases sympathy. Unlike those moralities which are compelled to institute prohibitions, the aesthetic sense, even in the egoistic pursuit of its own ends, becomes blended with morality, and so serves in the task of maintaining society."

As the mother soothes her child with some bright object, and not with sermons, so the artist shows us the beauty of the world and fills us with joy. It is in this way that the Adventure of Existence is justified.

"Every great artist, a Dante or a Shakespeare, a Dostoevski or a Proust, thus furnishes the metaphysical justification of existence by the beauty of the vision he presents of the cruelty and the horror of existence. All the pain and the madness, even the ugliness and the commonplace of the world, he converts into shining jewels. By revealing the spectacular character of reality he restores the serenity of its innocence. We see the face of the world as of a lovely woman smiling through her tears."

It is to M. Jules de Gaultier that Havelock Ellis is indebted for this philosophic justification for his valuation of life as an art comparable to the art of dancing which, in its origin and manifestations, is the most joyous and fullest of all arts and the one that calls for man himself in its exercise. It is the business of society to breed dancers in whom the aesthetic sense is alert, and it is Havelock Ellis's opinion that it must do so by some eugenic process if human evolution is not to degenerate into devolution. Our utilitarian democracies are doomed if they do not provide the leisure for the workers in which to grow and fit themselves for those spiritual exercises which make for the joy of the dance of life. TEMPLE SCOTT

Eternal Rome

A History of Rome. By Tenney Frank. Henry Holt and Company. $4.50.

The Founding of the Roman Empire. By Frank Burr Marsh. The University of Texas Press. $3.50.

Rome and the World Today. By Herbert S. Hadley. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

History of the Later Roman Empire: From the Death of Theodosius I to the Death of Justinian. By J. B. Bury. The Macmillan Company. 2 volumes. $14.

TENNEY FRANK has long been known as one of our foremost Latinists, but of so discriminating and urbane a type as to set him off from those of the feather of Dean West. He has never allowed an interest in Latin syntax so to absorb him as to cause him to lose sight of the contributions of Roman civilization, and his arguments for a cultivation of a knowledge of the Roman life have rested primarily upon an appreciation of the cultural gains to the individual to be secured thereby, rather than upon the punitive pedagogical ideal which has constituted the rallying-point of most classicists. He is probably the closest American counterpart of Warde Fowler in this respect. Mr. Frank had made notable contributions to Roman history before the publication of the present work. He had produced a thorough study of Roman Imperialism, an original biography of Virgil, and, above all, an Economic History of Rome, which deserves to rank with the few best American achievements in writing the economic history of any country or any age.

It is an interesting and curious fact that while up to 1922 no American scholar had produced a textbook of a college grade on Roman history, two have appeared within the last year, one by A. E. R. Boak, and the work of Mr. Frank under review. As compared with Mr. Boak's volume, Mr. Frank has made far greater concessions to the conceptions and methods of the "new history." It is less compressed, and less avowedly and exclusively political, diplomatic, and military. Every phase of Roman culture is treated with relative thoroughness. Some six out of the thirty-two chapters are entirely devoted to economic activities, social life, law, literature, and art, and much culture-history is found throughout other portions of the book. Chapter XXI is a marvel of condensation and clarity in treating a broad field of economic history. Though evidently somewhat rapidly composed, the volume is clearly written, the needs of the general reader being kept in mind throughout, sometimes to the exclusion of certain phases of the formal mechanics of textbook-making.

There are few points at which the reviewer would care to criticize the work. It would probably be improved by a general organization into major periods of Roman development and decline. Undoubtedly the later Roman Empire is treated too briefly when it is not ignored entirely. One misses the economic and social material on this period which enriched Dill's treatment of the last century of the Western Empire. The importance of Gaul for the Roman Empire and early medieval institutions, so well brought out by Ferrero, Fustel, and Jullian, is practically ignored. And one who has read W. L. Westermann's notable article on the economic causes of the decline of classical society will feel that Mr. Frank does not adequately assess (see p. 571) the effect of these material factors operating in the complex of influences producing the gradual disintegration of Roman society and culture. Little attention is given to the problems of imperial administration and reorganization, an omission which the author defends. On the whole, however, few competent critics will be likely to question the assertion that for a combination of modernity of viewpoint, clear exposition, reliability, and proportion the book is not equaled by another of its general type in the English language.

The work by Mr. Marsh is a relatively detailed account of the stirring events in Roman history from the time of Pompey to the establishment of the empire by Augustus. While rather conventional in tone and content, the episodical and biographical elements do not loom so large as to obscure the revelation of the development of party issues and leaders, and the evolution of definite new types of constitutional machinery. Julius Caesar, naturally, plays a central role in this drama, and Mr. Marsh devotes a long and discriminating chapter to Caesar's policies, which avoids extreme approval or disparagement. Augustus is regarded as having triumphed through tact, judgment, astuteness, and restraint rather than force and originality. Mr. Marsh contends that the pressure of practical necessity, and the force of circumstances, rather than the design or wish of Augustus, led to the end of the Republic and the establishment of the Empire. The economic and social aspects of this important revolution are scarcely touched upon. While the book is not an imposing example of original research or in any sense an illustration of the newer type of dynamic and synthetic history, it is a commendable and reliable effort to reconstruct and summarize the political history of this important epoch on the basis of the results of the researches of the last generation of students in this field.

Ex-Governor, now Professor, Hadley has made an earnest effort to write pragmatic history. Like others from Dionysius to Bolingbroke, he believes that history is chiefly useful as "philosophy teaching by example." He has attempted to cheer those despondent concerning European and American society under the sway of Drs. Poincaré and Harding by assuring them that the times were equally out of joint in the period following the civil wars of the later Roman Republic, and yet the Roman polity was saved by the genius of Augustus, who is the real hero of the book, and about whose reign the discussion centers. While critical historians are inclined to view with suspicion and incredulity the overworking of precise analogies in history, it is true that there are interesting similarities between the conditions following 31 B.C. and 1918 A.D., and Mr. Hadley has rather cleverly and effectively developed these. While rather over-eulogistic in the treatment of Augustus, the picture of his reign and policies is not inaccurate in its major outlines. Though the book is based on secondary works in English, and these not always the best or discriminatingly used, it is a creditable performance for a scholarly publicist. That the term "the scholar in politics" is an elastic and encompassing one may well be observed by comparing Mr. Hadley's work with a somewhat similar earlier effort, in scope, by Dr. James Hamilton Lewis, "Two Great Republics: Rome and the United States." The author does not make it clear who is to be the modern Augustus to save us from the impending disintegration of Western civilization, but one familiar with Mr. Hadley's political past may hazard a modest guess that he died on January 6, 1919.

Two works more widely separated in nature and content than Mr. Hadley's and the ponderous volumes of Mr. Bury could scarcely be imagined. Not even Mr. Frank can rank with Bury as an authority on the whole range of Greek and Roman history. He has made important contributions to most phases of classical history from the earliest days of Greek development to the later period of the Eastern Empire. The present work is an intensive and detailed study of the Germanic invasions and the period of Justinian, covering the first part of the era treated in his "Later Roman Empire," published in 1889—his first notable contribution to historical literature. In the first volume he surveys once more the perennially absorbing subject of the infiltration of the "barbarians" into the Roman Empire, on the basis of the most critical use of the original sources. His conclusions are completely disruptive of the old myth of a cataclysmic swarming of myriad Germanic hosts, which has been created and perpetuated by Charles Kingsley and those who have followed him. The Germans came in slowly, were few in numbers, created relatively little additional confusion, and preserved for a considerable time the old imperial fictions. The second volume is devoted chiefly to the exploits and reforms of Justinian, and the author justly claims that this is not only the most recent but also the most thorough treatment of the reign of Justinian to be found in any historical work. The book is a model of patient research, distinguished alike for a mastery of original sources and acquaintance with recent monographs. It is, however, strictly political and military history, embracing little social, economic, or cultural material, and making no extensive attempt at an interpretation of events. In fact, no other historian known to the reviewer possesses the dualistic capacity of Mr. Bury to display conspicuous talent for achievement in cultural and interpretative history along with remarkable patience in grinding out conventional compendiums of intensive narrative and episodical history. It would seem that the author of "The Ancient Greek Historians," "The History of the Freedom of Thought," and "The Idea of Progress" must possess a most saving and impelling sense of humor to carry him through the tedium of preparing "A History of Greece," or "The History of the Later Roman Empire."

HARRY ELMER BARNES

The Case of the Immigrant

The Immigrant's Day in Court. By Kate Holladay Claghorn. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THE function of the court and the law should be to secure justice and to create respect for the state whose authority they represent. "The Immigrant's Day in Court," which is the ninth volume of the Carnegie Corporation's Americanization Studies, is mainly devoted to showing how the "court," which includes also the laws, falls short of securing either of these ends.

On the one side are the officers of the court in whom wisdom and justice do not always dwell, and on the other side is the immigrant whose ignorance, crudeness, helplessness, and alien status make prejudice and impatience easy. We must not forget that the immigrant is maladjusted in a thousand ways which make his case more difficult—in customs, in social and moral codes, in industry, and in language. He is the very summation of exploitability. Miss Claghorn has drawn an accurate and detailed picture of both sides of the shield so that one may learn a great deal, not only about the immigrant, but about the personnel and the methods of the courts which are thrown into high relief by the difficulty of the immigrant problem. Prejudice, corruption, and technicality often supplant sympathy, honesty, and flexibility. Exploitability begets exploitation; the corrupt lawyer and his more corrupt "runner" hover like vultures over the immigrant in trouble. Questions of money which grow out of a great variety of conditions; troubles of family disorganization which come from the replacing in American life by irresponsibility the firm social control of the native village; the troubles of labor which inhere in the industrial status of the immigrants, all these furnish problems of what might be called common justice.

Our system was devised to meet the needs of a rural homogeneous population, and it has never been reorganized to meet the needs of an urban heterogeneous population. People who are interested in bringing about a better adaptation of legal procedure to modern conditions will find in this book a mass of detail and good judgment.

In addition to the courts proper there is the mass of regulative and discriminatory law which applies to immigration and naturalization. From the point of view of the purpose of these laws, namely, to secure better citizens for America, the measure of success is found in the attitudes of the people to whom they apply. Many of these laws are just and understandable, but some are pernicious, and many are confused and confusing, and some, like the alien income tax, are discriminatory, and in individual cases often unjust.

The deportations of 1919-20 are described in full, and since they fell in last analysis under the authority of the Department of Justice they belong to the "court." Merely feeling ashamed, as all good Americans eventually will, for this episode will not wipe out the harm done to America. Jerome Davis in "The Russian Immigrant" shows that the bitterness aroused by the prejudice and injustice of that period, of which the deportations were the tangible symbol, makes every Russian community aggressively hostile to America. If this reaction were limited to Russians the numerical problem would not be so serious, but it has made every alien nationality feel disillusioned about America.

As an Americanizing agency this book shows that the laws and their enforcement have been not only a failure but a detriment. Assimilation depends on the way people feel, not on how they conform. As Miss Claghorn says: "What can be the effect on the immigrant who has gone through these raids and arrests? One effect, as has been pointed out, must be intellectual confusion, resulting from the different decisions of different government officials as to the meaning of the anarchy clauses of the immigration law. . . . We have seen, in the study of cases presented here, how some of the people felt about it, and it is to be remembered that for one person actually arrested and ordered deported there are perhaps hundreds of foreign born who have been the object of attack by local authorities, who were not ordered deported, who remain here, but who are learning an unfortunate lesson in government and citizenship. . . . If we want the alien to respect government and the orderly processes of the law we certainly do not want to give him examples of mob rule and lynch law, or law mixed with loot."

On the whole the picture is a dark one, but our conviction of sin is not yet deep enough so that the lesson of experience has been learned. Another chapter will need to be added if the bill for the registration of aliens and the payment of an annual fee is passed. These measures, with most of the anti-sedition clauses urged by Mitchell Palmer in his evil day but for which native Americans would not stand, were in the bills proposed by Representative Johnson and Senator Shortridge in the last Congress. They are to be pushed again by the Department of Labor, urged by Raymond Crist of the Bureau of Citizenship. It would be hard to conceive more pernicious legislation, and yet it is one with the recent applications and perversions of the law in dealing with the immigrant.

Miss Claghorn offers few constructive suggestions. A change of attitude toward the immigrant is, of course, the most fundamental necessity, and that is larger than a question of law. There are persons, communities, and organizations whose activity is mitigating the bitterness which has been engendered. Legal aid societies do a great deal, but their scope is more or less arbitrarily limited. There seems to be no alternative except to reap the whirlwind, but reading this book will show us where to repent. HERBERT ADOLPHUS MILLER

For the Freedom of India

India in World Politics. By Taraknath Das. B. W. Huebsch. $1.25.

"I HAVE read Das's book. It is indeed 'valuable' and will open many eyes, letting people see that England's dominance of India is a world menace." So writes an Englishman; and the careful reader of "India in World Politics," with its authoritative tone, its obvious sincerity, and withal its innumerable citations from English, American, and other authorities, is likely to incline toward his point of view. With certain minor changes this book might well have been entitled "An Outline of World Politics" and expanded into a two-volume work. As it stands it is a good source-book especially for all political and academic connections. Could the book be read and taken to heart by our statesmen it would give this country what it lacks today—a definite foreign policy. Put into the hands of our youth it ought to give us future leaders who might create such a policy. But—

Several conclusions are bound to take shape as one catches the drift of the author's argument: first, that British control of India is an important factor in international relations; second, that this control has tempted Britain to extend her mastery widely, especially in Asia; and third, that such extended control is undeniably a source of continued diplomatic irritation leading to perpetual war. From the point of view of an Indian, Mr. Das holds that India is morally as well as physically the center of the world struggle for peace, and for that reason should be entirely free from foreign rule; and his conclusions may lead his readers to believe with him that this great country, which breathes the idealism of Rajdharma (ruling based on righteousness), must be a factor in bringing about this world peace, which today the "tottering insolence of the West" so seriously threatens.

The Introduction which Robert Morss Lovett has contributed to this big little book is a model of clear thinking and straightforward phraseology. Perhaps the most significant passages are those which deal with that "plunderbund," the League of Nations, and the "hypocritical imperialism"—both British and American—which it would buttress and perpetuate. "Modern imperialism," he says, "is no longer frankly predatory. It . . . sentimentalizes itself as the white man's burden." In the opinion of Mr. Lovett, Mr. Das has given in this résumé of predatory imperialism a judgment and a warning. "With (our) account opened in the ledger of imperialism," he points out, "we tend to be less critical of the solvency of other imperialistic enterprises."

A reading of "India in World Politics" cannot but make us more critical, and such criticism will be our safe-conduct to the territory of friendly peoples, and a guaranty that our goal is, not national vandalism, but the internation.

BLANCHE WATSON

Caillaux on Europe

Whither France? Whither Europe? By Joseph Caillaux. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

EUROPE seems to be in a fair way of solving the vexing problem of what to do with ex-presidents and ex-premiers. She sets them to writing books. Caillaux has the advantage of most of them—he has produced his third post-war book. "Agadir" and "Mes Prisons" took the bitterness of self-justification out of his system and in "Whither France? Whither Europe?" he is able to consider Europe impersonally. He also has the advantage, rare among politicians, of a really first-class economic mind. He did not, like Viviani, rise to fame as a Socialist and then, when within reach of power, move to a safely moderate position; nor is he so narrowly French. Caillaux reads English, Italian, and German—he is, in his outlook, essentially a "good European." Political discredit and banishment from the capital, with the resultant freedom from political exigencies, have done his mind no harm.

What, then, does this ablest of French ex-premiers say? That "absorption of German merchandise and utilization of German labor to reconstruct the devastated regions" would enable France to recover most with least harm to the economy of Europe and the world (the articles of which this book is composed were written in 1921); that 30 to 40 billions of gold francs would be an optimistic estimate of possible reparations; that England and the United States should accept German bonds in payment of their debts; that steps toward federation of the production of nations are necessary, and that while within the states parliamentary assemblies should be maintained with political powers, complete control of the economic state should be handed over to new organizations—"in a word, to combine western democracy with Russian sovietism."

This is good if rather indifferent liberal doctrine. It would be encouraging if one could believe that such doctrine were common among French politicians. But Caillaux had to write his articles in a little dissenting paper, Le Progrès Civique; and his own party does not yet dare demand the return of his forfeited civic rights. He is still being punished for his prewar policy of rapprochement with Germany. Nevertheless the hope of those who look for a restoration of the old Europe lies in just such shrewd, cautious, economic minds as Caillaux's.

L. S. G.

Monumental Scholarship

The Jews in Egypt and in Palestine Under the Fatimids. By Jacob Mann, M.A., D.Lit. Two volumes. Oxford University Press. $12.

A History of the Church to A. D. 461. By B. J. Kidd, D.D. Three volumes. Oxford University Press. $19.35.

A SCHOLARLY work should command reverence and awe. Even when it is the product of a seedy gradgrind, of a humorless, nerveless, human source-drill, it is a poetic and magnificent thing. The sheer labor involved in the building of it, the terrible because repressed passion it reveals in him who could spend years in gathering the material and meticulously putting it together, should make a reviewer profoundly humble in approaching it. Especially so, however, when the work explores utterly virgin forest and is as thorough as Dr. Mann's dissertation on the Jews under the Fatimids. The history of the Jews in Palestine and Egypt during the Dark Ages was practically unknown to us until several years ago some scraps of old Hebrew prayer-books and other writings were discovered in an ancient synagogue limbo in Cairo by Professors Schechter and Taylor. It being forbidden to destroy all worn-out prayer-books and other sacred documents, Jews were compelled to store them away in genizoth, hiding-places, and thus with the scraps which the ancients rejected the moderns have laid the foundation of the history of the Jews during several centuries.

Professor Mann is the first to explore this material with any thoroughness and order, and his work is perhaps the most original contribution in the field of Judaica in a generation or more. On the basis of some two hundred fragmentary documents (they fill the whole of the second volume) painstakingly pieced together and translated from the tortured Hebrew of the period, he fills an hiatus in Jewish history with startling data. It seems that Jewish life in Palestine by no means ceased with the Dispersion, but that literary productiveness and social activity flourished there for many centuries thereafter and to a degree never dreamed of even by the most daring of past historians. For its significance and its consecration to learning, Professor Mann's work is monumental.

Professor Kidd's three volumes on early church history are of the lesser breed among scholarly works, since they explore no dark continents or even corners, but merely retread well-trodden paths with perhaps more elaborate attention to the flints and pebbles that make them clear. Still the work is an imposing one, and it commands respect if only because it is the result of almost forty years of research. Even though it reveals a lack of familiarity with the rich Talmudic material on the period, though it is vitiated somewhat by the evident high-church prejudices of the author, it is still perhaps the completest and most competent account of the early Christian church to be found in the English language.

LEWIS BROWNE

Books in Brief

Suggestion and Medical Analysis. By William Brown. George H. Doran Company. $1.50.

Dr. Brown is a well-known London specialist in nerves and mental diseases. Incidentally between the first and second editions of this book one notes that Dr. Brown has moved to Harley Street. This little book is designed for the lay reader, but the author has not entirely avoided technical phraseology. Dr. Brown has, however, given us a book which is a very fair-minded presentation of the subject. He discusses M. Coué with considerable, but not unlimited, approval and with a kindly tolerance. On the whole it is a readable book and scientifically sound.

The Fern Lover's Companion. By George Henry Tilton. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

There is a peculiar fascination about ferns. They choose the edges of the loveliest waterfalls, the most magnificent rocky cliffs, the greenest glades, the deepest bogs, and lead their pursuer to the choicest spots in all outdoors. From the moment when their first fiddle-heads begin to uncoil in the warmth of April to the mid-winter thaws which expose the evergreen fronds of Christmas fern and polypody, they light the woods. The amateur botanist delights in them because he knows that at most he may find some thirty-odd species about his home, and familiarity with them all is within the range of amateur possibilities. Mr. Tilton has been collecting ferns for fifty years, and reading the fern-books as they appeared from decade to decade. From one out-of-print book he has culled a key to the ferns, from another a calendar of their time of fruiting, from a third its best photographs. To these he has added a set of descriptions, a few of his own filicological reminiscences, a bibliography with sketches of the men who have written on ferns, and made a book which fern-lovers will want to own.

From the Deep of the Sea. By Charles Edward Smith. The Macmillan Company. $5.

Dr. Smith has edited the diary of his father who was surgeon on the whaling ship Diana on her disastrous voyage in 1886-1887. Stefansson tells us that the Arctic is not a land of peril. These mariners were not equipped with his ability to live off the country. The Diana was caught in the ice-pack and the dreaded Arctic night closed around them. The surgeon felt it was his duty to inspire the men. His voluminous diary was a necessary outlet for his emotions. He wrote with an affecting simplicity. This account of the death of Captain Grenville is the equal of any chapter in Melville. He felt it necessary to hide from his patients the fact that they were afflicted with scurvy. He disguised the taste of the lime-juice which was his only preventive with other medicines. He knew that the trouble the men had with their teeth was a symptom of this disease, but he attributed it to smoking tea-leaves. The doctor was glad when he did not succeed in shooting a polar bear, because he believed in the Eskimo superstition that its meat was unhealthy. This story out of the past is one which adds to human dignity.

Gandhi's Life in Prison

SARJYUT SHANKERLAL, a fellow-prisoner of Mahatma Gandhi, has contributed to Young India of Bombay an account of the Indian leader's life in the Yeravda jail, from which the following is extracted:

MATERIAL COMFORTS

So far as material comforts are concerned, there is very little to be said. From my own personal experience I can say that I was kindly and courteously treated by the immediate prison authorities from the two superintendents down to the jailers and wardens. We were given the food we asked for. The doors of our cells were kept open. It was necessary for Mahatma Gandhiji because of his life-long habit of sleeping out in the open and for me because of my nerves. We were allowed an unlimited supply of books also from outside. Later, for health reasons, we were both of us allowed lights and bedsteads, and recently Mahatma Grandhiji has been allowed the use of a mosquito curtain, because of the trouble of mosquitoes during the season. We had all the clothing and bedding we needed, and we were given the choice, if we so pleased, to have our bedding also from outside. We were allowed to do hand-spinning on our own wheels as a voluntary occupation.

MAHATMA IN GOOD HEALTH

Mahatma Grandhiji is keeping very good health. While in prison we heard that there were stories abroad of his ill health and melancholia. He was hurt to hear about this. He said he would feel ashamed if he suffered from melancholia. He further said that a civil resister who would feel moody if he had to go to prison has no business to court imprisonment or do anything that would bring it on to him. He must be prepared to treat prison as his home, if he values his country's liberty above everything else. He added that if he ever fell ill, it would not be on account of any lack of attention on the part of the prison authorities, but because of his own carelessness or some inherent weakness in his constitution. He is taking all reasonable care of his health.

THE DARK SIDE OF THE PICTURE

So much for the bright side of the picture. It has, I am sorry to say, a dark side, too. While animal comforts are well looked after, he is mentally starved. The allowance of books is no doubt a very great comfort but the unnecessary isolation imposed upon him is severely felt by him. Immediately after our admission to the Yeravda Prison, I was taken away from him. We reached there about 5 p. m. We had some fruits with us. Even these were not allowed. Things, however, improved the next morning. But we never expected to be separated. Mahatmaji pleaded that I was suffering from nerves and his company would help to soothe me; but all to no purpose. He has given a graphic description of this in his letter to Hakim Ajmalkhanji, which the Government would not send for that reason. He makes mention therein of Messrs. Deshpande and Verumal who were in the prison at that time. After about two months' separation I was sent back to him, and I rendered such humble service as I was capable of. He needs oil massage every evening but he would not have it from any but friends. Whilst my being with him may perhaps have been soothing, the isolation from other prisoners remained and still remains till this day. It is so utterly unnecessary. The other ordinary prisoners are not isolated unless they are bad characters. Mahatma Gandhi therefore rightly regards this as an additional punishment.

The present superintendent, though a strict disciplinarian, would place all political prisoners in a separate block, but the Government would not listen to it. Till recently all the other political prisoners used to take their meals together, and hold conversation whilst under supervision. The authorities have now separated them—for no cause given by them, so far as I know—and have stopped all conversation.

LETTER TO HAKIMJI NOT FORWARDED

I may here mention that as the Government would not forward his letter addressed to Hakimji unless he agreed to omit passages objected to by Government, even though they bore directly upon the treatment meted out to him, he has refused to avail himself of the right of every prisoner to write and receive a letter once every three months.

And there was the danger, too, of his doing the same with the right of seeing friends and relatives. For some time he was allowed to see two friends and three relatives at the interviews, and the conversation at those interviews was limited to non-political matters. But it seems, last December, Hakim Ajmalkhanji, Pundit Motilal Nehru, and Mr. Manganlal Gandhi, one of his nephews, were among the proposed visitors, and all the three applications were refused. Mrs. Gandhi and Mr. Chhanganlal Gandhi, who were granted permission, did not avail themselves of it that time.

MAHATMA'S WARNING

While I am making this statement I am conscious of the warning given by Mahatma Gandhi that there should be no befogging of the main issue, nor does he want any agitation for any special concessions. He is fighting out for what he considers to be rights of prisoners. He holds that civil resisters when they go to prison are like prisoners of war and they may and should fight for their rights in a becoming manner. Whether the Government treats them, when they take charge of them as prisoners, as human beings requiring mental as well as material food or merely as animals like cattle requiring only physical comforts, makes no difference in the attitude of the civil resisters who have to bear their lot cheerfully in prison.

FLOGGING OF MULSHI PRISONERS

The other day we came to learn that five Mulshi Petha men were flogged for doing short task. We were horrified to think that men could be flogged for doing short task. Mahatma Gandhiji took this seriously to heart and immediately wrote to the superintendent, offering in the name of humanity to speak to these two men and if they claimed to be Satyagrahis to persuade them to work to the utmost of their capacity. The Government thanked him for the offer but would not accept a prisoner's assistance even if it resulted in the avoidance of flogging. The refusal, as it is, is only a minor affair. The main question is whether there should be flogging for short task or even refusal to work. The public may not be knowing that the authorities have other punishments open to them. There is the penal diet, gunny clothing, simple fetters, bar fetters, standing handcuffs, etc.

NO PUBLIC OR PRIVATE MESSAGE

The public would be naturally anxious to know about Mahatma Gandhiji's present political views. He was at first inclined to give a public message and several private ones. He started the discussion, but he suddenly stopped and would not give any. He felt that as a prisoner he had no right to send any public messages. Coming to private messages, he would want not to omit a single friend, and that was well-nigh impossible. Thus I have no messages from Mahatma Gandhiji, either private or public, but I can say that his views have undergone no change in any single particular. He swears by non-violence, Charkha, Hindu Moslem unity, and the removal of untouchability. He spins regularly every day for four hours, unless his eyes do not permit him. He reads largely religious books, chiefly the Gita and the Upanishads. He has read the Koran and he is now rereading the Bible. He has asked me to send him all the Vedas and the Puranas with translations and he intends to study them

Labor Defense Council

FRANK P. WALSH, Chief Counsel for the Defendants

NATIONAL OFFICE

FEDERATION OF LABOR BUILDING
166 W. Washington Street
Chicago, Ill.

> "For the defense of the Michigan Criminal Syndicalist defendants prosecuted at the instance of the Federal Secret Service in its drive against organized labor."
>
> "To carry on in connection with the legal defense, a campaign against all infringements upon the right of free speech, free press and freedom of assemblage and all measures restricting the rights of the workers."

National Committee

ROGER N. BALDWIN
New York, N. Y.
NORMAN B. BARR
Chicago, Ill.
DENNIS E. BATT
Detroit, Mich.
J. G. BROWN
Chicago, Ill.
ROBERT M. BUCK
Chicago, Ill.
JOHN C. CLAY
Chicago, Ill.
LENETTA M. COOPER
Chicago, Ill.
R. D. CRAMER
Minneapolis, Minn.
EUGENE V. DEBS
Terre Haute, Ind.
JOHN C. FLORA
Chicago, Ill.
ELIZ. GURLEY FLYNN
New York, N. Y.
MAX S. HAYES
Cleveland, Ohio
JOHN HAYNES HOLMES
New York, N. Y.
DR. JOHN A. LAPP
Chicago, Ill.
FRANCES C. LILLIE
Chicago, Ill.
MORITZ J. LOEB
Chicago, Ill.
REV. JOHN A. RYAN, D. D.
Washington, D. C.
JOHN T. TAYLOR
Detroit, Mich.
HULET M. WELLS
Seattle, Wash.
GEORGE P. WEST
San Francisco, Cal.

Co-operating with Committee of the Defendants

EARL R. BROWDER
Chicago, Ill.
WILLIAM F. DUNNE
New York, N. Y.
WILLIAM FOSTER
Chicago, Ill.
C. E. RUTHENBERG
Cleveland, Ohio

National Officers

ROBERT M. BUCK
Chairman
EUGENE V. DEBS
Vice-Chairman
REV. JOHN A. RYAN, D. D.
Vice-Chairman
MORITZ J. LOEB
Secretary
FRANCES C. LILLIE
Treasurer
WILLIAM Z. FOSTER
Sec'y Defendant's Com.

OPEN LETTER TO LIBERTY LOVING AMERICANS

If you have followed the cases of William Z. Foster and C. E. Ruthenberg in St. Joseph, Mich., we believe that you will agree with us that a more out and out free speech fight has never been fought in the American courts. The conditions for this fight were almos perfect,--the charge, not of overt acts committed, but merely of "Assemblage"; the defendants willing to meet and fight the issue squarely; the attorneys for the defense willing to defend the issue without apology for the principles of their clients; a labor movement while not entirely united, still interested and militant enough to give the defense the greatest support that has ever been given in a similar case.

Had the Ruthenberg case ended in any way other than conviction the fight would, in the largest sense, have been completely won. Now, however, the struggle must be continued through the higher courts and in the case of a defeat there carried on in the trial court again for the defense of the other men and women involved.

So far, more than 95% of the financial support which made the defense possible has come direct from the labor movement. The labor movement took the responsibility and so far has most generously responded to it. Up until now almost no appeal for funds has been made to anyone not directly connected with the labor movement and as a result very little money has been received from that source.

Now, however, with the principal field of activity removed from the public notice to the chambers of the Michigan Supreme Court, it has become increasingly difficult to secure the necessary continued financial support.

We therefore take the opportunity to appeal to those, who although not connected with the labor movement, have nevertheless taken up cudgels for Civil Liberties. To the end that the Michigan defense be successful and thus gain an important victory for Civil Liberties throughout the country, we solicit your early and generous financial assistance.

Very sincerely yours,

LABOR DEFENSE COUNCIL

Robert M. Buck, Chairman — Moritz J. Loeb, Secretary

---

Labor Defense Council
166 W. Washington St., Chicago, Ill.

Enclosed you will find $________________ as my contribution to the defense fund in the Michigan cases to help carry the Ruthenberg case to a successful appeal.

Name________________________ Address________________________ in the original. He religiously devotes one hour to Urdu and hopes to carry on correspondence with his Mohammedan friends in Urdu. He rises early in the morning at the stroke of four and begins his day with Ashram prayer and ends it similarly, that is, with the Ashram prayer. He is firmly convinced that the salvation of India is impossible unless hand-spinning becomes universal; for without that industry it is impossible to get rid of the growing pauperism of the millions of this land, and without getting rid of that, India cannot regain or rediscover her soul.

Chileans Condemn "Yankee Justice"

ON the day when the steamship bearing the delegation from the United States to the Pan-American Conference reached Valparaiso a general strike was called in that city by the Industrial Workers of the World in protest against "Yankee Justice." The following resolutions against the confinement of political prisoners in the United States were passed:

> The Chilean workers, members of the I.W.W., assembled in a public meeting, resolve to make known to the United States Government through the president of the fifth Pan-American Congress the most ardent wishes of the members of this body that all our comrades today languishing in the bastilles of North America for the "crime" of expressing their pacifist opinions at the beginning of the last war be set free immediately. And especially we demand the freedom of those two martyrs of this age, Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti.
>
> We do not forget, Honorable President of the Pan-American Congress, that under one excuse or another the barbarous justice of America has jailed and sentenced workers in your country for the simple reason that they were militants in the ranks of labor.
>
> Therefore it is our duty to make it known through you to the Hon. Mr. Harding that we will not stop at anything in the campaign against Yankee justice, and it may happen that in order to condemn by every means at our disposal the arbitrary and despotic law of your country we may have to tie up that commerce which has so promising a future in this small but prosperous corner of the earth. We hope that our cry for justice will be heard by the good people of the great democratic republic of North America.
>
> With best wishes to the president and all members of the Pan-American Congress.
>
> EMILIO MEZA, General Secretary
> SANTIAGO FLORES, for the Marine Transport Workers
> PORFIRIO SOTO, for the General Confederation

Tyranny in American Samoa

A READER of The Nation has sent a letter received by him from a man who recently visited American Samoa. Conditions there, under Navy rule, are pictured as follows:

> After twenty-two years of American occupation Samoa can boast of one mile of decent road, one respectable school building, one disinterested American teacher, the medical dispensaries for 9,000 people on four islands, and constant robbing and exploitation by a small clique of petty grafters supposed to represent the great American nation in the islands.
>
> My wife and I took a trip to Samoa this past summer and by constant living and talking with the natives acquired a personal knowledge of their ambitions and desires such as no governor ever has or ever will acquire during his two years of office.
>
> There are sixteen chiefs now doing from five to seven years at hard labor who were sentenced for offenses which would be laughed at in any civilized court in the world.
>
> I tried to put some of the beautiful hand-made Samoan articles on the market here when I returned, to enable them to obtain a fair price for their labor and have a little money for a few little luxuries which any human being craves. But no! As I suspected, they are not allowed to ship them to me, as I am suspected of sympathizing with them. They have no way of making a cent, except by working like slaves for the governor at $1 a day, or cutting copra and packing it to town on their backs and receiving 2½ cents a pound for it. They sent $180 of hard-earned money and seven letters back by us, and for that enormous crime three chiefs lost their jobs and two whole villages were confined within their limits for weeks.
>
> So now if two or more Samoans are found talking together about Samoan affairs they are sent to jail. And remember, in spite of newspaper reports to the contrary, there has never been any violence in American Samoa. They have had every excuse, but are so kindly and forgiving that they go on from bad to worse government, hoping and trusting for better conditions.
>
> They listened with doubt and incredulity when I told them of the way the so-called civilized peoples went out and butchered their brothers by the millions in the late war. Also the way the majority of the civilized peoples seemed to think of nothing but chasing dollars. Practically all Samoans are Christians, but even before Christianity came they loved and respected their father and mother, and all members of the family worked in harmony together and shared alike. They are so generous that they will hardly keep a present if they can possibly share it with someone.

Life in the Virgin Islands

THE following is from the Emancipator (St. Thomas, Virgin Islands) of May 23:

> Natives may not use fire-arms without a license, but on Sunday last a marine, in the uniform of this Great Republic, fired a shot at a boy (native). We cannot say whether it was done with intent to scare, kill, or wound. Rumor says the boy pitched a few pebbles at a cat, which to our mind was no business of this warrior. An altercation followed and while the boy ran off the sentry fired the shot which lodged into the walls of the Council's office. The hole is about one inch.
>
> This brave feat was done not in the land of the Huns but under the Stars and Stripes in the sunny Virgin Isles which form a part of the rich, energetic, and progressive domain of Uncle Sam.

Our New Telephone Call

The telephone call of The Nation has been changed to Whitehall 7730. Our friends will find it convenient to make a memorandum of this pending the publication of a new telephone directory.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 11, 1923 No. 3027

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .... 27
EDITORIALS:
  Man's Sphere .... 29
  The Next Next War .... 30
  After Florida, Alabama .... 31
  The White Man's Burden .... 31
SLAVERY OR SELF-EXTERMINATION: A FORECAST OF EUROPE'S FUTURE. By Bertrand Russell .... 32
THESE UNITED STATES—XXXIII. OKLAHOMA: LOW JACKS AND THE CROOKED GAME. By Burton Rascoe .... 34
REVOLUTIONARY DAYS IN BULGARIA. By Theodor Berkes .... 37
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter .... 38
CORRESPONDENCE .... 39
BOOKS:
  An Eminent American. By H. L. Mencken .... 40
  European Celebrities. By Herman Simpson .... 40
  The Diplomat at His Best. By Herbert W. Horwill .... 41
  After-War Novels. By John W. Crawford .... 42
  Colors of Spain. By Herbert J. Seligmann .... 43
  A Philosophical Detective Story. By Nathan Asch .... 43
  Gipsy Tales. By Johan J. Smertenko .... 43
  Books in Brief .... 43
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
  Japanese Students Show Their Opposition to Militarism .... 44
  The Japanese Cotton Mills .... 45
  Factory Hours in Japan .... 45
  The World's Chief Navies .... 45

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
LEWIS S. GANNETT ERNEST H. GRUENING
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY, MANAGING EDITOR
JOHN MACY, LITERARY EDITOR
IRITA VAN DOREN, ADVERTISING MANAGER
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
JOHN A. HOBSON ANATOLE FRANCE H. L. MENCKEN
FRIEDRICH WILHELM FOERSTER ROBERT HERRICK
CARL VAN DOREN NORMAN THOMAS

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: Ernest Thurtle, 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N. W. 4, England.

EDWARD W. BOK has instituted a competition which reduces to insignificance his earlier inducements to promote the building of convenient and inexpensive dwelling-houses. The prize offer he has just announced is based on the conviction that the chance of winning $100,000 will stimulate the minds of Americans to an inventive activity for which the mere ambition to bring about peace on earth would be an inadequate incentive. Blessed are the peacemakers, it suggests, when they can win a fortune by their peace-making. The conditions of the award will make this the largest sum ever offered for a gold brick. There is to be no awaiting the test of events, but half of the money is to be paid upon selection of the best peace plan by a jury and the rest when the practicability of the approved plan has been "demonstrated" either through its adoption by the Senate or because a sufficient popular response indorses it. It is unlucky for ex-President Wilson that Mr. Bok's offer is so belated. A few years ago his decision to involve America in the war—as the best means of "cooperating with other nations to achieve and to preserve world peace"—would have been held to meet one, if not both, of these requirements. At the time of the Washington Conference either President Harding or Secretary Hughes might have put forward a no less convincing claim to an immortal reputation and the $100,000. Would not Mr. Bok have shown himself more sagacious if he had appended to his offer the condition that the prize money should be refunded by the winner if it should turn out—five years, let us say, after the award—that the hopes raised by the scheme had proved illusory?

GENERAL GOURAUD has arrived, a valiant, eager warrior whose mission is to convert these United States to greater sympathy with the French war in the Ruhr. Bands will play and crowds will cheer, and the general will be photographed kissing babies, but if M. Gaston Liébert, chief of the new French Propaganda Mission in New York, were to ask our advice we should tell him that the war is over and that the old stuff is too old. Kissing generals on tour no longer stir the American soul as they did in 1917.

A MARK is worth one two-thousandth of a cent today. Two years ago it was worth two cents. Prices rose 100 per cent in one week in Germany last month; letter-postage rates were raised 400 per cent, telegraph rates 200 per cent, and telephone rates 600 per cent on July 1. Such facts paint a background for the invasion of the Ruhr. Another bit of background is the publication in England of correspondence revealing a direct connection between the French General Staff and Dr. Dorten's separatist movement in the Rhineland. Still another is the revelation in a Munich treason trial that the French invested 100,000,000 marks in a monarchist separatist movement in Bavaria. No wonder the French Senate is forced to resort to the convenient trick of increasing the estimated tax yield in order to balance the budget. Truly effective French propaganda would be news of a strenuous campaign in France against the waste of public funds in subsidies to Polish militarists, German separatists, and nationalist newspapers. Or if Poincaré should heed the Pope's appeal for common sense or give a direct answer to the British questions as to the precise terms on which he will end the madness in the Ruhr, that too would help General Gouraud in his mission.

TO judge from some newspaper headlines one might suppose that the outstanding feature of the third session of the World Court was the appearance of Hiram Johnson one morning in the visitors' gallery. The proceedings at the Hague, however, present other claims to attention. One of the cases for hearing is that of the British steamship Wimbledon, which, according to the plaint of the former Allied Powers, was unlawfully forbidden access to the Kiel Canal when proceeding to Danzig in March, 1921, with a cargo of French munitions for Poland. The decision hinges on whether at that time there was a state of war between Poland and Russia. In the hearing of this case a German sits for the first time on the bench of the World Court. This is consequent upon a provision that, if one nation which is a party to a case has a judge sitting in the court and the opposing party has not, the latter, even if not a member of the League, may appoint a temporary judge. Another case concerns the status of a certain class of German property-owners on lands which formerly belonged to Prussia but have been ceded to Poland by the Treaty of Versailles. The third and perhaps the most important matter is concerned with the autonomy of Eastern Karelia and the interpretation of the peace treaty of 1920 between Finland and the Soviet Government. This problem involves the prior determination of the competence of the League or its Permanent Court to deal with the subject, which Russia claims to be a question of purely domestic policy. In view of President Harding's plea for American representation on the court, its proceedings will deserve to be followed in this country with the closest attention.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIB.

EINSTEIN has explained his resignation from the League of Nations Committee for Intellectual Cooperation in words that need no comment:

> The activities of the League so far have convinced me that there appeared to be no action, no matter how brutal, committed by the present Power group against which the League could take a stand. I withdrew because the League of Nations, as it functions at present, not only does not embody the ideal of an international organization, but actually discredits such an ideal. . . . May the League in the future prove my harsh words to have been false.

"EVERYONE who calls himself a Conservative," said Stanley Baldwin in a recent address to the Chatham and Canning clubs at Oxford, "must look back for his inspiration to the Disraeli of the last century." Are we to interpret this utterance as a clue to the political ideals of the new Prime Minister? To a Conservative Party the golden age must naturally lie in the past rather than in the future, but one might have expected Mr. Baldwin to find his stimulus in some memory that would be likely to make a stronger contemporary appeal. This seems scarcely a propitious moment to summon from the shades the ghostly figure of the most Turcophil of his predecessors. Nor is "Back to Disraeli" likely to be a much more effective slogan if it is that statesman's imperialism that Mr. Baldwin has especially in mind. By this time much of the gilt has worn off those glittering schemes for magnifying British authority in India and Egypt which once aroused such enthusiasm in England. If the Prime Minister were a Bernard Shaw, one might suspect an ironical intent in that section of his speech in which he eulogizes Disraeli for "his amazing prevision, his unerring perception of the essence of things, and his almost superhuman courage." No characterization, one would think, could be less fitting for the clever demagogue whose adroitness won for him a popularity unrivaled until quite recent times by that of any other political prestidigitator. If Stanley Baldwin seeks his inspiration from Benjamin Disraeli, we shall see him leading the English people some strange dances—provided, of course, that he can invest his own personality with something of his hero's glamor.

OUR American immigration laws have infused a sporting interest into the logs of ocean liners. The opening of a new fiscal year on July 1 provided for any airman in the neighborhood the entertaining spectacle of American, British, French, Italian, German, Greek, Danish, Norwegian, and Dutch vessels, all immigrant laden, converging simultaneously upon New York harbor in such hustling fashion as to parallel the rivalry of university crews at Poughkeepsie. The schedule of quotas for 1923-24 reflects the continuance of the process of territorial readjustment in Europe. It is a significant commentary on the wisdom of present-day statesmanship that the chief gain is made by Turkey, whose allotment rises from 2,388 to 2,654 as a byproduct of her recent military successes. It is expected that certain national quotas, which last year were long in filling, will this year be completed within a few months. This is especially anticipated in the case of Great Britain, where emigration is being stimulated by the persistence of unemployment. Meanwhile, it has been found in England that there is less discomfort in entering the United States across the Canadian border, and the St. Lawrence route is accordingly becoming popular. It will be another example of the irony that dogs the schemes of politicians if one of the effects of the Dillingham Act should prove to be the checking of immigration from Great Britain and other North European countries.

IN Japan, as in the United States, military-minded men are attempting to use the higher institutions of learning as centers for military training. Here the students usually acquiesce, if with an abundant sense of boredom. We hear other news from Japan. The story of the protest made by the students at Waseda University is told in our International Relations Section this week. Doubtless the manners of these students were very bad indeed, but we wish the news of their bad manners could travel far and wide in these United States. We have here a popular superstition that every American is peace loving and every Japanese an hereditary militarist, and it would do some of us a great deal of good to read of the howls of derision with which the Japanese students greeted a speaker who attempted to satisfy them that militarism and military training were unrelated by citing our example.

ONE of the drawbacks of service in the Turkish army is, or used to be, uncertainty about getting one's pay, with a consequent temptation to indulge in looting, when opportunity offered, in order to maintain a proper standard of living. A Chinese brigand, too, has often been only a Chinese soldier who has been driven into unorthodox methods of self-support by the need to make up somehow for the financial deficiencies of a regimental paymaster or provincial governor. It is to be hoped that the 3,100 employees of the customs service in New York City are too well bred to seek any such irregular consolation for the unpleasant experience from which they are now suffering. At the end of June, it is reported, each of them was docked $10 in his or her weekly pay envelope because of the scanty appropriation made by Congress for the fiscal year then terminating. It was at first intended to make cuts proportionate to salaries, but this seemed beyond the mathematical capacities of the pay clerks, so a uniform reduction was adopted, stenographers at $18 to $25 a week thus having to sacrifice the same sum as the highest-paid officials. Protesters were informed that the deficiency would "probably" be made up in the next pay roll.

THERE was a great deal of talk in the newspapers about the dangerous radicalism of Rinaldo Capellini, who defeated the organization candidate for president of District 1 of the United Mine Workers of America. When the anthracite miners held their convention, however, radicalism seemed to be on the other foot. John Lewis, the national president of the union, hobnobbed comfortably with Cappellini, and there were no outbursts of violent passion from the floor. Violence was provided from within the conservative ranks. After an impassioned denunciation by Lewis, representatives of the Progressive International Committee of the mine workers, a semi-Communist group, were driven out of the hall and almost lynched in the streets of Scranton. It was a disgraceful affair. Cannot even the United Mine Workers, who have ranked among the progressive unions of the United States in industrial program and organization and who have suffered as much as any group from violation of civil rights and denial of free speech, tolerate opposition, even bitter opposition, without resorting to Ku Klux tactics?

IN a pamphlet entitled "The Intellectual and the Labor Movement," published by the League for Industrial Democracy, George Soule points out that with a strictly professional attitude and a lack of officiousness the technically trained intellectual could fill an important place in the American labor movement. The 1922 report of the Labor Bureau, of which Mr. Soule himself is a director, is documentary proof of this contention. The bureau's report, which was made public last week, shows that during 1922 the economists, statisticians, engineers, accountants, and writers who make up its staff rendered professional services to some 144 national and local labor unions and labor papers of various kinds. Including cooperative organizations and other agencies the total number of clients served was almost 200. The bureau's activities last year extended to twenty-five States and more than doubled in volume over the previous year. According to its report, the bureau, since its organization in 1920, has confined its services to labor and those working in labor's interest; it has kept free of subsidies and contributions; it has operated on a cost basis; and it has maintained a rigid detachment from factionalism and labor politics. It is safe to say that its success is due in large measure to these policies. The seal of labor's approval is the surplus shown on the bureau's balance sheet.

JACOB A. RIIS once said that every reform organization ought to have a professional humorist attached to it to prevent its becoming ridiculous or taking itself too seriously. If one humorist per organization was needed in Mr. Riis's time, a baker's dozen would not be too large a quota in this day. What, for instance, shall anyone with a sense of the ridiculous say of the "safety hour" chorus gravely recommended by the Police Department of New York City? Children leaving school at 3 p.m. are likely to be run down by automobiles, it is said; hence at 2:59 drivers are asked to go Squak, squak! with their horns and factories Toot, toot! with their whistles. The resulting din will save life! Well, we have always felt that as between the evil of speed and the evil of noise there was not much to choose, so we have refrained from mounting to the roof and emitting a howl at 2:59. That we may have failed to save some stray lives by this negligence we sadly admit, but we are buoyed up by the thought that we have conserved our own against the ire of some neighbor, who never having heard that noise prolongs life, might have cut short our "safety hour" chorus by a bootjack from his window.

Man's Sphere

NOT that we are opposed to men. Do not imagine for a moment that we are seeking to prohibit or abolish or even to modify or reform them. They are one of the most common of natural phenomena and we have long since ceased to butt our heads hopefully against a fact of nature.

The question, simply put, is this: Shall we continue the experiment of educating them?

There are some things that men, obviously, are cut out for. The celestial scissors shaped them to certain definite ends such as handling axes, bayonets, spades, and picks. Trained properly, men are good hewers of wood, good killers, good diggers. With a certain uncomplaining, simple courage, they are ready to endure death or to sweat under a hot sun. These things are their sphere. And it is apparent from the first that education interferes with these ends, even as it detracts from the manliness which is men's charm. Men were not meant, we fear, for those sedentary intellectual pursuits which hour by hour soften their muscles, and, worse yet, put ideas into their heads. Many a good sticker or digger has been lost in the pages of a book.

This is one aspect of the case. The other is even more obvious, though, lest tender masculine feelings be hurt, we will put it in the form of a question. Can men learn? We are not ready to say bluntly to their few defenders: "Men are indeed not the intellectual equals of women." No, we dislike sweeping generalities; it is only about 60 per cent safer to indict sexes than nations. Men's brains—let us put it this way—are different from women's. Give him a gun and a man's brain functions with apparent success. Give him a book—but let us again turn to the facts. On June 12 New York University announced its commencement prizes—five of them. There was the prize for highest honors in the School of Law. It was won by a student named Catherine Chadwick Noyes. Highest honors in the Medical College went to Ella Hodiger. The Alumni Medal of Washington Square College was awarded to Edna Weil. The Jeremiah Whipple Jenks prize in government was won by Irene Fletcher Richardson. The prize offered by the School of Retailing went to two students, John Williams Wingate and Francesca Smith.

There was a time, we recall in this connection, when women were not allowed to study for a degree in medicine at the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons. Finally they were admitted. In the first class of men and women to graduate the few women students were all at the top of the class; the highest stand man was a woman. At the time, we accepted this fact without reflection, but the prizes just announced by New York University arouse our suspicions of the reasons for maintaining that long-continued exclusion of women from the "P. and S." For here were thousands of students—the New York University graduating class was 1,524—young men and young women, working side by side with no handicaps or favors, preparing themselves presumably for an intellectual career. And with what result?

Some of our dearest friends are men, so we will not repeat the result. But let us, both as taxpayers and as philosophers, simply consider the question: Shall we continue to educate our men?

The Next Next War

WE live in days when men fear to face realities. Here are England and France, referring to each other as allies, maintaining an appearance of joint action in half of the world and negotiating for common ground in the rest, yet entering a race for the supremacy of the air in which no attempt is made to disguise the ghastly fact that they are bidding against each other, building great fleets of airplanes with which to fight each other in the next great war. We are not yet five years past the armistice that ended the war to end war, the war that was to teach us so many great lessons and set the world to rights, yet here are the two great Powers of Europe glowering at each other across the English Channel and beginning precisely the kind of armament race which, between England and Germany, prefaced the World War.

What else can Mr. Baldwin's statement in Parliament mean? "British air power must include a home-defense air force of sufficient strength adequately to prepare us against attack by the strongest air force within striking distance of this country." Mr. Baldwin's announced intention to increase the home-defense air force from eighteen to fifty-two squadrons, almost tripling it, is a direct challenge to France. It is directed against no other Power. France recognizes that fact, and is replying in kind. We are back in the poisonous atmosphere that made the European war inevitable, and we are in imminent danger of repeating, even without the traditional lapse of a generation, that terrific experience.

It is not only in the air that England is preparing for the next great war. She is beginning work upon an enormous naval base at Singapore, which can be aimed only at Japan. It is to Japan what the fortification of the Kiel Canal was to England. Japan, perhaps in response, is flirting again with Soviet Russia. The play of the Powers in China all looks in the same direction. The British Government has demanded, according to report, the right to maintain its own guards along the Tientsin-Pukow Railroad. What that is likely to mean past history has made only too plain. Poor China, torn by internal dissension, striving to make in a few years the adjustment to modern industrialism and Western parliamentarian democracy which it has taken Westerners centuries to work out—if we have worked them out—lies like a carcass on the plains of Asia while the Western Powers and the financial powers within the nations wait like greedy vultures, held in check only by their mutual jealousy. It is the old, old story—the story of Morocco, of the Bagdad Railway, of the partition of Africa, and the end of the book is war.

Germany is disarmed; Austria is disarmed; Hungary and Bulgaria are partially disarmed; Russia has fewer soldiers than before the war—but Europe has more men under arms today than she had when the Great War found her an armed camp in 1914. She is still an armed camp. France, unable to pay interest on her own debts, unable even to pay the contractors for reconstruction in her own destroyed provinces, France, which pleads despairingly for more reparations, lends 400,000,000 francs to Poland and 100,000,000 francs to Rumania, and maintains a military mission in Czecho-Slovakia, and accordingly those young Powers, born of the war to end war, maintain armies greater than those of their imperial predecessors. We ourselves have a larger army than before the war, and are constantly being urged still further to increase it. According to President Harding himself—whose figures Secretary Weeks will hardly attempt to dispute—we spend 85 per cent of our national revenue on wars, past and future.

Nothing can be gained by sugary optimism. We must know where we stand. Nor will mere machinery help us. A world court, useful as it may be, will not get us very far without a new spirit in international relations. While France is in a mood to feel insulted and peevish when the Pope and the British Government indorse Mr. Hughes's suggestion for expert determination of what Germany can pay; while the representative of the United States can thump his fist upon the table at a Pan-American Conference and rule out the Monroe Doctrine from discussion by the American nations, declaring that it is a "unilateral" policy of the United States; while even the League of Nations, hailed by so many as a mechanical solvent of the world's ills, still bars Germany and Russia from the rightful position of full equality with the Entente Powers in the world's councils; while the Powers barter for oil rights in Turkey when talking of protection for Armenians, there is small ground for optimism.

Yet there are steps which may be taken, and it is in the power of the United States, fortunately removed from the immediacies of European hates, to take them. It may be impossible, for the present, to stop the economic and financial rivalries which are such fertile breeders of war, but there are indications that the financial powers are tending to become internationalized and to adjust their differences without intervention by governments, and meanwhile there are things that governments may do. We believe that Mr. Harding is sincere in his respect for the principle of judicial settlement of international disputes for which his speeches plead so fervently. Let him join hands with Senator Borah, with whom he finds himself in unexpected agreement, in the Senator's plea for submission of all disputes to a court. Suppose, instead of hemming and hawing about reservations designed to safeguard the isolationist policy of the United States, he should call a conference which would exceed in dramatic interest and in historical significance the Washington Conference with which he began his Administration, and that he should open it by saying to the representatives of the Powers assembled: "Gentlemen, there is no issue which cannot better be settled by a court than by a war. There is no national right or interest so sacred that it can stand above Right. I have consulted with the members of the Senate of the United States and I am able to say that the United States is prepared to submit every dispute which may arise between it and any other nation, great or small, to a world court. That, gentlemen, means that we are prepared to outlaw war, and that in turn opens the way to larger measures of disarmament than we have yet discussed, and to new hope for us all."

It sounds wild and chimerical? It is a possible step. And unless we conceive and take some such step, something which will catch the emotion of the world and give it one of those dramatic wrenches which sometimes do lift it out of its crusted ruts, we will bear our share in condemning the world to a repetition of the murderous cycle through which we have just passed, on an even more colossal scale.

After Florida, Alabama

THE ghost of Martin Tabert of North Dakota, killed in a convict camp in Florida, has not yet found peace and where it walks society is troubled. Alabama citizens are asking their legislature why their State should be the last in the Union to cling to the barbarities of the convict-leasing system. After damning reports by legislative committees in 1915 and in 1919, it voted to abolish the practice, but twice since that time pro-leasing forces have managed to have the old leases extended. The anti-leasing forces are replying with reports of working conditions and cruelties in the convict-operated mines. They are concerned that convicts have to walk four miles after entering the mine, down the rough, wet, dripping slope to their work, and at night toil back, with the result that they seldom see the light of day except on Sundays. They are concerned that 25 per cent of all mine deaths in Alabama were among convict miners, although more than 250 mines employ free labor and only four are convict operated. They are concerned that 90 per cent of all cripples and 80 per cent of all the tubercular patients in the entire convict department come from the mines. They are saying that death, mutilation, and disease should not be added penalties to the sentences imposed by the courts. They are asking where lay the value of abolishing the lash in July, 1922, since wooden clubs and metal pipes have taken its place, and a common punishment is a coffin-like box in which convicts are fastened by their hands, their feet scarcely touching the floor.

But Alabamans are apparently little concerned with the creeping into the State of the insidious "contract" system that quibbles at the law and perpetuates all the evils of the old "lease" system. It matters not a jot whether the contractor buys the labor of the convict or the product of that labor. Workers are still speeded up under the piece system, and the brutality and graft arising out of dual supervision remain. A few weeks ago a private manufacturing company—sometimes called the "convict labor trust" from its use of 1,600 prisoners in Kentucky, Wisconsin, Wyoming, and Oklahoma, as well as Alabama—began operating the new shirt factory in the Kilby prison. They propose to pay the State seventy-five cents a dozen for shirts made and packed, which, according to the National Committee on Prisons and Prison Labor, is not more than half the cost in free factories, with $150 per month for cartage and overhead charges, which will mean an actual loss to the State.

We do not contend that the able-bodied prisoner should not work—in all kindness he should. Alabama could do no better than to adopt the program laid down by the National Committee on Prisons and Prison Labor and adopted, almost without exception, by the seventeen States represented at the first national prison industrial conference at Washington last March. The plan separates the mentally and physically unfit from the able-bodied, and provides for training or treatment so that the convicted may be returned to society "cured" persons. Economic and industrial considerations stand first, and, to this end, the "States'-use" system calls for a standardization of specifications for commodities needed by the departments of all States and the manufacture of those commodities by State prison factories, State managed, and paying a proper pro-rated wage to the prison employee. This is not a mere theory; it is developing in Massachusetts, Virginia, New York, New Jersey, and Ohio.

The White Man's Burden

SOME of the most troublesome controversies in the history of the British Empire have centered in the relation of the white settlers to the indigenous colored races of Africa. Scarcely less vexatious is the question of the civil rights to be allowed to the Indian subjects of the Crown. When these two problems present themselves simultaneously in the same area, there results a complication of exceptional difficulty. This is what is happening in the Crown colony and protectorate formerly known as British East Africa and now called Kenya. This is a tropical district of 245,060 square miles, with Abyssinia on the north and the Tanganyika mandate area on the south. It has a population of 2,630,000, of which only 9,650 are white Europeans and 36,000 are Asiatics, mostly Indians.

The occasion of the triangular duel being fought in Kenya between Europeans, Indians, and Africans is the demand of the Indians for equality with the Europeans as regards the franchise, conditions of land tenure, and restrictions on immigration and residence. They back their claims by appealing to a resolution of the last Imperial Conference in favor of removing the disabilities of British Indians in various parts of the empire. Their demand was recently expressed in a resolution of the Indian Council of State, on the motion of Mr. Srinavasa Sastri, the representative of India at the Washington Conference. Principle apart, it is urged on their behalf that Indians colonized the East African littoral before the whites, that the establishment of a British protectorate was due to the influence of Indian traders with Arab rulers and native chiefs, and that they perform a useful service by acting as intermediaries between the Europeans and the Africans.

The European settlers are almost unanimous not only in opposing these claims but in demanding the exclusion of Indian immigrants altogether. They declare that those who come to Kenya are of a most undesirable type, hindering rather than assisting the development of the country. On the ground that Indian labor lowers the standard of living, the few European wage-earners of the colony are as hostile to the Indians as are their employers. Certain pledges made by Lord Milner in 1920 are quoted by the whites in defense of their position.

Meanwhile, what of the original inhabitants? The history of African exploitation forbids one to attach much value to the professed solicitude of the Europeans for the welfare of the native population as the main ground of their objection to the Indian. What the natives themselves think of the matter is in dispute; many of them are said to regard with disfavor any suggestion that these outsiders should be admitted to a civil status higher than their own. There can be little love lost between these blacks and either Indians or Europeans.

The final authority in the matter lies with the Colonial Office in London. The decision will be a critical one. The question has aroused acute feeling in India, where the disabilities of Indians in Africa are resented as an intolerable indignity, so much so that their continuance will certainly stimulate revolutionary agitation. On the other hand, the handful of Europeans in Kenya affirm their determination to drive the Indians out anyhow—if necessary, by making Kenya a territory over which the Union Jack will no longer fly.

Slavery or Self-Extermination

A Forecast of Europe's Future

By BERTRAND RUSSELL

FROM the dawn of civilization until the present day almost everything of value to art and literature and science has been produced in the neighborhood of the Mediterranean (with the exception of the art and literature of China). Europe has decided that this is now to cease, and that the old homes of culture are to revert to barbarism—for how long a period no one can guess. This will produce great changes, some good, some bad. What is perishing in Europe naturally looks to America—with what hope it may—to keep alive whatever may have had value in our way of life. "Morituri te salutamus."

It is customary, in philosophizing about history, to attribute great events to great causes. This is due to our prejudice in favor of rationality, not to any valid reason. It is said that Napoleon fell because he ate a peach after the battle of Dresden. The peach gave him indigestion; indigestion made him omit to order the pursuit; the failure to pursue made him lose the battle of Leipzig, which made his fall inevitable. I do not vouch for this story. I only say it is just as likely to be true as the more respectable accounts of "serious" historians, i.e., historians who will not admit anything contrary to their conception of the dignity of history.

I believe that the Great War and its consequences have throughout been affected by accidents just as trivial as Napoleon's peach. If another man than Sir Edward Grey had been British Foreign Secretary in 1906, he might not have helped the Czar to suppress the first Russian Revolution, and a democratic Russia would have been less anxious for war than the Czarist Russia of 1914. If the Austrian Emperor, who was a very old man, had happened to die a few years sooner than he did, his successor's pro-Entente sentiments might have sufficed to prevent the ultimatum to Serbia. If the British Government had announced either that it would intervene, or that it would not intervene, no war would have taken place; in the first case Germany would have given way, in the second case France and Russia. The fact that our policy [Great Britain's] was what it was—namely, to assure France and Russia that we should intervene while allowing Germany to hope we should not—was not due to any large causes, but merely to the fact that there was an inner clique in the Cabinet which was engaged in deceiving the rest of the Cabinet, and was therefore obliged to proceed by discreet whispers. If the war could have been averted for a few years, socialism in Germany and revolution in Russia might have prevented it permanently. If America had remained neutral in 1917, Kerensky would have obtained the reasonable peace desired, at that time, by Russia and the democratic elements in England and France. If we had had, at the armistice, a prime minister who preferred the survival of European civilization to a few more years of office, we should not have had a general election at the end of 1918, and the Treaty of Versailles would have been so different as to be a possible basis for reconstruction. All these misfortunes required small personal idiosyncrasies as an essential part of their cause.

Since the Treaty of Versailles things have been different. Europe has marched to its fate like a hero of Greek tragedy, inevitably and by the force of destiny. The passions enshrined in that document were such that only a miracle could have prevented disaster.

At the moment of writing, the French are in the Ruhr with the benevolent neutrality of England. Our benevolent neutrality is necessary in order to secure French support against the Turks, whom the French made strong in order to put us in this dilemma. For the sake of our imperialistic aims in the Near East we are willing to see Germany annihilated. All thinking people in England, of whatever party, are strongly anti-French, but most people are unthinking and are still anti-German as the result of war-time propaganda. Moreover those who are most anti-French are withheld from vigorous action by the fear of war with France, which no one desires if it can be avoided. The French, strange to say, are not much impressed by our belated mood of generosity to Germany. They know that we went into the war with three objects: (1) To destroy the German navy; (2) to destroy German trade and shipping; (3) to annex the German colonies. Having secured these objects we naturally became indifferent to the French objects, which took longer to secure. But until we restore the German ships and the German colonies to their former owners, the French can hardly be expected to believe in our altruism. Meanwhile we are reckoning that the ruin of the Continent need not involve our ruin, since we can still trade with the Far East, South America, and the British Empire. We reckon that France must come to grief in her present policy, and that Germany and Russia can be counted on, in the long run, to produce that weakening of France which we require for the balance of power. We do not propose, therefore, to do anything to avert the final ruin of the whole Continent, which we clearly perceive to be coming. The Labor Party, of course, takes a different view, but unfortunately it is not in power.

Assuming, as I fear we must, that France remains unreasonable and England remains passive, it seems probable that the French will be drawn further and further into Germany, that they will be forced into considerable expenditure, and that they will not get another cent from Germany by way of reparations. They may attempt to work the Ruhr coal themselves, but they are not a great industrial nation and they are not likely to make a success of it. Gradually the Germans will be driven into the arms of the Bolsheviks; if the French are to keep us neutral they must antagonize the Turks. France is already on the verge of bankruptcy, not because the French are poor, but because they dislike taxes. If the Government attempts to tax them sufficiently to balance the budget, it will fall and be replaced by an anti-imperialistic government. This alternative is desirable, but very improbable; what is much more probable is that no attempt will be made to make both ends meet, and that the franc will go the way of the mark. In that case, the French peasants who have lent to the Government will ultimately become indignant, and there will be civil war. Before that stage is reached, France will cease to be able to support her partisans in Poland and the Little Entente, which, perhaps under Italian leadership, will veer toward Germany. We shall then have 1914 over again, with France in the place formerly occupied by Germany. The end can only be complete collapse of all the belligerents, decay of industry, death by starvation of the professional classes, and survival of a much-reduced population almost exclusively composed of peasants. From that stage it will be possible to begin reconstruction, as in Charlemagne's time.

It is not possible for England alone to prevent this development, because, even if we threatened the French with war, they would not stop in their present mood, so that we should have to fight and be involved in the universal ruin. It is possible for us to remain spectators and survive as a satellite of America, just as Holland survived as a satellite of England after her brief glory in the seventeenth century.

It is possible for the Americans, should they so desire, to decree a different development for Europe from that which seems probable if we are left to ourselves. If America chose to take a firm line with the French about the invasion of Germany, the French would certainly give way, just as we gave way about Ireland and naval supremacy in 1921. America could insist upon a revision of the punitive clauses of the Versailles treaty, and could give Germany a chance to revive. I understand that such a course is desired by finance and big business, but is deprecated by most other opinion throughout the United States. Perhaps it will not be considered impertinent if I set out the pros and cons as they appear to an internationally minded European.

There are, of course, two obvious arguments, one on each side. For taking part in the affairs of Europe, there is the argument that America has invested a great deal of money on this side of the Atlantic, and that all except the part invested in Great Britain is likely to prove a bad debt; on the other hand, if Europe could be stabilized, there would be room for the investment of vastly larger sums than have been already invested. This argument is straightforward and sound from its own point of view. On the other side there is the argument that any participation in European affairs means the beginning of a career of imperialism, economic if not military and naval. This is undoubtedly true, and it is also true that imperialism of any sort is regrettable from a liberal point of view. Nevertheless I cannot attach much weight to the argument, because I think that, human nature being what it is, America is absolutely certain to embark upon an imperialistic career within a few years. The only question to my mind is whether American intervention shall happen now, while there is still something to save in Europe, or whether it shall happen some years hence, when we shall have sunk to the level of Haiti and be treated in the same way.

It is not, however, quite true to say that this is the only question. There is another, namely: If America intervenes now and "saves" Europe, will Europe be any better off than if she damns herself? This is not such a simple question as it seems. If Europe is allowed to collapse into chaos, European industry will collapse, and American protectionism will probably be strong enough to hinder Americans from reviving it. All that has happened to Europe since the Renaissance will drop off like an outworn skin, to be succeeded by communities of poor and pious peasants. Such communities would offer little temptation to economic imperialism, which would turn rather to South America and the Far East. After some centuries of repose, they might again give birth to art and science, as after the Dark Ages; perhaps they would learn them again from Chinese missionaries. After a half-century of horror, during which the non-agricultural population would be dying of hunger in the intervals of killing each other, the reduced population might become fairly happy, and be forced into sanity by penury. This is the most optimistic view of the future if we are left to ourselves at this crisis.

Now, let us consider the other alternative. Suppose America were to intervene with a view to keeping the present states of Europe in being and preserving our industry from collapse. It is fairly clear that this would be to the interest of our American creditors, among whom the government is the chief. It is certain, however, unless one assumes that Americans do not share the ordinary frailties of homo sapiens, that intervention would not be unselfish and that the capital by which our industries would be kept going would be increasingly American. The result of this would be to make us poor, which matters little, and to make our culture American, which matters a good deal. But perhaps it is not clear why our culture should become American, nor why it should matter if it did. I will say something on both points.

The culture of a country in the narrow sense—its painting, theater, music, literature, science, etc.—may be supported by the state or by private patrons. Certain forms may be supported popularly—cinemas, music-halls, sentimental fiction are cases in point. But it is generally agreed that the popular forms are not, as a rule, the best; even those who only go to cinemas admit that Shakespeare is better. Most of the best poetry and music of the past is a product of court life—for example, Homer and Mozart. In our own day all that is best depends upon state endowment or the support of rich men. This applies to science quite as much as to art. It follows that, if Europe is very poor and America is very rich, patronage will go to those who please American taste, and higher education will be so conducted as to produce a result which can obtain money from Americans. Universities will be endowed by men like Mr. Rockefeller, whose ideals will gradually percolate into elementary education and imbue the whole population. Europeans who go to America rapidly become 100 per cent Americans, and those who remain in Europe will do so somewhat less rapidly if the capital by which their industries are kept going is American.

I cannot suppose that any patriotic American would see anything to regret in such a consummation, and I am therefore compelled, with all possible politeness, to explain why I should regard it as regrettable. American civilization is not a special kind, like the civilizations of India and China; it is merely the result of mechanism applied to Europeans. European countries become like America in proportion as they become industrialized. America, owing to the fact that it is a new country, has offered less resistance to mechanism on the ground of old tradition than European countries have, and has therefore shown sooner than we have what sort of culture industrialism tends to produce. I think myself, for many reasons, that industrial culture has grave defects which are not likely to be remedied except by contact with non-industrial communities or ideals. In the absence of such contact I believe that it gradually kills all instinctive joy of life, and will lead, by war, revolution, or sterility, to race suicide. For this reason, I would rather see Europe composed of ignorant peasants than see its complete conquest by the mechanistic outlook.

There is, of course, another possibility. There may be, in America, a revolt against mechanism, an increasing desire to enjoy life without sacrificing everything to efficiency. The popularity of books like those of Sinclair Lewis makes this not unthinkable. But I doubt whether Puritan ideals—which are those best suited to industrialism—can be eradicated under several generations, in view of the immense momentum of the educational system. Such questions, however, are more cheerful than those which our folly has brought upon us in Europe. Only two alternatives remain for us: mutual extermination or slavery. If we were wise, no doubt we should choose slavery. But we are not wise.

These United States—XXXIII*

OKLAHOMA: Low Jacks and the Crooked Game

By BURTON RASCOE

POLITICS in Oklahoma are, if anything, not much more corrupt than they are, say, for instance, in the city of Boston. The economic parity in Oklahoma is, if anything, not much more out of balance than it is, say, for instance, in the city of New York. The averages of literacy and intelligence in Oklahoma are little lower than they are, say, for instance, in the city of Chicago. The difference is that whereas in these great urban communities one may easily live in comfortable ignorance of the socio-economic condition that sustains one, there is in the State of Oklahoma no city large enough to conceal the hideous aspect of its fundamental organization. The sinister and discomforting skeleton is not only devoid of all the draperies, rouge, rice powder, and mascara of civilization; it is not even presentably filled out with the fat and tissue of human illusions.

It is not that Oklahomans are men and women set aside as an especially enigmatic exhibit in the mysterious way God moves His wonders to perform. They only seem so. That is because the State is so young and unpopulous as never to have acquired a social fabric with a nap of culture: it is a haphazard homespun every thread of whose woof is visible. An Oklahoman knows, if he keeps his eyes open at all, everything that is going on about him and he knows that it is not conducive to respect and solicitude for his fellowmen. It is the worst possible place for an idealist and, since most people of normal intelligence and decent instincts are weighted in adolescence with the impedimenta of illusions, they either shed their burden and become Oklahomans or shake the State's dust from their feet at the first opportunity. As a result the Oklahoma towns and cities are constantly being drained of their young and vigorous blood, blood which might redeem them from the mental, moral, and spiritual torpor into which, since statehood, they have fallen. Even in the larger towns such as Tulsa, Oklahoma City, Muskogee, Okmulgee, and Shawnee, the population, on the whole, is transient. People come and go in them with such rapidity that it is often difficult for one to discover a familiar face in the streets after a few years' absence. Only those who are anchored by real estate and resignation remain.

The reason is fairly obvious. Oklahoma has been, from the first, a boomer State, even before it was a State—when old Oklahoma Territory was first thrown open to settlers. It was peopled largely by land gamblers instead of home seekers. Like other boomer States, since the days of the California and through the Alaska gold rushes, Oklahoma was, when it first attracted attention, the goal not of people who wished to till the land, build homes, and develop a commonwealth on secure foundations, but of people who wanted to get rich suddenly and with as little effort as possible. That was the situation before oil was discovered in the State and that discovery intensified rather than diminished preexisting conditions. The State's cattle and agricultural resources are hardly more than self-sustaining, much less exploitable; but this fact did not prevent the land gamblers from inflating prices out of all proportion to the value of the land's increment. Towns, like Lawton, sprang up overnight with populations of 15,000 or more, on absolutely arid land, unfit even for grazing. They died out, of course, when the inhabitants discovered they could not live solely by trading real estate among themselves. In other towns, like Oklahoma City, more advantageously situated, on intersecting railway main lines and in reasonably productive districts, the boomer spirit was equally disastrous. Such towns were not permitted to grow normally. Their population figures were distorted into an aspect of metropolitanism and the optimistic real-estate boomers set about making the towns live up to these false figures. They sold bonds and erected skyscrapers for which they had no use, and these buildings sometimes remained vacant for years. They sold stock and erected great meat-packing, canning, tanning, and other industries which seldom got farther than buildings and equipment when bankruptcy revealed the enterprises as plain financial swindles, fostered often enough by local chambers of commerce to attract immigrants and sell them real estate. One naturally asks how it was that plain, common foresight did not tell the business men in communities where such things were going on that crashes and depression were bound to follow; but the answer is that there were almost never in these communities any business men in any acceptable use of that term, no business men mindful of the credit system, contented with a legitimate margin of profit, careful of future security; they were boomers, eager to make their immediate pile even at the cost of their established residences, stores, and reputations, and skip elsewhere. They took chances, that is all; they gambled, because the State has been from the first one vast roulette wheel played by adventurers from other States.

True enough, it has its farmers who bear the burden of producing the food, its manual laborers, small shopkeepers, clerks, and other accretions of industrialism which give some semblance of a permanently organized society; but behind them all is the gambling spirit producing probably the vulgarest low comedy offered anywhere under the name of democratic government. Where else is afforded a spectacle similar to this: The theft by night of the State papers from the Capitol in Guthrie by automobile bandits from Oklahoma City who sped back and established the State capital in the Lee-Huckins hotel; the indictment of a governor and a State bank examiner for graft arising from false statements of solvency of banks under State supervision; the emptying of the State prison overnight by a lieutenant governor who held the reins of government for a few hours in the absence of the governor and issued pardons at so much a head; all the important State officials selected by a lawyer for a great oil corporation, to whom they are in debt for campaign expenses incidental to their jobs and for whose laws and political wishes they are merely the agents and office boys; graft so prevalent and inalienable a feature of State government that the only citizens who are not partaking of it are the stupid or unlucky?

---

* Reproduction forbidden. Quotation limited to 300 words. Copyright, 1923, The Nation, Inc. All rights reserved.

Let us consider for a moment the history of a State in which such a spectacle is possible. When the western part of the territory which the United States Government had reserved as a haven for the Indians who had been driven out of the other States was thrown open to land grabbers, certain portions were designated as Indian reservations and as school land. The remainder, up to a stated number of acres, was his who first staked it out as a claim. The west and southwest were suitable only for cattle raising; the northern and northeastern sections were soon a rich grain-producing region, yielding wheat, oats, barley, corn, alfalfa, and milo maize. The central, eastern, and southern sections of the territory were given over to cotton, corn, alfalfa, and potatoes. There was coal to be mined near El Reno, Oklahoma City, and Guthrie. At first, except in the extremely fertile districts, there were extensive ranches and cattle ranges, acquired by the enterprising, and these were in due time fenced off and converted into small farms. Settlers out of the bleak hills and rocks of Arkansas, the dry prairies of Kansas and Texas, the swamps of Louisiana, and the barren lands of southern Missouri came through in covered wagons, prepared to establish homes. They found that the better portions of the land had already got into the hands of people who were holding them for speculation—town residents, bankers, real-estate operators. To acquire land one had either to pay a whopping price for it or marry an Indian woman. This latter method was a favorite one with a great many who were not already burdened with a family. Each adult Indian woman had 160 acres in her own right, as a government land grant, and for each child she should have there would be additional grants of 160 acres. At first there was also a government allotment of money to full-blooded Indians and to such children as they bore. This proved an allurement not only to a great many white men but to Negroes as well, and as a consequence black and white squaw men and their progeny came into possession of such desirable lands as had not already fallen into the clutches of speculators and land operators.

There was established then almost from the first an agricultural caste system, divided into landowners, tenant farmers, and share-croppers. Less than 30 per cent of the farmers of the State own the land they work. The landowners rarely live on the land they own. They rent it to tenant farmers or leave its yield to the industry and intelligence of the share-croppers. A tenant farmer has his own teams and implements, cows, hogs, and chickens; he undertakes to till the land, pay for the extra farm labor, and market the crops. If he does not rent outright he pays over to the landlord a stated share of the gross proceeds on the farm for the year. The share-cropper is among the most pitiable of human beings. He owns nothing whatever except the clothes on his back. He usually has a wife and numerous children. These, and his own bodily strength, are his assets. The landlord provides him with a house in which to live, teams and implements with which to work, and, often enough, an advance of money for food while he is laying in the crops. He and his wife and children perform the labor in the fields and get in return a fraction of the yield of the crops.

The only way he knows of meeting the situation is that of voting the straight Democratic ticket if the Republicans happen to be in office, or of electing Republicans if the administration is Democratic. Mankind, to him, has three constituents: Democrats, Republicans, and the others, roughly classified as Reds. Without differentiation he includes among the Reds: socialists, anarchists, syndicalists, I. W. W.'s, Catholics, Jews, pacifists, labor unionists, atheists, and what not. If he is a Republican it is conceivable to him that a man may be a Democrat without being a menace to the community, or if he is a Democrat he will concede that a man may be a Republican and still be only misinformed politically; but it is not conceivable to him that a man may be neither a Democrat nor a Republican and still hold a shred of honor. The most persistently and mercilessly exploited human being in the country, he is the most zealous and intractable upholder of the politico-economic system that exploits him. Let him hear that some other share-cropper as illiterate as himself has been converted to socialistic doctrines and he will help his fellow Ku Klux Klaners that night give the poor wretch a tar bath and a coat of chicken feathers. He will not suffer for a moment anything that threatens his privilege of being mulcted.

Although the State has the most rigid banking laws, bringing all banks under State or Federal supervision, most banks in all but the larger cities are not banks at all; they are the offices of a group of men whose principal business is real-estate speculation, horse-trading, and mortgage foreclosing. Their depositors are not farmers; they have nothing to deposit. The bank officials are their own depositors who lend their money out at usurious rates. The State usury law limits the interest rate to 7 per cent. But this is the way it works. Farmer Brown has a span of mules worth in the market $650 and farm implements worth a couple of hundred dollars more. He needs $200 for food and for the salary of farm hands to tide him over until he has finished bringing in his crop. Early in the season he has already mortgaged his crop at the bank for the money necessary to live on while he is planting his crop. He applies for a loan of $200, giving as security a mortgage on his mules and implements. He receives $175 in cash and is obliged to sign a note promising to pay back $200 at 7 per cent. In other words, $25 in interest is collected from him before he gets his money. The amount subtracted from the original loan varies according to the pressure of the farmer's need and the negotiability of his securities. Sometimes the amount deducted from a loan of $100 is as much as $30. If he invokes the usury law (as some poor devils have done) he is blacklisted by every bank in the State and thereafter cannot borrow a cent, no matter what security he has to offer. If his crops fail or if the market price for his produce does not enable him to pay off his note or notes at the bank and he is unable to dig up more security, the mortgage is foreclosed.

A generous national government reserved the most fertile sections of the country for those Indians which it had hopes of making over into good and industrious citizens. It had been unable to tame the Apaches, Comanches, and Arapahoes, so it permitted them to die out of boredom in great numbers, under the armed surveillance of Federal troops in the arid regions of the southwest part of the State. The Osages, heirs to fertile broadlands in the north-central section, and good farmers by inclination and training, became, proverbially, the richest nation, per capita, on the face of the globe. Discovery of oil upon their lands and upon the lands of many of the Creeks and Cherokees (who had been granted nice rocky hills to roam around in) made millionaires of many of these original citizens of the country. The Seminoles and Creeks intermarried freely with the Negroes; and the Pottawottomies, Shawnees, Sacs and Foxes, and Cherokees intermarried equally freely with the whites. The Cherokees had a language and even a literature of their own; but with rare exceptions the Indians have not taken cordially to the blessings of the civilization which has been offered them. The Apaches, Comanches, and Arapahoes actively resented it as long as they were numerous, and even after they were shut up in stockades they occasionally broke out and scalped a few settlers. The Osages and the mixed breed Seminoles, Pottawottomies, Cherokees, Shawnees, and Creeks tilled their land, or had it tilled for them, and complied in some degree to the customs of the whites; but the full-blooded Indians, even of the younger generation, have consistently refused to embrace white culture. They live in tribal communities; they wear their beads, moccasins, and blankets; they hold such ceremonial dances as the government will permit them (they are denied the privilege of the war dance); and they allow themselves to be cheated out of their land by the enterprising whites. Under the Federal law, an Indian may dispose of his inherited land, but not of his original allotment, when he has reached the age of twenty-one. Knowing this, in every county seat in the State, land sharks literally sit around on the doorsteps of the county buildings waiting for old Indians to die and young ones to come to the age of twenty-one. These sharks know how much land each Indian can dispose of, what it is worth at the current land valuation, the date of the Indian's birth, his guardian, and his personal disposition.

Here is a typical instance of what goes on every month in a dozen different counties. The two leading bankers, which is to say the leading land sharks, in rival towns had their eye on the property of an Indian who had 800 acres of bottom land, worth at the lowest estimate $300 an acre as prices go. Two weeks before the youth's birthday one of them stole a march on the other, invited the boy on a trip, took him to Chihuahua, Mexico, got him drunk, showed him a riotous time in the redlight district, crossed the border back into the State on his birthday, had the deeds drawn up for him to sign, giving him $8,000 in cash for $240,000 worth of property, got his signature, and rushed the deed through the probate court the next day.

So much, in sketch, for the productive complexion of the State exclusive of its bonanza of gas, oil, and coal—a comparatively recent discovery, and already, according to many expert estimates, a source of wealth that is rapidly being exhausted. The general features attending the discovery of oil in the Tulsa-Sapulpa and Ada-Ardmore districts do not differ in essentials from the turn of events such a discovery brings about in every State. There was, of course, the rush of adventurers, oil promoters, highjackers (an oil-region term for murderous robbers), laborers, and camp followers. Until Tulsa amassed a wealth in its local banks which compared favorably with that of St. Louis and Kansas City it was, like most of the smaller oil towns now, a gay and lawless community, with gambling houses running wide open, a redlight district in full blaze, moonshine whiskey readily obtainable throughout the periods of senatorial, State, and national dryness, and the frenzied excitement prevailing which is always a concomitant of sudden visions of wealth. Millionaires were made overnight, and men and women who had until yesterday toiled barefooted in the fields trying to wrest a meager living from the sandy and rocky soil suddenly found themselves in possession of incomes from oil leases amounting to thousands of dollars a week.

This sudden acquisition of unexpected wealth on the part of illiterate white settlers had its comic aspect: they knew but two or three ways of spending it—buying high-priced and luxurious automobiles and tearing them up on the rocky roads, only to buy new ones; chartering special cars for a trip to Niagara Falls or to Washington; and buying diamonds. They tell of a wealthy Osage who inspected the cars for sale in Oklahoma City and found nothing to please him until he chanced upon a white hearse, which he purchased forthwith. This vision and fact of sudden, immense wealth has also its tragic side. The farmers, the normal producers of the State, live buoyed up by the hope that some day oil will be discovered on their land. Meanwhile they persist in the most backward agricultural methods obtaining in any State in the Union, and market their produce through the most inefficient and wasteful channels of middlemen and profiteers it is possible to imagine.

Within the last year the Oklahoma Cotton Growers' Association, a sort of farmers' union, has been perfecting a cooperative scheme for marketing and warehousing which may check some of the losses the farmer ordinarily sustains in the disposal of his cotton. Another part of the plan of the association is to limit the acreage in cotton to prevent overproduction. I was privy to one such agreement by the assembled farmers of one county. The following spring every single one of them increased his cotton acreage by at least a third, on the theory that every one else would decrease his acreage, the price of cotton would go up, and he would be the gainer. There was an excess of cotton produced throughout the country that year; the price slumped, and these men who had solemnly agreed to cut their production and raise corn for their stock and potatoes and other vegetables for themselves all but starved.

After such a demonstration of stupidity and covetousness, such a general indifference to the common weal, one grows skeptical of any profound change for the better in the source of wealth, the land; and this skepticism is deepened by the knowledge that, so long as reports come from time to time that another well has been sunk by oil-stock promoters, hope will spring eternal in the farmer's breast that he will not have to plant either cotton or corn; so he sinks back in sloth and squalor, living principally upon cornbread, salt pork, and sorghum molasses—a diet so preponderatingly of corn that pellagra epidemics spread through the State every year and children, who by all rules of hygiene should wax strong in the fresh quiet and pure food of the farm, are emaciated, rickety, weak, and sallow, easy preys to malaria, tuberculosis, and pneumonia. This because the mass of the farmers are at once so poor and so greedy that they do not keep cows, and the bulk of such eggs and chickens as they raise they sell in the town markets. There are plenty of schools, good schools for these children to go to; belief in education amounts in Oklahoma to a superstition. The State is heavily burdened with school taxes; a great portion of the land of the State is reserved as a source of income for the maintenance of schools; and there is in force a modification of the Indiana school system which offers probably as fine a public means of education as is to be found in any State. But the physique and minds of the bulk of the farmers' children are stunted by malnutrition; and education in the towns and cities only leads the young men and women to a disenchantment and disgust with a social-political and economic scene from which they are glad enough to escape.

The next article in the series These United States, to appear in The Nation of July 25, will be Kentucky: Where Men Die Standing, by Ben Lucien Burman.

Revolutionary Days in Bulgaria

By THEODOR BERKES

The writer of this account is, we believe, the only correspondent of an American publication who was on the spot when the recent overthrow in Bulgaria took place.

Sofia, June 17

EUROPE, which had heard so many false tales of overturns in Bulgaria, may not have been surprised by Stambuliiski's fall. Sofia was. Toward three o'clock in the morning on Saturday, June 9, a few hundred shots were fired in Sofia and soldiers marched through the streets; when dawn came the police had disappeared and had been replaced by military patrols. The Bulgarian capital looked like an army camp. Stacks of arms were pyramided in front of the castle as if in preparation for a campaign, and soldiers armed with hand-grenades and accompanied by "goulash-wagons" were drawn up beside them. Circulation in the streets was forbidden, shops were ordered to shut, and when foreigners tried to look out of hotel windows they found themselves face to face with bayonets. The discomfort of the situation was aggravated by the uncertainty as to the future. A few days previously Stojanoff, one of the ministers of the old Peasants' Party cabinet, had replied to threatening letters from some of the Macedonian Komitadji that if they ventured to attack the peasant regime, Sofia and the two Macedonian cities of Kustendil and Petritsch would be turned into cemeteries and not one stone left upon another.

Stojanoff is now in prison and his bloody fantasies remain unrealized. It was only natural that there should be opposition to so arbitrary and violent a regime as that of Stambuliiski. It was plain, after thirty former cabinet ministers had been arrested and some of them condemned to death, after a long series of political murders, after a political and economic dictatorship, after hundreds of Macedonians had been arrested and the Macedonian organizations declared illegal, that a change must come. Stambuliiski, a man of extraordinary energy and power, had, to be sure, won the election six weeks before with 544,000 votes against 460,000 for all the opposition parties put together. He held 212 out of 245 seats in Parliament. He had built up an army out of members of his own party and had added the so-called Orange Guard of peasants. Naturally many responsible Bulgarian politicians, however opposed to the Government, were disinclined to gamble under such circumstances with their own lives and with the future of their nation. Despite the fact that the opposition had won its few electoral victories in strategically important cities, it had lapsed into a kind of pessimistic hate of the Government and seemed almost resigned to believing Stambuliiski's boast that he could rule another twenty years.

But unknown even to their own sympathizers a bold committee of action had been formed of one hundred determined opponents of Stambuliiski, led by the present city commander of Sofia, General Lazaroff, the present Prime Minister, Professor Zankoff, and the present Minister of Justice, Smiloff. The Peasant Government had a whole army of spies, but these men carefully sounded out politicians and army officers and worked so successfully and so suddenly that even the army officers who played the decisive role in the overturn were informed of the plan only half an hour before it began. At two o'clock in the morning the army units broke out of the barracks, disarmed the Orange Guards (who surrendered immediately) and the police (only in one quarter was there any opposition and only a few were killed)—and that completed the job in Sofia. The government offices were next occupied, and at three o'clock a revolutionary committee waited upon the King, who knew as little of what had happened as any other citizen of Sofia. After all, ever since Stambuliiski came to power, the King had been only a puppet, accustomed to being threatened with exile if he did not behave; so he signed on the dotted line and issued a ukase dismissing the peasant Ministry and naming the new Government.

This new Government, hoisted into office on the points of bayonets, is a nationalist coalition, including five neutrals, five representatives of the bourgeois parties, and one Socialist. Its chief is the former rector of the university, Zankoff, an able economist, hitherto unknown in politics but reputed to be an extremely energetic man. General Russeff, the new Minister of the Interior, began his career by putting the entire civil administration under military orders and instructing them to proceed relentlessly against all disturbers of public order. Smiloff, the Minister of Justice, a Radoslavist, is one of the ablest orators and one of the most capable men of the young Bulgarian generation.

The public seems to approve the new cabinet, particularly since it contains no one too well known in the past. It was natural that the cities should approve any alternative to the Peasant Government, but it seems that opposition even in the villages has not been very keen. It is significant that men like Turlakoff, Tomoff, and Manaloff, who were formerly associated with Stambuliiski but turned against him because of his violence, have declared that if the new Government respects the liberties and interests of the peasants they will not oppose it. The Communists, who always despised the Stambuliiski system, have as little respect for the new Government which they call a bourgeois regime dominated by soldiers and policemen—and the participation of Socialists in this Government only increases their dislike of it.

All but two of the peasant ministers have been arrested. The former ministers whom Stambuliiski kept in prison have been transferred to their homes and will soon be set free. Stambuliiski fled to his country estate and after a few days' uncertainty was captured and, according to the official report, killed while attempting to escape. Huge crowds gathered in Sofia yesterday expecting to see him arrive as a captive, but their hope of hissing and howling at the man who had lately ruled them was vain.

A detachment of ten men was sent to arrest him at his home. They arrived, fired a salvo, and demanded the surrender of his military guard. The commander of the guard agreed to surrender, but first informed Stambuliiski. Stambuliiski insisted that the soldiers were mere bandits and ordered that they be fired upon. The soldiers thereupon hastily retreated, but Stambuliiski, accompanied by a quickly assembled troop of peasants led by a priest who carried a crucifix in one hand and a hand-grenade in the other, retired to the woods fearful lest the soldiers return with reinforcements. There were small engagements in the woods, and it is reported that the four soldiers captured by Stambuliiski's men were outrageously mutilated. But Stambuliiski's followers gradually deserted him, so he dressed himself up in a raincoat and tourist's cap and appeared in the village of Golak ostensibly as a builder looking for tiles to buy. The mayor of the town, however, recognized him and he had hardly left the village when a group of peasants led by the mayor came after him and took him captive. He denied his identity, but his face was only too familiar. Upon his forced return to the village, he composed a telegram to the new Prime Minister as follows: "I have just learned that my government has fallen and I hasten to surrender. Please send automobile. With greetings, Alexander Stambuliiski." The auto was sent, but on its way back to the capital, according to the official account, it was surrounded by armed adherents of the former Premier and he, while attempting to escape, was accidentally killed. There can be no doubt that the Bulgarian revolution will have a great influence abroad. The new Government has promoted demonstrations before the Entente embassies in Sofia in order to show that the revolution is not anti-Ally, but it has certainly broken many bonds which linked one or another of the Powers with Stambuliiski. No new government is likely to be so loyal to its neighbors or so hostile to the pro-Bulgarian aspirations of the Macedonians. The Little Entente is not likely to be pleased by the rebirth of the old Bulgaria, especially since it owes its existence to bayonet-tips. What the relations of the new Government to Russia—General Wrangel was in Sofia when the revolution took place—and to Turkey will be, remains to be seen.

In any case, there is undoubtedly what the diplomats call "a new situation" in the Balkans, and it is not a very reassuring one.

Contributors to This Issue

Bertrand Russell, English philosopher and scientist, is the author of many books and magazine articles.

Burton Rascoe is the literary editor of the New York Tribune.

Theodor Berkes is the correspondent in the Balkans of the Berlin Tageblatt and of The Nation.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has been motoring again, this time away from the city; and in the course of a long tour not many days ago he had occasion to reflect upon the institution of hard roads. Concrete, asphalt, brick, and macadam pavements across the country were once the fondest dream of drivers who had to bump from town to town in dry weather and who in wet weather either splashed through a thousand puddles or did not venture forth at all. And now that a number of those pavements are laid and alive with cars, something of the dream does linger about them. You can go so fast and so far, so easily! The road lies smooth and hard ahead. There is plenty of room for other cars to pass, at any speed they like; and the best curves are gradual, with banked sides so that no driver need slow up seriously for a turn. Better yet, the road is becoming more difficult each year to lose. Signs of every color and shape and size are up; there is no longer the necessity of stopping at farmers' houses and asking the way. Delays are fewer and fewer. You now may make a schedule for yourself and be reasonably sure of arrival in Buffalo or Cincinnati at a certain hour of a certain day.

* * * * *

THE Drifter is not unappreciative of these improvements. He relishes ease, and wishes the world more of it. But as he rolled without anxiety or interruption between two cities the other day he could not help wondering if the future of hard roads would not be that they should make travel too easy. Nothing is less adventurous to the Drifter than an ordinary railroad; and here he was comparing the concrete highway with an ordinary railroad. The car ran so evenly, hour after hour, that the driver grew sleepy at the wheel. There was never any question about the way. Neat signs on solid posts at convenient intervals told the miles, and even the tenths of miles, to the next important town—one might almost have said station. Had there been such a question, the route book—one might almost have said time table—lay under the seat to be consulted. Now and then a road gang, looking very much like a section gang, stood aside to let the traffic go by. Great signboards lined the right of way to remind the public of the best in hotels, garters, and breakfast food. In towns, garages and filling stations were more or less perfect images of round houses and water towers. And the Drifter's party arrived at its destination only forty minutes late, after an all day run and one slight mishap with a freight train—or a truck.

* * * * *

IN general the Drifter is not one to lament the good old days, or to see any advantage in adversity. Yet it seems plain to him that a certain exultation no longer is possible to the motorist. You do not exult these days over getting somewhere; you could not have stood still. Purely in the interest of pleasure, the Drifter will avoid the main-traveled roads next time—they are only the city indefinitely extended—and take to the byways, some of which he hopes will conduct him to a region where the roads are alternately bad and good, where few strangers have been before, where the natives have not been bored in advance, and where he can lose himself as often and as completely as chance desires.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Letters to the Editor should ordinarily not exceed 500 words, and shorter communications are more likely to be printed. In any case the Editor reserves the right to abridge communications.

An Amherst Graduate's Answer

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have just learned that the trustees of Amherst College have forced Mr. Meiklejohn to resign his presidency of that institution. Knowing something of the condition of the college at the time of his coming to it, the declared purposes for which he was brought there, the support pledged him in the carrying out of his policies, the many ways in which the college has been improved under his guidance, and the genuine distinction brought to it by his leadership, the news of the trustees' action comes as a great shock to me.

Two years ago at the time of the endowment drive, having faith in the program and ideals of liberal education which Mr. Meiklejohn was attempting to establish, I pledged a small amount to help the college in its work of carrying out those ideals. Since, to my knowledge, the trustees and opponents of Mr. Meiklejohn have advanced no ideals of liberal education superior to his, and since no other intelligible reason for his removal has been brought forward, I am forced to conclude that his repudiation amounts to a repudiation of the ideal of liberal training at Amherst. Under these circumstances, in order not to embarrass the trustees, I feel constrained to withdraw my subscription, pledged to the support of an ideal no longer acceptable to them.

EVERETT GLASS, Amherst College, Class of 1914
University of California, Berkeley, June 20

The First Woman Ambassador

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Reviewing some numbers of your paper I find a note concerning the first woman ambassador which should be corrected. When the Karolyi government came into power in Hungary Madam Rosika Schwimmer was appointed ambassador to Switzerland—November 19, 1918—until March 21, 1919, she held that position. At that date the government passed into the hands of the Communists, the pacific government of the Karolyi group was at an end, and Madam Schwimmer returned to Budapest.

Chicago, June 9 FLORENCE HOLBROOK

Mental Overfeeding

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Lectures on Oriental rugs and on engineering problems of the Catskill aqueduct may indeed furnish intellectual pabulum for the college student, but are they not part of that already too heterogeneous diet of the non-academic which is causing mental indigestion?

One solution would seem to lie in the direction of giving the students less food for thought and more leisure for thinking. Colleges like Bryn Mawr, where the student takes three five-hour instead of the customary five three-hour courses, and like Smith, where the superior students are allowed to do concentrated work rather than attend many classes, have taken a step on the right path. However, the reform must go further than that, and colleges which are raising the hue and cry against so much dissipation of energy in athletics and non-academic activities need to realize that the many extra-curricular interests offered by the colleges themselves under the guise of "broadening" the intellectual life of the students merely serve as part of that overstimulation so pandemic in college and university life today. What will be the thought product of undergraduates living in the atmosphere suggested by the following schedule of one of the leading women's colleges?

| | |
|---|---|
| Monday. | First of a series of four lectures on politics and government—12 m. |
| | Maids' play—8 p. m. |
| Tuesday. | Lecture on Oriental rugs—4:30 p. m. |
| Wednesday. | First of six lectures on India. |
| | College party—8 p. m. |
| Thursday. | Lecture on ethics and government—12 m. |
| | Lecture before an open meeting of the Science Club on "Engineering Problems of the Catskill Aqueduct"—4:30 p. m. |
| | Lecture on "Student Movements in Europe in 1922"—8 p. m. |
| Friday. | Piano recital—8 p. m. |
| Saturday. | Glee Club Concert—11 a. m. |
| | Junior Promenade—4:30 p. m.-12 midnight. |
| Sunday. | Chapel—11 a. m. |
| | Organ recital—6:45 p. m. |
| | Lecture on "Some Forces Under the Surface of the Lives of the Working People"—7:30 p. m. |
| Monday. | Lecture on the modern drama—4:30 p. m. |

The mentally as well as physically overfed American students present a strange contrast to the young men and women of Central Europe who worry more about their inability to afford paper on which to take lecture notes than their lack of food.

New York, April 5 JANE PERRY CLARK

Why They Subscribe

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is a cause of genuine pleasure to learn that Los Angeles has a board of education sufficiently intelligent to look behind your smoke-screen of "honest journalism," and to appreciate, at their true valuation, your efforts to publish "what is really going on in the United States and the world." The board of education, apparently, has divined the real purpose of your activities, namely, the teaching of communism under the disguise of liberalism, and the fostering of literary ideals which, if they were generally adopted, would create an atmosphere redolent of Gomorrah.

My purpose in continuing to subscribe to The Nation during these years is solely to study the activities of parlor bolshevism. It is true that there may be more profitable pastime, but it will be difficult to find more interesting phenomena for the observation of the amateur psychologist than the "carryings-on" of our own unwhiskered soviets. THOMAS L. KELLEY

Fort Winfield Scott, San Francisco, April 23

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It was several issues back I saw in The Nation a note from some one of your subscribers who lived in the West. He was complaining bitterly about the stand The Nation was taking in behalf of the darker races—"The Rising Tide of Color," as he was pleased to call it—and stated in the same letter that on account of that stand you would please him very much if you would discontinue The Nation when his subscription ran out. This subscription is to take its place.

New York, April 28 W. W. WOLFE, M.D.

Who Wants Some Magazines?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If any of your readers can place a quantity of magazines where they will do some good, I shall be glad to hear from them. I have several thousand copies of various kinds and dates, and will be glad to send them prepaid on request, and if preference as to kind is stated, supply them according to that preference so far as possible.

Shiner, Texas, May 29 HARTLEY H. HEPLER

Books

An Eminent American

My Thirty Years in Baseball. By John J. McGraw. Boni and Liveright. $2.

IT is a pleasure of most agreeable smack, after groaning through such flabby, stupid biographies as that of the late Thomas Nelson Page by his brother, Rosewell, and that of Cyrus H. K. Curtis by his son-in-law, Edward W. Bok, to find the life story of a man of salient and charming personality told simply, honestly, and winningly. Such a man is John J. McGraw, A.B., the distinguished manager of the New York Giants; such a book is his present autobiography. I have heard the usual whispers that he did not write it—that its actual author is a New York sporting reporter. The fact is unimportant if true. In every chapter of it, and almost on every page of it, there is matter that no outsider, however gifted, could have dredged out of the subject without his active and intelligent assistance. He, and he alone, is the man talking, even though he may not be the scribe writing it down, and so he deserves nine-tenths of the credit for the volume's peculiar virtues. He has made, it seems to me, an autobiography that is almost a model. Every reasonable inquiry about his career that an admirer might ask is answered succinctly, and his opinion upon every question within the range of his professional interests and talents is given frankly and clearly. But there he stops: no man could avoid the irrelevant more diligently. He has met in his time, I daresay, most of the great heroes of the newspapers, from Presidents up and down; if so, he forgets it. He has his private views, no doubt, upon the League of Nations, the coal problem, the Ku Klux Klan, baptism by total immersion, the training of children; if so, he withholds them. His book is devoted to baseball, and to baseball alone. It is the best book upon the subject ever printed.

This is simply because Mr. McGraw is the most reflective and ingenious man who has ever devoted himself to baseball as a profession—because his natural talents as a player of the game have been reinforced from the start by a quite unusual capacity for analyzing its problems and devising solutions for them. When he first entered big-league company baseball was still in a relatively primitive stage, despite the high development of individual prowess. Pitching had been brought up to great perfection, catching had emerged from the era of mere human backstops, and there was a growing improvement in fielding and base-running, but there was very little effort to coordinate the skill of one player with that of his fellows, and to make the whole team play as one man. The best pitching was frequently made vain by unintelligent fielding, and even the best fielding was simple, obvious, and devoid of plan. Mr. McGraw's native intelligence made him see the weakness of this scheme of play; combined with his increasing skill and experience, it enabled him to devise a better one. The clubhouse of the old Baltimore Orioles constituted his seminary and laboratory. There he called the first councils of war ever heard of in baseball, and there he gradually developed the first mass plays in the grand manner. The Orioles, in the main, were not great stars; McGraw himself, indeed, was a player of very decided limitations. But when he and his colleagues went on the field with coherent plans in their heads, instead of the old simple trust in God's gifts and the fortunes of war, their playing instantly became five times as effective as it had ever been before, and in a few short months they had mowed down all the visiting stars, revolutionized baseball, and won the national championship.

In his book Mr. McGraw describes some of this now ancient strategy in detail, showing how it was evolved out of the earlier chaos, how it achieved its devastating victories, and how, in the end, as its victims began to penetrate and imitate it, it had to be changed or abandoned. Most of it seems simple enough, viewed from this distance, but as one who witnessed its first trials I can bear witness that it was by no means transparent then—that it not only puzzled and flabbergasted the poor morons who fell before it, but also stumped the illuminati in the Baltimore stands, many of them professors in the Johns Hopkins University and at least 250 years old by the Simon-Binét test. Mr. McGraw is by no means modest about his share in this revolution; in fact, he blows more than one exultant blast upon his bugle horn. The music gives no offense; he was actually the moving force he says he was; not one of his colleagues had half his acumen. To this day, I believe, he remains without a peer. Individual players of enormously greater skill have come and gone, but none of them has ever left such brilliant marks upon the game. The lively ball is his enemy today. It makes things easy for the heavy swatter of the truck-driver or Babe Ruth type, and so tends to convert the game into a mere clown show for the mob. But even this difficulty, I am confident, will fall before the McGrawian ingenuity. One gathers that his mind is busy with the problem, and that he is not without hope. On some bright afternoon, perhaps not far distant, the Crô-Magnon batsmen who now flourish will suddenly wither and die, as the impregnable pitchers of 1893 withered and died before the scientific bunting and base-stealing of the old Orioles. McGraw used to put in his winters keeping a saloon—no low doggery, of course, but an establishment befitting a philosopher and a bachelor of arts. His own steam beer, olives, pretzels, Blutwurst and Kartoffelsalat shortened his wind and gave him a paunch, and the conversation of his clients whitened his hair. He has thus made his last slide and bitten off his last umpire's ear. But his head is still working.

H. L. MENCKEN

European Celebrities

Eminent Europeans: Studies in Continental Reality. By Eugene S. Bagger. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

MR. BAGGER'S book gives full-length portraits of ten European rulers and statesmen: of King Ferdinand and Queen Marie of Rumania and of John Bratiano, the most powerful of Rumanian statesmen; of Eleutherios Venizelos and the late King Constantine of Greece; of Thomas G. Masaryk, President of the Czecho-Slovak Republic, and Edward Benes, Premier and Minister of Foreign Affairs of that country; of Count Michael Karolyi, President of the short-lived Hungarian Republic, and Nicholas Horthy, the present regent of Hungary; and of Ignace Jan Paderewski, Premier of Poland in 1918-19. Imbedded in the larger canvases are subsidiary sketches, the most notable of which are those of Count Stephen Tisza, Hungarian Premier at the outbreak of the World War, a typical Hungarian magnate of the old school, and of Prince Ludwig Windischgraetz, who was Hungarian Food Minister at the close of the war and who acquired immortality as the "potato prince," because, when the revolution came, he left the country calmly carrying away with him twelve million kronen of state funds destined for the purchase of food for the starving people. Noblesse oblige!

It will be noted that Mr. Bagger's list of political eminences is drawn from the second-rate states of Central and Southeastern Europe. Most of his subjects are but little known in this country; but that is no reason why they should not be made known, or pilloried, according to their deserts. It might be objected that the ridiculous Ferdinand, the complacent Bratiano, the White Terrorist, Horthy, even those perfect saints of the Czech lower middle class, Masaryk and Benes, are not representative 100 per cent Europeans. But who can tell? To compare things unknown with things known, are we quite sure that Roosevelt and Wilson, those fine political artists, are more representative of America than the clumsy Taft and the normally mediocre Harding? Is it quite certain that Messrs. Burleson and Palmer, Daugherty and Lusk are less typical Americans than the editors and contributors of The Nation, New Republic, and Freeman? Even Mr. Ludwig Lewisohn is not quite sure that his genius is more truly representative of America than, say, the genius of Brander Matthews. I may prefer to read of the titans who are battling and toiling for a new social order; but Mr. Bagger prefers to write of the eminences who bear the burden and reap the profits of the old. That being the case, the only proper question is, How has Mr. Bagger done his job?

He has done it, all the difficulties of contemporary biography considered, surprisingly well; throughout with spirit and vivacity, occasionally with a deep insight into the nature of things. The futile Rumanian royalties are exhibited in all their futility, the effect of which is heightened by amusing anecdotes of more or less authenticity. Venizelos and Constantine fight over again their world-renowned quarrel, for which millions of Greeks, Armenians, and Turks, too, have paid in misery, starvation, and death. Proudly Bratiano struts past, held up by his wealth, the name of his father, his princely wife, his high financial connections. Paderewski lives his life over again, sacrificing his composer's ambition for the applause and the emoluments of a great popular virtuoso, sacrificing his possessions and his art for his beloved Poland, sacrificing himself in the pursuit of a political ambition, only to be beaten by the virtuosi of intrigue and demagogy. We see Count Karolyi, one of the greatest magnates of Europe, fleeing with his wife and children, pushing their belongings in a little cart, robbed of everything, but sure of his soul, his pure motives, his benevolent intentions; the one truly noble figure in this gallery of eminences. We see the country squire Horthy rising, ever rising, with Hapsburg aid, with Allied aid, until he is able to send forth his detachment chiefs with blanket warrants "to pronounce and execute sentence on the guilty." The portraits of Masaryk and Benes are not quite so well done; somehow they lack vigor, the sap of life. But what is one to do with such moral, model citizens? So much virtue and goodness, so much adaptability and serviceability may have honestly earned its successes and triumphs, but if you undertake to depict it you do so at your own peril.

In his papers on Venizelos and Constantine, which are among the very best hitherto penned, Mr. Bagger very justly points out that, among Western liberals and radicals, Venizelos is undeservedly in ill repute. They regard him as an imperialist, whereas in reality he is a nationalist, pursuing aims similar to those of Pachitch and Masaryk in our day, or of Mazzini and Cavour in the mid-nineteenth century. The ideal of Venizelos, the union of all the historic seats of Hellenism in one state, seemed at one time on the very verge of realization, although now, after the Ionian catastrophe, its total shipwreck is apparent to all. But Mr. Bagger is at his very best, achieves his finest effects, in the papers on Karolyi and Horthy. There he is on his own native heath—beg pardon, puszta—and his analysis of the historically active groups and classes of Hungarian society—the great Catholic landowners, who had made their peace with the Court; the country squires, largely Calvinist, who constituted the official opposition; the army officers, a subdivision of the country squires; the oppressed nationalities, who constituted more than one-half of the total population; the Jews, the intellectuals, the rising trade unions—this analysis, scattered though it is through these two papers, constitutes the most brilliant and delectable as it certainly is the most searching portion of the whole book. It is impossible to convey an adequate idea of it except by quoting a few of Mr. Bagger's sentences: "Stripped of its romantic trappings of race superiority and historic mission and all that sort of thing, Magyar supremacy meant monopoly of land." Since the Ausgleich with Austria, the national, i. e., the Magyar, cause had been championed by an oligarchic opposition, which assumed to speak in the name of "the people." The opposition's battle-cry was 1848, the year of revolution and separation from Austria, while the battle-cry of the Government party was 1867, the year of compromise with Austria and the dynasty. And what was the social meaning of this political division? Mr. Bagger tells us: "Roughly speaking, 1867 was the party of large landowners, Jewish high finance, and the Budapest bourgeoisie; 1848 that of the middle and small landowners, the Calvinist clergy, the burgesses of the smaller cities, and such peasants as had the property qualification for the franchise." And what is the meaning of the counter-revolution and the White Terror? "It was in reality a reaction against Karolyi, not Bela Kun; against the Westernism, the new-fangled ways, the alien, French and English, notions of the Budapest intellectuals. The 100 per cent Magyarism of the country districts, manipulated by the officers of the army and the clique of Budapest politicians, put Admiral Horthy into the saddle."

HERMAN SIMPSON

The Diplomat at His Best

Social and Diplomatic Memories, 1884-1895. By the Rt. Hon. Sir James Rennell Rodd. Edward Arnold and Company.

IT is a sign of the times that the author of this volume thinks it necessary to preface his recollections with an apologia for the old diplomacy. The effectiveness of the traditional system is no longer taken for granted. Indeed, the more popular assumption today is that this system has broken down. Sir Rennell Rodd takes up not so much the cudgels as the rapier in defense of his profession, but more cogent than any of his direct arguments will be the indirect persuasiveness of his delightful picture of the activities and interests of himself and his colleagues. He presents to us here a portrait of the orthodox diplomat at his best.

Certainly the old system has been able to draw into its service not a few men of the highest culture. Educated under Jowett at Balliol, where three other future ambassadors—Cecil Spring-Rice, Arthur Hardinge, and Louis Mallet—were members of his own class, as one would say in America, Sir Rennell has preserved throughout his career the tastes not only of a gentleman but of a scholar and an artist. We find him, while filling a junior post at the Berlin Embassy, relieving the monotony of deciphering telegrams by discussing the history of art with the commercial attaché, Sir Joseph Crowe. His term at Athens is followed by the publication of a book on the "Customs and Lore of Modern Greece" and by another embodying the results of diligent researches in the history of Greece during the Middle Ages. Having four days to spare between boats at Brindisi, he makes a pilgrimage to the home of Horace. Even at Zanzibar, of all places, he gains an unexpected thrill by discovering an unpublished lyric of Heine's. In respect of culture, the "shirt-sleeves diplomatist" will have something to do to catch up with the standard set him by his predecessor.

Perhaps on another side of his interests Sir Rennell will not be so hard to rival. He is not only a scholar, a poet, and an artistic and literary critic but a connoisseur in wines and taverns. He expresses some regret that circumstances have made him a courtier, whereas nature had meant him for a Bohemian. He becomes quickly at home among the habitués of an artists' kneipe at Munich, where he finds the company as good as the beer. In his own country as well as abroad he gets into touch with circles remote from either Buckingham Palace or Whitehall. Whistler, Burne-Jones, Mowbray Morris, and Pellegrini are among the names that appear in his records of London life in the eighties. There are some piquant stories of the youthful pranks of Lord Curzon and other Oxford intimates who have since become famous and dignified. This volume is, indeed, a treasury of diverting anecdotes about men and women, known and unknown, whom Sir Rennell has met in England and on the Continent.

He entered the diplomatic service in 1884, when he joined the embassy at Berlin under Lord Ampthill. The general reader will be keenly interested in his impressions of the old Emperor William, the Emperor Frederick, and the younger William, as well as of the Bismarcks, father and son. The historian will find some useful material here concerning the Morell Mackenzie controversy, of which Sir Rennell, through his friendship with the Empress Frederick, had first-hand knowledge. The publication of Sir Rennell's biography of the Emperor Frederick brought him into the black books of the younger Emperor William, and it was long before the offense was forgiven.

After Berlin came Athens, Rome, and Paris. In Greece, as may be inferred from what has already been said, diplomatic duties at the capital offered less attraction than expeditions in exploration of the country, including the islands. The fascination of these journeys did not wholly lie in their archaeological or antiquarian interest. In Crete, for instance, Sir Rennell met a lady who had had a long and intimate association with Garibaldi and who had many remarkable stories to tell him of the liberator of Italy. In Italy his chief was Lord Dufferin, whom he accompanied to Paris on his transference to the embassy there. Lord Dufferin, we are told, was reluctant to make the change. He quoted to his attaché the story of some famous character who, when asked what life he would have wished to live if he had been free to choose, replied that he would like from twenty to twenty-five to be a reigning beauty, from twenty-five to thirty-five a successful French general, from thirty-five to fifty a wealthy English nobleman, and the rest of life a Roman cardinal. As he could not become a cardinal, Lord Dufferin said he would like to have remained the next best thing, an ambassador in Rome.

It is with a shock of surprise that one finds Sir Rennell, after this diplomatic apprenticeship at the historic capitals of Europe, suddenly switched off to East Africa. At the end of 1892 he was appointed to the charge of the Agency at Zanzibar, which carried with it the High Commissionership of the whole coastal area administered by the East Africa Company, from the Equator to the boundary of German East Africa. From court balls and Balkan imbroglios the chronicle now turns to the suppression of the slave trade and the prevention of the smuggling of fire-arms and hasheesh. Of all the unfamiliar problems that now confronted him the most critical and dangerous was that involved in the succession to the Sultanate of Zanzibar. How Sir Rennell, with the cooperation of the officers of the warships in the harbor, met the emergency makes a story whose sensational incidents would make it fit to be "featured" in the supplement of a Sunday paper. Modestly told as it is by the chief figure, it arouses in the reader a keen admiration for the courage and resourcefulness of all concerned. The occasion made a call for qualities that one does not by any means associate with the characteristics of the conventional diplomatist, but Sir Rennell Rodd laid his plans and carried them out with the skill and sangfroid of an old campaigner. With his departure from Zanzibar in 1894 at the age of thirty-five the present record stops. We are promised a supplementary volume telling of his subsequent service in Egypt under Lord Cromer, in Stockholm, and again at Rome, where he spent three years as secretary of the embassy and eleven as ambassador, which last included the period of the Great War.

With all its attractiveness, this picture of the old diplomacy, as drawn by one of the most accomplished of its practitioners, is not likely to convert anyone who believes that international relations in the future will need to be conducted by men of more democratic sympathies and outlook. Wherein the traditional system was lacking is sufficiently indicated by an incidental allusion of the author's to the "alleged infamies" of the collection of rubber on the Congo.

For a book dealing with so many names of persons and places there are few errata to be noted. But Sir Rennell's wits must surely have been wool-gathering when he attributed the "Battle Hymn of the Republic" to "Harriet Ward Beecher"!

Herbert W. Horwill

After-War Novels

Time Is Whispering. By Elizabeth Robins. Harper and Brothers. $2.

The Wrong Shadow. By Harold Brighouse. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.

The Return of Frank Clamart. By Henry C. Rowland. Harper and Brothers. $1.90.

THE philosopher's "revaluation of old values" may legitimately become a function of the novelist. It is, however, an open question whether the exposition of specific current problems, as such, may not rather facilely descend to the level of the diagrammatic editorial. Especially is this true if the writer succumbs to the too obvious expedient of hawking some pet household remedy for the social condition thus indicated. These three novelists are concerned with after-war states of mind in England and the United States. Miss Robins adopts the angle of the older generation; she as well as Mr. Brighouse, who champions youth, is engaged by the conflict of the British landed aristocracy and the new war-made millionaires, the latest phase of the battle between agriculture and industrialism. Mr. Rowland is apparently an ardent newspaper reader; his United States is in the throes of superhuman struggles against insidious foreign drug rings, murder syndicates, and "crime waves," all of which are the "aftermath of the war."

In "Time Is Whispering" Miss Robins develops her thesis in terms of events years before in India, modified by memory and brought to bear upon the matured personalities of her protagonists. Her heroine suggests irresistibly a softened Charlotte Brontë; Miss Robins's character is still "weakness preyed upon by bestiality," still pursued by love-mad men wherever she goes. The flashing melodrama, however, is lacking. Miss Robins's pleas for married love in the middle years are sufficiently generalized without bringing in endless arguments regarding the relative merits of passion and affection in relationships, whether Understanding or Happiness is the summum bonum, Near East and Far East politics, Anglo-Indian life from the woman's viewpoint, the taste of the young in art and literature, the place of women in English after-war economics, and the colonizing Englishman. It may be a pretty picture of the ideal of service, but it is hopelessly sentimentalized out of focus.

Mr. Brighouse's competent observations on the habits and outlook of the clerk-and-stenographer school of bohemianism have already furnished him the materials for several of his plays and novels. "The Wrong Shadow" is an excursion in the familiar field, with the addition of a war profiteer. The profiteer is a patent-medicine quack who has both a conscience and an ideal. The conscience refers him constantly to the early partner who discovered his formula for him and disappeared. The ideal involves welfare work for a healthy England. Mr. Brighouse has developed scenes of delightful comedy, and is not too seriously devoted to the solution of the larger issues. The encounter between his profiteer and the long-lost partner is deftly delivered of all its amusing incongruities. As is proper in a summer novel everyone is happy and rich at the end.

The well-worn formula of the reformed crook who turns upon his old associates of the underworld is the basis of "The Return of Frank Clamart." Mr. Rowland brings it up to date by discussions of the prohibition amendment, of the increasing drug traffic, of the need for military preparedness, of the essential "cleanness and right-mindedness" of his fellow-citizens, and of the "crime wave."

Mr. Rowland is a serious-minded young man. The reader is not allowed to have his red-blooded-action yarn until he has fully digested Mr. Rowland's opinions on the score of bootleggers, contraband liquor, the observance of the law, the topsyturvydom of war, and the "national good sense." Then he is plunged into narrow escapes from death, dealings with unscrupulous intelligences with Mexican or German names, and daring rescues of beautiful women. He is introduced to insidious and deadly new gases and to picturesque characters in high and low life. He is furnished with an unanswerably crushing rejoinder: "Go to Hell!" Try it on the landlord. Mr. Rowland writes with dash and assurance; his novel was first serialized in the Saturday Evening Post. It seems a shame that so much energy should be dissipated on arid and superficial ideas. JOHN W. CRAWFORD

Colors of Spain

Terassa of Spain. By Horace Fish. Mitchell Kennerley. $2.50.

HORACE FISH'S first novel, "The Great Way," disclosed a spirit strange to contemporary America, unhurrying, given to exploring and recording sentiment, of which American writers seem so much afraid when it is not a matter of "love story" merely. The passion of his book and its humor distinguished it. It was so thoroughly felt throughout. In "Terassa of Spain" he is again vindicating the humanity that subsists between people, old or young men, women, children, in the feeling they have for one another. Possibly the town of Terassa about which these ten stories are grouped has existence only in Mr. Fish's imagination. It is again, as was Dulce in "The Great Way," a vehicle, as the benevolent padre Pedro, the loving, suffering human beings and amusing little boys of Terassa are vehicles of the subtlest propaganda of the fiction writer—persuading of the loveliness of people. The realm this writer's mind inhabits is neither modern America nor dusty and sun-baked Spain. He draws his colors, of the vividest, from a sunny Spanish hill town, it is true, from the bull ring of Barcelona, from word and trait of old priest, wayward girl, circus clown, or bandit. But it is not Spain, it is fiction one encounters here, suited in phrasing sometimes heavily ornate to its romantic content, in sharp contrast with the incisive literalness of a James Joyce in "Dubliners," for example, or even of Proust. If the passion of words causes Horace Fish at times to over-write, it also gives the richness of masterpieces to The Fighting Iris and The Horns of El Dilemma, stories less written than modeled out of the golden atmosphere of Barcelona with its rags and destitution, its gorgeous crowd, its black-garbed padre, and the vivid tragedy of the bull ring. Of Apasionada one can say only it is sheer music. This book of stories makes one wonder what Mr. Fish's progress will be—since another novel is already announced—whether farther into the sentiment of exotic realms, or toward the hastening, noisy, struggling modern world from which his spirit seems so distant. He is one to be watched, for he is now one of our most distinguished prosemen of fiction. HERBERT J. SELIGMANN

A Philosophical Detective Story

The Emperor's Old Clothes. By Frank Heller. Translated by Robert Emmons Lee. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $2.

WHEN the book in question is a novel which has no literary pretensions, but wants to be judged purely from the point of view of so-called "entertainment," then the question naturally is—especially in detective stories like this one—whether the idea is plausible, and whether the mystifying element, that is the suspense, is worked out well enough for the interest to be held to the end. And if these principles are adhered to, and the story is well written, then the book can lay claim to be called "good light fiction." But if in addition to all these points the author permeates his work with a delightful sense of humor, not too proud to joke on his own account, interpolating into the speech of his characters mellow bits of philosophy, then it becomes the duty of the reviewer to remove the book from the rank of light fiction and set it into a place of its own, not too far from the so-called serious books. This reviewer will not tell the story for fear of spoiling the pleasure of the reader. He will content himself with saying that it deals with the adventures of a writer of detective stories, a man of sedentary habits, who becomes conscience stricken over the fact that he has never witnessed a murder, nor even seen an honest-to-goodness burglar. If a philosophical romance is possible, there is no reason why there should not be a philosophical detective story. And that is what this is.

NATHAN ASCH

Gipsy Tales

Murdo. By Konrad Bercovici. Boni and Liveright. $2.

TO say that the short stories of Konrad Bercovici are better than the work of most of his contemporaries is to say little. In the Gipsy sagas which he relates is the breath of freedom, the rhythm of poetry, and the sense of intimacy that proves the close imaginative relationship between author and his wild creations. Such a combination is obviously impossible to him who finds subject matter in the current of civilized and humdrum life, and it is not for him who seeks to report the incidents observed in alien surroundings.

It is therefore a foregone conclusion that "Murdo" will have an enthusiastic reception from discriminating readers. Yet it is just as certain that the book will not enhance Mr. Bercovici's reputation. For "Murdo," valuable and interesting in itself, adds nothing to the stature of the author of "Ghitza"; it is an enlargement, not a growth. Moreover, the proportion of stories in this volume which are constructed rather than realized is an indication that Mr. Bercovici has now emptied the bin where the seeds of these tales were stored. Let us hope that the Death of Murdo is the last of his adventures, that he will not return like Sherlock Holmes or Mr. Dooley to sadden us with dull and trivial repetitions of former successes.

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

Books in Brief

The Poetical Works of Leigh Hunt. Edited by H. S. Milford. Oxford University Press, American Branch. $3.

This volume, in the admirable Oxford Poets series, is the first "fairly complete" edition of the verse of a minor poet who is also a minor essayist. The two minors come close to making a major.

Self Healing Through Autosuggestion. By Dr. C. F. Winbigler. American Library Service. $1.25.

The impression that one gets from this book is that Dr. Winbigler would have the reader believe that he, Dr. Winbigler, has just stepped down from the Olympic heights where he wrote what he calls his "large work on suggestion" in order to chat patronizingly with ordinary folk. At the end of the book he gives some formulae for the relief of insomnia and constipation and a few similar common ills. While M. Coué is mentioned but rarely in the text there is obvious similarity in much of the subject matter. Some of the physiological statements in the book are quaint.

English Words and their Background. By George H. McKnight, Ph.D. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

This is a most interesting book. Mr. McKnight makes the study of words a fascinating, romantic sort of adventure. He gives us no suffocating textbook, no philological dry rot, but shows rather how words "illustrate the cultural progress of the race, not only the development of the material elements of civilization, but the progress in knowledge and the changes that have affected modes of thought." Nor does he assume the role of a word dictator. Always accurate and scientific in his presentation, Mr. McKnight is able by means of suggestion and analogy to build up a story of words which, in their infinite possibilities, in their continual state of flux, make up a story of mankind.

International Relations Section

Japanese Students Show Their Opposition to Militarism

UPROAR and expressions of opposition from students took place at the inauguration ceremony of the Waseda University Gunji Kenkyu-dan (Society for the Study of Military Affairs) on May 10, last. As the Japan Chronicle tells the story,

> Several automobiles of the War Office carried about thirty army and navy officers to the school, including General Shirakawa, the Vice-Minister for War, Generals Nakashima and Ishimitsu, the commanders of the Imperial Guard Division and the First Division, Admiral Furukawa, the director of the education bureau of the Navy Office, Admiral Tsuneda, of the Naval General Staff, and others, their breasts shining with decorations. At the entrance of the university was hanging a flag with characters: "Down with Militarism! Capture the Meeting Hall! Anti-Society for the Study of Military Affairs." When the military officers were entering the hall of meeting, one of the anti-society members cried: "Behold those human butchers!" At the appointed time there was, besides the professors and seventy members of the society, an audience of nearly a thousand students.
>
> Professor Aoyagi, the president of the society, took the rostrum and began: "I——" A student from the audience completed the sentence with "—am a militarist." Loud laughter greeted this sally, which was followed by: "Be ashamed of yourself, Aoyagi!" "He feels no shame; he has sold his soul to the militarists." Professor Aoyagi turned pale, says the Asahi, but he courageously said that liberty and discipline never were in conflict. They (the members) were not proclaiming militarism, but nationalism. The rest of his speech was drowned in the noise. The military officers compressed their lips and looked darkly at the disorder. "Who admitted these swashbucklers into the students' school?" one cried. "Drag them out!" shouted others.
>
> Dr. Shiozawa then took the rostrum and said the audience misunderstood something. "Nothing whatever!" shouted the students.
>
> "Was not Marquis Okuma the president of the Soldiers' Friends Society?" asked Dr. Shiozawa. "Don't misrepresent the spirit of the marquis!" shouted the students. The doctor concluded his speech saying that militaristic national defense was international. Look at Russia. Look at America. They were devoting all their might.
>
> Dr. Takada [the new president of the university], who had been fidgeting in his chair with impatience, betook himself to the platform and gazed on the students fixedly. "Reflect, Takada!" the students shouted, "Have you forgotten the 16th year of Meiji?" (when he stoutly attacked militarism). Dr. Takada turned scarlet with anger and cried that a nation constitutionally governed should respect the liberty of speech at public meetings. He recounted the views of the late Marquis Okuma concerning the army, and said that when you saw the present condition of America which strongly advocates liberty and equality——("There! That's militarism." Another noise.) If there were militarism actually, it should be destroyed as soon as possible. It must be part of the business of the society. But, he cried, the Waseda University ought to be ashamed of their conduct. He returned to his seat trembling with excitement.
>
> General Shirakawa, the Vice-Minister of War, then read an address on behalf of the War Minister. A voice cried that blood was dripping from the decoration on the breast of the speaker. Another student sang: "Thousands die to raise one hero to fame." Then the members of the anti-society began to sing the school song in chorus. Several more officers made speeches, but they were drowned in the noise, and the meeting was closed at 4:20 p.m. in confusion.

The Japan Chronicle goes on to say that the opponents of the Society for the Study of Military Affairs at Waseda University, having converted the meeting of that society into a mild riot on May 10, called a meeting of their own two days later. They were in turn raided by the advocates of military advancement, and the interruptions led to blows. Six students were seriously injured.

The next day the Kensetsu-sha (Construction Society) of the university, having among its members some of the younger professors, including Messrs. Kitazawa Shinjiro, Oyama Ikuo, and Mr. Sano Manabu, called an emergency meeting and passed resolutions, in the course of which it was said:

> We disapprove of the attitude of Dr. Takada and Dr. Shiozawa at the inauguration of the Society for the Study of Military Affairs. They should be impeached in the presence of the Construction Society.
>
> The Society for the Study of Military Affairs invited militarists, including General Shirakawa, the Vice-Minister of War, to the inauguration ceremony. We have reason to suspect that the society has joined hands with the military clique, and has been made the cat's-paw of the militarists. The society should be accused.

Both the Mainichi and the Asahi state that the police are preparing for action against the Socialists at Waseda and other universities. The former paper makes special mention of the Waseda professors who are on the official black list for their socialistic activities, and it happens that three of them are those who supported the anti-militarist students in their protest against the manner of organizing the Society for the Study of Military Affairs at the University. The militarist students seem to have taken this as an encouragement to themselves and have demanded the punishment of professors and students who "inculcate unpatriotic ideas." The Mainichi states that the special higher section of the metropolitan police considers that four professors of the Waseda University, Messrs. Sano Gaku, Inomata Tsunao, Oyama Ikuo, and Kitazawa Shinnosuke, who are on the black list, have gone beyond the bounds of theoretical study of socialism, and entered into the practical movement. They are alleged to be developing a tendency to bolshevize Japanese students.

On account of the opposition to the Society for the Study of Military Affairs, its organizers at the Waseda University dissolved it, but were later understood to be looking toward reorganization. The Japan Chronicle has this to say of the scheme which has led to so much opposition:

> According to report, the scheme which is supposed to be under discussion between the War Office and the Educational Department, the Home Office and the Department of Agriculture and Commerce, consists not only in extending the term of obligatory education but administering thoroughgoing military education at the universities, middle schools, and elementary schools with the object of reducing the term of barrack service, officers in active service being dispatched to the schools for the purpose and the enforcement of the training being regulated by Imperial Ordinance or War Office Ordinance investing the army with full powers. If so, this would be an attempt at making preparatory military training a compulsory part of school education—at militarizing the nation rather than nationalizing the army.

The Japanese Cotton Mills

A SURVEY of labor conditions in the cotton mills of Japan has been made by a Japanese welfare agency, the Association for Harmonious Cooperation, an account of which appears in the Manchester Guardian as follows:

Four-fifths of the workers employed in Japanese spinning mills are women or girls, and of these nearly two-thirds are under the age of 20. Out of 177,476 women and girls employed in 1919, 79 were under 12 years, 32,722 were between 12 and 15 years, 79,656 between 15 and 20 years, and 65,016 over 20 years. The number of men and boys employed was 55,330, almost all over 15 years.

For more than ten years factory owners have been finding difficulty in obtaining women workers, partly through the rapid growth of the industry, partly through the short period the women work. Over 60 per cent of the workers are "recruited" through agents sent out by the owners, who receive so much a head, and who advance a sum to each worker recruited, which apparently is intended to bind them firmly to the employer.

In spite of this contract system and the fact that over two-fifths of the women employees and nearly a fourth of the male workers live in dormitories attached to the factories, the labor turnover is very high. Thus in 1921, in proportion to the 229,038 workers in cotton-spinning mills, discharges were 74.11 per cent and engagements 90.87 per cent.

Mills now run either 22 or 20 hours a day. The operatives work in alternate shifts, each of 11 to 12 hours, with 30 minutes' rest for meals and 15-minute breaks at 9 a.m. or 9 p.m. and 3 a.m. or 3 p.m. Four days' rest a month is given, and "there is an increasing tendency to adopt the Sunday rest system." As food is often supplied to the workers by the employer or by outside agents authorized by him, it is clear that something not far removed from the truck system exists.

Tuberculosis is very prevalent among the dormitory workers, although things are reported to be improving. "Owing to the low standard of education and the slow progress of any feeling of self-reliance among the women workers, very little headway has been made in the organization of workers in the industry." The only union of spinners in Japan has a membership of 200.

Factory Hours in Japan

IN its new regulations on the minimum working age Japan has followed the Washington Hours of Work Convention, says the Manchester Guardian. The working age is put at 14, but children over 12 can work when they have finished the course of an elementary school or if they are in employment when the act comes into force. This wipes out the provision of the Japanese law that children between 10 and 12 can be employed "in certain light and easy work."

But in its regulation of hours the new Japanese factory act falls far short of the Washington convention. It provides that children under 16 and women are not to be employed more than 11 hours a day, which is one hour less than at present; exception is made in the case of the silk industry. The Washington convention limited the hours of children under 15 years to 48 a week. The act places no limit on the hours of work of male workers over 16, or of male workers over 15 for the first three years, which, of course, means that for that period there need be no change. The Washington convention put a limit of 57 hours a week, except in the raw silk industry, which was allowed a 60-hour week.

The Washington convention insisted on a weekly rest period of 24 consecutive hours to all classes of workers The act makes no provision for male workers over 16 (or over 15 for three years), but gives two rest days a month to children under 16 (or 15) and women; women and children on night work are entitled to four rest days a month. Likewise there is no provision for rest intervals during work for men and boys over 16, but children and women are to have half an hour's rest for a 6-hour day and at least an hour for a 10-hour day.

On night work the Washington convention sought to secure the prohibition of all employment of children under 16 (or under 15 until July 1, 1925) and women for a period of 11 hours, including the interval between 10 p.m. and 5 a.m., but modified this for Japan to make the period 10 hours for a provisional term of three years. The act prohibits work between 10 p.m. and 5 a.m. for children under 16 (or 15 for three years) and women, but allows work up to 11 p.m. with the sanction of the authorities.

The World's Chief Navies

THE London Economist prints a tabulation of the navies of Great Britain, the United States, Japan, France, and Italy as they were on February 1, last. The return, which is based on a White Paper issued by the British Admiralty, omits obsolete ships. The following comparisons are shown:

| | | British Empire | U.S.A. | Japan | France | Italy |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Battleships ......... | Built .... | 18 | 30 | 11 | 9 | 9 |
| | Building. | 2 | 9 | 2 | 0 | 0 |
| Battle cruisers ...... | Built .... | 4 | 0 | 7 | 0 | 0 |
| | Building. | 0 | 4 | 2 | 0 | 0 |
| Cruisers ............ | Built .... | 2 | 10 | 0 | 6 | 3 |
| | Building. | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| Light cruisers ...... | Built .... | 48 | 9 | 15 | 5 | 10 |
| | Building. | 4 | 10 | 8* | 3 | 0† |
| Flotilla leaders...... | Built .... | 16 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 8 |
| | Building. | 2 | 0 | 0 | 6 | 3 |
| Torpedo-boat destroyers .............. | Built .... | 185 | 315 | 71 | 51 | 51 |
| | Building. | 4 | 0 | 17§ | 12 | 8 |
| Submarines ......... | Built .... | 66 | 104 | 40 | 47 | 42 |
| | Building. | 8 | 27 | 11‖ | 13 | 0‡ |
| Gunboat and dispatch vessels ........... | Built .... | 0 | 4 | 4 | 72 | 9 |
| | Building. | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 |

Of her battleships, the United States is to scrap, under the Washington treaty, eight of those actually built and seven of those building, while five are on sale and being dismantled. This brings her battleship strength (built and building) down to 19, as against the British Empire's 20. Under the Washington treaty Japan is to scrap five of the existing and the two building battleships; she is also to scrap three battle cruisers, and to convert into aircraft carriers the two battle cruisers now building. Similarly, the United States is to scrap the four battle cruisers now under construction.

In light cruisers, the British total is large; but an outstanding feature of the table is America's tremendous preponderance in torpedo-boat destroyers. In submarines also she has a big lead. The White Paper does not tell us how many of the various classes of vessels are actually manned and in commission. Another important point about the above table is drawn attention to in our footnotes. In the Japanese list, in addition to the vessels built or building, six light cruisers, 21 torpedo-boat destroyers, and 28 submarines are projected. The latest date of completion of the vessels to be scrapped under the Washington treaty by the United States (apart, of course, from vessels now building) is 1909; while the torpedo-boat destroyers show a rather remarkable number of American craft of this type completed between 1919 and 1922.

---

* Not including six projected. † Two are projected. ‡ Four projected. § Not including 21 projected. ‖ Not including 28 projected.

HOW TO SELECT SAFE BONDS

The 8 Differences Between Safe and Unsafe Bonds

THERE are 8 requirements that every bond must have to insure the safety of the investor's funds.

If a bond will pass every one of these 8 tests it may be identified as presenting the maximum of safety to the investor. If a bond will not pass one or more of these tests, it is lacking in the elements of safety that every conservative investor should insist upon.

These are the differences between safe and unsafe investments—the elements that characterize the difference between the successful and haphazard investing of funds.

Every Forman Bond has passed fully these 8 tests. Absolute proof of the safety of Forman Bonds is the successful handling of the funds of thousands of investors over a period of 38 years without the loss of one cent to any customer.

Out of this long and successful experience we have published an interesting booklet "How To Select Safe Bonds" which tells how to make the 8 tests that prove the safety of every investment. Every investor, large or small should have a copy of this booklet. With it you will not only be able to test the safety of every investment scientifically, but you will be enabled to secure a larger income without any sacrifice of safety.

YOURS—FREE MAIL THIS COUPON

We have a limited edition of this book. It will be mailed only to those who ask for copies on the request blank below. Fill in, tear out and mail today.

GEORGE M. FORMAN & CO.
105 W. MONROE ST. CHICAGO
38 Years Without Loss to a Customer

George M. Forman & Co.
Dept. 947, 105 W. Monroe St.
Chicago, Ill.

Please mail me without cost or obligation a copy of your booklet "How To Select Safe Bonds." No solicitor is to call on me.

Name__________

Address__________

City__________ State__________

Practically immediate relief of pain follows a dose of

Midol

It is equally efficacious for

HEADACHE
TOOTHACHE NEURALGIA

—and in addition to being absolutely safe to take —it has no undesirable after effects.

In aluminum boxes
2 sizes. At all druggists

General Drug Co.
94 N. Moore Street, New York

THE SOUL OF WOMAN

A study of woman's mental and moral tendencies of the highest value, by the daughter of the famous Italian anthropologist, Cesare Lombroso.

By GINA LOMBROSO Price, $2.50 E. P. DUTTON & CO

IMPERIAL WASHINGTON is the story of American public life from 1870 to 1920. It is by R. F. Pettigrew, for twelve years Senator from South Dakota. "Revelations from such a source are well-nigh unique. . . . It is a stirring human document, irresistible in many of its facts and in its fervor." So says The Nation's reviewer. Cloth, 440 pages, $1.25 postpaid. Book catalog free. Charles H. Kerr & Company, 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago.

In Next Week's Nation, Dated July 18,

A Story
By
Sholom Asch

THE RUSSIAN INN
83 West 37th St., nr. 5th Ave., New York
Table d'Hote Luncheon and Dinner
also A la Carte. Open till 1 A. M.
Music by the Russian Inn Trio

"BELL SYSTEM"
AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
One Policy, One System, Universal Service, and all directed toward Better Service

STEINWAY
THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS

WANTED: Lady to share beautiful studio apartment in vicinity of 56th Street and 5th Avenue. Moderate rental. Address Box 180, c/o The Nation.

Bind your copies of
The Nation

in a strongly made, cloth covered binder. A convenient and orderly way in which to keep each volume of The Nation as completed.

Sent postpaid for $1.15

20 Vesey Street New York City

SIDNEY PHILLIPS
BUYS AND SELLS
Etchings Prints and Books Paintings
7 West 51st St. New York City

GERMAN BOOKS NEW and OLD Large Representative Stock at
BEYER'S BOOKSHOP
207 FULTON ST., Opp. Terminal, Upstairs, NEW YORK

JUL 17 1923
PUBLIC LIBRARY

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 18, 1923 No. 3028

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS.... 47
EDITORIALS:
What Is a Third Party?.... 50
The Newspaper Game.... 51
Heroes .... 51
The Servant Problem Solved.... 52
WOMAN'S 75-YEAR FIGHT. By Alice Stone Blackwell.... 53
BEFORE THE PAN-AMERICAN BAR. By Pierre Hudicourt.... 54
THE "LOG" UNSEATS "MARK HOPKINS." By Fred Lewis Pattee.. 55
THE PEOPLE LET DOWN. By William Hard.... 58
THE WILES OF DESTINY. By Sholom Asch.... 59
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.... 61
CORRESPONDENCE .... 71
SWALLOWS PASS THROUGH ROME. By Leonora Speyer.... 63
BOOKS:
Life and Letters of Elizabeth Cady Stanton. By Martha Gruening.. 63
A Cheerful Russian Poet. By Roy Temple House.... 64
Three Critics. By Samuel C. Chew.... 65
Being Respectable. By Katharine Sergeant Angell.... 66
A Malicious Panorama. By John W. Crawford.... 66
Books in Brief.... 66
MUSIC:
The Symphony Players. By Allan Lincoln Langley.... 67
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Russia's Economic Revival. By Alexander M. Krasnoschokov.... 69
Joffe in Japan.... 70
May Day in Mexico.... 71

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT ERNEST H. GRUENING
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY, Managing Editor
JOHN MACY, Literary Editor
IRITA VAN DOREN, Advertising Manager
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON ANATOLE FRANCE H. L. MENCKEN
FRIEDRICH WILHELM FOERSTER ROBERT HERRICK
CARL VAN DOREN NORMAN THOMAS

Subscription Rates—Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: Ernest Thurtle, 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N. W. 4, England.

THE British Government does not seem to find its experiment in diplomacy by catechism very successful. Trying to get from M. Poincaré plain answers to plain questions is like calling spirits from the vasty deep. The precision of a cross-examination in a court of justice is altogether alien to the style of negotiation most in favor in foreign offices. The Pope's intervention may ultimately achieve something, in spite of France's polite suggestion that His Holiness should mind his own business. Though technically he may have no status in international politics, if a ministry of reconciliation is none of his business, what is? Meanwhile, it is abundantly clear that what troubles France, in the Ruhr situation, is not sporadic bomb-throwings and sabotage, which she can readily cope with, but passive resistance, for which there is no effective weapon in her armory. It is comparatively easy, if you are physically the more powerful, to compel your antagonist to stop fighting or working, but it needs more than the stronger arm to induce him to stop not fighting or not working. How confidently we have been assured, of late years, that patient and persistent abstention from violence is a wholly futile method of gaining one's point! Yet here is the Ruhr population practicing this method with such tenacity that the most powerful government in Continental Europe has to confess herself nonplussed. "Abandon your Quakerism," she says in effect, "and then we will begin to talk."

TURKEY wins. That is the significance of the peace signed at Lausanne. Almost nothing is left of the Treaty of Sèvres. Great Britain agrees to evacuate Constantinople and Chanak; the warships, arms, and munitions now in the hands of Allied forces are restored to Turkey; and no mention is made of the Ottoman debt. Turkey is left to settle that with the bondholders—and it is understood that they will agree to payment in French francs. The Armenians are entirely forgotten, but Allied concessions are the subject of a protocol. This treaty is as great a triumph for the Turks as the Anatolian campaign. What its effect upon Europe will be is still a question. At least it means peace where war seemed imminent. Following so closely the overthrow of the Francophile Stambuliiski Government in Bulgaria it involves a profound realignment of forces in the Near East.

The fundamental fact in the anthracite coal problem is that heretofore these limited and exhaustible natural deposits have been in the absolute private possession of their legal owners to be developed at will, to be leased for such royalties as could be exacted, to be transferred and distributed at such rates and in such manner as a double-headed railroad and coal combination might find most advantageous from the point of view of private profit, to be sold at such prices as could be maintained by the restriction of output and elimination of independent competitors through such means as maintenance of freight rates, burdensome except to those who, owning both mines and railroads, could afford to be indifferent as to whether their revenues came from the one source or the other.—United States Coal Commission Report on the Anthracite Industry.

THE Coal Commission's report frankly recognizes that such a limited natural monopoly as coal cannot be treated as a private concern of the few owners but must be supervised by the government. That marks forward progress. The commission suggests "the creation of a governmental authority with power to require financial and operating reports, to prescribe uniform accounting, and to determine the conditions on which coal may be shipped in interstate commerce." That, we believe, would be only an entering wedge; further steps in public control would inevitably follow. Such a permanent fact-finding commission as this report suggests would, however, help the necessary process of public education. We are not much concerned with the commission's suggestion that the President be authorized to seize and operate the mines in case of a strike; we doubt if Congress would vote such authorization before the event, and if it did the act would only serve to emphasize the need of greater public control at all times.

PRESIDENT HARDING has gone to Alaska. There was something almost provocative in his last days in Oregon. In Portland—while the law officers were arresting fifty men and women who had sufficient of the spirit of 1776 in their veins to protest against the continued imprisonment on American soil of men whose sole crime was their opinions—he made a Fourth of July address which included an attack upon men "seeking to destroy American institutions," which was obviously the lowest kind of pandering to class prejudice against the I.W.W. The next day he stopped at Centralia to lay a wreath upon the tombs of the Legion men who were killed in what has since been disclosed as a Legion attack upon the local I.W.W. headquarters. And finally, on the same day when he was denouncing, as if it came from immigrants, the "gospel of envy and hate," he accepted with sweet words Judge Gary's cheap promise to use "every effort" to abolish the twelve-hour day in the steel mills "at the earliest time practicable"! (It is curious that Judge Gary, who has insisted that so few men worked twelve hours in the steel mills, now feels that reduction of the working hours would require 60,000 more workers.)

ELEVEN of the twenty-seven political prisoners granted conditional amnesty by President Harding have refused to accept it on his terms. His requirement of a pledge to be loyal and law-abiding seemed an insult to these men. We have seen no finer statement of their position than that contained in a letter from "Red" Doran to Mrs. Anna N. Davis of Brookline, Massachusetts:

> Had Christ accepted Pilate's offer there would have been no crucifixion. The tragedy at Calvary gave Christianity to the world. Luther at the Diet gave life to that which became the Reformation, when he refused to smother that "wee sma' voice" within and conform. George Fox gave new force to the same thing, Truth, when he refused to remove his hat in the English courts. Gandhi smashed one of the most intolerable barriers when he followed the dictates of conscience, and as a result the caste system in India crumbled. In the light of such inspiring precedent, surely I can stand by my conscience and contribute my small mite to the noble end seen by the greatest of men. I refused the "conditions" on principle solely. Any "condition" would be for me a degradation which my standard would not permit me to indulge. Do you recall Emerson's "A genuine act explains itself and explains your other genuine acts"? Conformity explains nothing. Of one thing I am certain to my satisfaction: that the greater joy comes from being square with oneself, because thus one knows Truth. Truth is a growing thing: it expands and presents new facets as one advances one's acquaintance with it. The trouble with the church brand of Christianity is that it has always been a game conducted on the profit basis. Be a "good" man or woman and you'll get to Heaven. Here's a reward, a material advantage, offered to be "good" Why not be humanly good and decent because it is good to be good? That's what Christ lived.
>
> Leavenworth Prison, June 28 J. T. DORAN

NEWS that a group of "leading citizens" resent President Harding's order that Negro doctors, dietitians, dentists, and X-ray specialists attend the Negro ex-service men to be cared for in the new Federal hospital at Tuskegee, Alabama, is surprising. In another mood these Southerners bade the Negro serve himself and passed a law prohibiting the attendance of white nurses upon Negro patients. Can it be that the hysterical delicacy of the white man has been calmed by the dollar sign? The United States Treasury allotted $2,250,000 to this hospital. The physician in charge is to receive $10,000 per year, according to the Omaha, Nebraska, Monitor, and will supervise a yearly budget of $1,250,000. The Atlanta Independent (colored) says, " . . . in every matter pertaining to the hospital, the white man has had only one point in view, the economic end." He is also consumed with fear—not physical fear of shell-shocked Negroes, but fear of any change in the status of the races, fear of the spectacle of trained Negroes successfully treating 600 Negro patients. On July 3 hooded Klansmen paraded the streets of Tuskegee as a silent threat. The Montgomery Advertiser helped fan the flames by announcing, as if it were predicting, that "there has been no overt act, no clash as yet between the races." The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has telegraphed President Harding asking that troops be sent to protect the colored doctors and Major R. R. Moton, successor to Booker T. Washington, whose life has been threatened by masked mobs. Some members of the Tuskegee staff have already fled North. Will the South still deny its own responsibility for the northward exodus of self-respecting Negroes?

IN another part of the South a Southern jury has gone far to rehabilitate confidence in Southern justice. Martin Tabert of North Dakota was a white boy, but he fell victim to a convict-leasing system from which Negroes suffer even more, and the same forces which make it well-nigh impossible to convict lynchers in the South fought to exonerate Thomas W. Higginbotham, the whipping boss who flogged Tabert to death. The Lake City, Florida, jury which convicted him of second-degree murder carried on the work of the legislature which swept the leasing system from its statute-book. The jurors honored Florida and themselves.

ONE more lie has been nailed. Frederick H. Gibbs, of Gibbs Bros., who reconditioned the Leviathan, declares flatly that the elaborate stories of German sabotage of the big ship just before the United States entered the war are myths. The former Vaterland, he says, was damaged in backing away from her pier at Hoboken on her second trip in 1914. He explains:

> The ship was new and the crew had not had time to become expert in handling her. Too much steam was turned on in backing out and the boat shot across the river, almost crashing into a Southern Pacific pier. One of the astern turbines was badly damaged and there were other damages. The German crew attempted repairs but they were badly handicapped, lacking materials that could be had only in Germany. In this work some machinery was dismantled. Although it was still dismantled when the vessel was taken over by the United States there was no evidence of malicious sabotage.

A naval officer who apparently was responsible for much of the newspaper excitement about the sabotage in 1917 contradicts Mr. Gibbs. He says, however, that

> The Leviathan probably was the least damaged by sabotage of any of the seized German ships. This was due to the fact that her commander supervised her building and simply could not bear to see his beloved ship injured.

This sounds a little lame to us. We are, indeed, so skeptical that we should not be surprised to hear that all the sabotage tales were Hoboken fish stories, invented in the homely saloons that used to line River Street.

AS an example of the enterprise of modern news agencies in spreading enlightenment about foreign affairs one may cite one of the first items published here concerning the recent conference of the British Labor Party. An Associated Press cablegram from London reported that "a capital levy on a graduated scale on fortunes from £5,000 upward became an integral part of the Labor Party's program today." In many of our daily papers appropriate headlines made sure that the most casual reader should not miss the significance of this notable departure in Labor policy. Nothing, evidently, escapes the vigilance of the A. P.'s London office—except such trifles as that the same proposal, identical even in the sum fixed for the exemption limit, was one of the most prominent planks in the Labor Party's platform at last year's election. Will not the New York correspondent of some London paper reciprocate by cabling across that Senator Lodge has become a convert to the policy of American abstention from the League of Nations?

BRITISH airplanes, sent to bomb villages of the recalcitrant Waziris on the Afghan border of India the other day, lost their bearings and bombed instead an Afghan village on the other side of the frontier, effectively destroying men, women, children, and cattle. This distressed the Afghans so much that the British Government felt constrained to issue a handsome apology. Lord Curzon, who recently complained of anti-British propaganda conducted by the Bolsheviks in Afghanistan, may well have felt that his own airmen were going the Russians one better. While Mr. Hughes proclaims new regulations for air war, and the Franco-British air rivalry fills the columns of the press, it would perhaps not be out of place to attempt to put ourselves in the place of the Afghans and Waziris and to meditate with them upon the marvels of Western civilization. The British use their planes to bomb Waziris, Hottentots, and Arabs; the French use theirs against African tribes; we Americans bomb Haitian villages with ours. We are all of us, we "civilized peoples," bullies and thugs.

WE are more than that; we are hypocrites. Last week The Nation referred to the controversy in Kenya Colony, British East Africa, where 9,000 Englishmen rule 2,000,000 black Africans, and are fighting to bar 30,000 Indians from civil rights. These Englishmen are of the dominant Nordic, Anglo-Saxon type which America celebrates in the Saturday Evening Post, in Arrow-collar advertisements, and in Ku Klux Klan demonstrations. They plead the necessity for their control on the ground of superior interest in the welfare of the natives, just as we justify lynchings, tar-and-featherings, and the conquest of Haiti and Nicaragua on similar moral grounds. And then comes such a revelation of the indecency of the kind of man who pleads the "white man's burden" as this Reuter dispatch from Nairobi, in the Kenya Colony:

> A painful affair, which resulted in the death of a native farm worker up country, has aroused general indignation here. It is alleged that the native concerned rode a mare in foal without permission, thus causing the animal's death, and that the European owner of the farm, a settler at Molo, was so enraged that he and three assistants thrashed the culprit, with the result that the man died.

THOMAS REED POWELL, professor of constitutional law at Columbia University, and Dr. Henry A. Ladd of Oxford have withdrawn their acceptance of positions in the Amherst College faculty next year as a consequence of the forced resignation of President Meiklejohn. It is to be hoped that other men who care for academic standards will show the same independence. It requires courage, particularly for young men who have not yet established positions, to make such refusals. The academic blacklist has outlasted most war-time atrocities; men who stood for freedom in 1917 still find themselves barred from the universities. Men who stand out against the medieval-minded trustees of one college are unlikely to be welcomed by the purse-holders elsewhere. Four professors have just been dismissed from the University of Tennessee, it is reported, because they expressed sympathy with Professor James W. Sprowls, removed last spring for teaching evolution and recommending "The Mind in the Making" to his students, and petitioned the American Association of College Professors to investigate Dr. Sprowls's dismissal.

NO man living is more competent than Graham Wallas to discuss "the art of political thought," and Dartmouth College has been fortunate in securing him to deliver its alumni lectures on that subject this summer. It is on the necessity of creative thinking in politics and social matters that he has laid most stress during his course. He sees civilization in danger of collapse if it continues to proceed by "the blind animal method of trial and error" instead of developing, by conscious effort of will, powers and processes of creative thought for the guidance of society. While as pessimistic as Bertrand Russell in his reading of the present situation, Professor Wallas is more hopeful for the future. The body of knowledge concerning the control of civilization by rationalized human purpose is so vastly greater than ever before that, in his opinion, no such complete débâcle as befell Rome can overtake the world today. "It is impossible now," he reminds us, "for any one great catastrophe such as the burning of the Alexandrian Library to wipe out of existence the entire accumulation of human knowledge." And, whereas the fall of Rome meant the fall of the world, there are now "islands of civilization"—America, for instance—which can remain for a long period unaffected by catastrophes that may overwhelm many other nations. Such consolations, however, do not absolve us from the duty of so developing our processes of thought as to build a better civilized life. Professor Wallas puts his finger on the source of many of our troubles when he declares that we have scarcely begun to use the imagination in our social and political thinking.

TO be President of the United States is not a normal ambition of boyhood, despite some belief to the contrary. Most city boys would prefer to be policemen or "smoke eaters," while country lads, constrained to pick up potatoes and feed the chickens, long to run the twine-binder or look down on the rest of the world from the driver's seat of a tractor. And all boys, city or country, have a consuming desire to hold the throttle of a locomotive. They cannot understand why these pleasures should be denied them merely because they do not understand the machines. But take notice, boys, that on his recent transcontinental journey a certain Warren Gamaliel Harding, of Washington, D. C., was in Kansas allowed to drive a tractor—without knowing how, and in Montana was privileged to run a locomotive engine—likewise without training. Apparently the sole reason was because he was President of the United States. There may be something in this job of President at which no boy should turn up his nose, especially since—once elected—he is allowed to turn on the power whether he understands the machinery or not. Does not the explanation of Mr. Harding's whole administration lie in the fact that, as with the tractor and the locomotive engine, he has swung blithely into the driver's seat and cheerfully undertaken to run the nation without knowing how?

What Is a Third Party?

WHEN Theodore Parker was thundering against slavery in Boston in days when anti-slavery was by no means a popular issue, some wise friend placidly assured him that slavery would disappear in God's good time. "The trouble is," Parker replied, according to the legend, "that God isn't in a hurry, and I am." The advocates of a third party in the United States are very much in Parker's position; they are in a hurry, but the mysterious tides of public opinion are not.

Outwardly the hope of a third party is very slight indeed. Yet it may be fortunate that the recent "Unity Convention" of the Farmer-Labor Party at Chicago did not achieve more unanimity of purpose. That convention, to which various farm and labor organizations were invited, was captured by radicals who were ready to cooperate even with the Communists. The result was the formation under new leadership of a Federated Farmer-Labor Party, leaving a part of the old guard of the Farmer-Labor Party to continue its separate way under the old and simpler name. The Socialists held aloof from the beginning. Obviously groups which maintain such mutual suspicion and show such utter incapacity for cooperation are not ripe to act except as leagues for political education.

But while the individuals who preach a third party see little return for their efforts, there is an undertow that is cutting into the old parties. The danger may even be less that the organization of third-party sentiment may be too slow than that it may be too fast. While those who should be building from the ground up are squabbling with each other, the Fords and the Hearsts, whose only real difference from the old parties is that the old-party machines will not take them in, may run away with the third-party spirit and discredit the whole enterprise as effectively as Theodore Roosevelt did when he converted the progressive groundswell into a personal Roosevelt party in 1912.

The Nation's readers are well aware that we are not interested in the formation of a third party simply in order to have a three-cornered fight. The essential is to force into our political campaigns discussion of those fundamental economic issues that are the promise and the peril of American life. We want to avoid the empty futility of another Harding-Cox campaign. We want to make it impossible for a candidate to dodge issues as President Harding has done on his Western trip. We want to hear candidates discuss the railroad issue as if they had convictions, not as if they were tossing a hot potato from one hand to the other. We should like to see a candidate less occupied in proving to the farmers that he had enabled them to get deeper into debt than ever before in their history than in suggesting ways of getting out of debt. We want voters to have an opportunity to make a real choice, and to be in a mood to use their opportunity effectively.

The encouraging aspect of the political situation in this country today is the prevalence of this restless mood. However feeble may be the efforts to organize discontent with the old parties, the discontent is there. Voters who have always voted as their grandfathers voted are today as cynical about Republican promises and Democratic pledges as a Socialist soap-box orator. The Western elections last autumn revealed an extraordinarily independent selection of progressive candidates regardless of party; the popularity of the Ford candidacy, however misguided the Ford partisans may be, registers the same unreadiness to follow the old hacks of politics.

Minnesota provides food for political reflection. The Senatorial election there is admittedly a fight between Governor Jacob Preus, inheritor of Knute Nelson's Republican mantle, and Magnus Johnson, standard-bearer of the Farmer-Labor Party. The Democratic candidate is as assuredly out of the running as a Prohibition Party nominee for President, and the political wiseacres seem to be hinting at another Farmer-Labor victory. Governor Preus has been struggling to make his a personal campaign and to keep national issues out of sight. President Harding offered to speak in his behalf, but was zealously kept out of the State. He was not even permitted to write a letter in behalf of his party's candidate. Indeed, one of the leading Republicans of Minnesota told newspaper correspondents that if the Senatorial election this month were a Presidential fight, President Harding, to whom Minnesota gave a larger majority in 1920, relatively, than any other State, would be overwhelmingly defeated.

This Farmer-Labor Party in Minnesota is a State organization, distinct from and little concerned with the disputes of the Farmer-Laborites in Chicago. It represents the producers' class-consciousness which is the backbone of the whole Northwestern progressive movement. It represents a movement which men who still hold to the old parties recognize as their movement, and their outspoken sympathy is as significant as the movement in Minnesota itself. Senator La Follette is the leader of the Republican Party in the neighboring State of Wisconsin, but he is doing all he can to defeat the Republican nominee in Minnesota and to elect Magnus Johnson, who would be of his progressive bloc in Congress. Senator Wheeler of Montana is a Democrat according to party label, yet he is ignoring the Democratic nominee and stumping Minnesota for Johnson. Throughout a dozen States progressives in the old parties have realized the unimportance of party names and are working together, with or without the name and organization of a party, for common economic ends. The standpatters have always done that; the progressives are only beginning to stand together.

There, after all, is the essence of a third party. The business of organization, of converting labor to the belief that it can be helped only if it will help continuously and systematically, will take time. But the outward form of organization is less important than the existence of this readiness of forward-looking men of like minds but different affiliations to cooperate for a common economic program. Where that spirit exists the third party is already a living thing.

The political leaders who are the symbols of this independence of spirit will bear a grave responsibility in the coming year. It may today be more important to cultivate this inter-party cooperation than to move toward the crystallization of a third party. But crystallization may be too long deferred. The vague third-party sentiment instinctively looks for a leader, for a definition of its aims and intentions. If those whose record gives them a right to claim the political loyalty of liberals, progressives, and radicals in America do not soon take the lead, less worthy men are likely to take it from them.

The Newspaper Game

SIXTY years of editorial work for one newspaper! That is the record of Sir John Merry Lesage, who has just retired as managing editor of the London Daily Telegraph. Sixty years' work of any sort for any number of persons—that in itself would be worth celebrating. But sixty years' work in one place, and that a newspaper——

Ho, hum! It makes the American newspaperman rub his eyes and ask, Can it be true? The average scribe on Park Row who has lived half of Sir John's eighty-six years has been hired and fired so many times that he has lost count. Sometimes he has worked for nearly every "sheet" in New York, not to speak of several in other cities, and often he has been on and off the same newspaper three or four times. Uncertainty of tenure is the great tragedy of the modern wage-worker, but the position of the American journalist in that regard is probably more pathetic than that of any other worker of whom a similar amount of mental ability and vigor is demanded. Clean, or almost clean, sweeps of the editorial personnel are periodic in some newspaper "shops," even without change of ownership or policy, and the hundred and one occasions that may lead to the dropping or resignation of an individual worker are notorious. At the time in life when a lawyer, a merchant, a farmer, or even a teacher feels that he has attained some security and position in his work, an experienced and faithful journalist is likely to find himself on the street some evening with a few days' pay in his pocket and the necessity of going forth hat in hand to hunt another job on terms laid down by somebody else. A recent dispatch, chronicling the death of a journalist forty-six years of age, spoke of him as a veteran newspaperman!

Do they order those things better in Fleet Street than on Park Row? Or is Sir John just a rare exception? For that matter there are rare exceptions here. It used to be said of the old Sun—the luminary of the Danas—that after a man had served a probationary period of two years his job was good for life provided he could keep sober until the paper went to press in the morning. To this day the New York World takes pride in long service among its employees. At the celebration this year of the fortieth anniversary of the purchase of the paper by Joseph Pulitzer there were ten persons on its rolls whose service covered the entire period, although few were of the editorial staff. Two of these men had reached the half-century mark. The men with a service record of twenty-five years have organized a Quarter Century Club. Until a few years ago the New York Evening Post was a place where few resigned and fewer still left in more summary fashion. Even today there are four who have worked there in an editorial capacity for from thirty-two to fifty-three years. The fifty-three-year man is J. Ranken Towse, the dramatic editor. Henry T. Finck, the music critic, has forty-two years to his credit, and Charles Pike Sawyer, who writes The Mirror of the Stage, has thirty-seven years. Arthur F. J. Crandall has held for thirty-two years the post of news editor, one of the hardest and most nerve-racking jobs in the office.

But those are the rare exceptions; the rule is otherwise. And that is one reason—perhaps the most important—why every newspaperman who has reached middle age does his best to dissuade any youngster from entering journalism. It is the worst occupation in the world, he says—and comes near to believing it. It is a tradition that everyone should—and the best do—get out of journalism before passing forty. Nobody insists so vehemently that the best journalists never fail to do this as the individual who himself has not accomplished it. He is wrong. The wisest men may get out early, but the best *newspaper*men stay on; stay on because they can't help it. Richard Harding Davis once described a good newspaperman as one who believed that the sun rose each morning solely to supply light for a waiting world to read his journal. And what every newspaperman knows is that he is what he is because he is unwilling to be anything else. The true journalist is like an old fire-horse. He may retire or be retired to still waters and green pastures, but when he smells smoke he would give the remaining years of his life to race with the others to the scene. A newspaperman of forty believes mighty little in this world and less in the next, but if he ever gives a thought to heaven at all it is not as a place of harps and halos and eternal rest; it is with the hope that he may be able to persuade the good Lord to let him cover the Day of Judgment for the Celestial Gazette. It ought to be a pippin of a story.

The average newspaper office is thick with cynicism, and every journalist is its prophet. Yet there must be something else in the work than disillusion. The journalist does not call his occupation a profession, or a business, or a trade. Mostly he speaks of it as the "newspaper game." And somehow the game must be worth the candle, for, unlike some other occupations, journalism is not cluttered with dead wood nor troubled to find fresh timber as the years go on. The best young men, as they leave our schools and colleges, clamor at its portals. In these post-commencement days they are besieging, dozens of them every day, the anterooms of the metropolitan newspapers, hoping that even in the humblest capacity they may get a chance.

Treat them kindly, these young men; for they are the evidence that your jobs and ours are worth the while—despite our firm conviction to the contrary! They and Sir John Merry Lesage rise up to confound our pessimism; to prove that there is something more in the newspaper game than we old cynics who curse it and belittle it—yet stick to it!—ever realize.

Heroes

THE protagonists of the most famous modern novels of American origin are a queer lot. There is hardly a safe or sane citizen, male or female, among them. These creatures of the imagination whose characters and experiences have spoken so obviously and so directly to and for millions of hearts and minds, how shabby and problematic they are, how little they seem to illustrate Mr. Stuart P. Sherman's definition of moral idealism!

The mischief started long ago. Mrs. Edith Wharton was given an honorary doctorate by Yale the other day; nothing is more certain than that the university honored itself in the act. She has been famous so long that the Yale trustees probably forgot the kind of men and women who peopled her exquisite and unsurpassed early stories, that they forgot that dainty derelict, Lily Bart, and the scathing satire of Main Street implicit in every syllable of the story of Undine Spragg. "The House of Mirth" appeared in 1905. The definitive publication of "Sister Carrie" took place in 1908. For some years the public that had any intelligence or taste was almost exclusively absorbed in the doings of those people, from Carrie Meeber to Eugene Witla, whose behavior Professor Sherman has likened to that of the animals. What, in truth, most readers felt was that Dreiser, above all else, showed the difference between man and the animals by illustrating how the human love-life is immitigably implicated with the higher nerve-centers and thus tends to make or break the whole man.

Dreiser's protagonists were, from any safe and sane point of view, a sorry lot. There is no denying the fact. But their progeny has not improved. Carol Kennicott would have said that moral idealism was precisely what the national genius didn't show in Gopher Prairie; George F. Babbitt knew in his inmost heart that it was the "bunk" of the sort of moral idealism that was fed him that had prevented him from doing a single thing he really wanted to do in all his life! And that was what Lee Randon, the Philadelphia manufacturer who bought a doll and called it Cytherea, felt no less. He wasn't living his own life but one that had been imposed on him from without. At the same time in the prairies of Nebraska Claude Wheeler felt something incurably external and ignoble in the life and the moral atmosphere about him and, but for the brute accident of the war, would probably have come to grief through an adventure with some Jennie Gerhard if not with some Savina Grove.

Extreme cases, like those of Mr. John Webster, who manufactured washing-machines in Wisconsin, may be omitted. You may avert your face from the Greenwich Villagers so sharply etched by C. Kay Scott in "Sinbad." The fact remains that the heroes of the best American novels by the best American authors are all, from a plainly conventional aspect, no better than they should be. The national genius as defined by Mr. Sherman does not speak through them. There isn't one of them who, if the truth were known, would be permitted to teach beside Mr. Sherman in a reputable American college; even Randon made himself socially impossible by that desperate episode with Savina Grove.

But something must speak very powerfully through these people, something that, whether it conforms to Mr. Sherman's national genius or not, affects profoundly hundreds of thousands of the most intelligent and sensitive people who make up this nation. Well, all of these characters, even the disreputable Eugene Witla, even the heavy, fleshy, blundering George F. Babbitt, are in some sort dreamers and seekers. They are unhappy; they are dissatisfied. They are all looking for a better life; they are all looking for some kind of salvation. Perhaps that is moral idealism; perhaps that and not the discipline of a narrowly interpreted national past. And perhaps the sort of moral idealism that these Babbitts and Randons and Witlas and Wheelers illustrate is a sort of idealism which is human rather than national, the sort that has driven men whom the respectables of their age and country always held to be outcasts and even jail-birds into strange adventures before now and whose feet it has always set upon untraveled paths. Perhaps there is indeed a great deal of moral idealism in America. Only it is not the moral idealism of conformity and possession but the moral idealism of adventure and creation, not of the professors but of the prophets who have always denounced the Zion of their day, have never been at ease in it, have always sought to destroy and then to build anew.

The Servant Problem Solved

WHILE unemployment in England keeps the press and the public and the Parliament busy for three days in the week, an acute shortage of labor occupies their minds for the other four. The shortage is in only one field—domestic service—but it is severe enough to have occasioned a parliamentary inquiry to discover why, when thousands are out of work, no one will be a servant. The answers have been many: Teachers are teaching girls to despise domestic work; they are learning dancing and music instead of dusting and making beds. They have no place in which to see young men to whom they are engaged, in fact they have no place in which to become engaged. They are tired of being called by their first names. They are looked down upon by shop-girls and factory workers. They decline "living in"—their hours are too long; there are too few electric washers in England, too much scrubbing and too many coal stoves.

Well, these and dozens of other factors may have their share of responsibility for the walkout from the British kitchen, but without having been invited to testify we harbor our own ideas as to the real reason. We would banish these complaining lady-employers. Take the mistress out of the home and the maid will go into it. An intensive study of the "want ads" in our own newspapers reveals the fact that a large and increasing number of women advertising for domestic positions want to work in the home of a "business couple." They want to work where they are not forever under orders and forever under foot. They want to act as something less ignoble than a small auxiliary motor in a showy three-masted schooner—doing the grubby, necessary work and getting neither admiration nor credit. They want, in short, a real and responsible and honorable job—and they can be sure of it only when they are alone in the house.

We may be suspected of using this argument as a mere pretext for forcing middle-class women into business and the professions. But no; we recognize the fact that some women like domestic work, and that many more don't know how to do anything else. What, then, we may be asked, are such women to do? It is a knotty problem. Our only suggestion is that they had best go out themselves and find employment in other women's kitchens—providing, of course, that they have left home as well—leaving their own houses in the hands of competent, hired houseworkers. Then at least they will be out of the way and will in turn be earning an honest living. They will feel more pride in their own work and have more respect for the work of other working women. There is food for thought in this idea.

Meanwhile, lacking our advice, things go from bad to worse in England. The unemployed, poor and rich, their numbers augmented by these wilful domestic strikers, threaten the foundations of society. We hope that a recent notice in the personal column of the London Times did not go unobserved by those members of the upper classes who are perennially out of a job. It does not offer a solution of the problem, but at a time like this every little job helps. The notice reads:

> Tory, married, independent means, WANTED by keen M.P. in live, poor London constituency, help voluntarily, convince workers Disraeli preferable Marx—Write Box D, 549, The Times.

Woman's 75-Year Fight

By ALICE STONE BLACKWELL

A convention has been called by the National Woman's Party to meet on July 20, next, at Seneca Falls, New York, the place where seventy-five years before the first woman's rights convention took place. A story of that first convention, and the sex prejudices of the time, is given below by a pioneer in the woman's movement.

IT is good for us sometimes to look back to see how far we have come. The Seneca Falls Convention of 1848, which is about to be commemorated, marked a milestone on the long rough road toward equal rights for women. It is a road of which we have not yet reached the end; but in looking back at that early convention we see how amazing has been the advance.

At that time it was a different world for women. All of a married woman's property and earnings belonged to her husband. He was the sole guardian of the children, and if he died before her he could bequeath them away from her to strangers. She could not sue or be sued, could not make a will or contract. He had the legal right to lock her up, and to beat her in moderation—which was interpreted as meaning with a stick no thicker than a man's thumb. Women were shut out from almost all opportunities for higher education. Oberlin, the first college to admit women (and also the first to admit Negroes), had been open only for a few years. There were no free public high schools for girls. There were almost no organizations of women, except church sewing circles. It was thought unwomanly even to belong to a temperance society. The Abolitionists were the radicals of their day, yet, only a few years before, the Anti-Slavery Society had been split in twain because Abby Kelley, a saintly young Quakeress, had been appointed on a committee. Women were shut out by public opinion from all but a few ill-paid occupations; and all the learned professions were closed to them, of course. Elizabeth Blackwell, who was to be the first woman to take a medical degree, was then a student in the Medical College of Geneva, New York, and had a year more to work before her graduation. Antoinette L. Brown (afterward the Rev. Antoinette Brown Blackwell, D.D.), who was to become the first ordained woman minister, was still a student in the Oberlin Theological School. Susan B. Anthony was actively working for temperance, but was inclined at this time to ridicule the woman's rights movement, in which she was later to bear so distinguished a part.

Woman's Declaration of Independence

FROM THE RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT THE SENECA FALLS CONVENTION OF JULY 19-20, 1848

That, being invested by the Creator with the same capabilities, and the same consciousness of responsibility for their exercise, it is demonstrably the right and duty of woman, equally with man, to promote every righteous cause by every righteous means; and especially in regard to the great subjects of morals and religion, it is self-evidently her right to participate with her brother in teaching them, both in private and in public, by writing and by speaking, by any instrumentalities proper to be used, and in any assemblies proper to be held: and this being a self-evident truth growing out of the divinely implanted principles of human nature, any custom or authority adverse to it, whether modern or wearing the hoary sanction of antiquity, is to be regarded as a self-evident falsehood, and at war with mankind.

Brave women here and there had made pleas for equal rights—among them Margaret Brent of Maryland, in 1647, and, later, Margaret Fuller, Frances Wright, and the beautiful Polish Jewess, Ernestine L. Rose. But all these had been voices crying in the wilderness. Except among the Quakers, public opinion ridiculed and condemned unsparingly any woman who addressed an audience, even for the noblest object. The brunt of this opposition had been met and partly broken by Abby Kelley and the sisters Sarah and Angelina Grimke of South Carolina, who freed their slaves, distributed among them most of the fortune earned by their unpaid labor, and then came north to write and lecture against slavery. Circumstances soon withdrew the Grimkes from the lecture field, but Abby Kelley kept on. At the time of the Seneca Falls Convention she had been speaking for many years, under a fierceness of opposition that we can hardly conceive. Lucy Stone said of her that Arnold Winkelried gathered the spears into his breast only once, but she gathered them into her continually for fourteen years. At one of the early women's rights conventions Abby Kelley said: "My sisters, bleeding feet have worn smooth the paths by which you came up hither!"

In 1847 Lucy Stone had graduated from Oberlin and had begun in the same year to lecture for woman's rights and against slavery, with a voice of singular sweetness and simple but wonderful eloquence. Elizabeth Cady Stanton said of her, long after, that she was the first person by whom the heart of the public had been widely and deeply stirred on the woman question. But she was then only at the beginning of her work. At the time of the Seneca Falls Convention, and long afterwards, the early champions of equal rights had to undergo every sort of persecution and abuse.

That convention—the first organized effort to secure equal rights—was chiefly due to two remarkable women, Lucretia Mott and Elizabeth Cady Stanton. Mrs. Mott was a noble and eloquent Quaker preacher, highly respected in her own denomination and outside it. She was the wife of an excellent man who was in full sympathy with her. Someone said: "I never saw such an expression of beatitude on any other human face as on that of James Mott while Lucretia was preaching an eloquent sermon and he sat holding her bonnet." She had been lecturing against slavery for years, and had had to meet the inevitable persecution that assailed a woman speaker.

Elizabeth Cady was the daughter of a distinguished lawyer. A girl of uncommon intelligence and courage, as well as of exuberant and overflowing physical vigor, she had listened with indignation to the stories that her father's women clients told him of their wrongs under the laws, and she very early determined to destroy these unjust laws by tearing them out of her father's law books. Enlightened by him as to the futility of this childish plan, she bided her time, but never forgot her purpose.

In 1840, soon after her marriage to Henry B. Stanton, she and Lucretia Mott were thrown together under memorable circumstances. In that year the World's Anti-Slavery Convention was held in London. The American Anti-Slavery societies had elected Lucretia Mott and several other women among their delegates. But the prejudice against women's taking part in public affairs was even stronger in England than in the United States. In spite of able pleas by Wendell Phillips and others it was voted, amid great excitement, that the women delegates should not be allowed to take their seats. William Lloyd Garrison and Nathaniel P. Rogers also refused to take theirs, and sat in the gallery with the excluded women.

Mr. Stanton was a delegate, and, oddly enough, he happened to be a delegate from that branch of the Anti-Slavery Society in America which was opposed to public work by women, though he was personally in favor of it. His young wife, though not herself a delegate, felt with hot indignation the injustice shown to the women on this occasion. She and Mrs. Mott became warm friends, and took long walks together in London, discussing what could be done to promote equal rights for women.

They did not meet again for eight years. In 1848 Lucretia Mott attended the Yearly Meeting of Friends in Western New York, and visited her sister, Mrs. Martha C. Wright, at Auburn. Mrs. Stanton had lately moved to Seneca Falls. Mrs. Mott, Mrs. Stanton, Mrs. Wright, and Mrs. Mary Ann McClintock, sitting around the table of Richard Hunt, a prominent Quaker, discussed equal rights for women, and decided to hold a meeting. The call for the convention was published anonymously in the Seneca Falls Courier of July 14, 1848. It read:

> Woman's Rights Convention.—A Convention to discuss the social, civil, and religious conditions and rights of woman will be held in the Wesleyan Chapel, at Seneca Falls, N. Y., on Wednesday and Thursday, the 19th and 20th of July current; commencing at 10 A. M. During the first day the meeting will be exclusively for women, who are earnestly invited to attend. The public generally are invited to be present on the second day, when Lucretia Mott, of Philadelphia, and other ladies and gentlemen will address the convention.

It was not every religious edifice that could have been had for such a purpose. Bishop J. W. Hamilton says he has always been proud that the first woman's rights convention was held in a Methodist church. When the audience arrived, they found the doors locked. Says the "History of Woman Suffrage":

> An embryo Professor of Yale College was lifted through the window and unbarred the door; that done, the church was quickly filled. It had been decided to have no men present, but as they were already on the spot, it was decided, in hasty council around the altar, that this was an occasion when men might be preeminently useful.

The women were unaccustomed to conducting meetings, and asked James Mott to preside. He took the chair, tall, dignified, and wearing the Quaker dress. Mary McClintock was chosen secretary. Lucretia Mott stated the purpose of the meeting. Elizabeth and Mary McClintock and Mrs. Stanton spoke—they all read their speeches—and Mrs. Martha C. Wright read some satirical articles that she had contributed to the papers in answer to diatribes on woman's sphere.

A "Declaration of Sentiments" had been drawn up, modeled upon the Declaration of Independence, stating eighteen grievances of women, as the Declaration stated eighteen grievances of the colonists. This was adopted, with a series of resolutions that took advanced modern ground and demanded among other things an equal standard of morals.

The only resolution not passed unanimously was that for woman suffrage. It was strongly championed by Mrs. Stanton and Frederick Douglass, and was finally carried by a small majority.

One hundred men and women signed the Declaration. "Firmly relying upon the final triumph of the Right and the True, we do this day affix our signatures to this Declaration," they said. But many of them withdrew their names when the newspapers ridiculed the whole affair. The New York Herald joined in the ridicule, but added: "We are much mistaken if Lucretia would not make a better President than some of those who have lately tenanted the White House."

This was the first local women's rights convention. Local conventions were held soon after in Rochester, New York, and Salem, Ohio, and in 1850 the first national convention met in Worcester, Massachusetts. The Call was headed by Lucy Stone and signed by eighty-nine prominent men and women from six States, including Ralph Waldo Emerson. This marked the launching of the national movement. The reports of the speeches in the New York Tribune are said to have completed the conversion of Susan B. Anthony to the cause. They also prompted Mrs. Taylor (afterward the wife of John Stuart Mill) to write her famous article in the Westminster Review, which started the modern movement for woman's rights in England.

Looking back at the small beginnings and the seemingly hopeless situation that the pioneers had to face, we may well take heart for all the struggles in behalf of human betterment that still lie before us. Harriet Beecher Stowe, at the celebration of her seventieth birthday, said that nothing ever looked more hopeless than the effort to abolish slavery, and she added: "Remember, whatever ought to be done can be done!"

Before the Pan-American Bar

By PIERRE HUDICOURT

Port au Prince, June 21

IT was as a messenger of the Haitian people, sent by the Patriotic Union of Haiti to inform the fifth Pan-American Conference and the peoples of South America about the American military occupation of Haiti, the destruction of our independence, and the waste of our resources by American politicians, that I left Port au Prince for Santiago, Chile, on March 29.

In the harbor of Callao I met Mr. Morillo, general secretary of the Dominican Nationalist Mission, who was fulfilling the same mission for our Dominican brothers. Henceforth we worked arm in arm, Haitian and Dominican, while the intrigues of the American occupation were creating a so-called frontier incident between Haitians and Dominicans—as if these two peoples, subject to the same slave yoke, could interest themselves in such trifles while they had a common enemy to fight.

It was our purpose to present the situation of our countries at the conference in an official memoir, but we were informed that, upon the suggestion of the delegation from the United States, a rule had been made that no protest could be received by the secretary general unless it came directly from an officially accredited delegate.

But Morillo and I had sworn to bring the sufferings of our countries before the conference in open session. This is how we did it: Our memoirs were printed. We put six Haitian memoirs and six Dominican memoirs together in each of eighteen envelopes addressed to the eighteen delegations to the conference, and we penetrated into the conference hall just when the president was opening the session. We placed our envelopes upon the desks of each of the eighteen delegations and, bearing another envelope addressed to the president of the conference, we mounted the platform. Morillo declared in Spanish: "Mr. President, my Haitian brother and I have come 4,000 miles to bring you this envelope which contains the protest of the Haitian and Dominican peoples against the occupation of their territory by the troops of the United States of America and against the destruction of their independence and their sovereignty. We ask the entire world for justice against this international crime."

"Gentlemen," the chairman, Mr. Agustin Edwards, replied, "I can only accept this envelope to transmit to the executive committee, which will order that note be made of it."

Our protest had been public. But considering that this was insufficient, we took our places on May Day in the press box, and when a resolution had been read, and the president called for discussion, Morillo and I stood up. Morillo in a thunderous voice addressed the entire conference: "Gentlemen, we have come here to protest against the occupation of Haiti and Santo Domingo by the United States and against the mutilation of their independence and of their sovereignty!" And in a still stronger voice: "Pidemos justicia!" (We demand justice!)

The chairman hammered with his gavel; the galleries cheered; there was a general uproar. When order was reestablished a police official took our names, but that was all.

Two thousand copies of our memoirs were sent to three hundred newspapers and magazines in South America, to all the presidents and foreign ministers, to all the legislatures and senates, to the municipal administrations of the larger cities, to the supreme courts, and to the leading universities. I dare hope that at last the conscience of mankind is awaking to the reality of this crime against our peoples which all the disarmament conferences in the world cannot wipe out.

The "Log" Unseats "Mark Hopkins"

By FRED LEWIS PATTEE

THE most hackneyed, perhaps, of all American apothegms pertaining to education is that defining a college as a log with Mark Hopkins on one end and a student on the other. It has survived its generation and has entered into our common speech partly because of its picturesque concreteness and partly because of its obvious truth. "Obvious," I repeat, though I am aware that each of its three elements is open to challenge. Plato, confronted with the dictum, might have asked, What need of any log? The modern State university trustee, fresh from an inspection of the athletic field and the extension-school offices and the fraternity houses, might ask, What need of any Mark Hopkins? And the old-fashioned teaching scholar, viewing the horde that has invaded his classroom, might ask in helpless sarcasm, What need of any student?

To Garfield, however, when he made the definition, and to all of the men of his generation educated under the old academic system, it admitted no debate. As he made it, he had in his imagination's eye a struggling small college of the earlier type, his own Hiram doubtless, himself the president, or Williams his alma mater, Mark Hopkins the president—teaching presidents both of them, meeting day by day large sections of their students in those vital classroom contacts that come only to the actual teacher. The definition in its concrete imagery smacks of primitive conditions. The "log" stands for the frontier, for improvised conveniences, for ability to do much with very little; the "Mark Hopkins" stands for the primitive type of teacher, happily not quite extinct, the man with individuality and scholarship and character and contagious power, the teacher who chose his profession deliberately because he considered it superior to any other profession open to the college-trained man, the teacher who would have been a leader of his generation in whatever profession he might have chosen; and the "student" in the definition meant student—not merely a matriculant of a college; it carried with it the connotation of congenital aptitude for scholarship and enthusiasm for learning for learning's sake.

It is not too strong a statement to declare that we have today completely outgrown Garfield's definition, so completely indeed that it seems like a bit of American humor or at best a specimen of early American idealism. The "student" has been amazingly multiplied and it is time now for a new name for him, for of all things he is not a student. "Mark Hopkins" has become a president without a classroom; he never meets the "student" at all save at opening or closing convocations or at athletic mass meetings. He has become a mere administrator, the business manager of a great plant, a lobbyist often at the General Assembly of the State, a peripatetic raiser of funds, an applauded lecturer before women's clubs and rotary clubs and boards of trade, a dignitary in gorgeous robes at intercollegiate functions, resplendent at commencement, an absentee for long periods from the college campus. Or, failing this, "Mark Hopkins" has become a dean, a functionary who also does no teaching, or he has been "elevated" into some other executive office that carries with it no classroom duties. And in the old chair which each of these men once efficiently occupied sits today a subordinate instructor whose chief qualification for his position is his willingness to work his whole life long for small wages. And the "log"—the log has been sawed and quartered and miraculously multiplied and piled toward heaven and bedecked and embellished until it has become the dominating element in the definition.

Could some representative from a newly discovered civilization come to our shores and ask to be shown over one of our great educational institutions, nine-tenths of all he would be shown would be what Garfield termed the "log." All that Clemenceau saw of Yale was the "bowl" at one of the periods when it was brimming full. The best time to see Harvard is in the vacation period.

But it is not my purpose to dwell on this phase of college life. My indictment goes far deeper than these surface conditions. Let me misquote Goldsmith:

> Ill fares the college, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates and men decay.

It is the decay of men in our colleges that fills me with alarm. This is my indictment: The enormous emphasis put of late years upon the "log" in American college and university education has unseated "Mark Hopkins" and rendered all but extinct the type which Garfield designated the "student."

Let us begin where all campus discussion begins, with the college president. Almost invariably he has been chosen because of distinctive success in some professional field, most often educational. He has spent years preparing himself as a specialist in some highly technical branch of human knowledge; he has attracted attention to himself by the brilliancy of his specialized work, and as a result he has been called to the presidency of a college. He has reached the head of his profession; he has attained now the supreme reward of the educator; and with the consciousness of having taken a long step in advance he abandons the specialty to which he has given his preparatory years and to which he is just ready to render the highest service, and at the same time he ceases forever to be a teacher. And the new profession which he now enters is one for which he has had little preparation.

One thinks at this point of Dr. Nichols of Dartmouth, who at the moment when he had made himself an international figure by his discoveries in the physical laboratory of the college and was just at the point where he might have advanced the frontiers of his subject and impressed himself upon his classroom with compelling power was called from his laboratory to the presidency of the college, and from that moment was no longer a discoverer, no longer a teacher, but merely an administrator. A great scientist lost; a great teacher lost. Count the colleges and universities of the United States and in a general way you will have the total number of those who have deliberately dropped the specialty for which the best part of their lives has been a preparation, deliberately ceased to be "Mark Hopkinses," teachers, molders of the new generation, and have become merely custodians of the "log," raisers of funds, makers of budgets, directors of business, wearers of academic costume, workers merely with material things.

Almost identical is the case of the deans: the dean of men and the dean of women, the deans of schools undergraduate and professional, all of them drafted from the teaching staff because of work distinctively done in the field of their specialty. Practically all of them have abandoned their classes, practically all have ceased to be educators, the administrative duties of their deanship absorbing the totality of their time and powers. A large university may have as many as a dozen of these deans, presumably the strongest men that could be found in the faculties, and all of them have ceased to teach in order that they may, at an increased salary, do work that a clever graduate of a good business college might do with equal effectiveness.

But the indictment goes deeper still: the list of teachers so effective that they are not suffered to teach does not end with the president and the deans. College vice-presidents, comptrollers, secretaries to the president, registrars, examiners, librarians, curators, and others are all drawn from the most efficient end of the teaching force at an increase of salary, until the non-teaching corps is a whole faculty in itself, and what is more it is the only really well-paid part of the college staff, always excepting the athletic directors. An experienced department head once complained to me that in thirty years every really distinctive teacher he had ever evolved had sooner or later been drawn off into an administrative position.

And one may add still another class to the administrative force semi-non-teaching in its functions: department heads, thirty or forty of them in some institutions, for the most part relieved of all save a minimum of classroom work because of the administrative work believed to be inseparable from their position. And these department heads, like the president and the deans and the executive heads, are the best teachers the college possesses, the ones best fitted day by day in actual classroom contact to impress and inspire and direct the plastic student in the most effective way. The efficiency, the personality, the power that brought them their administrative position should be exerted to the full upon the student body in the classroom and the laboratory. Any other use of their powers is distinctively inferior, no matter how profoundly these men may impress the mature world.

Why is "Mark Hopkins," the teacher whose supreme ambition is to be a teacher and only a teacher, disappearing from our colleges and universities? Why do specialists with individuality and creative power, scholars in the ancient sense of this abused term, drop all in a moment their work and enter a new field for which they have had little preparation? Salary for one thing. The plums on the educational tree are with few exceptions reserved for the administrator. The mere teacher who does not care to dissipate his power as a dean or a department head will work all his life long for the wages paid a bricklayer or a chauffeur. The president with his secretaries, the vice-president, the deans with their office force, the heads of departments with their stenographers, and all the other executive heads with their clerks and helpers—these are the ones who cut most deeply into the salary roll of the college. To do the actual teaching on what is left after these huge bites have been made means the employment of a large force of very young instructors, apprentices, callow neophytes just graduated and almost totally without experience, added to the force at a wage ridiculously low because of the privilege given them of securing in the odds and ends of their time the master's or the doctor's degree. No wonder the "student" exclaims: "Don't let your studies interfere with your education." The classroom has become a joke. The freshman meets no other teachers, and even the senior often finds them in charge of his "major" courses. It means, too, impossibly large sections of the upper-classmen in history, economics, literature, and the like—fifty, a hundred, sometimes two or three hundred. The instructor becomes a mere speech-maker, a droner over a manuscript, an endless talker rather than a teacher, doing all the work for his class save the slovenly taking-down of "notes" on the part of the listless victims condemned day after day to sit and be pumped into like passive buckets.

But salary is not all that tempts the superior teacher to leave his classroom. The honors of the academic world today, all of them, go to the administrator. The honorary degrees at commencement are seldom for the mere teacher, however effective he may have been in shaping and directing the young lives put into his charge. But let him be elected to the presidency even of a fashionable fitting school, or to a deanship in a college, and at once some institution rewards him with its degree. All this in the face of the fact that university administration could be done efficiently by one not fitted at all to be a teacher, by a man, moreover, without a college degree; by any man indeed who could take charge of any other equally large institution, be it manufacturing or military or financial. Most of the routine in the offices of the deans could be attended to by mere clerks, most of the lobbying at State capitals and most of the soliciting of funds from various sources could be done as well by non-college workers as by college presidents. Registrars, president's secretaries, financial officers, and the like differ very little from the employees in business houses, and they could better be furnished by business colleges than drawn from the ranks of the specialized teachers. Even college presidents could be secured from the mercantile or the military professions with greatly more promise of success than from the teaching ranks.

With men in our classrooms, men picked as presidents of railroads are picked, or as leaders in the industrial world, or indeed even as football coaches are picked, the advanced men of their generation, the men best fitted to do the work regardless of what salary they may demand, then it will be that the classroom will make the chief imprint upon the finished product turned out by the university. That this should be the supreme aim of the college there can be no question. The idea is by no means a new one. Old Roger Ascham in the early years of Queen Elizabeth voiced it with emphasis:

> It is a pity that commonly more care is had, yea and that amongst very wise men, to find out rather a cunning man for their horse than a cunning man for their children. They say nay in word, but they do so in deed. For to the one they will gladly give a stipend of 200 crowns and loath to offer to the other 200 shillings. God that sitteth in heaven laugheth their choice to scorn and rewardeth their liberality as it should, for he suffereth them to have a tame and well ordered horse, but wild and unfortunate children, and therefore in the end they find more pleasure in their horse than comfort in their children.

The most appalling effect of the Mark Hopkins dethronement is to be found in the manifest deterioration of the undergraduate body. One does not have to depend upon the reports of the departments of English and mathematics and chemistry, or the statistics of registrars, for information concerning this degeneration. Army leaders during the war complained that the college graduates upon whom they had chiefly depended for their supply of under-officers were men untrained, smatterers, youths incapable of long concentration and impatient of restraint. Many of our young engineers came home from Europe amazed at the breadth and the thoroughness and the accuracy of the equally young French engineers with whom they had been thrown. The American graduate from a State university knew in a general way his civil engineering, but he was not a thorough master, and he knew little else save this one area. He had not been educated, at least in the classroom, and the European engineer to his amazement was a broad scholar as well as a thorough specialist. Tens of thousands, to cite a single example, study French from one to six semesters in our American colleges, yet not one of them leaves college actually speaking French and very few of them are able even to read the language with any comprehensiveness or ease. Thoroughness, accuracy, scholarship, concentration to the point of mastery are to be found in so few college undergraduates that they may be said to be all but wanting in our modern education.

It is needless to go into detail. Every college atmosphere is heavily charged with criticism of the student body. Every instructor has his pet theory concerning the causes of the present college "slump." College presidents like Woodrow Wilson complain that the side-shows have swallowed up the circus; others dwell much on the decadence of the old ideals and "the belligerent younger generation"; still others lay the blame upon the fitting schools and the grades below; and there are those who dismiss the whole matter as one of the unavoidable accompaniments of democracy. To educate all of the people, these philosophers contend, to bring all of Main Street into the high school and even into the college classroom is a leveling-down process that is bound to lower the old aristocratic standards. All of these arguments are mere evasion. The cause of the "slump" in our colleges is fundamentally this: "Mark Hopkins" has been pushed from the "log"; the "log" has been made king; the teacher is disappearing from the American classroom.

When the emphasis is placed again upon the teacher and not upon the "log" and the extra-classroom activities of the student, efficiency and scholarship will come again to our colleges. To prove that this can be done, one need cite but a single example. The football coach today is an actual teacher with a small class and he is paid an adequate salary, one that will draw the desired man from any other profession that may be holding him. He is chosen with extreme care and always because he is considered the best available man in the whole country for the particular task in hand. As a result he does efficient work; he brings to his small class thoroughness and discipline and self-control and accuracy, and when he has completed his three years' course with an individual player he has developed that man to the utmost of the man's powers. Whether it has been worth while to develop the man for merely gladiatorial ends has no place in my argument. The essential point is this: the man has been educated by a master until he has himself become a master.

Better Mark Hopkins in a miserable barn without a shred of equipment than a half-baked instructor in a marble laboratory equipped with the last word in apparatus. Honor where honor belongs. Let the president delegate his work to skilful clerks and let him teach the senior class as of old. If he is not equal to this highly masculine task, let him resign. Let the dean, the high-salaried fifth wheel of the university chariot, appoint a committee of his school to determine academic policies and delegate the rest of his duties to a stenographer, and teach if he can classes of students as they should be taught. Limit the student body to a number that can be adequately handled in small sections. Give the degrees and the salaries and the public honors to the actual teacher who is worthy. Bring back Mark Hopkins, whatever he may cost, for not until he appears again shall we have students in our colleges and universities.

The People Let Down

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

TRAVELING into the West as far as Chicago and Minneapolis and St. Louis and Kansas City, and returning to Washington and gazing once more upon its really more or less successful mirroring of the country, I seem to myself to perceive a people in process of being let down from the remote and the grandiose to the local and lowly.

The idea, for instance, that the United States by the vibrant waving of its mighty moralities in the air of Europe can bring calm and reason to Europe's infatuations is much less prevalent, I think, than it was a year ago. I now meet fewer voters to whom the settlement of Europe seems easy. There is a certain subsidence of the ecstatic spirit which saw the United States delivering Europe from its woes by simply baptizing it in the Jordan of Americanism. If this is a loss in idealism, it is also a gain in realistic modesty.

In Chicago I attended a hearing in the case of the United States Department of Agriculture against, or regarding, the merger of Armour and Company and of Morris and Company; and here again the impression produced was that of a collapse of soaring ambitions. The great packers—the "Big Five"—have not been engaged in gathering the packing business of the United States more and more into their grasp. They have been engaged in losing a certain considerable percentage of it out of their grasp into the hands of smaller competitors. The idea of an irresistible integration of all slaughtering and of all packing into a unified industrial edifice owned by ultimately one private firm and transferred then to national ownership and to national operation by the United States Government is at this moment a dissolving dream. The path immediately before the packing industry is not toward a glittering focused centralization, but toward a diffused multiplicity of firms.

In Minnesota I observed that the farmers and the laborers of the Farmer-Labor Party are not engaged really in attempting a new heaven and a new earth. Projects like the Plumb Plan for solving the railroad question through the drastic application of the principle of nationalization, plus the principle of employee management, have receded from the middle of the stage to a waiting position in the wings. The fight that is being fought in Minnesota is not a fight for establishing a new United States, but for overthrowing and punishing certain tyrannies inflicted by Minnesota capitalists upon Minnesota farmers and Minnesota laborers.

Our national government as a means either of saving the world or of saving the country is becoming obscured with doubt. It is true that the farm bloc has just succeeded in taking the government into the regulating of stockyards and of packers, and also into the regulating of grain speculators, and also into a new part of the rural banking business. It is further true that the farm bloc has taken the farmer to the tariff trough, and has caused him there to drink his fill of governmental protection along with the thirsty Eastern manufacturer. I observe, nevertheless, that at the end of all this using of governmental power, and at the end of all this using of governmental money, the reputation of the government as an economic savior has not increased but diminished.

In Kansas City the audience that greeted President Harding was quite firm in its applause of his denunciation of government ownership. It also additionally was quite firm in withholding all applause even from his plan for assembling the railroads into larger units of operation. The idea that the larger the unit the greater the efficiency is getting dimmed. It is contradicted now by the experience not only of the packing industry but of certain other manufacturing industries. It is also contradicted by the experience of the Southwest in reference to certain railroads. A sentiment is springing up to the effect that a railroad managed by persons inhabiting the very ground where it gives its immediate service to a given familiar region may be better than a railroad which is operated by transportation emperors inhabiting remote heights, and serving many regions but intimately understanding none of them.

In Kansas City and in St. Louis also I observed among old friends of mine a quite new increase of distaste and disgust for Federal government intervention of any sort in local matters. Even the Federal child-labor amendment seemed to some of them to be objectionable in spite of their enmity to child labor. The local self-government ideas of Senator Reed, of Senator Borah, of ex-Senator Beveridge, and of Governor Al Smith seemed to be winning converts.

In Ohio, among those sincere Cincinnati wets who are willing to suffer all sorts of raidings and burglarizings by prohibition-enforcement officers rather than surrender their thirsts into the keeping of a beneficent government, I observed a certain new thoughtfulness regarding not indeed the prohibition law, but the naked and pure idea of law as law in contrast with governmental despotism. Licensed marauders who under color of a statute may go from the county which licenses them into a county which has not licensed them and may there make seizures and arrests; courts which under color of a statute may without a jury impose fines compelling those who cannot pay them to serve many years in jail; Federal inspectors employed in vast numbers to enforce the Eighteenth Amendment relating to a matter of the throat and of the stomach when no Federal inspectors are ever sent out to enforce the rights of political freedom granted by the Fourteenth Amendment and by the Fifteenth Amendment—these situations and developments have produced a certain new thoughtfulness and a certain new skepticism about the desirability of further Federal constitutional and legislative adventures.

Returning eastward from Cincinnati I now notice in the Baltimore Evening Sun a daily impassioned celebration of a week called "Too-Much-Law-Making-Week." I also notice, in Judge Hull, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, an enthusiastic concurrence in the idea that the true order of the day is a return to true Jeffersonianism. He tells me that for many months past he has not made a speech in which he has failed to emphasize local immediate self-government as the proper tonic to be taken by those who too long have looked for their salvation to government from afar.

I accordingly begin to suspect more than ever that Mr. Justice Brandeis is a great living book of wisdom. For years he has informed me that the day of the smaller nation, the day of the smaller business firm, and the day of a greater attentiveness to local government, in contrast with distant government, was a day demanded by the stars in their human courses. He thought so a long time ago. I grubbingly, as a reporter, pick up multiplying signs from year to year of the veracity of his vision.

The Wiles of Destiny

By SHOLOM ASCH

WE are at the preliminary festivities of an orthodox Jewish wedding in pre-war Russian Poland. The prelude is staged in the spacious parlor of the bride's home in a typical provincial town in the midst of the warm colors and dramatic setting dictated by the hallowed traditions of the race. The bridesmaids are here in force, giving the final touches to the central tableau in which the leading character, the bride, is sitting in state on the chair of honor in all the glory of her bridal gown. She is sitting here under the admiring gaze of the guests awaiting the veiling ceremony. The wedding band of provincial musicians are here to a man, lined up around the bride with their instruments in position. The violins are tuned up and poised clear for action. From time to time the tension is broken by the growl of a violin string under the temperamental pinch of its master's finger. The double-bass groans in a painful, low-pitched plaint, and Yankel smothers his impatience in the silvery, rolling response of his clarinet to his tuning up.

The wedding bard is also here and ready to do his part. But the interminable wait has set his nerves a-tingling down to his finger-tips. These finger-tips of his are plucking and twitching away at his racial goatee—that poor little tapering bunch of beard-like, nervous, jerky strands framing the restless and bony minstrel-chin—as if to vent all their irate fury on this innocent tuft.

But the bridegroom with the silken veiling cloth is not yet in sight. His absence acts like a wet blanket upon the festive company. All become depressed and gloomy. The mother of the bride is sulky and restless. Her angry scowl suggests some grave trouble with the bridegroom, but nobody knows just what it is all about. The poor bride, tortured by dark forebodings of her maiden dreams cruelly blasted, is sitting and waiting, pale and trembling in an agony of shame, with her eyes and face buried in her hands to hide the rush of hot tears and smother the sobs convulsing her frail, delicate frame. The girls, overcome by pity for the bride, are doing their best to cheer her up and dispel the all-pervading gloom. They laugh and romp and shout in transports of glee, calling upon the band to play. But the musicians, on their part, are sunk in a brown study tinged by fear and worry at the loss of the money staring them in the face in case the match is called off. They chase off the bevy of girls with their violin bows.

"Move on, girls, no dancing just now; bide your time."

The mother of the bride stands bent over the weeping form of her daughter, cooing and crooning at her consolingly: "The Lord will redeem your shame, my child, He will make good all you've suffered."

The sordid end of the affair in all its naked, unredeemed, commercialized brutality is going on at the same time in the next room where the fathers of the bridal pair are threshing out the business details of the marriage agreement. Oiser, the groom's father, an undersized specimen of the race, is sitting, with his withered, bloodless lips tightly closed, his small boyish head supported by the palm of one hand, and his other hand placidly stroking his scrubby beard. He is as dumb and unresponsive as the rocks. The father of the bride is a tall, husky man with a large, spreading face framed by a long beard of russet strands, with the ruddy complexion of the sturdy semi-blond Jew typical of western Poland. He is standing before his puny prospective kin-in-law pleading with him appealingly to come to terms:

"Oiser, don't disgrace me before the people. Within eight days after the wedding, as soon as I clinch my wheat sale, you'll get the hundred rubles. Please take the note; for mercy's sake, accept the note," he begged, and shoved it into Oiser's hand.

But the weazened, scrawny bit of a Jew does not budge. His hand keeps stroking his beard without making the slightest move in response to the plea. He sits there just as before, with his body rigid, without raising his eyes or moving his head, his mouth tightly shut.

From time to time one of the bride's relatives pokes her head through the door, speaking into the room:

"Well, family, the bride and groom, as you know, are having a long summer's day fast."

"Family, the guests are breaking up; we'll be disgraced before the people."

"What shall I do? He is sitting there like a brigand"—the father of the bride pointed at Oiser. "Well, I have an idea. Let's appeal to the groom. If he insists that I don my long coat outright, take my cane, and go out into the street to scrape together a loan of one hundred rubles for the balance of the dowry, right now, before the marriage service under the canopy, where my child is waiting for the veil, well, then, I will do it, I'll do it," the irate father of the bride bursts out.

"The groom will do as I tell him," was Shorty Oiser's curt, unruffled reply.

"No, I must have it from his own lips; I want him to tell me he won't step up to veil the bride until the last one hundred rubles of the dowry are put down in cash," he insisted.

"Well, you can have it if you must," Shorty Oiser again said in his unruffled manner. Rising and coming up to the door, he called out: "David, David, just step in."

The groom sat surrounded by the young Jews invited to hear him expound the prepared forensic piece of abstruse Talmudic lore prescribed by the marriage canon. But his innermost thoughts and heart-stirrings were fixed elsewhere. He understood that something was amiss and that the match might fall through. He did not sense it as real disaster. If his father should stop the performance before the canopy-service, why, of course, he surely knows what he is about and means it for his son's good. The young groom did not know his bride as yet. He had seen her a couple of times at the betrothal when he and she signed the marriage contract and wished each other good luck. Of course he felt overcome with pity at the idea that a daughter of Israel was to suffer disgrace; but his father surely knew what he was about, and there must be sufficient ground for it.

He felt bored by the long day. He took another try at his nuptial lecture with now and then a wistful and furtive peep into the next room where the bride was sitting. He saw nothing but a white dress. No doubt the bridal dress appealed to his emotions in a somewhat pleasurable way, helping him to a realization of the fact that she was his heaven-decreed bride. But, of course, the dress could not as yet evoke anything deeper. When his father called him in, he was sure the match was to be won or lost by his decision, and so his heart-beats began to quicken.

"David, do you want to marry on a three-hundred-ruble dowry?" his father asked.

"What do you mean? It's four hundred; here is the note"—the bride's father shoved the note into the groom's hand.

"What's in a note, a beggarly note? It's nothing; the dowry in spot cash is only three hundred rubles. If you, Dave, are willing, well, then I won't object."

David's blood rushed to his face. In the three hundred rubles he sensed a deep slur, an affront to his worth. Why, any common ruck of a fellow nowadays gets his four—five hundred in cash, and could he, with the phenomenal brains of a talmudic erudite, a real intellectual prodigy assiduously conning and poring over the formidable folios of abstruse lore, could he accept a paltry three hundred? Time and again he had rejected the most brilliant matches on the sole ground that the dowry didn't soar above the three-hundred mark. And should he now marry with this amount as his dowry, why, he'd be disgraced before his own friends, the young Jews gracing the sanctified study-halls of the synagogue. Think of it, a beggarly three-hundred-ruble groom! He was quite ready then and there to take off his coat and quit together with his father. But he hesitated to scandalize the young Jews and the guests in the next room. He kept twirling his side-locks, saying:

"Father knows better what's good for me; I depend upon him."

And so the bride's father, confronted by stern necessity, had to make the best of a bad bargain. He donned his long coat, took his cane, and went out into the street to scrape up a hundred-ruble loan for the balance of the dowry. The bride had to keep on sitting with her hair loosened waiting for the groom to veil her until the hundred rubles, scraped together in silver and copper coins from the widely ramified kith and kin of the bride's family, was safely tied up in the handkerchief of the short-sized, puny, freebooting, and tongue-tied specimen of a Jew.

"David, go and veil the bride," said this undersized son of Abraham with the silver coin in the knotted kerchief in his tight grasp.

At night, when the bridal pair were alone, the bride swooned in a fit of nausea. When David had sprinkled some water on her face and she had come to herself, she opened her eyes and looked at him bewildered and frightened. Her look seemed to beg him for something. David could not make out what was wrong with her and asked:

"What is it, Dora dear?"

Instead of answering him, she took his hand and pressed it to her heart.

David felt her heart pound hammer-like under his hand and became frightened. He asked her anxiously:

"Are you sick, Dora? What is the matter?"

She kept still. Her big eyes looked at him in mute appeal. He saw the pupils of her eyes gleam in the dark. She took his hand again and put it to her heart, whispering in the night hush:

"I am sick, David."

"What ails you?" he asked in fright.

Her eyes now implored with still greater intensity.

"My heart!"

"Your heart?" he shuddered, as he moved away from her.

"Why didn't they tell me anything about it?" he asked angrily.

"Father was afraid you wouldn't like the match."

"A bride with heart disease," he muttered to himself.

He kept still for a minute; he did not know what to do with himself. Dawn was still far off, yet it was too late at night for him to dress and go out. He sat down on the edge of the bed.

"I've been duped," he muttered to himself.

"I am not to blame. Father told me to keep quiet. Now you're my husband, you've got to know it, and so I told you."

David didn't say a word. He gazed at the window in search of a single light ray to herald the dawn. He thought he would surely go home with his father in the morning. A bride with heart disease, why it was out of the question. It wasn't his fault. He was trapped. But the rabbi would grant a divorce at once. He felt with a sense of pain the slow, snail-like pace of the night; here he was with a stranger in the same room, with one whom from tomorrow on he would never see again.

"David, you're angry?" she asked him.

He did not answer her, but he thought it was not her fault that God had punished her.

"Does your heart still ache?" he asked without looking her in the face.

"A little," she answered in a subdued tone.

"And what do your folks at home do when you have these spells?"

"A cold wet towel helps."

"Do you want to have one now?" he asked again without looking around.

"Yes, over there are a bowl of water and a towel."

Groping in the dark, David found the bowl, wet the towel, and handed it to her.

"Put it over my heart, David."

"Where?"

"Right here where my heart is."

David applied the towel. Unwittingly his hand touched her bare, warm breast. He felt a wave of affection for her.

"Is there no remedy for heart disease? One could go to a great medical specialist," he said aloud as if to himself.

"No, I have been to doctors, to great doctors—they know no remedy."

David sat in silence. He now visualized a future interminable round of living with an invalid wife, tied down to a woman who would always keep to her sick-bed, always, on Saturdays and holidays, always sick and always sad, and perhaps this would harm the children as well; they would be born weak and sickly, or, perhaps, there would not be any children at all, and he alone would live with a sick wife. Outside the sun would shine, holidays would come, such as Easter, Jews would be merry, rejoice and sing, the young married women would take walks in front of the synagogue while his wife would be confined to her sick-bed.

He thought no more of divorce—he saw himself already tied down to a sick wife and felt sorry for himself. Why, just a while ago he was a free young bachelor, happy, full of bright visions of the future, and now he was already so burdened with sorrow. What had he done that such a lot had been meted out to him? What crime had he committed to deserve such punishment?

He now accused or blamed no one but his unlucky star. He now felt pity for his young wife. Poor thing, it was not her fault. He only wanted to save himself from the impending doom, to find some ray of hope, and so he said:

"Pshaw! doctors don't know everything. The Lord's mercy may restore you to perfect health."

"The doctors said if I found a husband who would be good to me, I would regain my normal, healthy heart."

He sat on in silence. Her words cut into his heart with the sharp sting of love. There was so much soft, soothing sweetness in her voice that he felt quite overcome with emotion and muttered:

"Well, what of it, the fact of the matter is, we two are heading for the same port under the same star."

He heard subdued weeping behind his back. Her tears hurt him, and he said:

"Dora darling, don't cry."

"Why shouldn't I when my lot is so bitter and God has punished me so?"

David could no longer resist. He hid his face in her breast and wept.

"It is my star, my destiny too, Dora dear."

And he did not know whether his tears welled up from the fount of misery or bliss.

In the Driftway

UNFORTUNATELY the Drifter did not get to Shelby, Montana, in the fight-days. He has never been able to stir up much interest in dog fights or boxing matches, but he would like to have seen Mr. Kearns, Jack Dempsey's manager. The picture of that poker-faced gentleman placidly smoking a Pittsburgh stogie while all Montana was being raked for coin roused even the Drifter's hot-weather admiration. Jack Kearns finally took $210,000 and the gate receipts, but the Montana men, wild poker men as they are reputed to be, apparently did not believe he would. Kearns got every cent out of them that was to be had. "I'll not fall for any tear-jerking stunt on my shoulder," he told the world in choicest American a few minutes before the fatal hour. "I will not shade our end one whit. If these fine, upstanding men of the open spaces and the hairy wrists have been walking on stilts and tripped, that's their business. They don't seem to have sense enough to make good $300,000 for a $5,000,000 deluge of advertisements for their oil." (Some of the correspondents failed to stress the fact that Shelby is not merely a ranch town but an oil-boom town, and that the generous mayor who so nobly sacrificed his $100,000 is also a partner in Moore and Ropers, "real estate and oil-land investment," with offices on Main Street, Shelby.)

* * * * *

IF the movies that are to make the fortune of the defeated hero be warranted to include close-ups of the inimitable Kearns chewing his cigar while coin committees struggled and all Shelby besought him to relent, the Drifter will consent to accept free tickets from any devoted reader who may send them in. (And if he be drifting far from New York when the tickets come, The Nation has an office boy who might be persuaded to substitute.) He would not care much to see the pictures of Tom Gibbons being initiated as an honorary chief of the Blackfeet Indians, but if any imaginative camera man turned his machine upon the scene when one of his fellows, in true movie-man style, interrupted Chief Curly Bear's opening prayer to seize the good chief by the shoulder and spin him around to face the cameras, the Drifter would like to see that. He would like too to see the expressions upon the Blackfeet faces when the camera man thus showed his real American respect for religion.

IT must have been a great sight. The neglectful correspondents omitted to obtain figures upon the amount of business done by the Dakota-Montana Oil Company, Moore and Ropers, and the Sunburst Oil and Gas Company, all of Main Street, Shelby, during the days of Shelby's greatness, but they did give one a picture of the wild and woolly West in 1923. It is peopled, it appears, almost exclusively by farmers in Ford cars and their daughters, who wear silk stockings and natty knickerbockers.

* * * * *

THE umpire ruled Jack Dempsey victor, and the crowd insisted on awarding the moral victory to Tom Gibbons, but the match, despite a few votes in favor of Shelby, really went to Kearns. It was a gigantic game of bluff from beginning. A few Shelby oil speculators had the inspiration one night in the good old days before public attention forced respect for the Eighteenth Amendment upon Shelby. They wired Kearns, bidding $200,000 for the match; he raised them $100,000, and they called. After that it was a new game between Shelby and Kearns: how much would Shelby have to pay him to keep him from calling the match off? Whenever the Shelbyites suggested compromise Kearns chewed his stogie negatively, and they struggled on. The Drifter suspects that Kearns, who thus outbluffed Montana, is a mere effete Easterner, but he cannot tell, for Who's Who in America pays no tribute to that worthy. For that matter, you can search Who's Who in vain for any information about Jack Dempsey, champion heavyweight boxer of the world, Tom Gibbons, the challenger, or even about THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Letters to the Editor should ordinarily not exceed 500 words, and shorter communications are more likely to be printed. In any case the Editor reserves the right to abridge communications.

A Word on Tax Exemptions

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your last issue, in commenting on the decreased number of taxpayers returning incomes of one million dollars and over, you attributed this fact to the large issues of tax-exempt securities and expressed approval of the suggestion that the Federal Constitution be again amended to prohibit the further issue of tax-exempt securities.

I believe that all tax exemptions should be abolished and, if a constitutional amendment were needed for that purpose, I for one would heartily favor such amendment. But I am not convinced that such an amendment is needed. I still believe that the Sixteenth Amendment, if properly construed, abolishes all exemptions from taxation so far as the powers of the Federal government extend. That amendment has, however, been so construed as to thwart its purpose in so far as it seeks to do away with tax exemptions. The circumstances under which that construction of the amendment was adopted are such that in my opinion a concerted effort should be made to resubmit the question to the United States Supreme Court and thus secure a proper interpretation of the Sixteenth Amendment.

You are no doubt aware of the fact that the exemption of salaries of State, county, and municipal officers and employees, and the exemption of income from securities issued by States, counties, and municipalities from the Federal income tax, rests solely on judicial interpretation of the Federal Constitution and not on any explicit provision for exemption contained in that instrument, and that the provisions making such exemptions found in the revenue act were inserted therein by Congress in pursuance of the supposed want of power on the part of Congress to subject income derived from these sources to Federal taxation.

I feel safe in saying that most of the people of the United States (including Justices Holmes and Brandeis of the United States Supreme Court) were of the opinion that when the Sixteenth Amendment authorized the taxation of incomes, "from whatever source derived," it really meant that all incomes "from whatever source derived" were made subject to taxation. However, it remained for the United States Supreme Court in the case of Evans vs. Gore, 253 U. S. 245, to demonstrate in that most astonishing opinion that this provision so carefully worded and so clearly expressed is utterly meaningless. According to the construction of the Sixteenth Amendment in the case of Evans vs. Gore, the meaning of the amendment would be exactly the same if the words "from whatever source derived" had been omitted therefrom.

The case of Evans vs. Gore should be called to the attention of the entire bar of the country and of all intelligent and patriotic citizens. It should be thoroughly discussed in the press, and in this way it is possible that a proper construction of the amendment may be obtained and the necessity for further cluttering up the Constitution with pernicious amendments be avoided.

St. Louis, June 20 HENRY H. FURTH

Ireland

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In a recent editorial you refer to De Valera's "content" with the "substantial measure of self-government obtained by Ireland under the new constitution," but doubt his conversion to this "content." Apropos of De Valera's "last word" to Free Staters and England, you observe: "Saying one's last word may appear a less heroic attitude than dying in the last ditch, but the friends of Ireland will hope that, after all, the controversy may reach its final stage in speeches and manifestos rather than in deeds of violence."

The real friends of Ireland cannot see a "substantial measure of self-government" in the new constitution. That such an expression can find a place in the columns of The Nation is a tribute to the thoroughness with which pro-British propaganda in this field has worked. We have the word of a British authority in the latest edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica that "indifference to truth is a characteristic of propaganda, that it is to promote the interest of those who continue it . . . [which] differentiates it from useful knowledge." The so-called treaty divides Ireland arbitrarily with two hostile camps, with an army of occupation in each. No referendum vote has been taken on the treaty.

The constitution gives "Southern" Ireland but the status of a slave state. We have no control over our parliament, our judiciary, or even over the spending of our own money. Our judges are appointed by the king's governor general. The parliament is called and dismissed by the king, who has a veto on all legislation. As for the "deeds of violence" of the Republicans, would it not be more to the purpose to emphasize the deeds of violence of the British Government which has precipitated all this? When it is realized (as it ought to be) that the Free Staters are and have been all along simply the tools and puppets of the British Government, one will be able to get something like a real perspective on the situation.

New York, June 30 HANNA SHEEHY SKEFFINGTON

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "Scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar." English veneer is equally thin. From Lord Curzon up or down, every class and school of political opinion in England exposes its fundamental savagery when the name of Ireland is mentioned. So it is with Henry W. Nevinson, writing in your issue of the 13th instant.

Mr. Nevinson and his ilk on both sides of the Atlantic have thus "championed" the cause of Ireland, of India, of Egypt, up to a point where it appeared that the patriots would triumph, whereupon the "champions" have invariably thrown their weight and their pens in favor of a "moderate" settlement, which equally invariably proves to be a victory for the British Government. Nevinson and Company come close to the role of agents provocateurs.

New York, June 15 JOHN E. KELLY

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Nevinson speaks of his love for Ireland and the Irish people and "the shameful history of their oppression and persecution at the hands of England for so many centuries" down to the "Black-and-Tan tyranny." Then he speaks of December 6, 1921, as the day "the very happiest of my life" because "the news came that the treaty between Great Britain and Ireland had at last been signed." One wonders if on that day Mr. Nevinson knew the terms of the so-called treaty and by what happy magic he thought England had been transformed overnight from tyrant to benefactor. Is not this the question at issue? Does the so-called treaty guarantee Ireland's liberation from the oppression of England or does it perpetuate it?

In the first place the document signed December 6, 1921, over which Mr. Nevinson waxed so happy, did not purport then to be a treaty, but in the document itself is called articles of agreement. It was signed by the three Irish delegates in excess of their authority and against positive instructions from the Government of the Irish Republic which they represented and under threats of an immediate and devastating warfare on the part of Great Britain. For these reasons two of the three delegates, after returning to Ireland, repudiated their signatures. The constitution, built on the articles of agreement, was not drawn up by delegates from the Irish people and has never been submitted to the Irish people either for amendment or approval, so that in no sense can the government instituted by these documents be considered a government of and by the Irish people.

The so-called treaty and the constitution forced on Ireland from without change the situation not a whit to the lover of Irish independence. These documents can no more bring peace to Ireland than the Treaty of Versailles can bring peace to Europe. Just as always we have Great Britain standing for a world-wide empire from which she does not dare to lose Ireland, and Ireland, now as ever, passionately ready to sacrifice her very life blood for the "right of self-determination."

Oakland, Cal., June 23 CHARLOTTE ANITA WHITNEY

Governor Russell on the Press

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have noticed throughout the nation for many years the unmistakable signs that the money power of this government was controlling the policy of the press. It is rare indeed to see a journal with any circulation and with any standing that would dare to speak out in behalf of the great masses of the people. From the first along to the last there is unmistakable evidence that these papers are subsidized. They speak the language of their masters, the predatory interests.

In our own State we haven't a daily paper that would dare to champion the cause of the common people upon any question, and they follow the wishes of the "big interests" always. The big fellow that is a well-known tax-dodger has their sympathy and support. These newspapers take great delight in abusing any person, official or private, who would dare to demand that these tax-dodgers pay up their just dues to the government. When it comes to the reduction of freight and passenger rates, telephone and express rates, and the like, these same journals always maintain a strong argument in behalf of these corporations, trusts, and combines. Recently we have gone through a siege with the insurance trusts. This is the most pernicious, arrogant, and criminally inclined lot of fellows I have ever seen infest this State. They did their best to overawe and sandbag our people. In this they were repulsed, but the fight is still on.

The fight in this State now and in the years to come is against this sort of octopus and others of this kind, and if we had an honest and fearless press we would run these criminals out of the State at once, but unfortunately we have but few editors that will take up the fight against this common enemy. The small country paper has come under the same criminal influence of these predatory interests as have the larger papers, until now our State has only a very small percentage of honest-to-goodness newspapers. These are making a valiant fight, but the common enemy is continually closing in on them, and unless a revolution takes place it will not be long before they are all silenced—I pray this revolution may come soon.

Jackson, June 23 LEE M. RUSSELL,
Governor of Mississippi

Our Rule in the Virgin Islands

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The intelligent Virgin Islanders of New York have followed the articles which have been appearing in The Nation on the naval rule now in vogue in the Virgin Islands with considerable interest. It heartens us in our fight for a democratic status to know that such an internationally respected journal as The Nation is on our side. Mr. Arthur Warner's article on Political Peonage in the Virgin Islands in your issue of June 6 was especially valuable. It sums up succinctly the chief evils from which the people of the islands suffer under American rule as administered by the Navy Department.

The Virgin Islands Congressional Council was organized more than a year ago to get the searchlight of publicity turned on the dark corners of this naval rule. We have found the naval mind a rather queer piece of furniture. In the Negro newspapers amenable to its manipulation (two in the Virgin Islands and one in New York) all our citations of fact—official orders, rulings, and records—are cavalierly condemned as "propaganda," while the naval regime, in the method made familiar by propagandists during the war, seems to think that, like Humpty Dumpty, words can be made to mean anything that we want them to mean. Thus to call an administration selected exclusively from the Navy and by the Navy for the people a "civil" administration evidently makes it civil.

Mr. Warner has done a conscientious piece of reporting. He has entered sympathetically into the problems of the people, and does not stand Olympian-like upon that high mount of supercilious condescension upon which most white Americans stand when discussing darker people of the West Indies. It is the earlier humanism which you have preserved for us almost alone in America and renamed liberalism that must serve as the solvent of our inter-racial problems. For only in that manner can they be solved with mutual good-will and respect.

New York, June 13 CASPER HOLSTEIN,
President, Virgin Islands Congressional Council

To Students of Carl Robert

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will former students of Carl Robert, who was for many years professor of archaeology at the University of Halle, Germany, until his death in January, 1922, kindly send either to the undersigned or to Professor Otto Kern, Robertinum, Halle, brief accounts of their recent academic activities? These are intended to be incorporated in a forthcoming biography of Professor Robert written by his successor, Dr. Kern.

WALTER WOODBURN HYDE
University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, May 20

Swallows Pass Through Rome

By LEONORA SPEYER

The swallows flying north have come to Rome,
The sacred city; wing to wing they flit
About its golden walls, nor care a whit
For Forum, Coliseum, Catacomb.
Unmoved, they skim St. Peter's shining dome,
Brushing the Cross; and did great Angelo sit
Beneath that leaning cypress? What of it?
Tell the gray dove, that dreaming stay-at-home!

What are Rome's marble monuments to them?
Its fallen columns crying on dead gods?
Dead or alive, here's shelter for a night,
A rag's a nest as warm as purple hem;
A peasant's crumbling eave, well-stuffed with clods,
As good as martyr's niche, or Caesar's might.

Books

Life and Letters of Elizabeth Cady Stanton

Elizabeth Cady Stanton as Revealed in Her Diary, Letters, and Reminiscences. Edited by Theodore Stanton and Harriot Stanton Blatch. Two volumes. Harper and Brothers. $6.

"I COMMENCED the struggle of life under favorable circumstances," wrote Elizabeth Cady Stanton in the opening sentence of her diary. She could, however, as she also records, "enjoy life under the most adverse circumstances" and "with no abatement of her indomitable spirit turn these or any circumstances to good account."

Perhaps no words that could be quoted from the rich record of these two volumes better indicate the buoyant vitality that carried Elizabeth Cady Stanton through more than fifty years of ceaseless revolutionary activity as well as of an unusually full domestic life. Born in Johnstown, New York, in 1815, the daughter of a conservative and learned judge, she early displayed her rare faculty for dominating circumstances. Constantly depreciated by her father as a girl, in spite of achievements uncommon in a girl of her day; confronted constantly through the incidents of his law practice with the injustice of woman's legal position, she acquired, while still a child, that hearty disrespect for legalism and authoritarianism, for all time-honored and senseless obstacles to human happiness that was to distinguish her through life as one of the greatest and wisest rebels of her century. It was not in vain that she learned during these formative years that her simplest wish and impulse were likely to be in conflict with rule and precedent, tradition and convention, for she soon developed the habit, invaluable in a revolutionist, of heeding no authority and following no prompting save that of her own intelligence. It was this outstanding quality in her that made her through the introduction of the famous ninth resolution at the Seneca Falls convention, against even the advice of Lucretia Mott, the founder of the American Woman Suffrage Movement, and later in the eyes of some of her coworkers its enfant terrible. It was this that led her to recognize and welcome every progressive and liberating tendency of her time as well as many that were far in advance of it, and that frequently brought to her not only the hostility of her opponents, but the disapproval of her friends and associates. Thus, during Reconstruction days, she temporarily estranged ardent Abolitionists with whom she had worked because they could see no relevance to the Fourteenth Amendment in her question: "Is the African race composed entirely of males?"—(a question not without interest today when a considerable number of feminists apparently believe that only the Caucasian race has any females). She lost the presidency of the temperance society she had helped to found because of her radical views on divorce, pained her relatives by wearing bloomers publicly during the early years of her motherhood, and when past seventy shocked the respectable majority of a suffrage convention into sanctimonious silliness by publishing "The Woman's Bible." Profoundly social in her outlook, she was intensely individual in spirit and method, and because she was passionately committed to the cause of human freedom she was passionately consistent in her demand for self-expression and self-fulfilment. Skeptical and challenging where creeds and codes were concerned, her reverence for human life and personality was of inestimable value in combating the congealing tendencies that so often threatened the movement with which she was associated. That these tendencies sometimes carried the day in spite of her, only heightened the exhilaration one feels in reading her record of unbroken opposition to bigotry and snobbery, compromise and toadyism whether these appeared in the ranks of her opponents or in those of her fellow-workers.

In 1840, after a girlhood of outward ease and inward turmoil, she married Henry B. Stanton, characteristically omitting the word obey from the marriage ceremony, and sailed with her husband to the World's Anti-Slavery Congress to which he was a delegate. This convention may have achieved notable things for the abolition of Negro slavery but it is chiefly remembered today for the impetus it unwittingly gave to the emancipation of women by its exclusion of the women delegates. For Elizabeth Cady Stanton as for others of the excluded women the action of the convention was a turning-point. It brought to a focus the vague aspirations and stirrings of discontent they had felt and kindled in them the determination to fight without ceasing for the full emancipation of women. It was not until 1848, however, after some intervening years of concentrated domestic life, that she definitely launched the woman's movement at Seneca Falls. It was shortly after this that Mrs. Stanton met for the first time her great coworker, Susan B. Anthony, and that the life-long friendship of these two women began. From that time on the record shows her as living to the full of her magnificent powers both in her personal and in her public life. She had seven children, six of whom survived her, to whose health and education she applied the same radical and fearless intelligence with which she met other problems. She agitated continually for abolition, for divorce, for better property laws for women, for suffrage. She addressed innumerable legislatures and drafted countless memorials. She edited The Revolution. She wrote and edited a large part of the official "History of Woman Suffrage." She traveled through the West on Lyceum Lecture tours under pioneer conditions of almost incredible hardship with the same zest that she did in Europe. She founded and was for many years president of the National Suffrage Association. Throughout her life she was a constant contributor to magazines and newspapers, not only on topics relating to women, but on any that stirred her never-dormant sense of pity or of outrage at injustice. She was the ardent champion not only of movements but of those individuals who stirred her loyalty or aroused her protective passion, and no connection with any movement could force her to silence when she felt called on to speak. She took up her pen in defense of Parnell when those she termed "canting saints" were hounding him, and one of the most touching of her letters was her message of sympathy and respect to a young colored cadet at West Point for persecutions endured at the hands of his white fellow-cadets.

It is in her letters indeed that her many-sided and stirring personality is best revealed. Interesting as is the record of her diary, and charming as are the more formal reminiscences intended for publication, it is the letters that are richest in characteristic and spontaneous utterances, in those ringing phrases struck from her in the heat of controversy, in the unforgettable expressions, at once so terse and so eloquent, of the qualities that made her great. One wishes that all leaders of public movements might read and take to heart the letter on compromise she wrote in 1880 to Miss Anthony: "Ah, beware Susan lest as you become 'respectable' you become conservative" and note the cheerfulness with which she always received the news that someone or something had once more "killed" the suffrage movement. Her letters, too, are rich with indications of the warmth and breadth of her personal affections, her steadfast uncompromising friendship, and her wise and light-hearted motherhood.

A biography of Mrs. Stanton could not fail to be an important historical document, as Bernard Shaw once said of his own, for, like Shaw, she "lived up to the chin in the life of her time." The present biography is memorable, however, not only as an historical and social document, but as the extraordinarily living record of a rare personality, a pioneer among pioneers, whose gaiety, courage, and intensity so animate every page that it is not, as biographies too frequently are, the record of "old, unhappy, far-off things," but packed with significance for our own times. It is memorable too for the sympathetic and skilful editing it has received at the hands of Mrs. Stanton's children, in particular for their wide and discriminating selection from her letters. MARTHA GRUENING

A Cheerful Russian Poet

Visions Solaires. Mexique—Egypte—Japon—Inde—Océanie. Par Constantin Balmont. Traduit du Russe avec une préface par Ludmila Savitzky. Paris: Editions Bossard. 1923.

PERHAPS we should have begun our title with the definite article, since cheerfulness is not frequent in Russian literature. But Constantin Balmont is not pure Slav. Of Scotch ancestry on his father's side and Mongolian on his mother's, he is, for all his affection for Russia, an endless traveler and a citizen of the world; and it is the world's gay variety of color and enthusiasm, rather than the world's monotony of disillusionment, which moves his pen. "I love the faces of Negroes"—"I love Herodotus"—"I love islands"—"I love the grass-blade and the mosquito" (save the mark!)—this friendly investigator has belted the planet, carrying back to Russia a store of voluble comment on Aztec mythology, Egyptian agriculture, Japanese art; and the best of his travel essays have just been opened to a wider public than the Russian intelligentsia by their translation into French.

The translator informs us that the title of the collection was the author's own suggestion; which proves that Balmont has an instinct for titles. "I came into the world to see the sun," runs a line from one of his exuberant poems; and this collection is the diary of an amateur in physical sensations, particularly the sensation of sight. Nowhere else in literature, unless it be in a story of Poe's, do we remember to have read so breathtakingly vivid a rendering of the feeling which seizes a nervous person when he looks down from a height as in Balmont's account of his descent of the pyramidal Maya temple in Yucatan called the Casa del Hechicero. And there are not many more engaging pages in literature than the one describing the meeting with the half-buried statue in the Casa de la Vieja, in the same region. "I crawled into the subterranean passageway, bent to half my height. . . . In the passage, which was half choked with broken stone, against the left wall I discovered a remarkable piece of sculpture, a severe female face with only the bust visible beneath it. It seemed . . . that all the lower part of the body had been buried in the rubbish. Coming face to face with this visage I experienced a strange emotion, something like a reminiscence. . . . It was a wonderful face, of a Judeo-Egyptian type. Fine features, eyes living and deep, not lively but full of life, a fine nose with clean-cut, expressive nostrils, lips which had known how, which still knew how, to speak in silence. . . . This figure seemed alive. It expressed a thought, a sentiment. I was filled with hesitation and trouble. It seemed to me impossible to leave it thus, as one moves away from a lifeless picture, from a statue of stone. With an indescribable emotion I pressed my lips against the face, and a strange sensation of vivifying coolness permeated my being at the moment when those sculptured lips received my kiss and gave back a supernatural response."

The best chapter in the book is the one on Japanese poetry. This race-conscious Slav who reckons the Russians "the noblest people, and the most delicate, in existence"—this lover of his country who was wounded to the heart by the surrender of 1905—becomes a good friend of the "Poem-Land" and an enthusiastic admirer and translator of her writings. Even at third hand—for the French version is an artistic achievement—these tankas and hokkous are touching and beautiful, and as critic the lavish Russian shows the most accurate appreciation of an art which is worlds apart from his own.

It is to be hoped that Balmont will shortly be introduced to the English-speaking public. He seems to bear translation well, and his point of view will be more sympathetic to Anglo-Saxons than that of certain of his formidable fellow-countrymen.

Roy Temple House

Three Critics

Three Studies in English Literature: Kipling, Galsworthy, Shakespeare. By André Chevrillon. Translated by Florence Simonds. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.50.

Suspended Judgments. Essays on Books and Sensations. By John Cowper Powys. American Library Service. $3.

Thirteen Worthies. By Llewelyn Powys. American Library Service. $1.75.

THESE three books came to me together; it is convenient to review them together; yet there is little in common between them beyond the fact that they all belong within the large and vaguely limited field of literary criticism. Criticism of criticism is at best at second or third remove from real appreciation of literature; and I am tempted to recommend M. Chevrillon's Studies heartily and without reservation and to recommend the volumes by the Powys brothers less heartily and with considerable reservations—and consider my duties as a reviewer done. But something more than this needs to be said, if only to point the contrast between the brilliant and assured mastery of the distinguished French critic and the journalistic informality and ease of the other two books. The student of literature must know Chevrillon's opinions; he can without much danger dispense with the Powys books, which will find most of their readers in women's literary clubs in the smaller cities of this land.

Chevrillon's three essays in criticism were written quite independently with no thought of combining them into a volume. At first impression there appears to be little in common between Rudyard Kipling, John Galsworthy, and William Shakespeare that, when the Studies were collected together, could produce a well-defined and unified volume. Yet the book holds together admirably, because it is founded upon clearly reasoned and lucidly formulated principles of criticism and upon a knowledge of English literature and character that is, I believe, unrivaled in France. In a word, the unity of the book is to be sought in Chevrillon's visualization of the two contrasting sides of the Englishman: realism and mysticism, the seemingly irreconcilable traits which produce on the one hand force, grossness, pride, self-control, and a sense of duty to the race; on the other hand, sentiment, a tendency to moralize, a deeper feeling for the mystery of the world than other nations possess, and, at its highest, poetry of an imaginative quality and a profundity that is unequaled elsewhere in the modern world. Chevrillon tends to hark back to the old Arnoldian method of analysis; the modern Anglo-Saxon type showing the divergent traits of the Saxon and the Celt. One may leave such ethnological speculations to one side, and note that the critic writes with great acuteness of the contrast between the Englishman of the Renaissance and the modern type which has gradually emerged through the discipline and subordination of traits of character which in Shakespeare's day appeared upon the surface of English life.

The modern Englishman, with his energy, his instinct for government, his world-wide grasp, his pride of race, his ideal of duty, is reflected in the poetry of Rudyard Kipling. It is perhaps too much to expect that any foreigner, and especially any Frenchman, should possess that native instinct whereby we can recognize great poetry and keep it apart from rhetoric, more or less admirable, more or less blatant. It is enough to say that Chevrillon ranks Kipling higher than the judicious among those to whom English poetry is a racial inheritance have agreed to rate him. Moreover—though this is a criticism of Kipling rather than of his French interpreter—there is no effort to reveal the less excellent aspects of Kipling's doctrines; there is no rebuke forthcoming for the hypocritical cant about the White Man's Burden and the Lesser Breeds; there is much said of Kipling's warnings and prophecies of the coming clash with Germany, but it seems never to have occurred to Chevrillon that Kipling's unexampled hold upon the attention of Englishmen might in the early years of this unhappy century have been employed in bringing about the sympathetic and generous understanding between the two peoples which, had it been effected, might have made this world a fitter place for decent folk to dwell in.

Galsworthy, in Chevrillon's penetrating analysis, is seen to be probing below the surface of the modern Englishman, to be reaching down to those traits so long smothered by the national ideal which yet exist as the real motive forces of character and action. The novelist's technique is related cleverly to that of Meredith. Throughout his work, and especially in "The Forsyte Saga," his method is indirect; action and character in the principal persons of his stories are seen as reflected in the subordinate persons. An interesting comparison might have been drawn between Galsworthy and Joseph Conrad; between the methods of the two novelists there is something in common but more that is contrasting. But Chevrillon does not make this comparison, and there is no space to develop it here.

I find the elder Mr. Powys's essays solemn, rather dull, and more than a bit pretentious. His title puzzles me, for his judgments are seldom suspended. Rather, they are frequently delivered ex cathedra with an assurance which the academic and professorial critics whom he so frequently abuses must regard with envy not unmingled with alarm. He is inclined to refuse "the noble title of real Fiction-Lovers" to our whole generation, instancing in support of his refusal "the frivolous craze for short books." Yet I seem to remember that "Ulysses" and "The Forsyte Saga" and "A la Recherche du Temps Perdu" have been much talked of of late. He declares that "disillusion is the mark of civilized eras as opposed to barbaric ones." Indeed! The fifth century B.C.? The thirteenth century A.D.? "Don Juan would be a hodge-podge of indecency and sentimentality if it were not for the presence of genius." My marginal and unsuspended judgment of this remark is "Stuff!" "There is not the remotest trace of snobbishness in Henry James." On the contrary, James reeks of snobbishness. "France —always the protector of civilization." Come now!—in 1923?

Mr. Llewelyn Powys is less ponderous than his brother, and though his matter is thin, he is lively, genial, and entertaining, having a happy gift of apt quotation from the author he is appreciating which brings the good old "worthy"—Coryat or Urquhart or Woolman—vividly before us. He is less excellent when dealing with greater folk: Chaucer, Montaigne, Marlowe, Hardy. He is apparently fascinated by death-beds; we learn how a dozen of his thirteen worthies passed to their reward. May it be long before he can add the final paragraph to his final chapter!

Samuel C. Chew

Being Respectable

Being Respectable. By Grace H. Flandrau. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

THIS is a novel of the Main Street school, another critical study of a phase of American life. It is the portrait of the plutocracy of a Middle Western city, the indictment of that oligarchy to which George Babbitt aspired in vain. The picture which it gives of a provincial, respectable, mean-spirited, overfed, over-comfortable, and under-thinking existence seems perfect to one reader at least whose lot was cast for a time on just such a plane. The truth of Miss Flandrau's Columbia is exact and fine-drawn. Here is the city so many of us know, the leafy avenues, the ginger-bread houses whose cupolas and porticoes are being supplanted by a new Middle Western brand of "Colonial" architecture, here are the purring Cadillacs, the self-righteous churchgoers, the gluttonous overdressed women, the cocktails, country clubs, gossip and flirtation, the factitious interest in the book or the uplift movement of the moment, and here beneath it all are suffering, repression, and horror because life cannot quite contain itself within the deadly limits of that fashionable mediocrity.

"Being Respectable" is well constructed, it moves within a rounded form, yet it never fails to give a sense of continuity, of life spreading beyond the front and back covers of the book. Some of the characterizations are admirable—Darius Carpenter, the sentimental, half-dazed, lovable father of the family; his son Charles, a correct and successful rotter; Louisa, the elder daughter, unattractive, energetic, miserable Louisa, eternally straining in the pursuit of her gods of church, "society," and respectability until the death of her daughter leaves her broken at last in the loss of her one genuine, decent emotion. The people drawn within the circle of that narrow life are alive and real, but where the novel fails to become really momentous is in the portrayal of those who revolt from the bleakness of such an existence. Deborah, the younger daughter, supposedly the heroine of the book, the protestant against conventionality and provincialism, is an uninteresting person, devitalized, unimportant. To borrow the jargon of the stage, Miss Flandrau has found that it is easier to write, as it is to act, a "character part" than a "lead."

KATHARINE SERGEANT ANGELL

A Malicious Panorama

Through the Wheat. By Thomas Boyd. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.75.

WAR is a panorama of "grim comic imbecility" to the eyes of Mr. Boyd's character Hicks. Toplofty idealism is brought into the picture, only to be shattered by a barrage of deftest malice. A pompous captain, with a Napoleonic vision, or a zealous top sergeant, actuated by a crusading delusion, becomes helplessly ridiculous in the face of a platoon of unimpressed and "kidding" soldiers. The antithesis is given a more sharply ironic twist in the spectacle of men under fire becoming vocal in photographically trivial conversation about mail, food, and cigarettes. The popular sentimentalism of a bitter and personal hatred for the Germans is dismissed with a hilarious gesture:

"Possibly for an hour during his whole life he [Hicks] had hated the German army. Now he only disliked them. And for one reason: because they marched in a goose-step. He felt that for any people to march in that manner was embarrassing to the rest of humanity."

The author permits himself a broader view than would be provided through the personality of Hicks. Mr. Boyd takes a dive into the mental processes of a subordinate character to heighten the absurdity of his self-importance and his ponderously grave acceptance of war hokum. What these excursions over a wide field cost him in immediacy in terms of Hicks he recovers in his total effect of a tragic buffoonery.

Mr. Boyd further contrasts the recruiting-poster with actualities in a cumulative series of episodes. He begins with the grumbling of the soldiers at menial tasks. A night raiding party loses a man to the clumsy artillery attack of its own trenches and is thrown into a panic by a false gas-alarm. The commanding officer responsible for these blunders is touched off with a slight sneer as "a former professor of English at a Texas college." In the same casual tone, instance after instance is given of unprotected, meaningless advances in the midst of machine-gun nests. Hicks thinks it would save time and ammunition simply to offer all their necks to the kaiser's ax.

All the while, the pallid boyish witticisms and the endless succession of rumors of their destination are interrupted only by the dead silence of physical exhaustion. Hicks is paralyzed with fear while he is slowly advancing; he feels his "spine bare with scorpions parading along the flesh" when he is forced to wait upon orders from headquarters. At other times Hicks walks among dangers with the same irreverent unconcern that marks his offhand dubbing of President Wilson "old horse-face."

Without having the attention jerked toward them, the reader becomes aware of fields of yellow wheat as background to marching men, fighting men, hiding men, and dead men. The wheat lends an impersonal indifference and a serene sense of growth to a pageant of unrelated waste of life and energy. Hicks in the wheat-fields sees his friends shot away, gassed, shell-shocked. He is strung to an unbearable nervous tension, waiting, hungry, deafened, not knowing why he is there or where he is going. His mind patters off in childish games with words. He talks to dead men with a mock solemnity born of fatigue-drunkenness. Hicks is left with a foolish smile on his face and his stumbling, undirected feet guiding him away from an approaching line of German soldiers.

Mr. Boyd falters at the end. Hicks is a little undefined and his spiritual disintegration is thereby rendered less poignant. The author seems to hesitate between a finality and a progression and achieves neither. "Through the Wheat" is nevertheless a remarkable first novel. JOHN W. CRAWFORD

Books in Brief

Jefferson Davis: His Life and Personality. By Morris Schaff. John W. Luce and Company.

There was room, if not need, for a biography of Jefferson Davis, and this book contains a good deal of interesting personal data. Unfortunately, the superficial treatment of Davis's public career, joined to outspoken hero worship and a quite too familiar and personal literary style, make Mr. Schaff's work one of slight importance as an historical contribution. The student of American slavery, however, will find some interest in what the author has to tell of Davis's relations with the Negroes both before and after the Civil War.

Europe in the Middle Ages. By Ierne L. Plunket. Oxford: The Clarendon Press. $1.85.

A praiseworthy attempt "to make medieval Europe live for the many who, knowing nothing of her history, would like to know a little, in the lives of her principal heroes and villains, as well as in the tendencies of her classes and in the beliefs and prejudices of her thinkers." The book is apparently intended for use as a textbook, although that purpose is not stated.

A World History for the Workers. By Alfred Barton. London: Labour Publishing Company. 3s. 6d.

Mr. Alfred Barton is certainly well within his right in thinking that "working people" ought to have a history written by "one of their own," and in writing a book to fill that need, but his "World History for the Workers" cannot be accorded a very high place as either an historical or a literary performance. Mr. Barton begins with the theory of evolution and the emergence of man and ends with the problems of yesterday, today, and the future, the narrative of events between these extremes being devoted to a rapid and rather disjointed account of the struggles of the "disinherited" against capitalism and class, with liberal quotation of Karl Marx and other writers. We do not object to sensible propaganda and we think highly of the value of history, but the percentage of propaganda in Mr. Barton's volume is so high that the purely historical portions are relatively unimportant.

Expenditures of the Sino-Japanese War. War and Armament Expenditures of Japan. By Giichi Ono. Oxford University Press, American Branch. $2.25 each.

Expenditures of the Russo-Japanese War. By Gotaro Ogawa. Oxford University Press, American Branch. $2.50.

Military Industries of Japan. By Ushisaburo Kobayashi. Oxford University Press, American Branch. $2.25

The history of recent warfare, particularly on its political, administrative, and economic sides, prior to the Great War of 1914-1918, is enriched by these four publications lately issued under the auspices of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Neither of these works is primarily devoted to technical military or naval operations, and their exhaustive study of what may be called the civil side of war forms a permanent contribution to the recent history of Japan in its relations with China and Russia. Three additional volumes of this Japanese series are promised.

England Under the Restoration (1660-1688). By Thora G. Stone. With a preface by A. F. Pollard. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.50.

A collection of extracts from contemporary sources, forming No. IV of the University of London Intermediate Source-Books of History.

Les Sources de l'Histoire de France: XVII$^e$ Siècle (1610-1715). Par Emile Bourgeois et Louis André. III. Biographies. Paris: Auguste Picard.

The first volume of Part III of this monumental bibliography of French history, containing a list, with critical annotations, of contemporary biographies, with references to later works of special importance. A brief introduction treats interestingly of the value of biographies as material for history.

The Dancer of Shamahka. By Armen Ohanian. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

To read this book is to behold a long panorama of mosques and minarets, of dreaming villages under brilliant blue skies, of palm-lined hills, of struggling caravans, and of glaring yellow sands; and at times, breaking the peacefulness of the scene, one sees bearded Cossacks snap their brutal whips, observes terrified women and children trembling at the threats of massacre, or watches an earthquake shaking a beautiful town to ruins. Armenia, Russia, Persia, Turkey, Greece, and Egypt constitute the setting of this novel, which is autobiographical in method and tells of the adventures of an Armenian woman harried by misfortune and reduced in the end to becoming a professional dancer. The story is told in a style glowing with ardor and imagination.

The Wrong Move. By Anna Robeson Burr. The Macmillan Company. $2.

A mystery story of elaborate design and an ambitious outlay of characters, motives, and clues. This embarrassment of riches maintains the mystery through the greater part of the book by diffusing the reader's suspicion. But the frequently used method of presenting a number of characters all apparently innocent is more successful in sustaining a prolonged interest, for it is more stimulating to discern a criminal beneath a cloak of guilelessness than to choose him at random from a group of equally vicious persons.

Music

The Symphony Players

NEARLY two years ago the National Symphony Orchestra was merged with the Philharmonic, ostensibly because the cost of its maintenance was too high to be met. At that time there was a great deal of talk about the alleged venality of musicians. They were denounced in all manner of ways, one prominent conductor taking part in traducing them in the press. Throughout private channels the prevailing theory was, and is still, that the musician should remember that he is an artist, always be sincere in his work, not assume the role of agitator, etc. Now the musician would like very much to conform to such theories, but any desire to do so has been knocked out of him by the unequal struggle he has to fight to get a bare living. His employers seemingly expect him to be satisfied with praise, while compelling him to suppress his impulses to better himself by the implied threat of losing his job.

Due to recent intra-union activities in New York, there arose a demand for new wage-scales in the theaters. The conservatives won; there was no increase; theater musicians will work the year round at existing prices. But for the symphony musician such negotiations can have little significance. For him it it is not a question of raising his wages for yearly employment, because his season lasts barely half a year and he is always face to face with the difficulty of making the other half remunerative. It thus appears that the symphony musician constitutes a peculiar problem when viewed in comparison with his fellow-craftsman.

To begin with, a symphony player must possess the actual or potential ability to play the most difficult music that has been written for his instrument. He must also be a thorough musician as well, understanding the rationale of orchestral ensemble and the many and varied ramifications of different schools of interpretation. To these must be added an attentive and studious demeanor, a reliable memory, continuous energy and enthusiasm, and a prodigious degree of elasticity in both theory and performance. His individual artistry is only half of his equipment; the remainder lies in his capacity to subordinate himself to the conductor, who besides requiring perfect obedience often alters in a concert things the musician supposed settled in rehearsal. It is thus evident that to give satisfaction in a symphony orchestra involves an amount of training that is not even required of a solo performer, who is responsible to no one but himself.

Having fulfilled these necessities (and woe betide the man who has managed to enter an orchestra without them!) the musician is then confronted with the actual life on the job. This article being principally concerned with New York affairs, it can be stated at once that the symphony season covers but 23 or 24 weeks. Unless he is a wind-soloist, or a first-desk string player, or perhaps one of a limited group whose services seem to command a higher salary than most, he is paid the union minimum, $60. Obviously, whether married or not, he cannot subsist the year round on $1,440 for a 24-week engagement. To augment his earnings, therefore, he turns to the theaters or hotels. Here, if he choose to work practically all day and evening, he may, if well enough acquainted with the contractors, enlarge his salary by 50 or 75 per cent. The winter months, from October to April, are most favorable for obtaining theater jobs; from spring to fall some theaters and picture-houses reduce their orchestras, or shut down altogether. And the competition among New York musicians is so strong that during the off season a first-class man often walks the streets when his inferiors are well provided for. However, it is within the limits of symphony employment itself that conditions are most unfavorable.

The two major orchestras of New York are allowed by the union at present a minimum of five rehearsals and four concerts a week. Their official aim is apparently to give as many concerts as possible during the 24-week season, to make the orchestra pay as much of its way as it can, and to supply the public with all it can absorb with a view to increasing enthusiasm and subscriptions. There is nothing theoretically objectionable in such a policy, but in its working-out it contributes materially to the present deplorable rebelliousness of the orchestra musician. To give four concerts and rehearse often three different programs in one week is too much for consistently superior performance. Even if the musician had nothing else to do, the mental responsibility would far surpass the physical. It has already been shown that he cannot restrict his earning capacity in favor of a single allegiance; the result is that under such a strenuous regimen he is traditionally fatigued and below par. Therefore success from the conductor's viewpoint is achieved only at the cost of unquestionable exhaustion and its attendant disadvantages of irritability and dissatisfaction. This impairs the morale of the orchestra and engenders hard feelings against the management and promoters. A casual observer might remark that the possibility of earning $2,000-$2,500 a year compares favorably with many other salaried professions, but such a conjecture takes no account of the essential well-being either of the man or his work.

Further handicaps are imposed on the musician by the crowded concert season. If he be fortunate enough to hold a theater position, he must send substitutes three or four times weekly. This often offends the theater-conductor, who is apt to object if substitutes are sent more than once or twice a week. Thus, not infrequently a symphony man finds his orchestral position a definite drawback when seeking a steady outside engagement. His symphony is the work which in his heart he enjoys most, and is proudest of; but when he discovers that its demands restrict his additional earnings he begins seriously to wonder if art for art's sake is not too idealistic a theory to support.

What might be said of the symphony man who would like to make his entire living from his orchestra, and devote all his efforts to it? He would like a season of at least 35 weeks with a minimum salary of $3,500 yearly. He would prefer to be able to bring true enthusiastic energy to his work, without drawing continually on his reserve vitality. He would choose as a matter of course, to please the conductor as much as possible. He would be glad to keep his musical ideals, eager to retain the sheer happiness of playing that made him take up his profession in the beginning. And he would welcome a reasonable security in his position.

All these considerations are becoming more and more impossible at the present. No matter how laudable are the public professions of promoters, they do not ring true to the musician. He is not allowed to be happy in his work; his fidelity to ideals is taken for granted; he is kept going like a machine. He knows that if he protests in the slightest any irritation he may be replaced by another. He is made to feel his impotence, forced to the bitter realization that while he may furnish the public with education, enjoyment, rapture even, his individual worthiness is lost sight of in a vague and sentimental collective fame which renders him no personal reward. He gets into a mental and emotional rut; what began as artistic ideals becomes mere routine. And this is all wrong.

Conductors play a considerable part in his troubles. The authority vested in a conductor is often systematically abused. Only once in a long while is he appreciative of how much of his own success is due to his men. In too many cases in America conductors are riding rough-shod to fame over the very musicians who make their success possible. We need not go into details or personalities; the simple statement that in almost every symphony orchestra in this country the conductor, not the orchestra, is the sine qua non in the eyes of the management and backers, is enough.

Dr. Muck of the old Boston Symphony was one notable exception to the general rule. He was wont to give public signs of his appreciation of his orchestra by sometimes laying down his baton and allowing the orchestra to play certain virtuoso passages with no other guidance than his eyes. This always electrified the audience and contributed in large measure to the orchestra's reputation. Given such a compliment by its conductor, any orchestra would literally break its neck to justify the implication of its virtuosity.

It is asking too much of the orchestra player, however, to expect him to keep at high pitch considering the trials he has to undergo. Most musicians are men of distinctly peculiar temperament, which can be developed into an asset or a liability in accordance with the way it is handled. In order to achieve artistic results, the musician must retain a spontaneous naivete, as well as mere mechanical perfection. The conductor too often takes his good intentions and performances for granted; but at the same time his imperfections and lapses from good-nature are treated as deliberate offenses. No allowance is made for their possible justification; they must simply not exist. Yet numberless times the musician submits uncomplainingly to the pettiest exhibitions of ill-temper and childishness on the part of a conductor. He realizes that the latter is in a delicate position, and nearly always cheerfully admits a fault. This the conductor will rarely do; and yet, season after season, he walks off proudly appropriating the public and private plaudits, the press talks about him only, and the orchestra is left in the background.

Let me not grow sentimental. It is evident that these matters will probably always remain much the same, and there is no reason to rave about it. Musicians, too, should rejoice that their path is free of the public and social responsibilities of their leader. But what the orchestral musician cannot bear is, not that he is not lauded and praised and feted by press and promoter, but that he is not given due respect and recompense for his life of service. He more than anyone else is responsible for the fame of conductors and the success of orchestras. He more than either is the foundation on which the very life of music is built. There were musicians before there were conductors; there were individual instrumentalists before there were orchestras. What is ideal for the one should be made ideal for the many. The musician, like other beings, is only human after all. Naturally he rebels as long as a conductor can demand and receive a salary running from twenty to forty thousand dollars, while he is almost entirely neglected and not considered worth more than fifteen hundred for the same length of season.

It is not with any inimical spirit that these opinions are given. It is not to demand or expect a self-centered Utopia for musicians that these facts, suggestions, and correctives are adduced. There is a deeper motive, a more vital desire, in this as in any other crusading. We in America are too nearly submerged, from our very birth and traditions, in complacency and self-satisfaction not to heed the desirability of putting as much puissance as possible into our art as well as into our general life. It is worse than deplorable, it is more tragic than unfortunate, that those who sponsor the greatest musical forces in our country have not the will or the foresight to make their beneficence as comprehensive in fact as it professes to be in theory. It is inconceivable that the prominent financiers and successful entrepreneurs who control American orchestral affairs could not devote their business acumen and initiative enterprise to reorganizing the entire symphony proposition. The present system gets results, it is true: as witness the brilliant performances so often given by the New York orchestras. But few realize that it succeeds in spite of, rather than on account of, its conditions, and that it is undermining all the artistic sincerity and idealism of the very men whose ability alone should make membership in great orchestras a proud and satisfying possession. ALLAN LINCOLN LANGLEY

International Relations Section

Russia's Economic Revival

By ALEXANDER M. KRASNOSCHOKOV

Moscow, April 1

THE economic situation of Russia has improved greatly in the last year and a half. This improvement includes agriculture, industry, commerce, and finance.

The last harvest of breadstuffs, fodderstuffs, and potatoes amounted to 2,833,000,000 poods, an increase of one billion poods over the previous year. Up to a short time ago the area of cultivated land was but 55 per cent of the peace figure, but today the agricultural production is nearly 70 per cent of the pre-war production. The result of the harvest played an important part in the general improvement of the situation, but by no means the only part. The measures taken by the government were of great effect. Particular attention is being devoted to agriculture this year by the government. Thus far 20,600,000 poods of seed have been placed at the disposal of the farmers by the government as a loan. The budget of 1922-23 appropriates 55,000,000 gold rubles for loans to farmers, and another 25,000,000 gold rubles will be used for the organization of a credit system for the small peasants.

In industry we find improvements along every line. During 1922 the production of coal rose 24 per cent in comparison with the preceding year, of naphtha 20 per cent, crude iron 41 per cent, iron and steel 90 per cent, rolled metals 66 per cent, raw textile wares 243 per cent, yarn 180 per cent, woolen stuffs 32 per cent, and linen stuffs 82 per cent. The productive capacity of all industries has increased importantly. The wages of the workingmen in Petrograd and Moscow and also in some important industrial centers in the provinces have risen to 78 per cent of the pre-war figure. In certain branches of industry with a quick turnover of capital, industries that are dependent on the consumption of the masses, the leasing system has developed. About 40,000 undertakings have been leased. Of these, 40 per cent are in the food and leather industries, and private individuals make up 50 per cent of the lessees. The reconstruction of industry commands the chief attention of the Soviet Government. Under the current year's budget, industry is to receive loans amounting to 89,000,000 gold rubles.

The financial system has improved greatly. The budget carries one billion gold rubles, and is closed with a deficit of but 25 per cent, whereas the deficit of the last previous budget exceeded 80 per cent. The rate of emission is falling relatively, and the actual value of the paper money outstanding is increasing. On January 1, 1921, the paper money in circulation had a value of 41 million gold rubles; today it is worth 105 millions. Covered banknotes in circulation have today a value of more than 45 million gold rubles.

Along with the development of agriculture and industry goes an improvement of commerce, especially the nationalized commerce. If one assumes 100 as the turnover of the nationalized commerce in January, 1922, the turnover for last December amounted to 359. Private commerce has developed strikingly. Not only has the flight from the cities stopped, but it has been replaced by a stream of inhabitants from the villages to the cities. The latest census enumerations of urban population show that the increase in population everywhere has been at least 10 per cent. This process has brought with it a bettering of public order and the raising of the cultural standards of life in a manner that is evident even to the casual visitor to Russia.

On the political side the period just passed through is marked by a fact of the greatest historical importance. I refer to the organization of the U.S.S.R.—the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics. This step will mean an economic consolidation in the internal affairs of Russia and the strengthening of the country's influence in international affairs. It must not be thought, however, that we have gone back to the methods of pre-revolutionary centralization. On the contrary, along with the complete, unlimited unity of the federation, the most far-going independence in matters of economic activities is assured to every member.

The recent reform increasing the rights of the local governmental authorities has also been carried out along the same line of decentralization. The new arrangement of administrative districts, the adapting of administrative units to the economic needs, and the economic and political regrouping contribute to the perfecting of the official apparatus and the heightening of its effectiveness. The improvement of the entire social situation of the country corresponds with these political improvements. The contact between laboring man and peasant, between city and country, has been made firmer and closer under the influence of the introduction of the tax in products, which replaced compulsory collection of taxes, and also under the influence of the increased production of the farmers.

The matter of taxation is today the basic problem of the state's policy. Its importance rests on the transition from barters in kind to barters for money, and upon the profound changes which this evokes in the country's economy and the formation of its budget. For the Soviet Government, which is a socialistic Power, the progressive income tax and the receipts from property owned by the state are the most acceptable sources of revenue, and our financial policy is built upon these. But the country, which was exhausted by an imperialistic war, revolutions, blockade, and isolation, is so badly weakened that it would not be possible to erect the fundamental parts of the budget upon this basis. The greatest part of the industry needs subsidies, the incomes of the citizens are not sufficiently differentiated and definite, and the taxation machinery is not adequately organized.

Up to recently the lion's share of the state's income consisted of taxes in kind. What could not be obtained in this way had to be obtained by printing paper money. But now the situation has altered radically. The furnishing of the work of horses by the peasants has been completely replaced by a money tax. The tax on necessaries of life plays already a much less important role in the budget. In the course of this year we shall replace these in part for the non-agricultural governments by the money tax. The part played in the budget by note-emission is steadily decreasing, that played by taxation is steadily increasing.

In January, 1922, the note-emission amounted to 91.5 per cent of the total receipts of money; at the end of the year to only 50 per cent. In January, 1922, receipts from taxation amounted to but 1.8 per cent of total receipts; at the end of the year to 25 per cent. The receipts from property and businesses owned by the state rose in the same period from 7 to 26 per cent. In January, 1922, the average monthly increase of the money in circulation amounted to 56.2 per cent, and in February of the same year to 56.6 per cent, but in January, 1923, it had dropped to 33.5 per cent, and in February to only 29 per cent. The emission is dropping in rapid tempo. At the same time the circulation of covered paper money—the banknotes—is increasing rapidly. As mentioned before, these notes already in circulation amount to 45 million gold rubles, compared with a purely fiat circulation of 105 millions. These results were made possible only by carrying out a consistent taxing policy. The budget for 1922-23, carrying one billion gold rubles, contemplates receipts of somewhat more than 500 millions through taxation. Receipts from undertakings and property owned by the state will, it is estimated, bring in more than 400 millions.

It would be incorrect to assume that the greater part of the taxes falls on industry and commerce. Of the 500 million rubles expected from taxation, 140 millions will come from indirect taxes and 15 millions from customs duties. These taxes fall entirely on the consumer. Direct taxes amount to 375 million rubles, the main part coming from the taxation of necessaries of life. Thus, considered in retrospect, our taxation policy means a decided step forwards from taxes in kind to taxes in money, and from inflation to deflation.

The revolutionary years destroyed our taxing machinery utterly, civil warfare altered the inner structure of the masses, and it is natural that the first steps in the direction of restoring our taxation system were accompanied by some excesses. These came especially in the cities. The destroyed municipal administration and the sanitary situation demanded great outlays at a time when the people's purchasing power was small and all settling of accounts and inventorying were completely lacking. But these excesses are steadily diminishing. A number of legal decrees define strictly the powers of the central and local officials and prescribe the manner of assessing and collecting taxes. The whole machinery of the commission for domestic trade and of the supreme people's economic council has been adapted to the regulating of the constantly shifting problems of taxation.

A vastly more complicated problem is the social side of the taxation policy. Our might, that is, the might of the workmen's and peasants' government, rests on the basis of harmonious relations of heavy industry with agriculture to achieve the aim of mutual work for the rebuilding of the state's economy upon a socialistic foundation. The development of industry requires enormous means. The sources of the state's income are taxes. In a country of peasants the peasant is the chief taxpayer. In view of this it might appear to the superficial observer that it is necessary to increase the peasants' taxes as much as possible in favor of the city. But that would be a shortsighted policy. Industry cannot be restored by state subsidies, but through the sale of its products in the domestic market under a strong demand. It is necessary to restore the purchasing power of the agricultural population, and this lays upon our government the duty of protecting the interests of that part of our people. The compulsory requisition of foodstuffs was replaced by an orderly tax to be paid in produce, and by requiring a certain amount of work with draft animals. The latter is now being altered to a progressive money tax, and in the course of this year a beginning will be made in substituting a money tax for the foodstuffs tax also. An income tax is gradually being introduced which will eventually be the only form of tax raised. At the same time the government is taking all measures to lower the costs of production in the state industries, to bring about closer relations between industrial and agricultural producers, and to better the condition of agriculture. A great part of the money taken from the peasants returns to them in the form of services performed for them by the state.

We are adjusting ourselves to the steadily diminishing role which the emission of paper money plays as a source of revenue for the state, to the substitution of money taxes for all forms of taxes in products, to a separation between central and local receipts, and to the introduction of exactitude into our taxing system. Our chief aim, which we keep ever in view, is to make the receipts from the state's farms and other natural resources, forests, industries, and commercial undertakings, and from the markedly increasing export the big, central item of our income. Foreign capital has no reason to fear our taxing policy. The day of excesses is past, and our whole system is directed toward the work of reconstruction and toward the creation of favorable conditions for economic development.

Joffe in Japan

"THE conversation between Viscount Goto and Mr. Joffe at the end of March, and the Viscount's visit to Premier Kato on April 10, formed a basis for a preliminary exchange of opinions, admittedly unofficial, between the Japanese Government and the representative of the R.S.F.S.R. in the Far East," says the New Russia, of Shanghai, in its issue for May. "The news of the conversation of Viscount Goto with the Premier got into the press about a week later, in connection with the consideration in the Council of Ministers of the question of Russo-Japanese relations, but at once the Russian question took a place of first importance."

In this connection the New Russia reproduces an interview between a correspondent of the Tokio Nichi-Nichi and the Russian visitor. Some of the questions and answers, which were exchanged in writing, follow:

> Q.—Many look upon the coming economic cooperation of Japan and Russia pessimistically, not only because of our different economic system but also because in Japan at the present time the prices of goods are so high that it is scarcely possible to dispose of them on the Siberian market. There are expectations of fishery concessions, forestry concessions, etc. But the conclusion of these concessions depends mainly on the Soviet Government. You, in your article published in a certain journal, wrote of the necessity of the creation of "cooperation between the Soviet Republic and capitalistic states." Do you look forward to the possible creation and development of just this kind of cooperation in the Far East?
>
> A.—In my article I wrote of the problem which stands equally before the capitalist and the Soviet world, not touching upon the concrete form of solution of this problem. It may be understood that the problem itself is one of similar nature both in the West and East.

As to pessimism with regard to the possibility of purely commercial relations between Russia and Japan, the facts do not appear to confirm such pessimism, as according to Japanese figures there passed through Tsuruga in three months merchandise of a value of 18,000,000 yen, which is not so bad if we take into consideration that normal commercial relations between the two countries do not as yet exist. But, aside from this, it seems to me that this pessimism is not justified even theoretically; goods cheaper than Japanese could be obtained by Russia only in a country with a low exchange rate, i. e., in Europe; the cost of bringing these goods from Europe to the Russian Far East would probably equalize the prices. I do not think that Japan can seriously figure on the European Russian market, but the Far Eastern—theoretically—must belong either to Japan or to America, depending upon which country sooner comes to an agreement with Russia, and shows greater attention to her condition and her needs.

Q.—In political circles in Tokio in the last few days it is said that the principal obstacles to the renewal of Russo-Japanese relations are, first, the intervention in Sakhalin, and, second, the non-recognition of the governments. As to the first question we have already received your reply. As regards the second question, in just what way must the recognition of governments be made? By the publication of a special declaration or by agreement on the conditions of exchanging diplomatic representatives, as defined in the Rapallo treaty?

A.—In the history of international relations there have so far been known only cases of internal political revolutions in which the new governments appeared as unreservedly and wholly the successors to the old in all questions of international relations; for this reason the custom was, as it were, established, that other governments should declare their recognition or non-recognition of the given political revolution and the government arising from it.

The Russian revolution went far deeper, and involved an overturn not only in internal but also in international relations in that, first, it annulled all the debts of the Czarist regime, and, second, annulled all treaties concluded with Russia at any time prior to the revolution. In this way, if at the present time some state should desire to declare its recognition of the Soviet Government de jure, this would be insufficient, as there would still not exist between Russia and the given state any treaty relations whatever, and it would be absolutely necessary to conclude a treaty of some kind.

On the other hand, almost all the bourgeois states of the world carried on war against Soviet Russia, and war, as is well known, according to international law cancels ipso facto all previous relations.

In no peace treaty concluded since the war is there ever any clause of recognition, the fact of recognition flowing out of the treaty itself and the establishment or renewal of normal diplomatic and consular relations.

In all normal treaties concluded so far by Soviet Russia, including Germany, Afghanistan, Latvia, Lithuania, Turkey, Persia, Esthonia, Finland, Poland (and even in the treaty concluded with Germany, Austro-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey at Brest-Litovsk), this question was settled in just the way indicated, in full agreement with international law. I think it must be settled in just the same way between Russia and Japan.

May Day in Mexico

THE following declaration by José Vasconcelos, Minister of Education, was read in the schools of Mexico on May 1:

On this date the workers' holiday is celebrated, and it is necessary that the children give a loving thought to their parents to whose labor they owe their sustenance and the hours which they dedicate to study; and also to all those in this world who work to earn their daily bread and to better gradually the world's conditions. Man would possess nothing, neither humble homes nor the poorest food, were it not for the labor which distinguishes us from the animals, which permits us to dominate and regulate the appetites and create the tools with which we build houses and extract its products from the earth. . . .

A life, modest but comfortable, and time to conceive beautiful things—that is what the society in which he lives ought to give to every worker, and that is attainable only by means of energetic labor intelligently orientated.

The children ought to venerate labor as a mysterious instrument of human salvation; nevertheless, labor, which is the most sacred of the powers of man, has been prostituted and defiled. Labor, which is an instrument of liberation, has been employed by some evil men to enslave their brothers. The accumulation of disproportionate riches for personal benefit has converted labor, which ought to be sacred, into a satanic plague which occasions the unhappiness of the monopolist and of his victims. Labor produces riches, and if such riches, in place of being employed in works of general benefit, serve only as a means by which one man may try to satiate all his appetites, then he who accumulates riches prostitutes his soul by devoting all his attention to the physical—he himself loses and causes others to lose, condemning them to the misery which fills their souls with anguish. This reciprocal harm, this lack of equilibrium, produces hatred of one toward the other and conflict between them. And one of these conflicts, a bloody conflict, originated this holiday which the workers celebrate on the first of May. It commemorates one of so many occasions on which the exploiters did not limit themselves to diminishing the wage of the exploited, but, making use of force, sacrificed the workers who were demanding more equitable adjustments in the distribution of the products of labor.

Since then the workers of the entire world reaffirm on this day their proposal that riches be distributed with equity in order that there exist no bitter disputes, in order that labor may benefit all men and improve all men. And the children who are the sons and daughters of the workers, and who ought to aspire to be the workers of the future, must feel themselves bound to the worker who constructs, to the mason who erects walls, to the mechanic who manufactures machines, to the thinker who organizes peoples. Therefore, today is also the holiday of the children because it is the holiday of tomorrow. Mexican boys, Mexican girls, place your affection and your gratitude in the workers who are making the world advance, and prepare your arms for future labor. Reverence labor, but without prostituting it with egoism. Work, not so much to be richer, but for the benefit of all men and in order that on the morrow the entire world may be better.

Contributors to This Issue

ALICE STONE BLACKWELL, daughter of Lucy Stone and a niece of Elizabeth Blackwell, has for more than forty years been a leader in the woman's rights movement.

PIERRE HUDICOURT was a delegate from Haiti to the second conference at The Hague and was formerly the head of the bar association of Port au Prince.

FRED LEWIS PATTEE is professor of American literature in the Pennsylvania State College.

SHOLOM ASCH is a Polish Jew now living in America whose novels and plays in the Yiddish language were acclaimed in Europe before they gained recognition in the United States. His play "The God of Vengeance" was produced in English last winter in New York.

ALEXANDER M. KRASNOSCHOKOV was formerly president of the Far Eastern Republic and is now the general director of the Russian Bank for Commerce and Industry.

IN the brief time which has elapsed since the Straw Vote for Liberals was announced almost two thousand ballots have been returned to the Editor, of which somewhat over a thousand six hundred have been counted as this page goes to the press. Both the number of responses and the character of the supporting letters which accompany many of the ballots are strong indications of the value and importance of the questionaire, for Liberals and for the Liberal press. For those readers of The Nation who have not yet voted the ballot form is reprinted below. Help find out what the Liberals are thinking.

The outstanding change from last week's tabulation is the gain of Henry Ford as a presidential choice. He has now outstripped Borah and is only two votes behind La Follette among the candidates for the existing parties. Mr. McAdoo, however, still safely holds the lead. There is little change in the attitude toward the third party, the surprising thing being that in the East the sentiment seems to be almost as favorable as elsewhere in the country. A marked gain also is shown in the number of advocates of the League, particularly in the East and Mid-West.

The results of the Straw Vote for Liberals are being published regularly in The New Republic.

| | | | | | | | | To head Third Ticket | | | | | Choice of candidate existing parties | | | | | | | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| SECTION | Join the League | Join with reservations | Opposed to League | More favorable than in 1920 | Less favorable than in 1920 | Favor Third Party | Opposed Third Party | La Follette | Borah | Johnson | Ford | Others | Harding | McAdoo | Ford | Borah | Smith | La Follette | Others | Favor public ownership: mines | Opposed | Favor public ownership: railroads | Opposed |
| East: New England; New York; Pennsylvania; New Jersey; Maryland; Delaware; West Virginia .... | 291 | 240 | 292 | 302 | 407 | 609 | 190 | 193 | 166 | 7 | 57 | 113 | 43 | 214 | 85 | 106 | 67 | 92 | 86 | 696 | 135 | 640 | 189 |
| Mid-West: Ohio; Indiana; Michigan; Illinois; Wisconsin; Iowa; Kansas; Missouri; Oklahoma; Kentucky | 124 | 104 | 162 | 132 | 203 | 302 | 78 | 110 | 65 | 8 | 51 | 44 | 25 | 108 | 53 | 36 | 13 | 66 | 46 | 334 | 66 | 323 | 79 |
| Northwest: Minnesota; No. Dakota; So. Dakota; Wyoming; Idaho; Montana; Oregon; Washington. | 21 | 42 | 46 | 28 | 52 | 71 | 15 | 31 | 21 | 2 | 14 | 5 | 2 | 20 | 18 | 14 | 6 | 21 | 11 | 80 | 14 | 74 | 18 |
| Southwest: California; New Mexico; Nevada; Arizona; Utah; Colorado. | 29 | 25 | 67 | 39 | 73 | 100 | 21 | 30 | 18 | 4 | 17 | 21 | 6 | 31 | 28 | 20 | 6 | 11 | 17 | 106 | 22 | 100 | 26 |
| South: The Old South; including Arkansas; Tennessee; Texas .......... | 34 | 33 | 31 | 41 | 46 | 50 | 39 | 21 | 14 | — | 12 | 2 | 3 | 30 | 16 | 10 | 5 | 12 | 13 | 64 | 23 | 62 | 26 |
| | 499 | 444 | 598 | 542 | 781 | 1132 | 343 | 385 | 284 | 21 | 151 | 185 | 79 | 403 | 200 | 186 | 97 | 202 | 173 | 1280 | 260 | 1199 | 338 |

Note: Not everyone replied to all the questions on the ballot, so that the number of ballots counted does not agree with the total number of votes on any given question.—The New Republic.

Cut out here and mail to
Straw Vote Editor →

The New REPUBLIC
421 West 21st Street
NewYork City

THE LIBERAL STRAW BALLOT

1. Do you favor joining the League (a) as now constituted?..............., (b) with reservations?..............., or (c) are you definitely opposed?..............
(yes or no) (yes or no) (yes or no)
2. Are you more sympathetic toward the League than in 1920, or less?...............
(more—less)
3. Do you favor the idea of a third party in the field for 1924?..................If so whom would you select to head the ticket?.......................
(yes or no) (name of candidate)
4. Of the presidential possibilities now being discussed, which one would you be most likely to vote for if he were nominated by any of the existing parties?...........................
(name of candidate)
5. Do you favor public ownership of (a) mines..............., (b) railroads?..............
(yes or no) (yes or no)

Note: To insure accuracy and prevent any possibility of duplication, ballots must be signed (with address) and mailed to the Straw Ballot Editor, The New Republic, 421 West 21st Street, New York City. A letter of explanation or comment would be welcome. Also names of other Liberals to whom the ballots may be sent. This ballot is secret—your opinions are confidential and will not be quoted.

...................................................
(your signature)

...................................................
(address in full)

...................................................

Nation 7-18-23

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 25, 1923 No. 3029

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .... 73
EDITORIALS:
  Whither France? Whither Germany? .... 76
  British Labor Surveys Its Task .... 77
  Man and Folk .... 77
  Hall Caine Up to Date .... 78
COMPANY UNIONS OR NATIONAL UNIONS?—A DEBATE:
  The Pennsylvania's War on Labor. By Paul Blanshard .... 79
  The Railroad's Reply. By Samuel Rea .... 80
  The National Union's Viewpoint. By N. P. Good .... 82
THESE UNITED STATES—XXXIV. KENTUCKY: WHERE MEN DIE STANDING. By Ben Lucien Burman .... 83
STRAWS AND CONFETTI. By William Hard .... 86
ANYHOW DEBS SPOKE IN CINCINNATI. By Mary D. Brite .... 87
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter .... 88
CORRESPONDENCE .... 88
BOOKS:
  A Man of Faith. By J. W. Krutch .... 90
  A Great Queen. By William H. Scheifley .... 90
  Essays and Reminiscence. By Gerald Hewes Carson .... 91
  Follies of Imperial Germany. By Hermann Lutz .... 92
  A Textbook on Literature. By Johan J. Smertenko .... 93
  Presbyterian Demons. By Clement Wood .... 93
  The Tramping Methodist. By Katharine Sergeant Angell .... 94
  Reality and Imperfection. By Laura Benét .... 94
  Criminological Wisdom and Unwisdom. By John Koren .... 94
  Books in Brief .... 95
DRAMA:
  Dunsany. By Ludwig Lewisohn .... 95
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
  Poland: A Danger Spot. By Robert Dell .... 96
  Indians Clubbed and Bayoneted .... 97

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
LEWIS S. GANNETT ERNEST H. GRUENING
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY, MANAGING EDITOR
JOHN MACY, LITERARY EDITOR
IRITA VAN DOREN, ADVERTISING MANAGER
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
JOHN A. HOBSON ANATOLE FRANCE H. L. MENCKEN
FRIEDRICH WILHELM FOERSTER ROBERT HERRICK
CARL VAN DOREN NORMAN THOMAS

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: Ernest Thurtle, 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N. W. 4, England.

MAGNUS JOHNSON'S sweep of Minnesota as Farmer-Labor Party candidate for United States Senator is like the roar of thunder heralding a great storm. It is a warning to both old parties that the people of the Northwest are tired of standpattism. The Democratic candidate was out of the running from the start; the Republican kept his party's leader, the President of the United States, out of the State, and disavowed its national platform on the tariff and other issues in a desperate effort to save himself. But the Farmer-Labor alliance held out. Undoubtedly the last-moment fall in the price of wheat played a part. As certainly the farmers and workers knew what they were doing. They were voting for the La Follette progressive bloc as against the two old parties. La Follette's son and half a dozen "Republican" representatives from Wisconsin stumped the State for Johnson; so did Lynn Frazier, Nonpartisan League "Republican" Senator from North Dakota; so did Montana's "Democratic" Senator, Wheeler. Magnus Johnson will swell the ranks of the progressive bloc which these men have already formed. July 16 was a great day for those who long for a real third party in America, in which country and city producers may join hands to realize a fundamental economic program.

"FRANCE Ratifies Washington Treaties"—on the front page. "French Deputies Vote Serbian Loan"—in very small type on an inside page. "Just before ending the session the Chamber of Deputies voted by a large majority a 300-million franc credit for Jugoslavia. This credit is to cover deliveries of military material made by France to Jugoslavia in the last two years." Jugoslavia is a part of the French bloc in Central Europe. One hundred million francs to Rumania for military expenditures; four hundred millions to Poland; three hundred millions to Serbia; unknown millions to Czecho-Slovakia—all to be spent on French-made munitions, and all advanced as freely as wartime loans by a Power that pleads poverty and whimpers that it cannot pay a sou on its own debts. If France wants to convince America that she is ready to help the peace of the world she will have to do more than ratify Mr. Hughes's "disarmament treaty" (which limits neither cruisers nor submarines nor airplanes nor land armies); she must stop promoting the militarization of the lesser Powers.

AN English commentator observes in the Contemporary Review with surprise that the French loan to Poland has provoked American opinion more than all the reports of excesses in the Ruhr. We are dulled to atrocity stories. But one detail of French militarism in the Ruhr is new, and Americans of all people should understand its peculiar cruelty. In the midst of the terrific heat wave which has been sweeping Central Europe the Chicago Tribune reported the protest of the German trade unions against a French military order that all windows in Essen and other Ruhr towns must be closed from 9 p. m. until 6 a. m. Probably the order was intended to prevent midnight sniping upon French soldiers; but the callousness of such an order in midsummer is striking evidence of the thoroughness with which the French have acquired the military mind.

ANOTHER tiny news item of large import was the report that Professor Georg Fuchs had been convicted of treason at Munich. Professor Fuchs had contacts with an amazing range of people in Bavaria from commanders in the Reichswehr to the police president and intimates of the Bavarian Crown Prince. To all of these people, he admitted during his trial, he exposed his plan for a Putsch which should overthrow the republican regime, establish a dictatorship à la Mussolini, restore the monarchy, and separate Bavaria from the German Reich. For two years he maintained intimate relations with a M. Richert, a French official in the Sarre coal mines, who was in touch with the French Foreign Office. From Richert he and his confederates—two of whom committed suicide rather than face trial—received sums amounting to a hundred million marks in times when marks were worth more than they are today. His last conference with Richert occurred in February, after the Ruhr occupation had begun, when Richert urged the strategic importance of hurrying his plans. A date was set for the Putsch; but Fuchs and the others were arrested before plans passed into action. The significance of the revelations is twofold; it is amazing that such plans as Fuchs's should be so much as listened to by the officials with whom he conferred; and it is striking that France subsidizes the bitterest nationalists in Germany. The men of the Blücherbund and similar "patriotic" leagues upon whom Fuchs relied hate France, though they are ready to use French gold for their own ends; in subsidizing them France subsidizes the anti-French movement in Germany to which she points when complaining of her need of "security."

THE landed interest in Great Britain has won a great victory. It has destroyed the last vestige of the famous land-tax legislation of 1910, which was not placed on the statute-book until after a long and fierce struggle, involving two general elections and the curbing of the power of the Lords. If Lloyd George had died before the war, that legislation would have been regarded as the crowning and most permanent achievement of his career. Today not a scrap of it is left. The taxes themselves, imposed on increment in value due to public enterprise, were abandoned in 1920 with the consent of their author, whose acquiescence was part of the price he had to pay for Tory support of the Coalition Government. There remained what he called the new Doomsday Book—the compulsory registration of the values of the land or property concerned whenever sales or transfers took place. This was retained in order to secure a truer assessment for death duties and to check the rapacity of sellers when land was required for public purposes. Year by year the landowners have tried to regain their freedom to place one value on land for purposes of national or local taxation and quite another value if a prospective purchaser appeared. Parliament has now decided, by a vote of 260 to 187, to abolish compulsory registration. Henceforth Great Britain will, it is said, be the only country in the world left without the data provided by such machinery as that of the repealed clause.

THERE is scant support in recent events in Italy for the predictions or assertions of the decline of Mussolini's power. His electoral reform bill went through the Chamber of Deputies by a vote of 335 to 139, and after his speech in its favor he was carried in triumph on the shoulders of his adherents. The new system gives him undisputed control as long as the Fascisti can maintain themselves as the most numerous faction. That is, whatever party obtains a plurality of the votes—not necessarily a majority—will be entitled thereby to a two-thirds bloc in the Chamber. This will prevent the defeat of a plurality party by a combination of minorities against it. On top of the new electoral bill comes news also that at a recent meeting of the Grand Fascisti Council the secretary-general stated that in spite of local quarrels the enrolled membership of the organization was 1,000,000, and growing. The adoption by the Cabinet of a regulation prohibiting the publication of "false" or "biased" news promises a press censorship more drastic than ever, and thus a growing control of public opinion.

A MOST amazing attempt to misuse the power of the courts to gag the press has been made in New Mexico. Carl C. Magee, editor of the Democratic New Mexico State Tribune of Albuquerque, has been attacking a group of Republican politicians. He charged misuse of State funds by a clerk of the Supreme Court. Calling the attention of two judges to the abuses he said of a third that he had "grown too accustomed to old methods to see anything wrong in what happened." For this he was tried and sentenced to eighteen months at hard labor, by a jury of Mexican-Americans not one of whom could read English. When his attorneys came to court they found that the pages on libel had been cut out of their law-books; when his chief counsel made speeches in his behalf he was cited to show cause why he should not be disbarred because he "attempted to create public sentiment"; when Magee editorially denounced his own conviction the trial judge cited him for contempt of court and, without jury trial, sentenced him to a year in jail and a $4,000 fine. The Governor has pardoned Magee but the outrageous judge who sentenced him still holds office.

REPORTS of 2,500 whipping parties in Oklahoma in a twelvemonth, of a whipping squad in one county with more than 200 names on its list for visitation in the near future, of victims afraid to report their injuries because of threats, and of local authorities who refuse to act, have led Governor Walton to put Okmulgee County under martial law and to threaten three other counties with like procedure. The acting governor of Texas, T. W. Davidson, has sent rangers into Burleson County where recent acts have been a "challenge to the very foundation of law." The climax came when Otto Lange, a quiet, home-loving farmer, protested against being ordered out of his house at nine o'clock at night by four hooded, masked men, and was thereupon shot to death, the bullet passing through his body and hitting his three-year-old baby. The mob spirit which has held northern Arkansas in its grip since the Harrison attacks upon railroad strikers a year ago broke out anew in Pocahontas when unidentified men riddled a priest's home with bullets, injuring four priests and a church official. There seems to be no one in Arkansas with the courage and wisdom to meet the situation. Senator Jacob R. Wilson, of the legislative committee which investigated the Harrison outrages, deplores the fact that in spite of plenty of evidence the committee preferred to recommend no legal action.

OVER against such pusillanimity must be set a striking example of courage and public spirit on the part of a young private citizen. On Independence Day, as the New York World tells the story, there had assembled at Houston, Texas, a crowd of 4,000 members of the Ku Klux Klan to hear an oration by "Emperor" William J. Simmons. The announced speaker was more than two hours late, and several Klansmen talked themselves hoarse to fill in the time. When they had finished, the master of the ceremonies asked —doubtless without the least anticipation of a response—if there was an anti-Klan speaker present who had nerve enough to come to the platform. Luther Evans, senior law student of the University of Texas, promptly accepted the challenge, and, amid angry cries of dissent, made excellent use of his opportunity. He twitted the Klan on its assumptions of a monopoly of patriotism, its professions of concern for freedom of speech, and its absurd apprehensions of Negro domination. What, he asked his hearers, were they going to do with the Negro? There were eleven million Negroes in the South. Did the Klan want to murder them all? It could not dispose of the problem by merely declaring that it was for white supremacy. "Finally," said this plucky young fellow, "your Klan speakers say that you stand for the chastity of womanhood, and for all high ideals. I stand for the chastity of womanhood, myself, and I practice this ideal; but there are thousands of you Klansmen who don't." No wonder that the audience was stunned for a moment by so plain-spoken an impeachment, and that its outcries then became so threatening that it was thought expedient by the master of the ceremonies that Mr. Evans should leave the platform. After all, the age of chivalry is not past.

> AIR WEEK. "Air week," which began on Sunday, has already produced evidence of the wide popularity of the idea of creating an air fleet for civil and defensive ends among all sections of the population. The labor organizations are displaying special interest, entering the "Society of Friends of the Air Fleet" in large numbers. The workers in many undertakings are collecting a percentage of their wage in aid of the air fleet during the week, and are collecting subscriptions for their own machines. . . . Great interest is also taken in civil aviation, which has developed considerably of late. It is hoped to use this not only for passenger and postal communication but also for economic purposes, particularly in agriculture. . . .

THREE guesses, gentle reader, as to the whereabouts of this "air week." It reads like typical booster stuff of the American Legion or Navy League, and you might guess that it emanated from Des Moines, Iowa, Galveston, Texas, or Los Angeles, California. All wrong. It is dated Moscow, June 26, and is sent out by the semi-official Russian Telegraph Agency (Rosta). The language of militarism is the same the world over, and the methods of the propagandists are as tawdry and corrupting between the White Sea and the Caspian as between the Gulf of Mexico and the Great Lakes.

PRESIDENT HARDING has sold his control of the stock of the Marion Star. That is not surprising. The curious part of the sale is that the same interests which have bought the Republican Star have also purchased the Star's Democratic rival, the Marion Tribune, and will continue to publish both papers. More than that, Messrs. Brush and Moore, the purchasers, already own a Democratic and a Republican newspaper in East Liverpool, Ohio. Newspaper publishing to them—as to Mr. Harding apparently—is a business and it is nothing more. (Mr. Harding is to continue "editorial association" with the Star.) They are apparently good Democrats and good Republicans, realizing and accepting the utter lack of principle in American journalism and of real difference between Republican Tweedledum and Democratic Tweedledee.

THE University of Delaware is not our largest or best-known educational institution, but it has inaugurated an experiment which may give it fame as the pioneer of a most important movement. It has permitted eight students to go abroad for a year with a member of the modern-language staff of the university. They will study in French universities, the time to be credited as their junior year in college. The scheme provides what American students so much need, the chance to study modern languages and acquire an international outlook while retaining their connection with, and maintaining their standing in, a college in the United States. Our only misgiving is that, if acquiring a foreign language is the chief end, the period of residence ought to be two years instead of one. But this is a detail subject to modification. Our hope is that the idea will spread to other colleges and become a general and accepted part of American educational technique.

YOU can always tell a New Yorker, some say, wherever you meet him. That is not so. Nicholas Murray Butler has been mistaken for a Southerner. During his present lecturing tour in England he has been announced as president of Columbia University, an institution not commonly regarded in this country as hiding its light under a bushel. In one of his addresses Dr. Butler made some remarks about prohibition which evoked a protesting letter to one of the English weeklies from Mrs. Milne, the national president of the British Women's Temperance Association. She says they are out of harmony with the opinion of the vast majority of the people of Dr. Butler's city and State, and she ought to know, she suggests, because she stayed for three weeks last autumn in Dr. Butler's city, Columbia. There was an election in South Carolina at the time of her visit, and the results showed that his views on the subject are not representative. What would Mrs. Milne have said if President Lowell or President Angell had spoken on prohibition? The Century Atlas gives seven Harvards in the United States and thirteen Yales.

IN the conviction that a "refusal to consider necessary reforms will not perpetuate outgrown conditions" in American life but "will only tend to make the changes violent and catastrophic," and believing that the ideal of democracy must be "something more than a tradition, a prejudice, or a slogan—it must conceptualize the vague but real longing of the mass of men for a type of social life in which the wants and needs of men are recognized and provided for"—ten editors have launched upon the journalistic seas a new bimonthly, the American Review. That the major part of the editorial board is drawn from universities, cities, and small towns of the Middle West promises a unique point of view in the field of magazines and journals of opinion. The American Review avowedly seeks to clarify opinion, not immediately to crystallize it. In the first issues the editors have already presented from the pens of authoritative persons a provocative gamut of subjects—war and peace in the industrial world; the social problem of labor education; international relations today; religion as a cooperative quest for the good life. They have chosen to review the more stimulating of recent books and they have not neglected the arts. The Nation cordially welcomes the American Review, and is glad of an added force at work to arouse Americans to a consideration of themselves, their times, and their habits.

WE had thought that the craze for marathons had subsided until we noted a news item from Chicago describing a contest there in long-distance whiskers. As the crowning event of its convention, the International Association of Specialty Salesmen sought to produce the man with the longest beard in the country. One was discovered in Elko, Nevada, with whiskers eleven feet, seven inches, but he was out of the running when Hans W. Langseth, seventy-seven years old, of Barney, North Dakota, walked into the convention. Besides the whiskers which Langseth wore, he carried a bag which he opened—and out tumbled what the news item describes as a "hirsute Niagara." "I haven't seen 'em myself for a year," observed the patriarch. "They were seventeen feet when I looked at them last." Langseth was awarded the championship, and hereafter, no doubt, will swear not by the beard of the Prophet, but by the profit of the beard.

Whither France? Whither Germany?

PREMIER STANLEY BALDWIN'S clear statement of the European situation is startling for its frank gloom. Statesmen in office seldom speak so frankly. Readers of this paper might almost imagine, when reading his words in the House of Commons, that they were reading extracts from editorials which have appeared in The Nation in the past three years. "Germany herself appears to be going fast toward economic chaos, which may itself be succeeded by social and industrial ruin." "It is not too much to say that the recovery of the world is in danger." "The Allies are obtaining less reparations than they did before the occupation." "We and our Allies will be the main sufferers. And we are firmly convinced that methods which can only result in the ruin of Germany will be fatal to this country, to our Allies, and to the whole of Europe."

It is progress when the Conservative Prime Minister of England, known for his Gallic sympathies, speaks thus. But we wish he or his predecessor had done so long ago. It has taken more than six months to force the British Government out of an almost benevolent neutrality into this avowed pessimism. In those months unemployment has grown in England, the French franc has fallen, and in Germany the results which Mr. Baldwin now predicts have already occurred. The time to predict them has passed. Germany is in economic chaos today. Social and industrial ruin are following. The mark has dropped, since the poilus entered the Ruhr, from one-tenth to four ten-thousandths of a cent. The sober basis of national economic life in Germany has gone. Only a few bloodsucking speculators, many of them allied with French industrialists, have profited by the chaos which France has wrought, and these swollen captains of industry have won the real power. The government is bankrupt; how could a government be otherwise when its tax schedules are made out in advance, and it may have to spend fifty times as many marks as was anticipated?

The German note of June 7 accepted unreservedly the Hughes proposition to leave the amount and manner of German payments to an impartial neutral commission. It required a stout struggle between opposing forces in Germany to get that far. But the Allies have not even replied. Now, six weeks later, Mr. Baldwin comes reluctantly to the point of threatening a separate reply unless his Allies will cooperate in drafting one together. His argument is irrefutable; the only difficulty is that it was as true and might have been said more effectively six months ago.

M. Poincaré replied emotionally in a speech made at the unveiling of a war memorial at Senlis. It was the old demand for the pound of flesh, a reiteration of the demand that Germany abandon passive resistance before France will talk business (a curious recognition of the power of pacifism), and a point-blank refusal of the expert commission. In other words, France will go her own road regardless of British fears that it may mean the ruin of Germany and of Europe.

It seems unlikely that further British negotiations will much change M. Poincaré. But other factors may be more potent. There is the internal situation in France. There is, of course, no hope of a liberal overturn in the present French Chamber; that body, elected four years ago in an ecstasy of flag-waving, is an irremediably jingo body. But the national-bloc candidates, boasting of their support of Poincaré, have been decisively defeated in two recent by-elections to the Chamber, and the protest vote has shown itself in some fifty local contests in which André Marty, leader of the mutiny in the Black Sea fleet in 1919, has been elected to various minor local offices upon a Communist ticket. These elections are regularly annulled by the Government, which keeps Marty in prison, but they have their significance. The next general election is still nine months away, but deputies who hope to be reelected are already trimming their sails and they might be ready to follow Poincaré or such a man as Louis Loucheur in a saner liquidation of the Ruhr policy. What hope is there of that?

To understand the real hope of such a solution we must look beneath the political symptoms which absorb the attention of our newspaper correspondents to the titanic industrial struggle which is determining the fate of France and Germany. In each country two great groups of industrialists are battling for control. Within the French steel trust there has been a break. The meaning of such breaks is not aired in the press, but apparently the replacement of M. Schneider as president of the Comité des Forges by M. de Wendel, whose brother is a naturalized German, means a victory for forces which are ready to form an industrial partnership with Stinnes and the German magnates. Without Ruhr coke the Lorraine blast furnaces cannot operate. De Wendel seems willing to come to terms, and Stinnes, whose patriotism is hardly skin-deep, is reported ready to give French interests a 40 per cent partnership. Schneider apparently believes that France, by holding out and destroying German industry, can win all. Within Germany Stinnes is opposed by a group, strongest in the electrical and finishing industries, which is readier for a genuine reparations settlement based upon an international loan. For such an international loan these industrialists would be willing to pledge their industries as a guaranty. Not so Stinnes—unless, perhaps, he could win the German railways from the government in exchange. For him the fall of the mark is unimportant—he sells raw materials abroad; to the finishing group, which has to buy its raw materials in foreign exchange, the stabilization of the mark is all-important.

M. Poincaré may speak a different language when he gets away from politics and war memorials. What his answer will be is likely to hinge largely upon the industrial struggle to which we have referred. A new, more moderate tone which has slipped into the semi-official editorials of the Paris Temps is explained by the Manchester Guardian as due to the appearance in that office of M. Robert Pinot, agent of the de Wendel faction in the French steel trust. We can only hope that this underground diplomacy of industry will move more rapidly than the British Government. For there is no longer any good solution of the Ruhr business possible; the only hope is that there will be some solution soon. General Allen, former commander of the American troops on the Rhine, declares flatly that the situation is "Black. There is not a ray of rose-color in the whole outlook." It will take, at the best, far more than six months to get back where Europe was six months ago when M. Poincaré made his ghastly decision to order his troops to march. There is no reason for nations which have sat by and watched to be proud of a record of indiscriminate impartiality.

British Labor Surveys Its Task

IT was in cheerful mood that the British Labor Party met for its annual conference. True, there was reported a drop in membership of 700,000 from last year and over a million from 1920—due to the decline in trade-union membership—with a corresponding reduction in income, but such losses were almost forgotten in the face of the party's gains in political strength and influence. Its successes at the general election have made it no longer a third party but a second, and its parliamentary chief now holds the semi-official rank of Leader of His Majesty's Opposition. Moreover, as Sidney Webb pointed out in his address from the chair, the by-elections since November have still further improved its position, and a continuance of the rising curve of Labor votes since 1910 would place the party in the lead somewhere about 1926. Mr. Webb, indeed, would have been justified in adopting Gladstone's famous boast: "The flowing tide is with us."

This conspicuous advance in public favor has not turned the heads of the Labor leaders. They recognize, without any self-deception, the magnitude of the task still before them. As Lord Rosebery once warned his followers that Ireland would not get Home Rule until "the predominant partner" had been converted, so Sidney Webb today reminds his party that, before it can be called upon to form a government, the bulk of the electors must be convinced of its capacity to undertake the responsibilities of office. At present, the weakness of Labor is in the rural constituencies, where its candidates have hitherto been nothing like so fortunate as in the industrial centers. The conference accordingly decided to inaugurate a special election fund for a campaign in country districts and to prepare a definite agricultural policy that would appeal to the farm laborer.

Nothing could have been better devised to reassure the timid middle-class voter than Sidney Webb's presidential address. Sane and temperate, it emphasized "the inevitability of gradualness" in the attainment of the ends to which the party was devoted, and disclaimed—indeed, almost ridiculed—the idea that the party, when it came into power, would want to do everything at once. It was aiming, he said, at no violent or revolutionary overturn, but at "the translation of socialism into practicable projects, to be adopted one after another." Mr. Webb laid great stress, too, on the impossibility of achieving much unless what they did was done in the right spirit. "We must always remember," he insisted in his closing passage, "that the founder of British socialism was not Karl Marx but Robert Owen, and that Robert Owen preached not 'class war' but the ancient doctrine of human brotherhood—the hope, the faith, the living fact of human fellowship." The conference gave a practical indorsement of its chairman's disavowal of extreme courses when it rejected by an overwhelming majority—the figures were 2,880,000 to 366,000 on a "card vote"—an application for affiliation from the Communist Party.

The attitude of the conference on foreign affairs was such as might have been expected from at any rate the post-war record of the party. It welcomed the amalgamation of the Second International and the Vienna Union of Socialist Parties into one International; it characterized the Ruhr occupation as an act of aggression and war, and called for negotiations or arbitration; it urged the calling of a world conference to revise the peace treaties—Mr. Webb declared that Paris, in 1919, was "a factory of international inefficiency on a calamitous scale" and that the treaties failed because they ignored economics on the one hand and morality on the other—and it advocated full recognition of the Soviet Government. It further resolved to request the British Government to take the initiative in making a proposal for immediate universal disarmament, to be laid before an international conference on that subject, but rejected a suggestion that the Labor Party in Parliament should vote against all military and naval appropriations.

There was nothing novel in the domestic program adopted. The plan of redeeming a substantial proportion of the national debt by means of a capital levy—which expedient, by the way, the Prime Minister was almost simultaneously describing to a Conservative audience as not robbery but " a perfectly legitimate form of taxation" —was reaffirmed. A resolution on unemployment emphasized that it was due mainly to foreign policy. The present Government was condemned for its inadequate housing schemes and its crippling of national education. The moderate and practical temper of the conference was shown not less clearly by what it turned down than by what it accepted. It negatived, for instance, as involving a breach of contract, a proposal that the burden of the war debt should be diminished by reducing the rate of interest on war loans, and it shelved, by means of "the previous question," an attempt to commit it to a declaration of republicanism. J. Ramsay Macdonald succeeds Sidney Webb as chairman of the national executive of the party, and during the next twelve months will combine that office with the leadership in Parliament. His election is a guaranty that the blend of idealism and common sense that was so notable a feature of his predecessor's address will continue to guide the British Labor movement.

Man and Folk

THE intellectuals are not loved in any country. The intellectuals do not love themselves. They are martyrs; they are martyrs to what they themselves have created. Yet they have created it for the good of mankind. Things of use and wisdom are their products. By their efforts man cleaves the air and conquers disease and sees his span of life lengthened and sees order and beauty where chaos prevailed. The creators of these benefits are left isolated, jeered at, outcast, often a weariness to themselves.

For the intellectual remains a man. He has all the biological, all the atavistic urges. He wants the comfort of being at one with his folk, of acting, at times at least, out of folk-instinct, communal passion, of being leader rather than rebel and martyr. It does not, except by an inverted psychical process, really please him to outrage the Philistines, bait the Babbitts, bully the "booberie." How he would like the comforts of neighborliness of the spirit, to drop the wretched veiled condescension forced upon him by his own character in all intercourse but that with his fellows; how, at moments, he needs, in this fundamental and ancient sense, the simple life!

He envies the men of other ages. The subtlest schoolman, the greatest prelate of the Middle Ages did but more thoroughly and completely understand what the clown at his gate and the hind in his fields believed without understanding. Schoolman and cobbler held the same views both physical and metaphysical. They could converse upon a common basis. No gulf of misunderstanding separated them. They could be neighbors and friends.

The twentieth-century intellectual is cut off from communication with his folk. The people still have myth; he has none. The myth may be merely some shabby absolute in questions of conduct and government. It sunders the believer hopelessly from the confirmed relativist. No common ground is left, not common ground enough even for disagreement. When the myths become thick and hot there is no possibility of speech. What will you say to a man who believes in hell, or that the Pope of Rome wants to run this country, or that the Jews caused the war, or that Darwinism is a devilish device to undo the pure in heart, or that the authority of the majority should be absolute, or that want of flat conformity should be penalized by expulsion from the state? How would you argue with a Methodist minister from an Arkansas village, with a Kleagle of the Klan, with a "this-is-a-white-man's-country" politician from central Georgia? Nor is this all. Can you contend with a billionaire industrialist who thinks, and avows his thought, that "history is bunk"?

No common speech is left, no common ground. The scientific and philosophical discoveries of the past hundred and fifty years with their accompanying perceptions have caused men who exist simultaneously to live in different ages, ages that have little power of communicating with each other. They have robbed the intellectual of folk, country, tribe, home. When ultimate decisions come he has, in self-defense, to act with his people, even to try to act through them. He cannot be left dangling in the void. But he can never be whole-hearted, never whole-heartedly at one with the mass. He has infinite mental reservations—he is, indeed, a creature of mental reservations—and must first build up a philosophy which will permit him to act with his fellow-men without wholly destroying the honor of his mind.

He is a democrat and fears the power of the democracy, a libertarian who knows that when the people speak of liberty they mean liberty to do the conventional will of any majority, in village, county, State, where the test happens to be applied. He is a humanitarian and knows that they who echo his words will always make exceptions that destroy his notion—unbelievers, public enemies, those guilty of sedition. He is passionately loyal to truth. But he cannot display that passion. Heresy-trials are conducted on ostensibly the same principle. He employs all words in special senses, lives in the flowing and creative world whose very existence is hotly denied by every word and act of his fellow-citizens, and finds his final refuge in silence or mild irony.

All the while he suffers, unless he has a divine Miltonic arrogance or a Goethean serenity, from malaise and homelessness. That explains his occasional romantic yearning for Periclean Athens, for medieval Rome. His golden age is either a past or a Utopia of oneness, union between himself and others, outer harmony and so inner peace. He wavers, in proportion to his vitality, between Novalis and Wells. He is always escaping into past or future. He is pitiable and magnificent, destined to creativeness and gloom, to service and to isolation.

Hall Caine Up to Date

THE great Roman Revolution of 1900 was led, readers of Hall Caine will recall, by David Rossi, son of a marriage contracted—in his non-clerical youth—by a saintly pope and a woman of the people. The disturbances grew, as is always the case, out of bread-hunger and desperate suffering, but the militarism and brutality and corruption of the Italian Government and the class-consciousness of the city proletariat combined to bring them to their victorious conclusion. The amazing feature of the whole uprising was its peaceable character; the people took over power quietly and soberly. Except for a few clashes instigated by the military, the republic was declared and the new government formed without any of the horrors that have so frequently marred revolutionary achievements. And this, as we recall, was due entirely to the almost religious pacifism of David Rossi. He was one of those rare spirits who combine revolutionary fervor with fairness and gentleness.

It is possible that some of our readers have forgotten that revolution—and not unnaturally, since so many more noisy ones have intervened—led by a saint who sought to establish the principles of the Lord's Prayer. But if they have they should refresh their memory by turning to the story of those great days written by Hall Caine—now Sir Hall Caine—under the name "The Eternal City." They should read this story and read it fast—for "The Eternal City" is about to be filmed.

An old account of an old revolution obviously must be brought up to date for the screen and a popular moral attached to it. And so, according to the London Daily Herald, "The Eternal City" is now undergoing alterations at the hands of Miss Ouida Bergère, "the famous American film scenario writer." Sir Hall Caine need apparently have no concern lest Mr. Hall Caine's revolution be allowed to look like an old 1900 model. "This wonderful work of his," Miss Bergère explained to the Herald reporter, "is to be used in combating socialism."

"How?" inquired the reporter. She elucidated:

> By the very simple process of turning the hero from a Socialist into a Fascist!
>
> Besides, you see, the Italian Government is going to be very helpful in giving permission for the taking of "shots" of historical buildings and in generally helping the production of the film.
>
> And so in return Sir Hall Caine has agreed that his Socialist shall be converted into "something like Mussolini."

And after the scenario writer has successfully turned David Rossi, pacifist and democrat, into a Fascist dictator, and the people's uprising into a military coup, she can doubtless improve the rest of the book. That part needs revision, for instance, in which the American Ambassador says to the Prime Minister:

> In my country, your Excellency, we don't look upon popular demonstrations as an insult to the powers of the State. . . . We regard them as you regard the hieroglyphs on your obelisks, as so many writings on the wall, and we set ourselves to decipher them.

Miss Bergère is guaranteed to be a famous writer of scenarios and so we have no doubt that she will be able to substitute blood and castor oil for the Lord's Prayer, and some of the more recent sentiments of Mr. Daugherty, perhaps, for the dangerous suggestions of Mr. Hall Caine's out-of-date American Ambassador.

Company Unions or National Unions?—A Debate

The Pennsylvania's War on Labor

By PAUL BLANSHARD

ON May 28 President Samuel Rea arose before the United States Railroad Labor Board, removed his cigar, and announced that company unions had come to stay on the Pennsylvania Railroad. The announcement was a defiance of the Labor Board and indirectly of the United States Supreme Court. No Attorney General, however, rushed to get out an injunction. Unlike the railroad strikers last fall, the Pennsylvania occupies an impregnable position; after more than two years of bitter fighting the owners have attained the ideal of General Atterbury, "committees of employees whose orders come from the bottom, from the men at work on this railroad, and are not handed down from the top by some people we know nothing about."

The story of those two years is one of the most significant chapters in the record of the open-shop movement. In the spring of 1921 the Railroad Labor Board terminated the national agreement under which organized labor on the railroads had built up an effective system of collective bargaining. The board ordered the railroads and the employees to open direct negotiations for new agreements. The Pennsylvania refused to open negotiations with System Federation No. 90 of the American Federation of Labor, which had hitherto represented its shop-craft employees, and held an election in June, 1921, in which the name of the System Federation was not printed on the ballots. The company insisted that the shop-craft workers should vote for individuals only. It maintained that as long as the employees were able to choose any union or non-union worker the election was valid.

By an overwhelming majority the shop-craft workers refused to indorse the company-union plan and demanded that the name of System Federation No. 90 be printed on the ballot. The Railroad Labor Board sustained the union's demand, but was prevented from publishing an official condemnation by an injunction secured by the company. That injunction was finally vacated by the United States Supreme Court, but like most injunctions it had already done its damage. The condemnation of the Labor Board is now too late to be effective. The unions, facing annihilation, called a shop-craft strike on the Pennsylvania on the issue of company unionism versus labor unionism. The fight was bitter, the union claiming that more than half of the workers were out at the peak of the strike, the company claiming that only one-third left their places. The strike has cost the company millions of dollars and the fight is not entirely over yet, since thousands of skilled mechanics are still on strike.

The methods adopted by the Pennsylvania in making effective its plan of employee representation show the power of a corporation in time of depression. The "rump" election of 1921 was held in the middle of a period of unemployment when thousands of active union men were on furlough. Ballots were distributed to the workers and they were told to vote for any employee as an individual. Only about 10 per cent voted the company ballot, and of these many cast their ballots for union leaders who refused to accept the election. The signed report of tellers in the Northwestern Region is illuminating, especially since the result is more favorable to the company than the outcome in other regions. About 19 per cent of those eligible to vote cast legal ballots, electing 115 representatives, among whom were fourteen foremen and an assistant foreman who had not been allowed to represent the union. Twenty-six of those elected refused to serve, leaving seventy-four bona fide workers and fifteen supervisory officers. Several of these were elected by one vote, presumably their own. Meanwhile System Federation No. 90 took a vote of all active employees on the whole system, including those on furlough, with the result that 37,238 voted for the union and seven against. The total vote on the company union ballot had been 3,480 cast for individuals.

The company was not embarrassed by the results. It proceeded to "bargain" with "its employees." It prepared the terms of a new wage and working agreement for submission to the rump organization. Those committeemen who accepted their election were sent among the workers with little slips of paper which read: "This is to certify that I am willing to serve as a committeeman to represent the machinists on this division for the unexpired term," etc. Thus the vacancies were filled supposedly by the committeemen who had received a 10 per cent vote of confidence but, according to the affidavits of union men, by the solicitation of foremen and other company officials.

The company then summoned conferences of these employee representatives, whose expenses and salary were paid by the management while they solemnly discussed and adopted the terms of a new agreement altering the conditions of employment in the Pennsylvania shops, reclassifying certain operations, and, incidentally, bringing millions of dollars into the coffers of the company. In the Southwestern Region they summoned to St. Louis a divisional committee from Columbus, Ohio, which was not authorized to negotiate a wage agreement even for its own division. When the company attempted to impose upon this committee the terms of a regional agreement, the committee withdrew in a body and issued a statement exposing the company. Even this did not embarrass the Pennsylvania; the new rules for the region were issued over the name of the general manager and there was no one to dispute them.

With its employee representatives chosen by 10 per cent of the workers, the Pennsylvania then agreed upon a definite plan of employee representation, a plan which is admirably democratic in details and totally farcical in meeting general problems. All workers are allowed to vote for any employee of their choice. They can elect a solid union committee if they wish. There are committees for crafts and divisions and regions, all elaborate and perfectly constructed. But the plan has three obvious jokers:

1. Even if 100 per cent of the workers belong to a union, they cannot vote for that union to represent them and they cannot bring the research experts and officers of that union in to help them bargain with the trained executives of the company.

2. The Joint Reviewing Committee, which is described by the railroad in its official pamphlet as "the highest authority on the railroad in the settlement of matters in dispute between employees and management" and which is composed of an equal number of employee voters and company voters, requires a two-thirds vote to reach a decision. The workers must win over to their side one-third of the managers before they can change the interpretations and rules of the company. The railroad officials can deadlock the reviewing committee at any time that they see fit.

3. There is no real provision of arbitration of vital issues. The Joint Reviewing Committee nominally has the right to refer deadlocked cases to arbitration, but the company can block the choice of any impartial arbiters under the two-thirds rule or it can "sit tight" and declare that there is nothing to arbitrate.

When the Pennsylvania had adopted its new rules and regulations in conference with its employee representatives, it became necessary to win over the workers to the scheme. Coercion was liberally employed. Furloughed men were called back and compelled to sign the new regulations or face discharge. At least fifteen leading union officials who were serving the System Federation while on furlough were summoned back to work and discharged when they refused to quit their union posts. Employees who were elected under the company's plan and who refused to accept the new agreement were frozen out. The stenographic record of the secret (?) meeting of the Central Regional Committee on December 8, 1922, in Pittsburgh shows that the chairman, H. E. Custar, called upon the divisional chairman from Buffalo to withdraw from the session because he had not signed the new company agreement. The Buffalo chairman withdrew.

The workers in the Pitcairn shops "voted" for the new piecework schedules as follows: Foremen distributed ballots in the form of petitions asking the management to adopt piecework, the signature of each worker being asked. The workers repeatedly voted by a great majority against the piecework plan. The management promptly posted notices abolishing the jobs of many of the skilled mechanics and creating "helpers'" positions in their places. Then the men were told that they might continue as mechanics under the piecework system or as helpers; otherwise their positions were abolished. They voted for piecework.

The controversy came to a head in the railroad strike. After the strike had dwindled the task of the company was easy. The workers who returned to work were naturally compelled to accept the company plan. Many of them were strike-breakers; some were good union men starved out. Many of those who now accept the plan and try to work out their salvation through it are sincere advocates of employee representation as the best thing under the circumstances. Recently a general election has been conducted in the Central Region in which the leaders of the company union claim a vote of 82 per cent of shop-craft workers eligible to vote. That is a victory for the Pennsylvania, a victory which has cost the road many millions, a victory in which the workers had to choose between company unions and nothing.

The railroad has stressed the "outside agitator" as a cause of disturbance and has sought to eliminate him from the system. It has held that there is a distinct virtue in dealing with men on the pay roll of the company and no others. The result has been peculiar. N. P. Good, the able head of System Federation No. 90 of the A. F. of L., is a machinist from the Pennsylvania shops. H. E. Custar, head of the employees' organization in the Central Region, is a car man from the Pennsylvania shops. Both have offices in Pittsburgh. Both work full time for their respective organizations. It is not likely that either one will work in a Pennsylvania machine shop again for years. But Good is an "outsider"; Custar is an employee. Why? Good is paid by union dues and is responsible to the labor movement; Custar is on the company's pay roll. His salary and expenses are paid by the company.

The company supports thirty-five committeemen as active propagandists for the employee-representation plan. There is no equivocation about it. The chairman of the Central Region told his committee at a meeting held last winter: "You are given a six weeks' leave of absence if you so desire to use that time to help convince the men at home that this body has acted in the best way they saw possible." The men accepted the invitation at full pay and overtime. Inside agitators!

The fight on the Pennsylvania verifies the beliefs of the orthodox union-shop advocate. Union leaders have always held that the outside organizer is a necessity in making collective bargaining effective, especially in shops which are not 100 per cent union. The worker in the shop is usually too tired and too ill-informed and too subservient to bargain with power and knowledge. His treatment in the shop usually depends on his being nice to the boss. The outside union official is better informed and more independent. He has many faults but these are his virtues. He may be dispensed with in some situations in which the union is so strong that its representatives act as a unit without guidance, but these situations are rare. The transportation brotherhoods who deal with the Pennsylvania without the presence of national organizers are virtually 100 per cent organizations with years of tradition and discipline behind them. The shop-craft unions have never been so intrenched; they developed largely under the protection of Federal control and never claimed more than 85 per cent of the workers on the Pennsylvania. For them the company union with its exclusion of national officials and its special favors to non-union workers means annihilation.

The Railroad's Reply

By SAMUEL REA

THE difference between the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the United States Railroad Labor Board is a fundamental difference in their respective points of view which goes to the very essence of successful relationship between men and management.

Apparently the Labor Board considers itself to be the arbiter of rules for carrying on what it conceives to be a perpetual struggle between a railroad and its employees. The purpose of the management, on the other hand, is not to struggle against or to triumph over its employees, but to gain their loyalty and cooperation by a policy of fair dealing, mutual consultation, and just compensation.

In like manner there seems to be a fundamental difference in the point of view of Mr. Blanshard and that of the vast majority of the Pennsylvania employees, which may be expressed as follows: The management and the employees have the same stake in the Pennsylvania Railroad. Their interests are mutual. Their success and prosperity depend upon the success and prosperity of the railroad in its service to the public. The other view seems to be to create hostility between management and men, to stigmatize the so-called "company man," to make men feel that only by industrial warfare can they obtain fair play.

Neither the company nor its employees subscribe to such a conception of our relations, and if the Transportation Act in its labor sections means anything it means that men and management should endeavor to settle peacefully between themselves and without annoyance to the public whatever disputes may arise. As far as our employees are concerned, the issues in the Pennsylvania Railroad-Labor Board case have long since been settled to the satisfaction of the vast majority. As far as the public is concerned, the policy jointly pursued by the management and the employees maintained uninterrupted, and, in fact, greatly increased service at a time when nearly every railroad in the country was seriously affected by a national strike. Two-thirds of the Pennsylvania employees refused to answer the strike call.

How the employees themselves regard the Pennsylvania plan of employee representation is indicated by their participation in recent elections to fill the expiring terms of employee representatives among the shop crafts and the clerks and miscellaneous forces of Eastern, Central, and Northwestern Regions and Altoona Works. These three regions and Altoona Works represent more than three-fourths of the total number of employees in these classes on the entire system. It was the original elections in these classes to which the United States Railroad Labor Board objected. The fact is that in the elections just held more than 80 per cent of the employees affected voted in the election of employees' representatives to deal with the company.

Apparently the desire of Mr. Blanshard, of the Labor Board, and of others, who continue to agitate the issue, is:

1. To make people believe that the company was under obligation to comply with the decisions of the board on account of the Supreme Court's decision in the matter. The fact is that the United States Supreme Court made it very plain that our company was not obliged to observe the Labor Board's decision if it felt that its constitutional and legal rights were being invaded. The management was firmly convinced that the constitutional and legal rights of the company and its employees would be invaded if it complied with the decision of the board in the shop-crafts' and clerks' cases.

2. To make people believe that the company is anti-union. The fact is that its relations with employees who are high officers in national labor unions are, and have been for many years, eminently satisfactory to both. The company is now dealing with committees, all of whom are employees, representing signal men, telegraphers, and engine- and train-service employees, composed entirely of union members.

3. To make people believe that the company and its employees are at war. The fact is that under our system of employee representation employees and the management are working in the closest harmony. There is now no dispute of any consequence with our employees which we believe will not be amicably adjusted.

4. To make people believe that the company has denied its employees certain rights to which they are entitled. The fact is that the employees on the Pennsylvania have a more influential voice in determining matters affecting their wages, rules and working conditions, and other questions of mutual concern than the employees of almost any other large industry.

Reference is made to "more than two years of bitter fighting." Undoubtedly it is desired by outside agitators to create such an impression, but the employees themselves, the shippers and passengers who, because of the peaceful relationship between the Pennsylvania men and management, were served by this railroad when other railroads were handicapped by the strike, know better. They know, too, the facts about the national agreements to which the article refers, and which the Labor Board itself abrogated.

It is stated that System Federation No. 90 "hitherto represented" the Pennsylvania shop-craft employees. With the Railroad Administration, yes. With the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, no. System Federation No. 90 was imposed upon the Pennsylvania Railroad employees during Federal control, and acted for them in dealing with the Railroad Administration. It was never recognized by the management as representative of the wishes of the Pennsylvania shop men.

Referring to the shop-men's strike of last July it is stated that the "fight was bitter" on the Pennsylvania. It is common knowledge capable of substantiation from public records that during the strike this railroad handled more freight than before, and that its service was never seriously affected. Is that evidence of "bitter fighting"? And yet the Pennsylvania men who were called upon to strike would not have been out alone. They would have been part of a national strike, but two-thirds of them stuck to their posts.

It is stated that the rules adopted by the Pennsylvania show the "power of a corporation in time of depression." What about the power of the so-called company unions since that depression, when wages were raised under the Pennsylvania plan, and rules and working conditions negotiated which, for fairness and justice, stand comparison with those on any other railroad?

A great to-do is made about the number of employees of the shop crafts that voted for individuals in the first shop-crafts elections, and those who are alleged to have voted for System Federation No. 90. The fact is, however, that every one had an opportunity to vote by secret ballot for any individual, union or non-union. In several cases, all union men were elected and recognized as representatives of the employees by whom they were elected. In no civilized country in the world does the failure of its citizens to exercise their right of franchise invalidate the election brought about by those who do exercise that right. If the Pennsylvania plan was unfair, what was the inducement to the signal men, the telegraphers, the maintenance-of-way men to accept it and to elect solid union-member committees of employee representatives? The shop men had the same opportunity to name union employees as candidates, to vote for them, and to elect them if they could. But the union officers said, No.

One might just as well say that if the Republican or Democratic Party heads refused to participate in an election and urged their party members not to vote, therefore the candidates named and voted for and elected by their parties would not be validly elected. As far as voting for individuals rather than organizations is concerned, it is well to remember also that in this country we do not elect parties. We vote for individuals nominated by the parties, and meeting the requirements of the various election laws.

Mr. Blanshard states that the Pennsylvania plan "is admirably democratic in details and totally farcical in meeting general problems." Let us see what are the facts:

1. The company and its employees have successfully and satisfactorily negotiated wages, rules, and working conditions.

2. Transportation service has been maintained without interruption, even during a period of a national strike seriously affecting other railroads.

3. Means have been established for the peaceful settlement of all controversial questions. The highest authority on the railroad in the determination of these matters is a Joint Committee equally representative of employees and management, a two-thirds vote deciding any question. No executive officer nor board of directors can veto the decisions of this committee. If it cannot settle a question itself, it has the last say as to what tribunal will settle it.

4. Grievances are settled more amicably and with greater dispatch and mutual satisfaction than ever before.

5. Every employee has an opportunity to have a voice in deciding matters of most vital concern to him through the election, by secret ballot, of employee representatives.

6. The records of the settlement of disputed questions are unanswerable evidence of the success of this plan, of its satisfaction to the vast majority of Pennsylvania men, and of its importance to the employees, the company, and the public that we all serve.

It is stated in the article that the company can "deadlock" the Joint Committee. The answer is that, as far as the employees are concerned, scarcely any more vital questions are conceivable than wages, working rules, and conditions of employment. Yet all these matters have been satisfactorily adjusted without the deadlock that Mr. Blanshard fears. It is stated that certain union officers were discharged "when they refused to quit their union posts." The truth is that these men were released because they failed or refused to report for duty when ordered to do so. As regards Mr. Blanshard's reference to piecework, the fact is that even the matter of piecework prices on the Pennsylvania is subject to consideration and adjustment by a committee equally representative of employees and management.

It is impossible for any fair-minded observer of the operation of the Pennsylvania plan and the results which have been accomplished through the joint efforts of both management and men to escape the conclusion that our policy serves the best interests of the employees, the company, and the traveling and shipping public. In carrying out this policy the company and its employees have complied with the Transportation Act in letter and spirit, and we have made what we believe to be a very advanced step in the establishment of most valuable industrial relations.

The National Union's Viewpoint

By N. P. GOOD

PRESIDENT REA'S attempt to defend the management in what it has done centers around two things. First, there is the allegation that the Labor Board and other "agitators" want to make people believe that the company is under obligations to obey the Labor Board's directions. Is it not true that the Pennsylvania Railroad is under obligation to obey the board's decision and any other provision of the Transportation Act, just as it is obligated to obey the provisions of any statutory law? The only difference is that the obligation concerning a decision of the Labor Board is moral while, with respect to other laws, there is a penalty imposed for violations. Are we, therefore, to understand Mr. Rea to imply that obligations for the violation of which there are penalties are the only sort of obligations recognized by the Pennsylvania management? If this is true, then let me call attention to the mandatory provisions of the Transportation Act concerning procedure before a dispute goes to the Labor Board. Section 301 requires conferences between management and organizations of employees, but nowhere does it provide that the management may, much less shall, designate who these representatives shall be or how they shall be chosen. The obligation to carry out these provisions is not moral; it is mandatory. These provisions of the act have also been violated by the carrier.

In the second place, Mr. Rea would have the public believe that the road was not seriously affected by the suspension of work of the shop men on July 1, 1922, and that the vote cast in the late so-called election is evidence of approval by the employees.

Whether a majority of the shop-craft employees suspended work and whether the railroad was seriously affected can best be attested by the fact that commissaries and bunkrooms established in July, 1922, were still in use at some points in July, 1923. On July 1, 1922, several hundred stored locomotives were in white lead and the general condition of power was normal; which means that 15 per cent of it was not serviceable and 85 per cent serviceable. At the present time no serviceable locomotives are in storage, several hundred new ones have been purchased and delivered, and still the Interstate Commerce Commission's inspectors have reported during the past few months approximately 85 per cent of all locomotives inspected in a defective condition. In other words, the figures of a year ago and today have been reversed. In addition to this there was a general disregard of safety laws, which became so bad that a protest meeting was held by the transportation brotherhoods last February.

Mr. Rea likens the election conducted by his railroad to the election of candidates by the Republican and Democratic parties. In this he fails to consider that our national election laws were made by those authorized by the people to do so, while the employees of the Pennsylvania Railroad were required to vote (if they voted at all) under regulations established by company officials and a few political henchmen who had no authority under the Transportation Act and no mandate from the employees to create such laws; therefore, the refusal of such a large number to vote should properly be accepted as a protest against such illicit dealings.

Mr. Rea says: "Means have been established for the peaceful settlement of all controversial questions." The means of "peaceful settlement" of which he speaks are not approved by a majority of the employees and will not endure, because he and his associates have utterly disregarded the constitutional and moral rights of all those who opposed them and because they are endeavoring to mold public opinion in their favor through a campaign of misrepresentation.

The outstanding feature, however, was not touched upon by Mr. Blanshard and certainly would not be mentioned by Mr. Rea. This is the attitude of the United States government administration toward the striking shop men who were charged by the Labor Board with having violated the law and against whom an injunction was obtained by the United States Department of Justice. Compare the attitude of the President of the United States and his Attorney General toward the shop men in this instance with the attitude toward the Pennsylvania Railroad, which has more openly and brazenly repudiated the provisions of the Transportation Act but against which not a public word of criticism has been issued, except as it has come from the Labor Board itself.

These United States—XXXIV*

KENTUCKY: Where Men Die Standing

By BEN LUCIEN BURMAN

THE limited, Boston bound, roared over the flat Ohio farms. The melancholy New Englander in the seat opposite us, a boy returning East for a first year in Harvard, shook his head. "Kentucky," he repeated, gloomily. "No. Not as my home. All the people there are savages. Aren't they?" We spent an earnest ten minutes in proving the falsity of this belief. At the end of which time, optimistically, we rested our case. The grave youth thought a moment, then again shook his Mayflower head. "Well, anyway," he said, "it isn't a Christian country." A remark which was probably prompted by thoughts of the well-known but mythical old lady of the Cumberlands whose acquaintance with religious figures was limited to a certain mysterious God, familiar only through his last name "Dam." The doleful New Englander's indictment was pronounced before the Darwinian tempest swept down the Blue Grass; now a serious sophomore, the youth probably condemns the State as too Christian. Belief in its savagery, however, he will undoubtedly hold until his death. For to a diminished degree his verdict is the verdict of the nation. Is not Kentucky the land of grizzled feudists and defiant moonshiners; of soft-hatted politicians who recite poetry and tote pistols; is it not the land of dashing Night Riders and tobacco-chewing Methuselahs; is it not Wild West on Main Street? It is. All of these. But it is not savage: merely romantic. Therefore let a mechanized world be grateful.

The mountaineer who—if he can draw the faster—slays on sight a cousin in war over a pig three generations dead, is not a fiction: he is a fact. Yet he is the same mountaineer who to a weary, hungry stranger will give all his rickety bed and more than half his scanty corn pone. He is hospitable, kind, noble, even at the starvation point. His violence arises from the single passion which masters his existence—he must not be trod upon, he must be free. His cousin's kin, he argues, cheated his kin; they are trespassers upon his family's, and thus his own, kingdom of self; they must be annihilated. By no means is Kentucky all mountainous, nor all its dwellers mountaineers, yet from the misty heights of Pine Mountain on the east to the mud-lapping Mississippi on the west, the creed is one: I will be myself. The laws that please me I will obey; the laws that suit me not be damned. "A Kentuckian kneels only to his God," declaimed Crittenden, doomed for aiding the Cuban insurgents, as he faced the rifles of his Spanish executioners.

Alas that the Kentuckian forgets that the doctrine of "You let me alone" connotes "Then I'll let you alone"; certain of his own righteousness, he is not content until he is transfigured into an exalted crusader, off for the battle. Willy-nilly, he would then ram baptism by sprinkling, baptism by immersion, or whatever the momentary credo, down his townsman's throat, with revolver as ramrod. Intense, passionate, pious, his emotions are easily stirred, and the unschooled evangelistic parson, with his jeremiads of literal blood, fire, and brimstone, can whip him into acts, if not of violence, of ridiculous stupidity. Such are the black-frocked clerics who would make of Kentucky a virgin gold-field for the Ku Klux Klan with nuggets lying beside every tobacco plant—were it not for one fact: a Kentuckian revels in a fight, but it must be a fair fight.

One glossy laurel these rustic churchmen almost won: the law to prohibit the teaching of evolution—a law the bare mention of which should cause the giant pine trees, whose ancestors heard the Kentuckian bitterly assail the repressive Alien and Sedition Acts, to turn their spiny tops from the sun. The history of the Darwin episode is illuminating. A veteran Kentucky legislator's daughter enrolled at the State University. The time arrived when she returned home. One afternoon parent and child were conversing. "Father," the girl announced, "what you and mother taught me is wrong. All wrong. I've studied science in college. There isn't any God." And the father wept. But mere weeping is vain, he knew. He decided to act, and deliver the youth of Kentucky from these lethal educators who taught that men were no better than monkeys or dogs, with the same hope of heaven. The battalions of the pulpit rallied at his jousting cry. Bryan entered the capital. He addressed the legislature. The Nebraska breath was fire; the silver tongue scattered vitriol. The lower house heeded, with ears acute, and minds on the little church back home, thronged with voters. Enough votes were pledged for a victory. When at the last dramatic moment the thrice-blessed figure of independence and free-thinking rose from the corner where it had been pushed and sat upon: the bill was defeated by one vote. In the Senate, had it not been smothered in committee, the measure would have passed. A fact we confess with shame.

With shame, because the law would have violated every tradition that has brought the State glory. The tradition, for example, of the Kentucky which when still an unweaned, unprotected infant, surrounded by Indians, many times verged on a break from the Union because of Federalist autocracy; the tradition of the Kentucky governor who at the outbreak of the Civil War, when commanded by the Union's military chief to send troops, telegraphed the haughty officer a courteous "Go to," and sent the same valiant message to the Confederates; the tradition of the Kentucky militiamen who in the early conflicts of the nation, disgusted with the campaigns' conduct, told the chiefs their opinions, packed up their kits, and went back to the Blue Grass; the tradition of a Kentucky which, when the decision of the State's highest court did not satisfy the people, abolished the court. After all the anti-Darwin bill was defeated and tradition saved. Let hosannas ring!

High up in the Cumberlands where men live in the log houses their forefathers chopped from the shadowy forests, where there are no doctors in a county, no automobiles, no railroads, no telephones, there reigns liberty unfettered—and systematic scorn for law. It is moonshiners' paradise. Back from the creek bottom serving as a highway sits Steve Miracle, rifle at his side. In his pigmy clearing, deserted except for a hissing rattler, or a "blowin' " viper, he watches stoically as the mountain "dew" drips from the rusted still into the jug below. Maybe, if Steve isn't conscientious, he adds a bit of alkali. Certainly the gun is there. Kept handy, too. Et's his liquor, ain't et? His corn, his still, by God, it's all his'n. What right's them folks up in Frankfort or way out East to say he cain't make liquor ef he wants to? Let a dam revenuer come aroun! He'll show 'em, by God.

---

* Reproduction forbidden. Quotation limited to 300 words. Copyright, 1923, The Nation, Inc. All rights reserved.

The Kentucky mountaineer shoots first and thinks afterward. In a county whose voting population was eleven hundred, three years saw twenty fatal shootings and sixteen woundings. No conviction followed. Amazingly trivial are the causes of this deadly gun play. A farmer kicks his neighbor's dog. A father gives his intoxicated son an unwelcome order—orders are not popular in the mountains. One ingenious highland merchant after a quarrel, knowing his life to be in danger, constructed a stockade the entire distance from his house to his store. He died from a bullet nevertheless. The statute-books denounce gun-toting: the law is futile as a sun parlor in Mammoth Cave. In this year of grace nineteen hundred twenty three, of subways, radio, and chewing gum, every man taking the oath of office in Kentucky must swear he has neither as principal nor second participated in a duel! When the last constitutional convention assembled in 1890 obsolete enactments came up for repeal. The dueling law was retained; the legislators believed revocation would be dangerous. More than once has a judge rendered a decision and afterwards affirmed it with his life. The vigorous breath of this warning in the columns of an old newspaper still blows up the Licking. "I . . . thus publicly give notice to all sheriffs, constables, bailiffs, marshals, and their deputies, that if they do serve any precept on me preparatory to coercion that I will . . . put a period to their earthly career. . . ."

Withal, the Kentuckian is kind, devoted, lovable. Though his only books be the Bible and the Sears Roebuck catalogue, he is never uncouth. He is always the gentleman. Woman, beautiful, black haired or golden haired, flashing eyed, soft of form and soft of voice, here dwells in the age of chivalry. Upon her pedestal she is enthroned, for stranger, lover, husband to worship. In the Blue Grass the mannish-collared college girl would be a sight so bizarre that her walk upon the streets would signal a parade of gaping ragamuffins and grinning piccaninnies. When Kentucky was still an eighteenth-century wilderness of forest, Indian, and trapper, a dancing-master established a school for pirouettes in the blockhouse of Lexington. Nor did he starve. Kentucky is the land where woman must be woman; her castle her home. True, the State did at length ratify the suffrage amendment; why, is a mystery. At a document-strewn desk a prominent Kentuckian, pounding with his fist as though each blow annihilated one of the guilty, scathingly harangued to us why the law was the most calamitous act in all the nation's history.

How ran the old song the school boys chorused when no teacher was nearby? Something after this fashion:

In Kentucky. In Kentucky.
Where the horses are the fairest,
Where the women are the fastest,
And the politics the damndest:
In Kentucky.

Let the sleek horses graze quietly in their velvet pastures; bid farewell to the Kentucky maiden—though verily she merits far more than a glance—and muse instead upon ballots and balloteers. The writer of the song's closing line was a man of truth. Politics are the damndest in Kentucky. The reason? Again it is individuality, exalted, bringing with it strange contradictions. Whether classroom novice, farmer, lawyer, clerk, or tobacco picker, every male is a politician. Asked whence came the principles he cherishes, his proud reply would be "Myself": almost certainly these principles were handed down by his father, and by his father's father, slightly changed in the passage of time. Yet, stubborn partisan as he is, should the interpretations of other father's sons, clashing with his own, be made the dominant creed of the party, instanter he bolts. A party split is as regular and expected as frogs after a Visalia rain. The schisms sometimes prove fatal. For politics in Kentucky are never impersonal. Wrote one statesman to a rival: "I will not call you liar, villain, or scoundrel; but with all the politeness imaginable, I could prove you so."

The office-seeker is delightfully ingenuous. Thus advertises one highland candidate: "I am out of a job for some time. My wife and six children need my support. Think it over, friend, and let me have your vote for clerk." A poster with the honest rustic smiling out blazons these cryptic sentences: "All my life I lived in this county. My father and grandfather, too. Not one of us ever asked for a political office. I think it's about time they got one, don't you?" "A dog for every man in the mountains," promises a son of Clay County, wistful for the legislature. While what more could be asked of man than this: "I will make the people of our county a good, sober sheriff"?

Along the river valleys, where time is marked by the coming of the show-boat, or on the rolling plains where the clock is the county fair, the buying of ballots is a commerce probably far rarer than in the Northern States stretching up from the clayey Ohio, with their Cincinnatis, their Terre Hautes, their Chicagos. In the Republican mountains, however, where there are few to see and none to tell, the ballot merchant—so say the Democrats—disdains retail barter, and opens his shop for the wholesale trade. The clientele is that benumbed caste, supposedly the progeny of criminals who fled from England; their slogan, "A vote for a dollar." In a plateau county, so insistent became the cry for greenbacks a few days before election, the tiny bank serving the community was drained, and compelled to telegraph the Sub-Treasury for a new supply.

In the Goebel assassination mountain political fury attained its height; the case is a twentieth-century tragedy of two cities begun with death in a duel and ended with murder. . . . William Goebel is State Senator from Covington in the lowlands. The commoner hails him as a liberator; corporations denounce him as a self-seeking despot. . . . The Senator writes a political article attacking Colonel John Sandford, an officer of a Covington bank. . . . The two men meet at the bank's entrance. . . . Both draw, both fire. . . . Sandford falls, mortally wounded. . . . Goebel is never indicted. . . . Four years pass. . . . The Senator is now Democratic candidate for governor. . . . The returns show the Republicans to be elected by 2,383 votes. . . . The verdict is accepted, then contested on a charge of intimidation and fraud in the mountains. . . . The legislative committee assembles at Frankfort to hear the contest. . . . Feeling is intense. . . . Nine hundred and sixty armed mountaineers invade the capital "to see justice done" . . .

The decision of the contest is about to be announced, in Goebel's favor. . . . When Goebel, entering the capitol grounds, is shot to death by a bullet fired from a window in the Secretary of State's private office. . . . Republican leaders are accused, among them the governor whose office Goebel was contesting. . . . It is testified that mountain feudists had agreed "to kill off enough Democrats to make a Republican majority in the legislature." . . . One confesses, some are convicted: to be pardoned later when a Republican chief executive comes into power. . . . One is repeatedly sent as a mountain representative to Congress. . . . In a single aspect the grim episode is not typical; Goebel was slain by an assassin, not by an enemy face to face—Kentuckians abhor cowards who shoot from behind. Another fatal drama, so recent that the trials may not yet be ended, is the "Bloody Election" of Clayhole. In this hamlet, where political control vacillated, gunmen entered the polls, shot promiscuously and mortally, riddled the ballot boxes with bullets, and dumped them into the river nearby.

On the same stage as these tragedies of blood, are rightly, in comic relief, enacted high political comedy and farce. The legislature, less corrupt perhaps than in many other commonwealths, naturally could not exist without its lobbies for drollery and divertissement. Here the jovial entertainers are the Three Musketeers—the coal lobby, the railroad lobby, and the race-track lobby; appearing in their sportive interlude:

> All for one. One for all.
> Dare he strike one, three on him fall.

No bribes, says Mr. Legislator. Away, Satan, with your bribe! But a drink of whiskey from a friend in a dry country—that's different. So the soft-coal lobbyist must stock his hotel chambers with the mellowest of Scotland's pride, and keep open house for the men who make the laws. There's work to be done! The influence thus exerted is said to be tremendous.

Out of England to the Indian-haunted forests lumbered the caravans of the Kentucky settlers. The wilderness did its work, and the traits of the newcomers identifying them as Englishmen vanished. Except one: the Englishman's love of a horse race. From the days when "scalping" was a dread fact of the moment, not a dim tradition, the bronzed inhabitants of each little settlement gathered to watch shining steed vie with shining steed. Today the sport, commercialized, has aggrandized until it is imperial; the daily health bulletins of its Morviches, its Silver Kings, are flashed about the world as though they told of a god upon whose well-being hung the universe; millions are won and lost when the favored Derbyite stumbles and breaks a leg.

It is the race-track lobby, fighting the church lobby for its life, whose methods are unique. This is the procedure laid down by the race-track political Book of Etiquette. About the busy paddocks are a myriad hangers-on, watchmen, machine-tenders, ticket-takers, all well paid. Be you envious of such an easy livelihood, or out of employment, call upon the king of horses and jockeys, and petition for a place. "Go," commands the monarch, "and seek out the political chieftain of your province. Worthiest of all, let it be a legislator. Ask him to inscribe for you an indorsement. Return to me then, and the post is yours. If ye gain no such indorsement, return not, for we are busy, and life is brief."

Thus, indirectly, the politician goes deep into the race-king's debt: and debts it is not etiquette for a politician to forget. As another effective expedient, the sovereign places the legislator upon his regal pay roll, at a stipend of fifteen dollars a day with no onerous labor demanded of him.

One unsophisticated, conscientious legislator, apprised of this boon, so goes the story, besought of the king to know his duties. "You see that concrete wall over there?" growled the monarch. "Yep," returned the anxious inquirer. "Well, you're the wall guard," sniffed His Highness. "Keep your eye wide open to see that it doesn't walk away."

Always a paradox is the Kentuckian; an ultra-conservative in making laws, he becomes a passionate radical in breaking them. The tenant tobacco farmers, "hill billies" who were ever in debt to the grocer and at the mercy of a tobacco trust which paid as the mind of its buyer varied, decided something must be done. Failing to consult Blackstone, they banded together, agreeing to retain the crops until a life-supporting price was offered. If a neighbor more prosperous, or preferring to play his football game alone, insisted on selling at any figure tendered, he received three or four warnings. If the warnings went unheeded, upon a cloudy night a troop of cavalrymen dashed through his fields, and a few moments later tobacco barn and its black leaves were in flames. These incendiaries, haters of trusts, were, and are, the "Night Riders." Similarly, when toll-gates along the ragged highways in Campbell County harassed the travelers, and negotiations for purchase appeared never to end, rustic cavaliers galloped down: when the toll-keeper appeared after dawn to collect his levy from every voyager he found the gates hacked into splinters. The sale was consummated at once.

Kentucky, the Kingdom of Self. It is a land which has borne or fostered many of the famous: Daniel Boone, Simon Kenton, Henry Clay, Henry Watterson, Jefferson Davis and Abraham Lincoln, the President of the Confederacy and the President of the Union; but always the greatness is of the individual, never of the reflected group. It is the Land Where Anything Might Happen; where judges spit tobacco with grandiloquent attorneys, and one judge opens court with hymns; where school teachers kill wild-cats by lying upon them; where schoolboys whip pedagogues because no holiday is granted to honor the visiting elephant; where a newspaper-contest promoter addressing circular letters in the conventional "My Dear Mrs. Bowsley" is invited upon the street to fight numerous irate husbands for flirting with their wives; where the casual wayfarer is introduced to the college president by the driver of the mail hack. It is a land where love of liberty compensates for grievous imperfections; a land of the lotus which the Kentuckian may leave, but never abandons. This is the State's sin: life is too cheap. Let the Kentuckian barter his revolver for a book, and die in bed.

Lest the Blue Grass inclined vacationer be frightened from his pilgrimage, to the sorrow of commerce chambers, we hasten to add that there are policemen in Kentucky, and spots where the stranger might dwell five years without hearing the sound of a gun.

The next article in the series These United States, to appear in The Nation of August 8, will be North Dakota: A Twentieth-Century Valley Forge, by Robert George Paterson.

Straws and Confetti

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

SOME people say that ex-President Wilson is really for Al Smith of New York. They allege that they have it straight—at only two removed. They confirmingly remember that Mr. Wilson unavailingly but revealingly vetoed the Volstead Act. . . . Harry Slattery, veteran conservation fan, returns from Europe and reports seeing ex-Secretary of the Interior Albert B. Fall, veteran conservation foe, who in London thrilled the local newspapers by telling them that "President Harding likes his drink as well as I like mine." "President and Cabinet Minister Boon Drinking Companions," said some of the ensuing headlines. . . . Slattery says also that no American since Woodrow Wilson has been so welcomed in Europe as Hiram Johnson. He has been dinnered, luncheoned, breakfasted, pursued by the electorate and cornered by the elect, interrogated, besought to explain "irreconcilability," put on a pedestal, urged to open his marble lips, quoted whenever he was pleased to say a word to the world, and photographed and filmed all the rest of the time. . . . He also was laboriously psychoanalyzed by European editorial writers who seemed to feel: "We studied the wrong America when we studied Wilson: here's our chance to study the America that wins." . . .

Senator King of Utah, hatchet-faced and rip-saw-minded, passes through Washington on his way to Moscow and says that he helped in a high degree to expel the Russian Soviet Bureau from the United States and that now he wishes in an equally high degree to be helpful in restoring Russia to the family of nations. . . . Tarrying one night in Washington, Senator King labored in his office in the Senate Office Building till one o'clock. He illustrates a true story which no reporter could ever make the public believe. Washington is full of public men who labor long after their constituents have gone to the movies. . . .

The anthracite coal operators tell the United States Coal Commission that there is large and intense competition between them. Some people here doubt it. Others say: "We fear it will be so." . . . The Interstate Commerce Commission has driven the last spike home to insure the continuance of unlimited competition among bituminous operators. It has decided that every bituminous mine, in every bituminous railroad district, must always have its full pro-rated quota of all coal cars, including and counting all private coal cars of private coal consumers and including and counting all special coal cars assigned by railroads to get coal for their locomotives. . . . Bituminous mining, already very competitive, is going to be more competitive. Anthracite mining, very consolidated, is getting split into ultimately competitive units by the enforced separations of anthracite railroads from anthracite lands and of anthracite railroads from other anthracite railroads. . . . Governmental destruction of railroad rebates and governmental destruction of other unfair practices have split the packers apart till the small packers every year are making gains on the big packers. . . . The utmost endeavor of the Department of Justice has shown no monopoly, and not even any conspiracy, among sugar firms. Washington fears we are drifting back toward competition. . . . The horror of it is that if we cannot explain "profiteering" by "monopoly" or by "conspiracy" we shall be driven to explaining it by the simple fact that everybody under a system of production for profit is habitually engaged in taking the highest price that anybody will offer him for his product. . . . We then would have to choose simply between the production-for-profit system, or individualism, and the production-for-service system, or socialism, and few people have the nerve to make that bald choice, either one way or the other, outrightly. . . . Yet that is precisely the choice toward which we are moving. The Coal Commission statistics show that the admitted "independents" among the anthracite operators are able to exceed the prices of the "trust" and do so. The Federal Trade Commission statistics show that the "independents" among the packers can—and do—exceed the "Big Five" in profits on their investments. . . . Washington is perplexed. . . . Everything in the national capital is criss-cross. . . .

The Democratic Party leaders, in the name of the down-trodden, are preparing to make a strong play in Congress next December for tariff reduction. . . . The ablest organization of farmers here represented, through the ablest legislative agent here resident, is preparing, in the name of the down-trodden, to give the Tariff Commission endless hurdles to jump if it dares to set out toward tariff reduction on certain agricultural products. . . .

The Supreme Court, through Mr. Justice Butler, decides that the authorities of West Virginia did not consider the "reproduction cost" theory of value in arriving at the valuation of a public utility and that, therefore, they were wrong in following the lower "original cost" theory. On the same day, through Mr. Justice Brandeis, the Supreme Court decides that the authorities of Georgia did consider the "reproduction theory" and that therefore they were quite right in following the lower "original cost" theory. . . . This distinction between being wrong when you fail to consider a thing and being right when you consider it and reject it is very puzzling to Mr. Justice McKenna, who thereupon dissents from Mr. Justice Brandeis. . . . Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Holmes seem to be leading the court toward being more favorable to the "original cost" theory, which is the theory also of Robert Marion La Follette. When La Follette advocates it, editors say he reminds them of Trotzky. They do not say he reminds them of Holmes. . . . Mr. Justice McKenna and Mr. Justice Butler make it seem unlikely that Al Smith, if elected President, would necessarily do everything that the Roman Catholic hierarchy suggested. Mr. Justice McKenna and Mr. Justice Butler are Roman Catholics. The National Catholic Welfare Council, consisting of all the Roman Catholic bishops in the United States, has laid down the most progressive social economic program which any church in America has ever laid down for its followers. Mr. Justice McKenna and Mr. Justice Butler remain contumaciously among our stubbornest conservatives. Until St. Peter has more influence with them, it seems not proved that he would necessarily carry the keys to Mr. Smith's thoughts should he some day reach the White House. . . .

The Democrats are cooling toward the League of Nations very fast. Their spokesmen here talk now of positive action by America toward Europe's reconstruction problems irrespective of the League. Republicans will offer the country a leagueless world court. The Democrats will offer the country a leagueless international economic conference. . . . The steadiest wind in this cave of whirlwinds seems to be the one that blows against the League.

Anyhow Debs Spoke in Cincinnati

By MARY D. BRITE

CAN Eugene V. Debs come to Cincinnati on the hottest and longest day of the year and speak to an overflowing audience? No, said the Chamber of Commerce, the Kiwanis Club, the Rotary Club, and other business men's organizations. No, said the American Legion, the Army and Navy Club, and other patriotic societies. No, said the trustees of Music Hall who canceled their contract after the hall had been obtained and the rent paid. No, said various clergymen who took the opportunity to refer to the meeting in their sermons. Most emphatically no, said the daily papers, one of which stated that no information relative to the meeting or to Mr. Debs would be published in that particular journal, at the same time giving generous space to the organizations protesting against the meeting. Even Billy Sunday sent a telegram commending the action of the trustees in canceling the contract.

But the working men and women of Cincinnati said Mr. Debs was to speak—those who in spirit had been with him in his opposition to the war; who in spirit had gone to Atlanta with him and in spirit had come out of Atlanta with him.

Last winter when Margaret Sanger arrived to hold a birth-control meeting Cincinnati was mightily stirred. Could people hear the pernicious doctrine of limitation of families? But adherents came to the front, pressure was exerted in the proper quarters by the proper people, and it was discovered to be vitally important that the right of free speech should be maintained. A large and interested audience heard Mrs. Sanger with the full approval and sanction of the city authorities.

So when there was a possibility, which developed into a probability, of having Mr. Debs for a meeting, I felt it would only be necessary to get the largest hall in town, announce the meeting, and the opposition of the American Legion would furnish the advertising. Music Hall was engaged, a contract was signed, the rent was paid.

Then things began to happen. Running true to form, certain members of the American Legion took the opportunity of expressing their belief in "free speech, but—" Resolutions were passed against allowing Mr. Debs to appear in a city composed of so many 100 per cent Americans who must not be disturbed in their beliefs; these resolutions were rapidly followed by similar action on the part of other patriotic and business organizations.

Then the ministers got on the job, and speaking in the name of the lowly Nazarene, protested against the appearance in Cincinnati of a man who had declared himself against war and in pursuance of his belief had gone to jail.

The protests came to the ears of the trustees of Music Hall. Now the contract for Music Hall contains a very engaging clause which reads:

> The lessor may terminate this lease for the violation of any of the provisions or conditions thereof; or in case the trustees of the Music Hall Association decide that the use of the premises under this lease be improper or obnoxious. In case of such termination, the rent paid by the lessee shall be forfeited and the lessee shall be entitled to no refunder thereof.

The Board of Trustees decided that it would be "improper or obnoxious" for Mr. Debs to speak in Music Hall and promptly canceled the contract. Attention was called to the fact that under the clause no refund was required, but being honorable gentlemen, the amount of the rent paid was returned. All very polite and considerate.

Music Hall came to the city as a gift from Reuben Springer and was for many years called "Springer Hall" in commemoration of him. Stock was sold in the Music Hall Association for $1 a share and many people, as a civic obligation, acquired shares. It was Mr. Springer's idea and intention, and was so stated in the endowment, that the hall was to be used by the citizens of Cincinnati for the purpose of holding meetings, educational or otherwise, and that the business of the association was to be conducted at cost of maintenance, no profits to be derived therefrom. For this reason the property is not taxed.

The committee on arrangements went steadily forward with its plans. Labor Temple was engaged and a smaller hall secured for an overflow meeting. The management of Labor Temple prevented the disgrace of having it said that labor in Cincinnati had failed to accord to Mr. Debs the recognition he merited at its hands.

The question then arose as to the probable attitude to be taken by the city authorities. Would it be decided that there was too much danger to vested interests if Mr. Debs were permitted to speak? Would we have a city administration reversing a precedent laid down with much virtuous sounding of trumpets only a few short months ago? Fortunately, they evidently saw the point involved in such an attitude and stated that no attempt would be made to interfere with the meeting, but that a couple of policemen would be detailed to be present in order to see that nothing seditious or lawless should be attempted.

"The foxes have holes and the birds of the air nests, but the Son of Man has not where to lay his head." The hotels in Cincinnati were too full (?) to accommodate Mr. Debs and his party, and it was not until the day of his arrival that rooms were engaged. When he arrived and registered the following conversation took place between the clerk and a member of the committee. Said the clerk: "Does Mr. Debs wish to engage the hotel auditorium for a meeting?" He was informed that a hall had been obtained and arrangements completed, to which the clerk replied: "Well, I just wanted to say that if he did he couldn't have it." The hall in this hotel, by the way, seats in the neighborhood of 200.

But we were not to get off so easily. At the last moment we discovered that our tickets were not in accordance with the latest style, and a new supply had to be printed. Then we were advised by the Chief of Police just before the meeting was to begin that it could not be held as we had no permit. I have arranged a number of meetings in Cincinnati at Labor Temple and elsewhere, and no permit had ever been necessary. But this was a Debs meeting, and all rules and regulations had been changed to meet that emergency. A permit was required—and obtained. Five dollars, please.

The meeting was held; many people heard Mr. Debs speak; many people were unable to get in either hall; the street was filled from curb to curb with an interested and eager throng, all anxious to see the man whom they loved and who they knew was full of love for and a desire to serve them.

In the Driftway

WITH pleasure the Drifter read that June 30 was a record day at the Chicago marriage license bureau, more licenses having been issued then than ever before. Was this not a delightful occasion, both for those persons who expected these hopeful couples to become disillusioned and for those confident that they would not be? Watching embarkees on this particular voyage of adventure is one of the greatest of indoor sports. Then the Drifter read further, and his smile changed to a frown—almost a tear. For this haste to wed was caused not by a joyous beckoning toward adventure but because the price of marriage licenses was to advance from one dollar and a half to three dollars on the first of July.

* * * * *

IT would be idle to debate the question, Is a marriage license worth twice as much on July 1 as on June 30? Not only would the value of marriage have to be thoroughly reviewed, but all sorts of complications involving the fiscal year which began on July 1 would enter in. At first the Drifter was inclined simply to include the repeal of such a monstrous ordinance in the blanket repeal bill which he is preparing. Careful contemplation of the subject made him believe, however, that a more expensive marriage license was not such a bad thing after all, especially in Chicago. Only a very short stay in the Middle West was enough to give the Drifter indigestion—from too much plenty. On every side of him uncountable rows of corn marched toward the horizon, myriads of heads of wheat bent halfway to the earth, fat hogs roamed slowly in rich pastures, and the trees were bowed under the weight of small green fruit (no telling how many branches would break when their burden ripened). There was too much—too much of everything.

* * * * *

IT may be that some statistician could prove that it was not too much; that each ear of corn would find its hog and each hog its pork-eater, or that each green apple would turn red and bring five cents in some city market. But the Drifter is not interested in statistics; he is suffering from colic brought on by a combination of the above-mentioned causes plus too much cream, eggs, butter, and black dirt. Probably only the sight of a meager New England hillside, covered with stones and sparse grass and topped by a spare, narrow, eighteenth-century farmhouse with barn and woodshed attached, can effect a cure.

* * * * *

IT is for this reason that he welcomes the increased difficulty in procuring marriage licenses. Something ought to be made difficult in the Middle West. And to any irate Middle Western farmer who sends him a letter calling him a lunatic and reminding him of the price of wheat and corn, the Drifter will reply by sending a photograph of that same New England landscape where it is frequently impossible to scratch out of the hard earth enough sustenance to keep the scratcher alive, let alone selling it in the open market.

* * * * *

MEANWHILE he is on a strict diet of straw and cornhusks slightly dampened with water, and he is hoping to get well without the discipline of marriage at three dollars per two heads.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Letters to the Editor should ordinarily not exceed 500 words, and shorter communications are more likely to be printed. In any case the Editor reserves the right to abridge communications.

Was Mencken Right?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The through express—New York to New Orleans—slows down and stops. "Pa-aper" bawls a voice beside the track. "Here boy!" I deposit a nickel. The Charlotte Observer is before me—Charlotte, North Carolina, morning edition, June 15, 1923. I read the following news stories:

Convention of the Knights of Pythias—front page story.
Convention of the Redmen—front page story.
Flag conference of the American Legion—front page story.
Ku Klux Klan parades in full regalia—page 2.
Mystery man haunts American Legion—page 2.
Federation of Musical Clubs pleads for Americanization of opera—English to be sung only—page 4.
Epworth Leaguers hear strong spiritual talk—page 4.
Kiwanis Club holds water party—page 4.
Conference of Young Folks Synod—page 5.
American Legion Bazaar, full details—page 5.
Rotarians plan private park—page 6.
Semi-annual meeting of Mooseheart Legion, the "purple fez wearers"—page 6.
"White Knight Whippers" beat up Frank Sanceri. Picture of Frank's back—page 7.
Convention of Baptist Seaside Assembly—page 8.
Annual convention of Baraca-Philathea Union—page 8.
Battle of Charlotte Chapter, D. A. R., observes Flag Day with tea and cookies—page 10.
Chamber of Commerce arranges meeting of Boy Scouts' Court of Honor—page 10.
Meeting of the Grand Chapter of the Eastern Star—page 11.
Parade—and picture—of Mystic Order of the Veiled Prophets of the Enchanted Realm, 60,000 strong—page 11.

And flanking these news stories, the following advertisements, mostly illustrated:

Wendell's Pills—"banish nervousness."
Poslam—for the skin.
Peterson's Piles Ointment—"Is wonderful for piles, says Peterson."
Freezone—for corns.
California Fig Syrup—for constipation.
Tanlac Vegetable Pills.
Carter's Little Liver Pills.
Cuticura.
Vicks Vapor Rub—for asthma.
Nature's Remedy Tablets—for constipation.
Women! Peel your faces at home with Mercolized Wax.
Better health for women—Lydia E. Pinkham.
666—for bilious fever.
Curly hair can be yours! Queen Hair Dressing.
Chamberlain's Tablets—for constipation.
Old Indian Liver and Kidney Tonic.
G. F. P. restores vitality to generative organs.
Foley's Honey and Tar—for coughs.
Blue-jay—for corns.
B. C.—for headache.
Doan's Kidney Pills.
Catarrh woman's worst foe.

I'm afraid Mencken was right.

New York, June 29 STUART CHASE

Important Russian Relief

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your mention, in a recent issue, of groups which are continuing relief work in Russia, you omit the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, which, with the exception of the American Relief Administration, has expended more money on relief work in Russia than any other organization operating there.

The J.D.C. (as it is generally known) is a sectarian organization, the funds of which have primarily been collected by Jews, from Jews, for Jews. The greater portion of the $60,000,000 so collected has, under the leadership of Felix M. Warburg, been spent in Europe for sectarian relief, to meet the special and exigent tragedies that have befallen Jews in the war-racked territories.

The Russian situation, however, was not one of specially afflicted groups, but of famine, in which the whole population in the famine areas was stricken. The J.D.C. therefore held that in this tragic crisis relief should be non-sectarian in the famine territories. From August, 1921, to January, 1923, the J.D.C. appropriated for Russian relief and reconstruction $7,159,654.62, the greater portion of which was expended wholly in such non-sectarian work.

The reconstructive work was conducted under the lead of Colonel Herbert H. Lehman. Seventy-five farm tractor machines have been shipped to Russia, with five tractor squads to teach the use and application of these tractors. Large contributions of live stock, farm implements, seeds, and various other farm supplies have been made. The formation of farm settlements for agricultural colonists has been furthered. Appropriations have also been made for the reestablishment of cooperative loan societies to further the economic rehabilitation of the people of Russia, and provision has been made for the establishment, equipment, and maintenance of trade schools with the cooperation of local groups. Much medical work has been done in the furnishing of supplies, etc., to hospitals.

Under Colonel Haskell's supervision and with the active participation of Dr. Joseph A. Rosen (a noted grain expert), representative of the J.D.C. in Russia, a great movement was inaugurated for the planting of corn and the diversification of crops. The result of this particular activity has been that over 2,700,000 acres have, according to reliable surveys, actually been planted in corn. The Russian peasant has, in the past, planted almost exclusively small grains. If there had been diversification of crops, the famine might not actually have been averted, but it would have become a matter of secondary consequence, for corn will fructify with summer rains, while the small grains require spring rain.

In a world racked by intolerance, hatred, and dissension it is a heartening thing when men of diverse religious beliefs and background join forces, actuated only by a common impulse to alleviate suffering and to render truly constructive aid.

New York, July 6 JAMES N. ROSENBERG,
Vice-Chairman,
American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee

The Chinese Question in a Nutshell

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The government of China is undoubtedly rotten. It is undoubtedly as rotten as the governments of the United States, England, France, Italy, Rumania, and Japan. Possibly it is even a little rottener. The government of China, or the isolated groups of militarists, officials, and professional robbers who constitute its government, succeed in despoiling the Chinese people every year of a certain large sum—say a hundred million dollars. The governments of the United States, England, France, Italy, Rumania, and Japan act as legal agents for the interlocking groups of American, British, French, Italian, Rumanian, and Japanese financiers, industrialists, and commercial chieftains who succeed in despoiling the American, British, French, Italian, Rumanian, and Japanese peoples of a certain much larger sum—say a thousand million dollars.

There lies the difference: in one case the government is robber direct, in the others it is the authorized legal agent for robbery. It is the only difference, but an important one in the minds of peoples who traditionally worship legality, that is, conformance to rules of the game as duly written down—written down by those who always win. And because of this difference, and in order to do away with it, there is clamor for intervention in China.

I can understand why the governments of the United States, England, etc., should talk of intervention, for they have a conviction of moral superiority to vindicate. I can understand why the classes for whom the governments of the United States, England, etc., act should talk of intervention, for they have a vested interest in the political and economic theory that the function of all governments is to act as their agents in robbery rather than as robbers direct. But I cannot understand why the people of the United States, England, etc., should talk of intervention, support it, or even be interested in it. And I know that the people of China will never give ear to it or submit to it. For at the worst they get off cheaper than the people of the United States, England, etc.

Oceans of ink have been spilled and can be spilled on various phases of the problem of China, but this is the essence of the problem, at least of the problem of China's relation to (call them) the civilized nations.

Constantinople, June 18 NATHANIEL PEFFER

Reading for Political Prisoners

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I suggest that if any Nation readers wish to furnish books useful to these men [political prisoners in San Quentin penitentiary], they communicate with me, and I will notify them as to what is needed. And, by the way, one of the men, P. Mellman, Box 37637, San Quentin, California, has asked to have The Nation sent him. This would mean its being passed around among many men. If some one wishes to brighten the days of our comrades in prison in this way, and keep them thus in closest touch with the progress of the world, here is a chance. The warden does not share the mentality of the Los Angeles school board. He permits The Nation and similar magazines free access to the prisoners. Thus they have some advantage over the inmates of Los Angeles schools.

San Francisco, June 29 W. T. BROWN

Imperishable Fielding

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Lovers of the English classics should be very grateful to Mr. Carl Van Doren for a recent article in your columns about Fielding. It is comforting to those who imagine fiction to be too perishable a picture of "the manners living as they rise" to behold this great writer's novels still enthusiastically read after two hundred years. Happier still is it to recall what Gibbon said of "Tom Jones" in his "Autobiography": "That exquisite picture of human manners will outlive the palace of the Escurial and the imperial eagle of the house of Austria."

We have already lived to see one part of this prediction fulfilled.

Seattle, June 20 FREDERICK BAUSMAN

Arkansas's Literary Reputation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Fred W. Allsopp's indignant objection to Edson's assertion that those Arkansans who can read do not read is not well founded, judging from his own figures. Surely no one would maintain that even the most scrupulous study of the Literary Digest, the Saturday Evening Post, and the Ladies' Home Journal constitutes reading. But I will agree with Mr. Allsopp that from the Chamber of Commerce, the Rotarian, and the Kiwanian viewpoint Arkansas is all right and going to be all righter.

El Paso, Texas, June 12 EDWARD D. TITTMANN

Books

A Man of Faith

Men Like Gods. By H. G. Wells. The Macmillan Company. $2.

IN the temperament of Mr. Wells the spirit of optimism is obviously even more fundamental and insistent than the spirit of inquiry, and he works because he hopes rather than hopes because he works. Busy as he is with controversy and the immediate problems of a tangled world he must refresh his spirit from time to time with a vision of existence made perfect beyond the need of controversy and, sweeping aside troublesome questions of ways and means, remold in fancy a world nearer to the heart's desire. Essentially he lives by faith, and, the very antithesis of a John Stuart Mill to whom a parliamentary report presented the flower of human ecstasy, he can never devote himself to the tangible without frequent rests for the contemplation of the impossible. Accordingly "Men Like Gods" is one of the periodical vacations which he permits himself. In it he wears his prophetic robes, touched with motley, with his jauntiest air, and in the person of a middle-aged man weary of his job as sub-editor of a journal devoted to the more depressing aspects of modern liberalism he jokes his way into Utopia. For Wells as for his hero "hope is the essential solvent without which there is no digesting life," and just because he takes up the story when everything in the modern world looks black and hope seems almost impossible he allows himself the tonic of hope without limit.

This time the promised land lies in a universe parallel to ours in some unknown dimension. There, two supermen devoted to experimental Einstein rotate a fragment of our world into theirs, carrying with it a group of representative Earthlings. Then after one, at least, of the latter has seen and appreciated the difference between that world of knowledge, order, and intelligence as compared with our own world of ignorance, confusion, and prejudice the fragment is rotated back and we are bidden after this Pisgah sight to push on our way across the desert with faith in ourselves as our guide.

If we have not before now come to the end of our journey, Wells implies, it is because we have never really tried. Through many weary centuries we unloaded responsibility for the direction of our affairs upon God and when God had disappeared we shifted the burden to Nature. In the supposedly unreligious nineteenth century Divine Providence reappeared under the seductive guises of natural selection and economic law, encouraging us in our unwillingness to look after our own affairs by assuring us that something—if not God then the Darwinian theory and the law of supply and demand—would surely work for the good of those willing to muddle through. But since Nature's holy plan has left human affairs in the same unhappy confusion into which All-seeing Providence conducted them, only intelligence remains to be tried. Faith in God and faith in Nature are seductive excuses for irresponsibility, but faith in the human mind is a driving force.

Mr. Wells is more interested, I think, in asserting his dogged confidence in Utopia as an attainable land and in indicating the general direction of the route than he is in describing minutely the institutions of the place. And in this, of course, he is wise, for perfection is notoriously difficult to imagine. Any street-corner fanatic can describe a hell which is at least hellish enough, but not even the imagination of a Dante can conceive a heaven in which one man out of ten would want to spend a time longer than that embraced by the usual summer vacation. Indeed, a pessimist might see in this impossiblity of imagining beatitude a sinister sign that man was made for trouble, with organs for the perception of pain but without correspondingly adequate organs for joy, and that happiness can never be obtained because it cannot even be conceived. But such gloomy imaginings are not for Wells. Here, he seems to say, is a world, not perfect perhaps, but at least as much freer and comelier than ours as ours is freer and comelier than that, let us say, of Carthaginian despotism. And it is conceivable that men essentially no different from ourselves could realize it.

Though the mind of the present reviewer is not of the sort naturally inclined to Utopian imaginings he is far from denying either the interest or the value of Utopias. Mr. Wells himself would never have been a sociologist if he had not been a dreamer first, and he may be justified in his assumption that only the faith and the will are lacking to transform this world into something which would seem by comparison at least a paradise. It may be that if the general on the battlefield says "It's human nature to kill and you can't change human nature," it is only because he does not want human nature changed; and that if the captain of industry says "You can't have an incentive to accomplishment without cutthroat competition," it is only because he does not want to stop cutting financial throats. And, finally, it may be also that by dreaming dreams enough man will at last become civilized and intelligent after he has come to realize how fair civilization and intelligence are. In all of Wells's new book there is nothing which he himself has not said several times before, but withal there is his unquenchable enthusiasm which keeps his work from being ever really stale.

J. W. KRUTCH

A Great Queen

Catherine de Médicis. By Paul Van Dyke. Charles Scribner's Sons. Two volumes. $9.

THIS is the first English biography of Catherine de Médicis based on original sources. Owing to the difficulty of documentation, no doubt, historians long shunned the subject. To be sure, ten volumes of Catherine's letters were available; and various aspects of her life had been treated. But there remained, imperfectly explored, the archives of England, France, Switzerland, and especially Italy. Thanks to Mr. Van Dyke's researches in those countries, he has utilized some 3,000 new extracts from letters and documents. However, he has avoided technical details, since his book is intended for people without training in history as well as for specialists.

But it would be impossible to understand the life of Catherine de Médicis without some knowledge of the national and international events in which for thirty years she exerted a very potent influence. Although constantly preoccupied with domestic politics and the interests of her children, Catherine never lost contact with world events like the Renascence, the upheaval in religion, and the struggle between France and the house of Austria. To such salient features of his subject Mr. Van Dyke has wisely devoted sufficient space to lend to the whole a substantial background.

Descended from a family of wealthy Florentine merchants, Catherine was born to large expectations. But the wisest seer could not have foretold that she was destined to be regent of France, the mother of three kings, two queens, a duke, and a duchess. Left at birth without parents, the young heiress became a pawn on the political chessboard. At the age of fourteen she was married to Henry, the second son of Francis I. But the upper French nobility regarded her with contempt. Indeed, for a decade Catherine feared repudiation for her failure to bear Henry an heir. Nor did the ten children that she brought her husband in the next thirteen years suffice to win him away from his favorite mistress, Diane de Poitiers.

Mr. Van Dyke has vividly depicted Catherine's existence as a submissive wife and devoted mother during Henry's reign: her love of display and sports, her stifled jealousy, the tact with which she discouraged licentiousness, conciliated political factions, overcame the King's dislike of Italians, and flattered both Catholics and Protestants. During Henry's campaign on the Rhine, the Queen as regent was surprisingly successful. This first taste of authority, so stimulating to her ambition, foreshadowed her career after 1559. Yet much as Catherine coveted political power, she certainly did not welcome it at the cost of Henry's life. Of all her sorrows—she lost nine of her ten children—the most grievous was the death of her husband.

As the author makes clear in his illuminating account of the Renascence and the Reformation, conditions in France after 1559 would have defied the efforts of the most sagacious queen regent of history. Henry II had left the country almost bankrupt, seething with factional quarrels, and hopelessly divided over religion. How then could his weak, neurotic sons command obedience? The wonder is that their mother succeeded as well as she did. True, she was a better matchmaker than statesman: she placed marriage of her children above the national weal. But in spite of such shortcomings, her marvelous tenacity and power of persuasion often accomplished the seemingly impossible. Like Elizabeth of England, she was astute, resourceful, and unscrupulous. Like Elizabeth, too, she knew when to threaten and when to cajole. Some historians have sneered at what M. Mariéjol terms Catherine's "politique de bascule, de compromis et de concessions," with which she played one faction against another; but none of these critics has suggested a better policy. We seriously doubt whether even a Richelieu could have controlled the situation that confronted Henry's widow.

Thus extenuating circumstances make the St. Bartholomew massacre seem less odious. While all historians charge that appalling crime chiefly to Charles IX's mother, they are coming to realize that she at first intended the assassination of only Coligny. Had this been accomplished as planned, there would probably have resulted no general slaughter. Mr. Van Dyke believes that up to 1572 Catherine had not had the remotest connection with the death of any person. Similarly he dismisses as absurd the perversity and fantastic crimes afterwards attributed to this queen.

Obviously Catherine de Médicis should be judged by the standards of her age—ethics which virtually sanctioned political murder. Says Mr. Van Dyke: "At the time of the St. Bartholomew massacre, the laws of all European countries, Protestant and Catholic alike, punished heresy with death." Nor does he hold the French Protestants guiltless. "No one who knows the sixteenth century," he affirms, "can suppose for a moment that what the Huguenot churches really wanted was simply liberty of worship. They looked forward ultimately to substituting their religion for Roman Catholicism and to a suppression of orthodoxy such as had taken place in England." On the contrary, Catherine, very far from religious fanaticism, was anxious to have established in the church modifications that would effect a reunion of Christendom. While Mr. Van Dyke naturally produces some very damaging evidence against "the indomitable old woman," he wholeheartedly admires her encouragement of the arts, her amazing energy and unfailing optimism. But instead of pronouncing a judgment, he has sought to draw a portrait—a purpose fully achieved. Happily, too, this masterly central portrait is enhanced by the excellence of those grouped around it: such personages as the Queen's children, the Guises, Coligny, Henry of Navarre, L'Hôpital, and the Constable.

A less commendable feature of the two opulent volumes is the burdensome length of their letters and documents, parts of which should have been given largely in substance. Further, a lack of dates adds to the reader's mental strain, frequently increased by an absence of punctuation. Here and there astonishingly careless English has crept in, for example: "few personages so many of whose words have survived as Catherine de Médicis" (I, V); "a letter to the Grand Master whose spelling (the spelling of which) is illiterate" (I, 31); "a sign whose meaning none but they knew" (II, 258); "tell me who I can trust?" (II, 282). Notwithstanding such minor details, Mr. Van Dyke's "Catherine de Médicis" is a monumental biography, equal in every way to M. Mariéjol's admirable French monograph on the same subject.

William H. Scheifley

Essays and Reminiscence

The Nineteen Hundreds. By Horace Wyndham. Thomas Seltzer. $2.50.

Earlham. By Percy Lubbock. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

Books and Authors. By Robert Lynd. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

It is not a novel experience to meet nobodies, shoals of them, in the current volumes of reminiscence. But it is distinctly exhilarating to find them sailing candidly and ingenuously under their own true colors. "I prefer the nobodies," says Mr. Wyndham. So he builds his book from a memory richly stored with anecdotes of the nonentities of London's literary, artistic, and journalistic life, and the dimly recollected somebodies who always manage to cling to the outer fringe of the current fashions in thought and manners. While his major interest did lie in Grub Street and among the little clubs of London's Bohemia, Mr. Wyndham caught a goodly number of celebrities, so that his memoirs are pleasantly studded with the names of such lions of the British fine arts as Oscar Wilde, Somerset Maugham, Frank Harris, J. M. Barrie, W. S. Gilbert, Mrs. Langtry, and Arnold Bennett.

"The Nineteen Hundreds" is an excellent book for readers who are not seeking information on literature, politics, journalism, art, or society. It is admirably designed for the uses of tired clubmen with some notion of the historical character of British urban life. Its place is the club lounge; its time, fifteen minutes before dinner and a half hour afterwards. Mr. Wyndham writes with as much vivacity and as jaunty a wit as any of the recent collectors of memorabilia, and somewhat more of discretion in reciting droll tales concerning the living and recently dead.

Marius the Epicurean was a prig. The circumstance makes it something of a gratuitous thrust to compare Marius and Mr. Percy Lubbock. Yet "Earlham," Mr. Lubbock's volume of childhood reminiscences, shows him clearly to have inherited in great part the golden mood of retrospect which gave Marius to the world. Substitute the lights and shadows of Mr. Lubbock's childhood home for White-nights, the garden at Earlham and the river Yare for the decaying landscape of the Roman campagna, omit the languorous, self-conscious imagination of Marius, add more than a touch of sly humor and healthy objectivity—and you have the genealogy of "Earlham," a volume which embodies, whether consciously or no, the more respectable line of descent from Walter Pater's epicureanism.

Robert Lynd, literary critic of the London Daily News, has assembled in "Books and Authors" some thirty-three of his flying pieces, classified as "More or Less Ancient" and "More or Less Modern." In each little essay Mr. Lynd gives touch-and-go consideration to such literary figures of the past and present as Hugo, Herrick, Molière, Burke, Keats, Byron, Shelley, Poe, Hawthorne, Beerbohm, Conrad, Wells, Vachel Lindsay, and T. S. Eliot.

Mr. Lynd is master of the well-made sentence, of startling paradox, of neat phrases which give the picturesque fillip so much sought after in compact, familiar little journalistic essays. Mr. Lynd minds his own critical opinions, too. He echoes with somewhat diminished effectiveness the dicta of Sainte-Beuve and Matthew Arnold that the critic "must portray in an author, not only an author, but a man." So he develops the familiar touch. "Charles Lamb was a small, flat-footed man whose eyes were of different colours and who stammered." "Herrick was a gross and good-natured clergyman who had a double chin." "Byron was a guttersnipe in scarlet and ermine." "Mr. Bennett is at once a connoisseur and a card." Mr. Lynd's draught as a critic of literature is not great. He trims his sails shrewdly, and lays his course in the safe channels clearly marked by well-established, enlightened contemporary taste. And he has a special merit in his faculty for concreteness and personality of style.

Gerald Hewes Carson

Follies of Imperial Germany

Lebenserinnerungen und Politische Denkwürdigkeiten. Von Baron von Eckardstein. Drei Bände. Leipzig: Paul List. 1919-1921.

Zur Vorgeschichte des Weltkrieges. Von Otto Hammann. Berlin: Reimar Hobbing. 1919.

Der Missverstandene Bismarck. Zwanzig Jahre Deutscher Weltpolitik. Von Otto Hammann. Berlin: Reimar Hobbing. 1921.

Bilder aus der letzten Kaiserzeit. Von Otto Hammann. Berlin: Reimar Hobbing. 1922.

Die Aera Bülow. Von Johannes Haller. Stuttgart-Berlin: J. G. Cotta'sche Buchh. Nachf. 1922.

THE English historian G. P. Gooch wrote in the Manchester Guardian of February 27, 1922, in an article on Lord Grey's Foreign Policy: "No one can have a lower opinion of German statesmanship since Bismarck than myself; but the dominant impression which a close study leaves on my mind is its incredible folly rather than its wickedness." The books under review prove the correctness of this statement. Four men, the Kaiser, Prince Bülow, von Holstein, and Admiral Tirpitz, are chiefly responsible for the fateful trend of Germany's policy since Bismarck was dismissed in March, 1890. The Emperor was barely conscious of the role he played; he was one of those who mean well but unwittingly do mischief. Tirpitz and Bülow had a strong hold on him; Tirpitz because of his determined personality, and Bülow because he knew how to keep the Emperor in good humor. William's bravado, his saber-rattling, his trumpeting words were much more the emanation of a desire for theatrical show than of a lust for war.

In the years between 1898 and 1901 the fate of Germany was decided, for during that period England made three proposals for an alliance. The details were revealed at the close of the Great War, to the utter surprise of the Germans, by Baron von Eckardstein, formerly Botschaftsrat at the German embassy in London, who personally carried on most of the negotiations, and by Otto Hammann, who was at the head of the press department of the German Foreign Office from 1894 until after the outbreak of the war. These negotiations came to naught through the crankiness of Holstein, who virtually directed the foreign policy of Germany.

Bismarck had already warned the Emperor that Holstein should be allowed to work only under supervision, and is said to have nicknamed him "the man with the hyena-eyes"; and Bismarck's son Herbert advised Bülow to drag the "snake" into the light of day or dismiss him. Instead Holstein intrigued so cleverly that he got a strong hold on Bülow, so that Professor Haller rightly speaks of a "Holstein era" lasting from 1897 to 1906, when Holstein was finally dismissed.

The diplomatic documents published by the German Foreign Office have proved that Bismarck after 1870 did his utmost to keep the peace of Europe and fervently desired to have England join the Triple Alliance. The British statesmen looked favorably upon the Chancellor's advances, but for parliamentary reasons were satisfied to continue in mere friendly relations. Toward the end of the century, however, they began to be uncomfortable in their "splendid isolation." Joseph Chamberlain was then the guiding spirit in the Salisbury Cabinet. After the Jameson Raid in 1896 came, in 1898, the violent quarrel with France about Fashoda, and this was followed in October, 1899, by the outbreak of the Boer War. At the same time Britain was on poor terms with Russia, which was threatening the trade interests of England in North China. The British Government felt the necessity of having a real ally on the Continent and turned, in the spring of 1898, to Germany.

During the early stages of the Boer War, when England was suffering reverses, Russia and France cautiously approached Germany, suggesting a continental coalition against England. The Emperor declined and hastened to inform his grandmother, Queen Victoria, and the Prince of Wales, of this proposal, which Russia vainly renewed in October, 1901. England twice repeated the offer to Germany of a definite alliance, the last time early in 1901 after the accession of Edward VII to the throne. An alliance with England obviously meant for Germany increased tension with France (especially as England proposed to divide Morocco with Germany) and impaired relations with Russia. Holstein himself desired the alliance, but he apprehended a speedy war with Russia which would be for the benefit of England, and he was not willing to pull England's chestnuts out of the fire. Lord Salisbury finally went so far as to propose a defensive alliance which should become operative only if one of the parties concerned was attacked by two Powers. But Holstein demanded that Austria-Hungary should be included in the compact; and the British ministers refused to compromise themselves in an alliance with a country which showed such signs of disintegration as the Dual Monarchy. The negotiations dragged on for more than three years. In the end the English statesmen made it clear that if they did not come to an understanding with Germany they would settle their differences with France and Russia, even at a big sacrifice in Morocco, Persia, etc., warnings which Holstein believed to be mere bluff: it was his deep-rooted conviction that England and Russia could never be friends. The consequence was the Entente Cordiale of April 8, 1904, and the entente with Russia of August 31, 1907.

Holstein's mentality and Bülow's carelessness were responsible for the fatal mistake. Bülow left Holstein in power. During the first Morocco crisis in 1905-1906, Holstein secretly worked for a rupture with France. He kept the Chancellor in the dark. In France Delcassé also was working for war, and therefore was dismissed in June, 1905. When Bülow realized whither Holstein's policy might lead, he finally took up the reins himself, and peace was insured. Holstein asked for his dismissal, an oft-repeated request, which this time was promptly accepted—to his great surprise.

Meanwhile Admiral von Tirpitz, Secretary of the Navy since 1897, had come to the foreground. It was his idea to build such a fleet that England would consider it too risky to attack it. With the navy law of 1900 Germany departed from Bismarckian policy; Tirpitz's program meant the deathly enmity of Great Britain. The Emperor was only too easily carried along. When Bethmann-Hollweg became Chancellor in 1909 he worked for a better understanding with England, and Tirpitz was his chief stumbling-block. The former British Minister of War, Lord Haldane, who knew Tirpitz fairly well, wrote in 1920: "I do not think that Admiral Tirpitz wanted actual war." But by 1912 things had developed so far that there were other stumbling-blocks. The Russian ambassador in Paris, Isvolski, for instance, wrote to the Russian Foreign Minister, Sazonov, that "in consequence of the celebrated visit of Lord Haldane to Berlin [in February, 1912] Germany had made an absolutely concrete proposition to England to enter into a written agreement according to which the British Cabinet was to preserve its neutrality in case Germany found itself involved in a war which it had not provoked itself. The London Cabinet informed M. Poincaré and hesitated apparently to accept or refuse this proposition. M. Poincaré pronounced himself in the most categorical way against any engagement of such a kind." He threatened a complete rupture, and, Isvolski continued, "the objection put forth had the expected result and the London Cabinet declined the German proposition, which provoked great discontent in Berlin."

Johannes Haller, professor of history at the University of Tübingen, writes about Germany's lost opportunities with a bitter heart. His book is a severe and scathing indictment of the follies from the end of the nineteenth century to the year 1909. Otto Hammann takes a more detached view. He is one of the very few initiated persons who was in almost daily contact with the chief actors. "The Misunderstood Bismarck" covers the period from 1890 to the Bosnian crisis of 1908. In his newest book, "Bilder aus der letzten Kaiserzeit," he describes the personalities and ideas of such men as Holstein, Bülow, Tirpitz, Bethmann-Hollweg, and the Emperor, revealing some of their unpublished letters and documents. The reader will come to the conclusion that Holstein was one of the most sinister figures in the history of imperial Germany. One of the nicknames that most stuck to him was the "Gray Eminence." His influence has proved to be more than gray. But as far as the war guilt is concerned the serious student will share the view expressed under the title They All Lied in The Nation of October 11, 1922: "Divided responsibility indeed, both in the years and in the days preceding the war."

HERMANN LUTZ

A Textbook on Literature

A History of French Literature. From the Earliest Times to the Great War. By William A. Nitze and E. Preston Dargan. Henry Holt and Company. $5.

IT is probably because the critics who recognize the beauty and significance of contemporary letters are engaged in establishing the value of this epoch's creative effort that the writing of histories of literature is left to those who believe the production of worthwhile literary work ceased about thirty years ago. This unfortunate circumstance has been as characteristic of every age and tongue as it is of our own, and it is most especially true of French literature. Despite a growing revolt on the part of her liberal scholars, France teaches her youth, through textbook and general survey, all the prejudices of Brunetière and Bourget, incorporated into their petites histoires by such petty pedagogues as Abry, Audic, and Crouzet.

Hence one can appreciate the thrill of discovery that was mine when I saw in the table of contents that one-tenth of this large, solid volume was concerned with the writings of our own times. It was even more thrilling to think that American students had done for French literature what the French want and need but have not yet been able to accomplish. These suppositions only increased the disappointment which followed further research.

Valuable though their work is as a limited "Who's Who" of modern French writers; dignified and intelligent though it is in comparison with the inanities of French pedagogues, Professors Nitze and Dargan have done nothing more in the chapters dealing with the literature of the past thirty or forty years than to transcribe the antagonisms of Brunetière toward the work of his contemporaries and to project that critic's narrow vision upon the literary achievements of the decade between his death and the war. Lacking his passionate opinions, the authors are unconvincing in their decisions, and in view of recent developments, they appear unsound in their judgments. It is unsound, for example, to ignore the influence, the power, and the intrinsic worth of Remy de Gourmont and to dismiss him in these lines: "Gourmont is also a sort of Intuitionist with regard to aesthetic theories. Following Bergson in the 'dissociation des idées,' he is led by this analysis into a corrosive and pernicious immoralism, especially in poetry and fiction. His criticism is likewise based on a sensual principle, but shows genuine gifts of divination and taste."

In fact, the professors are particularly unfortunate in their summaries and generalizations. They revel in labels, and in their efforts at condensation make these labels meaningless or ridiculous. "Zola lived largely as a recluse, and he was not an artist; his fiction suffers from these handicaps." This of the man who wrote "Art is life seen through a temperament"! And again: "In the meantime, the brothers had founded naturalism, of the low life kind, in 'Germinie Lacerteux.' . . . The Goncourt brothers were a complicated pair, and accordingly their work is composed of strangely mixed materials."

That the authors have not availed themselves of the opportunity to make a vital contribution to the study of French literature is obvious. Their treatment of the moderns is wholly inadequate, but the earlier periods receive more extensive and careful consideration. Here, too, though now on familiar ground, they are interested in rating rather than in evaluating the subjects, and they are exceedingly liberal in this rating. So far as I can judge, they have borrowed the superlatives from the partisans of each writer to impress upon the student that whatever was is good.

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

Presbyterian Demons

Demonism Verified and Analyzed. By Rev. Hugh W. White. The Presbyterian Committee of Publication. Priceless.

MISGUIDED modernists struggle along under the mistaken impression that demons (except for such imps as the beloved demon rum, the comforting demon nicotine, and the flapper demon soda-pop), after flourishing from Jerusalem to Salem, Massachusetts, were formally discovered to be nothing but a mob neurosis, or an individual case of poorly digested gefüllte fisch or mince pie. Nothing is closer to the false. Demons are in again, take it, as we do, from the Presbyterian Committee of Publications. The Rev. Mr. White refers casually to well-authenticated (we have his word for it) cases of demonism today in China, New Zealand, Mongolia, Japan, Korea, India, Africa, Germany, the Moslem lands, Mexico, and even New England. We have often wondered as to the motivating agency behind the Ku Klux Klan, normalcy, the popularity of Dr. Frank Crane, and the letters of statesman Hylan to statesman Hearst. Let us look further into this matter.

The Rev. Mr. White reports 368 cases of demons, of which 304 Chinese ones came under his own observation. Case No. 58, a Mrs. Ts'wei, had at first 125 demons, of which 120 had left her before he saw her. She was cured, in part, by the use of the name "Jesus," which is apparently respected by the most hardened devil. "Superstition," defines Mr. White, "is the erroneous attributing of phenomena in nature to direct arbitrary volition by spirits, to the denial or exclusion of scientific principles." In his victory over superstition, based upon scientific principles, he comes to the conclusion: "That there is a Satan and that Satan is responsible for demonism is put beyond question by the fact that the lines of demarcation between the countries which have not demonism and those which have it coincide with the limits of Christian influence." His religious geography may be excused as partly superstitious, since Germany, Mexico, and New England are three countries which have demons, and therefore, by his implication, are non-Christian. He implies further, of course, that Satan is not in Christian countries. And Satan inspires all sin and wickedness: for instance, "for the cause of lust and cruelty . . . no adequate interpretation has been found except on the hypothesis of a Satan with power to suggest." And Satan is not in this Christian land: neither in Yonkers nor Hoboken, not where Hohokus purls nor where Secaucus towers, not among the dives of Coney Island nor the vinous reaches of Milwaukee, Kokomo, and Keokuk, is there the faintest print of the cloven heel and the cloven soul, of the forked tail and the brimstone breath. There is—there can be—no crime wave. Let the burglars, lynchers, hold-up men, kidnappers, firebugs, motor murderers, bootleggers, and all the moral rest of our citizens repeat with Suey, the leading Chinese psychic healer, "Day by day, in every way, we're getting moraler and moraler."

These demons—and Healer Hickson, says the Rev. Mr. White, wrote him that he cured 200 cases at one meeting in India—are possessed chiefly by the fox and weasel spirits and speak English fluently with the tongues of illiterate Chinese who know no English. A headache, says Mr. White, may often be recognized as incipient demonism; there can be no headache in Christian countries—it is an error of mortal mind. A later work by the same author may establish the actual existence of men who are devils in their own home towns, and even of cigarette fiends, bridge fiends, and golf fiends. Thus modern science tramples superstition into the soil. Have you a little demon in your home?

Clement Wood

The Tramping Methodist

The Tramping Methodist. By Sheila Kaye-Smith. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

EVERYONE who has read "Joanna Godden" and "Green Apple Harvest" will wish to read the reprint of Miss Kaye-Smith's first book, "The Tramping Methodist," in eager search for personalities as intense and troublesome and appealing as either Joanna or Bob Fuller of the later novels. These two book people are so living that they penetrate one's subconscious knowledge of men and women and are added, like real people, to one's accumulated understanding of human conduct. Humphrey Lyte, the tramping methodist, is a less complicated person than the wrong-headed and magnificent Joanna or than that other wayward preacher, Bob Fuller of "Green Apple Harvest." His loves and his spiritual enthusiasms take him less hard, yet he is none the less real.

"The Tramping Methodist" is an extraordinary book for a girl hardly out of her teens to have written. Unified and swift, and because less subtle, perhaps more of a piece than the later novels, it is preeminently "a good story," reminiscent a trifle of "David Balfour" in the drama and romance of its narrative—a Stevensonian likeness which disappears in the later work. If one also compares Miss Kaye-Smith to Hardy in her reproduction of the soil and contour, of the quality and essence of her Sussex, it does not mean that she is an imitative writer. Indeed, to me she is one of the two or three women now writing really original fiction. For she does not merely expound an environment or a point of view—an accomplishment which we are apt to acclaim as art in America today—what she does is to get inside the souls of her characters to extract the ferment which is a novel. Therefore she does more than to give us a picture of nineteenth century evangelical England against the detailed background of a Sussex farming community, she shows us within the limits of environment and point of view, the working of that uncomfortable spiritual yeast which is in all men, though lacking in most of the Babbitts and mooncalves of the modern novel.

Katharine Sergeant Angell

Reality and Imperfection

City Block. By Waldo Frank. Published by Waldo Frank. $7.

AMONG recent books "City Block" stands out as unusual both in conception and execution. There is not, in the whole collection, anything that suggests the work of other contemporary writers; unless, perhaps, the treatment of some scenes faintly recalls Evelyn Scott. Few of the stories have any plot. The theme of each is a mental or spiritual tragedy revealed by the characters' minds, as wheels revolving in a machine exhibit its motive and purpose. When the workings of these minds are not too vaguely expressed, the author's thorough acquaintance with the cloud of miseries that envelops the city, his insight, and his power of description make him peculiarly successful. In Murder, Under the Dome, and The Table, the consistently destructive power over the life of the man or woman moves sullenly to its inevitable end. Mr. Frank has taken for the keynote of his book this sentence from Spinoza: "By reality and perfection I understand the same thing." But he seems unaware that he can weaken or destroy this impression of reality by irrelevant excursions into symbolism and sentimentality.

Side by side with the burning presentation of minds like Meyer Lanich's and Lotte Rabinowich's, which are crucified in the intensity of their misery, is placed the wandering, second-rate sketch of John the Baptist. Side by side with the ruthless picture in Murder are the unconvincing and hysterical reactions of Clarence Lipper, Patrick Broaddus, Paula Dessyn, Luis Ajala Dennis. Genuine emotion like fire warms with its own heat; the gas log of sentimentality is a cold, blue flicker in comparison.

Six of the fourteen stories are decidedly superior. They are Murder, Under the Dome (two stories), The Table, Candles, and Charity. Their action moves slowly but they reveal in cruel light every corner of that cabinet of curiosities, the human heart. The manuscripts of Under the Dome would be a distinctive beginning for another collection. They are singularly representative and moving, in both subject and treatment. The Altar of the World is strong and interesting but there is too much of it.

Throughout the book the writing is, for the most part, powerful and original. There are unusual figures and much vitality in the descriptions. If sympathy for your characters, suffering with them, is an important element in fiction, the author has stood the test in a notable half dozen instances. Sophie, Lanich, Lotte, Godfrey and Dora, Rudd we cannot forget. Their tragedies are before us as charred scaffoldings of houses, burned before their building was completed. The book is an achievement. It is not homogeneous, it is singularly uneven. But it is the best work Mr. Frank has yet done.

Laura Benét

Criminological Wisdom and Unwisdom

The Psychology of the Criminal. By M. Hamblin Smith, M.A., M.D. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.

Crime. Its Cause and Treatment. By Clarence Darrow. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $2.50.

In the Clutch of Circumstance. My Own Story by a Burglar. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

DR. M. HAMBLIN SMITH, who is medical officer of H. M. Prison at Birmingham, England, and a lecturer on criminology, has as his thesis that conduct being the result of mental life, the intensive investigation of the cases of individual criminals "is the road to the solution of the problems of criminality." Maybe so. But psychoanalysis aided by some scheme of mental tests will not do the whole bag of tricks. The "problems of criminality" are not all or solely individual problems. Some are social and require for their solution fundamental social adjustments.

If Dr. Smith cannot vaunt any startling contribution to the rather meager science of criminology, he has at least put behind him the conventional views. Those who still applaud the imprisonment of men and women for political or economic opinion will probably write him down as a dangerous radical after reading this sentence: "Eternal principles of right and justice may exist, but our limited intelligences are unable to discover what these principles are." Such folk and all others whose god of salvation is brute force, indeed every one, can read his book with great profit.

Mr. Darrow's treatise is frankly popular, which serves to explain why it has reached a third printing. It comes from the reflections and experiences of more than a generation spent in the courts. He writes in lawyer-like fashion, rather prolixly, but as one of refreshingly liberal views even if he does obtrude his own opinions as pretty final. To say that he has tried to present the most recent scientific thought and investigation in the domain of human conduct would be far fetched. He brushes that field very hastily and gives one the impression of making light of the only real advance made in modern criminology.

Mr. Darrow probably would be the last man to contend that he has made a scientific contribution to our knowledge of the origin of crime; and in respect to its treatment he naturally has not discovered a specific. Even so he will probably be accused by the befogged multitude of a dangerously lenient attitude toward the criminal. He is intensely human and does not forget that the wrongdoer is like unto ourselves. The book is refreshing in contrast to the usual professional preachment.

Mark Twain's burglar has written the story of his life, and it is like many of its kind in that it points the everlasting moral of the reformed criminal. Not that one should for a moment disparage his sincerity or make jest of his presentments; but its fame will rest largely on the fact that his last burglarious exploit was an attempt to rifle the house of the great humorist. It is good reading. JOHN KOREN

Books in Brief

Poems from "Life." With Introductory Words by Oliver Herford. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

A companion volume to Poems from "Punch" (1922), and for American purposes better. For this meridian no richer collection of humorous verse has appeared in years. The introduction not only is funny, but deserves to be crowned for its remark that Meredith's Essay on the Comic is "stuffed with straw." It is.

Reconstruction in France. By William MacDonald. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

This book is an attempt at a "comprehensive survey of the unparalleled work which France has done in the restoration of its invaded departments." The author has spared himself no pains in assembling a mass of documentary material, historical, statistical, legislative, administrative, and what not, the very profusion of which almost blurs the picture and benumbs by its weight. The deeper meaning of devastation by war does not seem to occupy him greatly.

Modern History. By Carleton J. H. Hayes and Parker Thomas Moon. The Macmillan Company. $2.40.

Unlike the history books which fell to the lot of the reviewer when a student, this book possesses a continuity which the writers' topical (instead of chronological) treatment in no wise weakens. Messrs. Hayes and Moon courageously flout the notion that so-called epochs form arbitrary divisions to that continuous flow of human activity we know as history and give a deservedly lesser place to those heretofore overrated departments of history, royal biography, and genealogy. There is no attempt here to befuddle our memories with an accumulation of dates and names to the utter destruction of historical perspective. The authors have hewed closely to the line of the precept enunciated in their preface: "It is less important that the secondary school student should nod at a large number of persons and things than that he should know thoroughly the really significant facts and people." This volume contains adequate illustrations, plentiful references, a chronology which takes its place as an appendix and, what will most delight the adventuresome schoolboy heart, references to historical fiction, Henty not excluded.

Development of Social Theory. By James P. Lichtenberger. The Century Company. $4.

This work is the result of Professor Lichtenberger's courses in the history of social theory at the University of Pennsylvania. Each theory discussed is first given a background in a sketch of the social and political conditions existing during the time and at the place of its formulation; there is then presented a sketch of the personality of the man who is associated with it, and then the theory itself. Beginning with Plato, the author treats of Aristotle, the later Greeks and early Roman writers, the early Christians, Machiavelli, the writers of the Reformation and of the French Revolution, before he attempts to deal with the theories of men who are generally classed as sociologists. He discusses Comte, the evolutionary school, Spencer, Lester Ward, Tarde, Gumplowicz, and Ratzenhoffer; such men as Giddings, Cooley, and the German social philosophers seem neglected, although they are touched on in connection with the others. The work should be splendid as a textbook for such courses as Professor Lichtenberger's.

Drama

Dunsany

Plays of Gods and Men. By Lord Dunsany. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.75.

Plays of Near and Far. By Lord Dunsany. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.75.

IT was in 1915 that Stuart Walker's Portmanteau Theater gave the first performances of plays by Lord Dunsany in New York. One remembers especially "The Gods of the Mountains" and "The Sword of King Argimenes." One remembers, across all the intervening years and their many brilliant and interesting theatrical events, the sharp, massive, magical colors and architectural contours of those productions, the strange beauty of spears and helmets and thrones and pillars and breast-plates and greaves, the sensitiveness and power with which Mr. Walker grasped and embodied the imaginings of the only genuinely mythopoeic writer of this generation.

That is the brief but necessary definition of Lord Dunsany's talent. To him myth is not instrument but substance. His plays, in his own words, are not allegories. Neither are they symbols except in so far as all that is human is symbolic. His place, therefore, is apart from the practitioners of the neo-romantic drama—Yeats and Hofmannsthal and even Shaw and Hauptmann in their latest phases. He has no theories, not even favorite truths. He tells himself somber fairy tales. We overhear them. He is not naive; he has no affiliation with his folk. His art is not an art of union; it is an art of flight. He escapes from his country, people, world as too troubling, subtle, intricate, and dreams of desert kingdoms that were old when Helen was not yet grown to womanhood.

The prevailing tone of these mythopoeic dramas is dark. Men and things dash themselves against a granite fate. But this is merely a matter of tone, of mood; it is an artistic and not a philosophical method and is to be ranked and appreciated with the velvety cruelty of the dialogue, with the invention of that marvelous nomenclature which has the timbre of muffled kettle-drums heard across vast spaces. Other moods come to Dunsany rarely and as though by chance. There is the eternal yearning for freedom in that lovely play "The Tents of the Arabs"; there is the withering estimate of cheap astuteness, of the wisdom of this world, in "A Night at an Inn." But in "The Laughter of the Gods" and in "The Compromise of the King of the Golden Isles" he returns to that overwhelming sense of the inscrutable and relentless character of human fate which he has found so fruitful an artistic mood.

It is a curious fact but none the less a fact that these plays are not felt to be monotonous despite the monotone of their dominant key. Dunsany is a highly concrete writer. He is a born story-teller. He is so good a story-teller that he does not need intrigue which is but the refuge of the barren. You are breathless over his tales as mere tales. Which cup will the King of the Golden Isles drink? Consider that one of them contains a poison that "is no common poison, but a thing so strange and deadly that the serpents of Lebutharna go in fear of it." Which? That is what I call a thrilling question—thrilling, beautiful, and remote. Remote, thank heaven! Which shows that Dunsany's art of escape triumphs. I can see the gorges of Lebutharna; I can see its wise and wary serpents. Their fangs are as terrible as ever because they never were. To shudder at them—there is an aesthetic experience that is as purely delightful as the reading of childhood.

The playlets of contemporary life, "Cheezo," "If Shakespeare Lived Today," and "Fame and the Poet," are keenly thought out and executed with an almost Shavian pointedness and speed. But other men could have written them. There is only one guide to Barbul-el-Sharnak, only one to the city of Thalanna that is at the edge of the great desert, only one to the golden islands of King Hamaran. LUDWIG LEWISOHN

International Relations Section

Poland: A Danger Spot

By ROBERT DELL

Berlin, June 6

THE change of Ministry in Poland is an ominous symptom. The late Government was on the whole the best that Poland has yet had. I met the late Prime Minister, General Sikorski, during a recent visit to Warsaw. He struck me as being a reasonable man with some sense of realities—a quality rare in Poland—and, although a general, he is not a militarist. He showed an independence hitherto unusual in Polish politicians in his refusal to comply with the French demand that Poland should take military action against Germany in support of the invasion of the Ruhr. It is possible that French intrigue has contributed to his fall, but the chief cause of his defeat in the Diet by a reactionary coalition was that, nationalist as he is, his nationalism is not sufficiently fervid and intolerant to satisfy the anti-Semitic fanatics.

General Sikorski's successor, M. Witos, is the leader of the right wing of the Peasant Party. During his previous term of office—he was Prime Minister from July, 1920, to September, 1921—his policy in home affairs was more or less progressive and his foreign policy was moderate and prudent, but he has now become the nominal leader and actual tool of a coalition in which the extreme right predominates. To get the support of the National Democrats (the party of the extreme right) M. Witos has thrown over his program of drastic agrarian reform and consented to accept as Minister of Foreign Affairs M. Seyda, whose brother held the same office a couple of years ago and who is a creature of M. Dmowski, perhaps the most dangerous reactionary in Poland. M. Dmowski, who will be the real head of the new Government although he is not a member of it, was an agent of the Czarist government in Poland before the war. He is still pro-Russian, but bitterly anti-Bolshevik, is in close touch with all the Russian émigrés and reactionaries, and is a favorite of the Quai d'Orsay.

It is not surprising that the practical advent of M. Dmowski to power has caused alarm in Europe. Marshal Foch's recent tour in Poland and Czecho-Slovakia has been interpreted by many people in England as a sign that France is organizing a new war on Russia and the change of government in Poland is taken by the same people to mean that this war is imminent. I believe this to be a mistake. The French Government does not now want a war against Russia. On the contrary its policy is rather to turn the Anglo-Russian quarrel to the advantage of France and, if possible, come to terms with the Russian Government. I am convinced that Czecho-Slovakia would not join in any war against Russia. The Czechs profoundly distrust the Poles and are alarmed at the effects on Germany of French policy, for they know that the ruin of Germany would be disastrous to Czecho-Slovakia, which is already suffering severely from the loss of the German market. My impression during my recent visit to Poland was that no party even there wants war. In the present state of Poland a war, even if victorious, would probably be national suicide.

The real danger, in my judgment, is not war between Poland and Russia but a Polish coup against Danzig. That would be quite easy—for the Free City of Danzig is unarmed—and it would be very popular in Poland. Moreover, it is probable that France is encouraging Poland to repeat against Danzig the tactics that were so successful in the case of Vilna. An attack on Danzig would be an open defiance of the League of Nations, but the Poles successfully defied the League in the case of Vilna and received the august sanction of the Council of Ambassadors. They know that unanimity could not be obtained on the Council of the League for any action against them.

The constant friction between Poland and the Free City of Danzig, which is at present more acute than usual, is the inevitable consequence of the most absurd territorial arrangement in history. I spent a few days at Danzig on my way to Poland, and came away more than ever convinced that the present system can never work. That indeed is the only point on which the Poles and the inhabitants of Danzig are agreed. For example, the harbor is under the control of a board composed of an equal number of Poles and representatives of Danzig with a Swiss chairman appointed by the League of Nations. The representatives of Poland and Danzig on the board never agree on anything and the unfortunate chairman has to decide between them as best he can. His decisions are invariably disapproved by one side or the other—sometimes by both. Moreover, since the harbor belongs neither to Poland nor to Danzig, neither will find the money required for necessary improvements. The High Commissioner is in the same position as the chairman of the harbor board. He has to decide between the Poles and the city of Danzig on every question that arises, and one side or the other invariably appeals to the League of Nations against his decision. In fact, the system has reached a deadlock and a change is urgently necessary. The Polish solution is the annexation of Danzig and the whole of Eastern Prussia, but that would only make matters worse. The only real solution is to restore Danzig and the Polish "corridor" to Germany, to internationalize the Vistula and make it navigable for big ships, and to give Poland a port at its mouth. That was the solution proposed by Germany to Poland immediately after the armistice, and Marshal Pilsudski would have accepted it had not the French Government and the Polish National Committee in Paris intervened. The Polish "corridor" cutting German territory in two is an intolerable grievance which, as a high official of the Polish Government admitted to me, Germany can never be expected to accept. A Polish visa is required for merely crossing the "corridor," except in the case of one through train each way between Berlin and Königsberg, with the result that the inhabitants of the adjacent German territory have to get such a visa every time they go to Danzig, which is of course the center for a large district. It takes two or three days to get the visa, and the fee for it is 32 French francs—at today's exchange 115,000 marks. As a member of the Government of Danzig said to me, "we are obliged to give the Poles free access to the sea, but they deny us free access to the land."

From the point of view of home policy the change of government is as bad as from that of foreign policy. The anti-Semites are now in power, and the Jews and other racial minorities are likely to be treated worse than ever. The annexation of Eastern Galicia, where the Poles are in a small minority, has greatly increased the non-Polish population, which is now about 44 per cent of the whole. Two Polish provinces, Volhynia and Polesia, did not at the last general election return a single Polish deputy. The Ukrainians will never accept Polish domination and, if the Poles insist on holding all the territory that they have acquired, disintegration is sooner or later inevitable. Next time Poland is at war, two-fifths of its population will be on the side of the enemy.

Nor is there any hope that the new Government will diminish military expenditure, which is at present about 40 per cent of the whole expenditure of the country. The army is the only flourishing institution in Poland. Every sou of the French loans to Poland has been spent on it. Those loans have taken the form of credits for the purchase of war material in France. Not one penny has the French Government ever given for the real needs of Poland.

If the Polish state is bankrupt, Polish industry is so much crippled by lack of capital that manufacturers have to borrow money at usurious rates to pay their wages and current expenses. Polish industry is otherwise flourishing and has a great future if it can get the capital that it requires. Additional capital can be got only from abroad and foreign capitalists will not invest in Poland because they do not believe in the stability of the country. They are quite right. Poland is ethnographically and geographically unsound and its present frontiers cannot be permanent. Unless the Poles consent to abandon the territories in which the non-Polish inhabitants are in a majority, Poland is doomed. The French capitalists have no more faith in the future of the present Poland than have any other foreign capitalists. Not one sou will the cautious French bourgeois invest in Poland.

Indians Clubbed and Bayoneted

DETAILS of the clubbing and bayoneting of natives by British police and soldiers at Rawalpindi are given in copies of the Nation of Lahore, India, recently received. A committee of eight natives, appointed by the Sikh public of Rawalpindi, has reported on the affair as follows:

> On the 29th of April the jail authorities at Campbellpore released about 460 Akali prisoners in pursuance of the Government communiqué. Some of them took the earliest train, but the rest, a few over 400, took the 12 down train leaving Campbellpore at about 8 p.m. on 29-4-23, intending to stay at Hassan Abdal en route in order to do pilgrimage at the sacred Gurdwara of Panja Sahib. The manager of the Gurdwara had arranged to receive them at the railway station and all the Akalis alighted there at about 10 p.m.
>
> At Hassan Abdal the train stopped, it is alleged, a few bogies' lengths behind its proper place, due to some one having pulled up the alarm chain. The Akalis as well as other passengers got down and made their way to their destination without any attempt on the part of the railway staff to detect the culprit or to check the passengers from coming out. As a matter of fact no one outside the railway circle knew that the chain had been pulled up. The train was to stop there in any case. The Akalis therefore alighted from the train and went to the Gurdwara Panja Sahib in full belief that they would resume their journey on the tickets they held.
>
> Some two hours after this a man from the railway staff in company with a sub-inspector of police went to the manager Gurdwara Panja Sahib, with a letter from the station master, saying that the Akalis had pulled up the chain and demanding that their tickets should be surrendered to him. Upon this the manager sent for the Jathedars, who denied having any knowledge of the pulling of the chain, but refused to surrender tickets as they had to resume their journey with them. Next afternoon they were again met by the inspector of police, who demanded their tickets again, and said that they could not travel with them; but as they still refused, he advised them to purchase fresh tickets to Rawalpindi, from beyond which station they could travel with the old ones. We have felt some difficulty in understanding why this advice was given because Rawalpindi is not over 100 miles from Campbellpore, and the railway rules which allowed haltage for every 100 miles could not have availed the Akalis at Rawalpindi. But we have good reasons to suppose that he simply wanted to get rid of the Akalis and to send them to Pindi where the authorities would be in a better position to handle them. The fact remains that the manager of the Gurdwara Panja Sahib purchased tickets for all the Akalis, and they took 18 down train which reached Rawalpindi at about 7:30 p.m.
>
> ### POLICE ON HAND
>
> It appears that the railway authorities at Rawalpindi had been duly informed that the Akalis were coming by that train, and the D.T.S. with some ticket-checking staff and the police was already on the platform. Immediately on the arrival of the train the checking of the tickets was commenced. Some Akalis were removed from their compartments and some were taken to the inclosure. Upon this all the remaining Akalis left the train and sat on the platform. Bhai Attar Singh, vice-president of the Local Singh Sabha, who was present on the platform, then approached the D.T.S. and requested that the Akalis be permitted to resume their journey upon the Campbellpore tickets. The D.T.S. said that they had broken the journey within 100 miles and their tickets had become invalid. He further said that his information was that about 55 Akalis were without tickets from Hassan Abdal, for which they should pay the fare. Bhai Attar Singh wanted some time to find out and discuss the matter with Jathedar, and he requested that in order that he might be able to do so the men confined should be released, which was accordingly done.
>
> Meanwhile food which the city people had brought for the Akalis was served out to them and they began to partake of it. Bhai Attar Singh could not again see the D.T.S., as by the time the Akalis had finished their meals the D.T.S. had already left to invoke the aid of the civil authorities. Here the Akalis remained for about an hour and a half, when at about 10 p.m. the D.T.S. appeared again with the deputy commissioner and the superintendent of police. On their arrival, demand for the fare was not repeated; on the other hand the police seemed to have taken orders to turn everybody out. First the vistors were turned out and some of them roughly handled; then the Akalis were searched one after the other, their tickets were taken, and they were pushed out. After some of them had been kicked like this the task was found tedious and hence all of the remaining Akalis were driven out in batches. The Akalis who came out of the platform first of all stopped near the motor stand to wait for their companions. The foot and the mounted police were already there. As the number of Akalis grew the police drove them further away. There is ample evidence to show that though the behavior of the Akalis while being thus driven was peaceful, force was used, and some of the Akalis were severely beaten. Upon this they thought that the authorities were determined to beat them and sat down by the roadside near the tonga stand. . . .
>
> ### ORGY OF BEATING
>
> At this stage some public-spirited gentlemen approached the S.P. and the G.C. and asked them to remove the police to some distance so that the Akalis might quietly move to the city. A gentleman went to the length of assuring the D.C. that if the police were taken some distance away and the Akalis allowed free passage, he would guarantee the quiet departure of the Akalis. No heed was paid to this, and shortly after indiscriminate beating was resorted to. The police made a free use of their batons and lathies. When some Akalis had been thus belabored, either the police got tired of beating or the authorities considered their manner inadequate. The police were called back and some platoons of the Gloucester Regiment (which had in the meanwhile arrived) were ordered to fix bayonets and charge. It appeared that the bayonets were soon unfixed and the assault maintained with butt-ends. There were Akalis who escaped injury; some of them were throttled with the sashes of their kirpans and kicked on the delicate parts of their bodies, as a result of which many became senseless. A large number of them were dragged by their sacred keshas and legs.

Thanks to the timely arrival of the local medical doctors the serious injuries were immediately attended to, though not without some risk of injury to them also, for the soldiers spared neither the Akalis nor the wounded, nor their attendants. But the sympathy of the public was wonderful, for immediately an Akali was belabored and laid flat he was carried on a chaupoy, if one was available, or on a cart (rera), if that was near at hand. Thus from amid the cruel blows of the infantry and the charge of the cavalry they were rescued and laid by the roadside near the Serai of Suratsingh or Dharamsala of B. Nathoo Mal, a ghastly sight no doubt, wounded and senseless lying in hundreds, at the dead of the night, only a short distance away from the scene of the tragedy. Here again they were not left to repose in calm, for the cavalry were soon upon them. . . .

428 INJURED

The medical evidence shows that the total number of persons injured was 428, which presumably includes a certain number of relief workers as well. The following table will show the nature of the injuries received by them:

Fracture of ribs, 60; fracture of hyoid bone, 1 case; bayonet wounds, 13 cases; strangulation, 5 cases; pleurisy, 1 case; pulling of hair, 1 case; abrasions, 4 cases; contusions, 397 cases. Total, 428.

Out of these many persons remained senseless for several hours. The condition of two was such that not a drop of water could go down without artificial means being employed. Three persons had to be administered hypodermic injections to sustain the activity of their hearts.

It now remains to see how far the action of the Akalis on one hand and the government authorities on the other could be justified or condemned. We have made it clear that as far as the result of our inquiry goes all the Akalis who traveled from Panja Sahib to Rawalpindi were in possession of double tickets. So there was no question of their liability for having traveled without tickets or expired tickets. Whether the tickets that they held from Campbellpore to Amritsar could be availed of beyond Rawalpindi depends upon the interpretation of the railway rules. In our opinion the simple fact that the holders of these tickets broke journey at Hassan Abdal did not make their tickets invalid. Rule 48, Coach Traffic, N.W.R., says:

> Holders of local and through single-journey tickets for distances over 100 miles are allowed one day extra for every 100 miles or for the purpose of breaking their journey. The journey must, however, be commenced on the date for which the ticket is issued, and no break of journey is allowed at a station less than 100 miles from the point where the journey was commenced.

This means that the holder of a ticket for a distance of over 100 miles can break his journey after 100 miles. It does not say that if he breaks his journey within 100 miles he would not be able to use the same ticket after 100 miles. The only penalty that the rule seems to imply is that he would not be able to use that ticket for a distance up to the hundredth mile. Thus we are of opinion that if the railway authorities had insisted that the Akalis could travel up to a distance of 100 miles from Campbellpore only on purchasing fresh tickets from Rawalpindi up to the distance, they would have been justified in doing so, but what they seem to have believed and insisted upon was that the tickets held by Akalis from Campbellpore to Amritsar had become altogether useless. In this, we venture to say, they were wrong.

Moreover we find that the matter was still under consideration by some local gentlemen when the D.T.S. left the railway station apparently with a view to take some drastic action. Had a little patience and tact been exercised, all interpretation of railway rules apart, either the Akalis would have left the platform quietly or some one would have purchased fresh tickets for them. The behavior of the Akalis on the platform was quite peaceful. This is shown by the fact that the railway authorities had no difficulties in driving them out. Here also we believe that if left to themselves and not pressed over by the strong posse of mounted and foot police they would have left for the city immediately or soon after. We wish the authorities had exercised some discretion in handling persons who had just come out of jail and whose peaceful behavior had almost become proverbial; this they failed to do. Their pressure and over-anxiety had its effect. The Akalis did not move. The authorities' sense of prestige was further offended and, though they already had with them a sufficient number of the foot and mounted police and though there was not the least justifying need, they called in a contingent of the British infantry and the cavalry. The importunities of a few well-disposed gentlemen were ignored and an unfortunate and hasty decision to disperse them by force was arrived at. The use of force was quite unnecessary and absolutely uncalled for, and when it was used it was excessive and indiscriminate.

THE OFFICIAL EXPLANATION

The official explanation of what happened at Rawalpindi is presented as follows in a Punjab government press communiqué, dated Lahore, May 3:

Two incidents have occurred of unlawful behavior on the part of recently released Akali prisoners at Rawalpindi.

About 170 prisoners were released from the Rawalpindi jail on the evening of the 28th of April. They were informed that they would not be allowed to march through cantonments to the railway station, but in spite of this warning they attempted to do so in military formation. The police accordingly had to use force to make them proceed by the road approved by the authorities. The police succeeded in their object without difficulty. A few of the Akalis were knocked down, but none were hurt.

The second incident was more serious. Four hundred and sixty Akalis were released from the Campbellpore jail on the 29th of April and were given tickets to Amritsar. At Hassan Abdal they pulled the communication cord, stopped the train, and broke their journey, thus rendering their tickets invalid, under the railway regulation, for the journey to Amritsar. They subsequently proceeded by a later train to Rawalpindi and were there detrained and required to give up their tickets. They were ordered to leave the railway station, but though they cleared off the platform they refused to leave its precincts, with the result that large crowds assembled and the whole of the station premises were blocked. The police attempted to disperse the Akalis by force, but they still refused to leave and eventually a company of British infantry with a force of cavalry had to be employed. These forces succeeded in clearing the Akalis away to a Dharmsala some 300 yards away from the station, where they were allowed to remain. The police and the military behaved with great restraint, using no force that was not thoroughly justified. No reliable estimate has been received of the number of the Akalis injured owing to their defiant attitude, but it is believed that very few have sustained serious injuries.

Attested. JUNIOR ASSISTANT SECRETARY
TO GOVERNMENT PUNJAB

Lahore, the 3rd of May, 1923

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 1, 1923 No. 3030

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .................................................... 99
EDITORIALS:
  Minnesota, the Nonpartisan League, and the Future.................. 102
  Law—Not War .......................................................... 103
  Are We Americans Thieves?.............................................. 103
  Monkeying ............................................................. 104
THOSE TERRIFYING FARMERS. By William Hard............................. 105
YOUTH AND THE AMERICAN COLLEGES. By Norman Thomas...... 106
STRAY THOUGHTS ON A COLLEGE PILGRIMAGE. By William A. Robson ........................................................ 108
BOSTON: A JOURNALISTIC POOR-FARM. By Oswald Garrison Villard ........................................................ 109
DEATH-WATCH. By Vincent Starrett.......................................111
A FAR CRY. By Zona Gale................................................. 112
"VACATION" AT SAN QUENTIN. By Miriam Allen de Ford.......... 114
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter......................................... 115
CORRESPONDENCE ........................................................... 115
BOOKS:
  French Masters. By Ben Ray Redman....................................... 118
  The Idea of Space. By George Boas........................................ 119
  Girls and Their Wishes. By Sarah N. Cleghorn.......................... 119
  Suggestion and Digestion. By John E. Lind............................... 120
  Sinbad. By Herbert J. Seligmann........................................... 120
  The Middle Ages. By Harry Elmer Barnes................................. 121
  Culture and Civilization. By J. J. Smertenko........................... 121
  A Pleasant Essayist. By Rex Hunter........................................ 121
  Books in Brief................................................................... 122
MUSIC:
  The Elder Singers. By Pitts Sanborn........................................ 122
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
  The Trouble on the Saar...................................................... 124
  The League's Resolution..................................................... 124
  The Old Saar Decree........................................................... 124
  The New Saar Decree.......................................................... 126

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT ERNEST H. GRUENING
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY, Managing Editor
JOHN MACY, Literary Editor
IRITA VAN DOREN, Advertising Manager
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON ANATOLE FRANCE H. L. MENCKEN
FRIEDRICH WILHELM FOERSTER ROBERT HERRICK
CARL VAN DOREN NORMAN THOMAS

Subscription Rates—Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: Ernest Thurtle, 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N. W. 4, England.

LEONARD WOOD began his term as Governor of the Philippines by proclaiming his belief that the Filipinos had too much self-government, and he has continued by acting upon his belief. The Filipinos, naturally, resent it. General Wood vetoed the ten-year university program and more than a dozen other bills. He attempted to force the Filipinos to sell their successful government-owned and operated railroad to private New York interests, but met such opposition that he had to give up his project. He sought to close out the sugar centrals which served the small sugar growers, and is still endeavoring to force abandonment of the Philippine National Bank. He has consistently neglected and insulted the responsible Philippine officials. Recently he refused to permit remission of local taxes, as advised by the Filipinos, in certain regions that had been devastated by locusts and typhoons. It was a proverbial straw that broke the camel's back. General Wood reinstated and honorably discharged a Manila police official who had been suspended by Filipino officials although acquitted in court of the charge against him. The Filipino members of the Council of State, the departmental secretaries, the presidents of the Senate and the House, and the mayor of Manila, resigned their offices in protest against his "desire to intervene and to control, even to the smallest details, the affairs of our government, both insular and local, in utter disregard of the authority and responsibility of the department heads and other officials concerned." When this was reported at Washington Secretary Weeks immediately stated that the Government stood squarely behind Wood. That was like Mr. Weeks; but we hope that Mr. Harding will not be so Junkerish. His word is pledged to the Filipinos that there will be "no backward step"; the only way to redeem it is to remove the bully, Leonard Wood.

FOLLOWING, as it does, reports of strong pressure exercised by the die-hard section, the announcement that the British note on the Ruhr received, in its final form, the unanimous assent of the Cabinet tends to discourage the hopes raised earlier of vigorous intervention by the new Premier. The situation recalls too closely the story of how, at Paris, Lloyd George suffered his better judgment to be overcome by the notorious telegram from his parliamentary supporters. Is the world today incapable of producing a statesman who will take his courage in both hands and firmly pursue what he believes to be the right course, regardless of the effect upon the political fortunes of himself and his party? Opinion in England just now is looking more and more to the United States as the deciding factor in the crisis. A protest from Great Britain alone, it is feared, will accomplish little or nothing, even if accompanied by definite and feasible plans, but if backed up by America as well as Italy it might detach Belgium from the side of France, and M. Poincaré would then think twice before condemning his own country to utter isolation. It is on Mr. Hughes's New Haven speech that reliance is placed for the expectation of American support, but those who set their confidence on a pronouncement of his made as long ago as last November do not know the Secretary of State as well as his fellow-countrymen do. Here, too, the exigencies of domestic politics may induce second thoughts, and promote the discovery, in Bacon's words, of "a window to fly out at or a secret door to retire by."

IN Germany, meanwhile, the limits to human endurance are coming gradually but sensibly nearer. It may be that there will be no single moment at which organized society will suddenly and dramatically collapse, as by an earthquake shock. When an individual dies of starvation, he does not drop down dead in the street, but wastes away in obscurity at home, until some day the last atom of strength quietly leaves his emaciated body. It is not in one convulsive spasm that a nation gives up the struggle, but its fate comes upon it at the end of a process of steadily weakening resistance to the forces of disintegration. The rural districts, with their nearness to sources of food supply, may be able to hold out for a considerable time after the congested industrial centers have reached the end of their tether. Fatal riots in Breslau, where food stores and hotels have been raided by large crowds, are an ugly symptom, and indicate what must be expected in other great cities. The Breslau mobs are reported to have gathered under Communist leadership, but, when the bare necessities of life are as hard to come by as they are in Germany today, popular uprisings do not depend on political propaganda for their instigation. Law and order cannot be maintained for an indefinite period in such an ordeal as that through which the German people are now passing.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC

BY inviting Soviet Russia to sign with them the convention establishing a new regime for the straits that separate Asia from Europe the Allies have taken one more step in the halting progress toward recognition which began with the trade agreements and continued at Genoa and Lausanne. Virtually every European government now maintains some sort of an official commission in Moscow, and their citizens have consular protection in doing business in Russia. The question of de jure recognition has become a mere matter of diplomatic jockeying. In Asia Soviet Russia is even more firmly established. The United States lags behind, most besotted of all the great nations. Mr. Hughes has just given new expression to his muddle-headedness. He is not yet quite sure that the Soviet Government is well established (what of Guatemala and Egypt, Mr. Hughes?); the persons of our citizens are for the moment free from harm, he says, but, like a child in a dark attic, he fears the possibility of harm; property has been confiscated (after all, he might recall the Emancipation Proclamation and the Prohibition Amendment); and the leaders of Russia are still prophesying world revolution (somehow, it does not frighten us). Consistency, Emerson said, is a vice of little men; when a statesman is wrong and knows that he is wrong it is something more than a vice.

CALIFORNIA has left nothing untried in persecuting the I.W.W. She has arrested them wholesale, submitted them to almost every form of prison torture, supported professional anti-I.W.W. witnesses who earn a living testifying to "I.W.W. crimes," arrested witnesses who seemed to sympathize with them on the theory that such witnesses must be equally guilty with the defendants, and now Judge Charles O. Busick of Sacramento County has gone farther yet. He has granted a temporary injunction which makes mere membership in the hated organization contempt of court, so that I.W.W.'s may be sentenced by a judge without bothering about a jury trial. Several juries have recently acquitted I.W.W.'s despite the plain intent of the State anti-syndicalism act to outlaw them, and Judge Busick's procedure has obvious advantages from the standpoint of men who believe perjury, torture, and even murder justifiable when used against I.W.W.'s, as many Californians seem to do. This is, however, a new departure in Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence; it is hard to believe that even California courts will sustain so obvious an attempt to do away with the right of trial by jury.

JUDGE-MADE law, however, is not waning in these United States, and there are times when we are tempted to hope that the courts will continue arrogating power to themselves until the people wake up and take effective action to curb so flagrant an abuse. Mr. Daugherty's handy man, Judge Wilkerson of Chicago, recently made permanent the scandalous temporary injunction by which he sought to break the shopmen's strike on the railroads last year. The injunction restrained railroad unions from interference with the operation of the railroads; in other words, from striking. Mr. Daugherty makes its intent plain: "No extensive strike tying up inter-State commerce will ever again take place," he says. His prophecy is, of course, nonsense; but the attempt to use the courts to break a strike is evident. Up and down the country, East and West, North and South, this abuse of the power of judges, perverting them into weapons of industrial warfare, is a daily occurrence. It has happened in the Brockton, Massachusetts, shoe-workers' strike and in the Buffalo clothing workers' strike. In Buffalo the courts have issued a whole flock of injunctions, even restraining employees from complaining about their working conditions in any manner to anyone except their employers, on the basis of a system of "individual contracts" which the employers had forced many workers to sign in ignorance of their contents.

THE English dock strike is largely a revolt of the plain man, and still more of the plain woman, against the statistician. An agreement made last August between the dockers and their employers provided for a reduction of a shilling a day in wages from the following October and of a further shilling as soon as the index figure of the cost of living fell ten points. This drop was reported in June, but the reduction of the second shilling, which then came automatically into effect, provoked an instant rebellion. There broke out at Hull a strike which spread rapidly to almost every other important port in the country, until at one time as many as 60,000 men were out. It was a clear breach of the agreement, and was started and carried on in defiance of the union leaders. The case of the malcontents was mainly a challenge of the statistical figures. There had been, they insisted, no such fall in the cost of living as the curve in the official chart showed. The Labor Ministry's calculations are honestly and carefully made by expert economists, but the docker's wife, when she goes to market, finds that a sixpenny bit buys no more than it did a year ago. She is therefore contemptuous of, and indignant with, government mathematics. The discrepancy may be due to a shifting of the basis on which the estimate was originally made; certain commodities, still taken into account, may have ceased to be consumed in working-class households, so that a decline in their cost does not actually relieve the working-class domestic budget. We have seen in our own country similar conflicts between the official cost of living and the cost in the kitchen.

COLUMBIA, Missouri, is the seat of culture of Missouri, the home of the State University. A Negro was lynched there last April. A member of the mob, George W. Barkwell, was recently tried for murder and acquitted. A university student identified him as the man who put the noose around the Negro's neck and shoved him off the bridge. For this the student, Charles Nutter, has been ostracized by fellow-fraternity men and threatened with lynching by the townsmen. W. E. Smith, a bank cashier, testified that he and Barkwell were talking together thirty-five feet from the Negro when he was lynched, and added: "I was standing on the bridge when I heard the crowd shout, 'There he goes.' I wanted to get a good look at the Nigger dangling, and, believe me, I did." The audience, according to the St. Louis Star, thereupon "howled with glee." This same Smith said he was not in the crowd at the jail. "Doggone it, I got there too late." Again the crowd laughed. Another witness for the defense related how he had pushed through the crowd after the lynching "to take a peek at the skunk." This, too, seemed to the citizens of Missouri's cultural capital a cause for mirth. Just what is the influence of a university?

> MAJOR ENTWISTLE moved the third reading of the bill.
>
> MR. F. N. BLUNDELL (Ormskirk, Unionist) said he believed the bill to be bad and immoral. . . . He was not afraid of telling the women that he did not propose to vote for measures he thought wrong simply because the women wanted them. (Hear, hear.) But overriding all other objections to the bill was the one that he believed the bill was contrary to the law of God. (Hear, hear.)
>
> MR. DUNNICO (Consett, Labor) opposed the bill, which he said was the first step in a powerful campaign to make the dissolution of the marriage tie easier. Whatever tended to that end would be a fatal blow at the very foundations of our national greatness and the fabric of our homes. (Cheers.)

ANYONE might imagine, after scanning the above excerpts from the debate on the third reading of the Matrimonial Causes Bill, that the British Parliament proposed to instal a soviet system of divorce. It is a shock, therefore, to read the bill and discover that it does no more than make it possible for a man to be divorced on the same terms as a woman. Until now a man must have been proved guilty of cruelty as well as misconduct; hereafter the latter ground, as has always been true in cases against women, is cause enough. The opponents of the bill apparently hold that a divorce case—against a man—is saved from immorality by the introduction of a good beating, and that the law of God is satisfied only by evidence of cruel treatment. Nevertheless we should suppose that few men would oppose a measure which makes it possible for a man to be divorced without going to the unmannerly lengths of striking a lady. In any case the bill successfully passed both Commons and Lords and hereafter no woman seeking her freedom need exhibit her bruises in court.

IT is characteristic of the Shipping Board, with a record of appalling losses in the past, a fleet of unprofitable vessels in the present, and lack of proof that the Leviathan will pay in the future, that it should be proposing the construction of two sister ships. Indeed the Leviathan is not only still an unproved liability, but it is in danger of becoming a by-word on the high seas and a joke with the discriminating public through the tawdry and dishonest publicity ideas that the Shipping Board has doubtless inherited from its previous chairman, Mr. Lasker. After the reconditioning of the Leviathan, it was announced that it had become the world's largest liner. There had been no change whatever in the hull; the gain had been obtained through added superstructure, and so much flag-waving and eagle-screaming over a steamship originally built in Germany seemed a bit inappropriate. Still the Shipping Board seemed to have the best of the argument. That cannot be said for its latest boast, that the Leviathan is the world's fastest liner because on its trial trip it logged 687 knots in twenty-five hours, or about 27½ knots an hour. The period of time chosen is wholly arbitrary, and a claim to speed based upon it is as ridiculous as it would be for a sprinter to claim the world's championship because he had run 98 yards, 7 feet, 2⅜ inches in less time than anybody else on record. The only record that counts in the North Atlantic service is that for the entire voyage. The Leviathan's performance for that is so far an average of about 23 knots an hour, or three knots under the record of the Mauretania. The Leviathan is a great ship in which Americans may rightly take pride. It would be a pity to make the vessel a laughing-stock through advertising methods that are better adapted to the sale of shoddy clothing or a dandruff cure.

A BROAD-MINDED clergyman will sometimes invite representatives of other churches to give, from his pulpit, a series of addresses expounding the faith that is in them. One rarely hears, however, of an example of this type of religious hospitality continued Sunday by Sunday all the year round. The Presbyterian congregation that has listened to "Why I am a Baptist" and "Why I am a Methodist" is presently shepherded back to exhortations duly certified by its own denominational authorities. In journalism, J. St. Loe Strachey, editor of the Spectator, the leading organ of moderate Conservatism in the London weekly press, is attempting a bolder experiment. He has engaged H. W. Massingham, lately editor of the London Nation, to contribute every week a political article under the general heading of "The Other Side"—a title "which implies," readers are told, "that we want him to feel as free as possible to express opinions which normally will be opposed to our own." Mr. Strachey disclaims any idea that this catholicity is prompted by any special virtue on his own part. It is merely "common sense and good business," for the readers of his paper "probably prefer to reach their conclusions on any given subject after considering both sides and not only one." There is also, of course, the chance, not mentioned by Mr. Strachey, that the enlistment of so brilliant a writer among the Spectator's regular staff may attract new readers. Mr. Massingham, in his turn, by thus acquiring a pulpit in partibus infidelium, gains an exceptional opportunity of doing real missionary work for liberalism—an opportunity which, in the long run, may go far to compensate for his loss of the paper through which he rendered for so many years such valuable service to the progressive cause.

THE death of Louis Calvert at the age of sixty-three means a very genuine loss to the English-speaking stage. Although Mr. Calvert's early training was largely in Shakespearean productions and although he was brought to this country as classical producer for the New Theater in 1910, there can be no doubt that he did his best work in the plays of the moderns. He had, in playing such roles as that of Undershaft in Shaw's "Major Barbara," an effortless authority, an easy and supremely natural concreteness that are among the very rarest and most precious achievements of the actor's art. Like Moskvin of Moscow he relied on no personal advantages. A plain, obese man, it was only necessary for him to be on the stage to turn that stage from a thing of artifice to one of art and the scene from play-acting into an interpretation of reality. He was, moreover, not only a gifted artist but an intelligent man. His volume "Problems of the Actor" is one of the few genuinely sane and valuable contributions to the subject with which it deals. Mr. Calvert's loss will be felt not only by playwrights and producers but also by the pupils who, during recent years, had the good luck to have him for a teacher.

Minnesota, the Nonpartisan League, and the Future

ROCK-RIBBED Republican Minnesota has twice within a twelvemonth voted a Farmer-Labor candidate into the United States Senate, and the politicians are filling the newspapers with explanations. One of the most curious features of their multifold explanations is that no one, not even the American Defense Society, dug out the literature of three or four years ago and blamed the farmers' revolt upon that sinister Trotzky of the Northwest—A. C. Townley, the organizer of the Nonpartisan League, the symbol of Red Russia (in the words of the ancient literature of three years ago) in the heart of agricultural America. Mr. Townley seems to have thrown such influence as was left to him in Minnesota against Magnus Johnson, and almost the only report of the "N. P. L." which reached New York newspapers during the campaign was the announcement of the death of the National Leader, successor to the Nonpartisan Leader and only survivor of an erstwhile host of League newspapers.

Yet the spirit which gave the Nonpartisan League its temporary success is obviously the same spirit which gave La Follette his five-to-one majority in Wisconsin a year ago, which sent Frazier and Wheeler and Brookhart and Shipstead and Dill and Howell to the Senate, and which has just given Magnus Johnson his 80,000 majority over Jacob Preus in Minnesota. What happened to the League?

The fact is that this farmer organization which appeared with such dramatic suddenness on the Western horizon in the years 1915-17 was the product of the driving energy of a few individuals applying to the political organization of farmers the methods of modern salesmanship. Even more than the evils which were capitalized and inveighed against (they were neither of recent origin nor as oppressive as they have since become) and more than the proposed remedies of State ownership and operation, which were hardly novel, the key to the sudden growth of the Nonpartisan League lay in the large-scale application of intensive book-agent or oil-stock-selling technique, supported by a not less carefully worked-out literature. The result was the unique spectacle in American national life of a political party financed, and adequately financed, from the bottom up, by the rank and file, instead of from the top down. Despite the most diligent muckraking no charges against the probity of the League's leadership, or of A. C. Townley himself, have ever been substantiated, although a looseness of financial accounting, an absence of real responsibility to the rank and file, and a readiness to embark upon new ventures without the necessary experience and personnel have undoubtedly been shown.

With the collapse of the American agricultural market in 1921 the Nonpartisan League suddenly found it impossible to continue organization on the commercial basis which had proved so sound in the years of farm prosperity. An income which had reached a total figure of several million dollars was suddenly cut off, and large sums in post-dated checks, a very important bit of detail worked out to facilitate the task of political salesmanship, could not be collected. As an organization the League had to cease functioning. The Minnesota headquarters were shut down and the League newspapers, one by one, were sold.

But although the visible machinery largely melted away, a sentiment and a point of view had been established in the minds of hundreds of thousands of farmers and ranchers in North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Oregon, Washington, Colorado, Oklahoma, and in lesser degree in other Western and Northwestern States. Agricultural depression has strengthened and corroborated what the League preached; and many a well-to-do rancher who refused to be coerced, hypnotized, or persuaded into giving up $16 or $18 in 1918 or 1920 would gladly pay it if he had it in 1923. It was the League's preparation-work which made it possible in the summer of 1922 to crystallize the sentiment for united farmer-labor action with a bare minimum of expenditure. These small funds the railway brotherhoods and miners supplied. Although hardly anticipating the day when organized labor would finance farmer organizations for the purpose of securing agricultural support for labor's national program, the leadership of the League had from the first stressed the identity of the interests of farmers and city workers. Unity was easily achieved. As a result the League, which had originally been concerned chiefly with State issues and programs, although its organization methods and financial control were national, placed increasing stress on national political issues at the very time when its national organization was disappearing. The obvious influence of European depression upon agricultural prices also facilitated the increased emphasis upon national issues.

Nonpartisan League sentiment still exists with near-religious fervor in thousands of Western communities, even though almost nothing continues in the way of a visible church, and so long as the price of wheat is low this sentiment will be a factor of political significance. But unless the sentiment is focused in permanently functioning economic organizations the movement will fade out as completely as the futile Populist movement of the nineties. Mass movements are temporary and evanescent unless grounded in economic organizations functioning three hundred and sixty-five days in the year. Strong local groups, the heart of any large organization of individuals, cannot be maintained if their only vital functions are performed but once in two years. The League's best efforts at holding local groups together on the basis of political discussions and education proved futile. But a growing number of specialized commodity organizations are functioning continuously and deepening the farmer's sense of producer's class-consciousness. The fact that Minnesota farmers stand in the vanguard of the American cooperative movement may have much to do with the fact that Minnesota leads the Farmer-Labor political movement. Senator Brookhart has returned from Europe afire with the gospel of cooperation. Here, perhaps, lies the chief hope that this new agrarian movement may plow deeper and be more lasting than its predecessors. If it does not put too much faith in temporary legislative panaceas, if it works unceasingly to strengthen its economic roots, and maintains its fruitful alliance with the city workers, this movement may prove itself vastly so vital and so sanifying as to amaze the cynical wiseacres who, with considerable justification in American history, predict merely a new variation of the old-fashioned political see-saw.

Law—Not War

FROM Argentina to Australia, in Germany, France, Russia, England, Italy, Japan, and the United States hundreds of thousands of men and women commemorate, on July 28 and 29, the ghastly days in 1914 when war cut Europe in two, by the solemn resolution that there shall be "No More War." Some of the more thoughtful, in this country particularly, have made "Law—Not War" their slogan, and are directing their energy to machinery for the adjudication of international disputes.

The ninth anniversary of the Great War comes at a gloomy moment. The outlook for a Europe dedicated to peace has never been more clouded. The Ruhr is today a steaming cauldron of hate; France and England are glowering at each other's air fleets (H. N. Brailsford writes: "Our experience of naval competition with Germany has taught us whither the new competition in the air must lead"); the Balkans are no more peaceful than in pre-1914 days; the little nations of Central Europe maintain larger armies than did their imperial predecessors; France announces her intention to conscript a half-million-man army among those poor black peoples of Africa whom "civilization" was supposed to have pacified; China is falling a prey to military bandits and the Western nations are talking of endowing her with international armies as well; Russia turns from reconstruction, almost perforce, to "air weeks," and glorifies the Red Army.

All the more need, then, for pacifists and for thundering no-more-war demonstrations. There is need for realization of what war has meant and will mean. There is need for men with the voices of prophets who will cry out, as George Lansbury wrote to the absolute pacifists of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, the Women's Peace Society, and the Women's Peace Union: "We stand against all wars. We believe that killing is a blasphemy and a crime against God and man. I hope that America will stand with us in trying to rid the world forever of warfare and its monstrous inventions which, unless destroyed, will annihilate all civilized peoples." These people demand the immediate abolition of armies and navies, the instruments of war. They want total disarmament and they are not content to wait until another war has tested out the expert theory that one air battle, with modern explosives, can destroy a New York or a London.

We are with them heart and soul, although we have become a little uncertain of the permanent effect of pacific proclamations. We have too warm a memory of the ardent pacifists of 1916 who adapted their convictions without difficulty to "We are for peace, but—" in 1917. It is perhaps some such doubt which has led the National Council for the Prevention of War to abandon the old international slogan "No More War" for the "more constructive" slogan "Law—Not War." Whatever emphasizes the fundamental importance of referring to judicial decision every international controversy that threatens to grow into war, whatever stresses the fact that arbitration is always more honorable than war, points in the right direction.

The trouble with the new slogan is that it is not comprehensive enough. It does not have the appeal to the heart of that bitter cry of the European masses: No More War! It even suggests, to the unwary hearer—and most hearers are unwary—some relation to the futile plans to draw up laws to regulate war. And to many it narrows the issue to the question of the World Court at The Hague. That is a pity—for it drags all the petty disagreements of national politics and with them the tragic problem of the League into a discussion which requires rather clarification.

For the issues about which we ought to be debating are not: Should we join this court or that? Is the World Court too closely linked with the League? It is the irony of fate that the American people, which has for decades led Europe in preaching the substitution of law for war, should today be hemming and hawing about the form of this court when it might be pushing the world forward toward greater readiness to use any court. Senator Borah gave us the right lead when he insisted that we must preach the gospel of compulsory jurisdiction, proclaim our own readiness to submit all our differences to judicial settlement, and invite other nations to show as much good faith. We have a great national tradition in which the names of Seward, Sumner, Root, and Bryan—yes, Bryan—bear an honorable part. If only our peace societies would all unite in proclaiming that law is always, always more honorable than war, and in urging Congress and the Administration to express that assurance, they might avoid the danger of contending for a shadow and contribute more certainly to the slow but ineluctable task of lifting a little of the gloom which, in these aftermath and prelude-days of war, is settling upon Europe.

Are We Americans Thieves?

"IT was the darkest hour of the war." Secretary Baker, just home from the front, reported to a group of twenty men in Washington that, according to general opinion, Paris was about to fall and the Channel ports would be taken. The news "brought gloom to every countenance and distressed every heart." But there was one of the twenty whose indomitable spirit was thereby quickened to more intense activity. A. Mitchell Palmer, Alien Property Custodian, conceived a strategic scheme far beyond anything that had entered the heads of Foch or Haig. Even at this desperate moment the enemy's victorious onset might be stayed and civilization saved—if only Germany were warned that such property as belonged to her nationals in this country would be confiscated. Threatened with this appalling calamity the Kaiser, though with so great prizes almost within his grasp, would see at once the futility of any further advance, and would sue for peace. Mr. Palmer hastened to the White House to lay this inspired project before Mr. Wilson. "I asked the President"—Mr. Palmer himself is telling the story in a United States district court—"to let me go down to the Congress and ask Congress to hit the Germans where it would hurt, to strike a blow from which they knew they would never recover, and let them know right now, as an act of war, that we proposed to Americanize this property."

There is reason to believe that Mr. Wilson did not imagine Germany would be so easily scared. But at any rate he was persuaded, after some natural demur, into agreeing to the confiscation of the industrial and commercial properties of German subjects in the United States, and authorizing the submission to Congress of a proposed amendment of the Trading with the Enemy Act in this direction. Unhappily for the testing of the merits of the scheme as a military master-stroke, it was not until the war was virtually over that the Alien Property Custodian had an opportunity of putting it into operation. The conversation with the President took place in March, 1918, but the amendment authorizing the seizure and sale of German patents in the United States was not approved until a week before the armistice. Accordingly, not a single one of the 4,800 patents "Americanized" was actually so treated because of war emergencies. They were all diverted to new owners during what was really, if not technically, a time of peace, and for the sake of enabling private American manufacturing interests to meet, in time of peace, the competition of the German proprietors. The action was not a war measure but bald commercial spoliation sugar-coated with patriotic phraseology.

The case now being tried at Wilmington, Delaware, is a suit in which the present Administration seeks the setting aside of the sale of German dye patents to the Chemical Foundation and their return to the Government. The evidence submitted and the arguments heard have covered a wide range of topics. Whether the courts have any right to review the war-time acts of a President or his subordinates in administering a congressional delegation of power; how far the upbuilding of a great dye-making industry is of service to national security by establishing plants that may be utilized, if need be, for the production of munitions; whether a patent is really of much value unless you have expert knowledge to profit by it; whether American soldiers were killed by being dosed with impure salvarsan—all these are matters of interest and importance, but the essential question to which the American public should apply its mind is the legitimacy of the initial transaction. Was it right or was it theft for our Government to take possession of German property in this country, not simply as a temporary measure of detention during war, but as a permanent expropriation? Was it to the office of Alien Property Confiscator or of Alien Property Custodian that Mr. Palmer and his successors were appointed? Before the war, at any rate, any international lawyer would have declared without hesitation that, according to the usage of civilized nations, private enemy property on land was of right immune from confiscation during war. And the United States in particular was so strongly convinced of the desirability of this rule as to contend again and again for the extension of the same protection to private enemy property on the high seas.

Well, whatever the law of nations might say, the German dye patents in this country have been "Americanized." ("'Convey,' the wise it call.") The process seems to have been more rapidly effective than the Americanizing of the immigrants who reach our shores. For a Tariff Commission report lately issued shows that today we have 87 firms manufacturing annually 64,632,187 pounds of dyes, as against seven firms in 1914, manufacturing 6,619,729 pounds. Last year American manufacturers produced 93.5 per cent of the dyes actually consumed here, and with this increased output has come some reduction in prices. But no satisfaction at the establishment of a new and flourishing industry in this country can obscure the fact that this prosperity is rooted in dishonor. The gains of producer and consumer alike are based on robbery which is none the less robbery because sanctioned by act of Congress; they are the reward of the successful exploitation of stolen property. Whatever may be the result of this particular suit, we cannot believe that the American people, when they realize all that is involved, will suffer the good name of the United States to be thus tarnished.

Monkeying

NO college is entirely secure against intelligence, and the University of Tennessee has had its modest share of scholars. One of these, Professor Sprowls, prescribed in a course in psychology James Harvey Robinson's "The Mind in the Making," and was thereupon dismissed. About the same time Mrs. Philip Hamer of the history department was reprimanded for voting in a charter referendum, and told that she would be dismissed if she went to Nashville in support of the equal-rights-for-women bill. Almost simultaneously the university's comic weekly, Mugwump, published a poem that fell under the administrative ax.

This was in the early spring. Events have followed fast. Petitions against the dismissal of Professor Sprowls were signed by students and instructors. The Association of University Professors was asked to help. Editors of the Mugwump offered to resign and were told that they would be expelled if they did so. The college paper, the Orange and White, was told that it might not comment on any of these events. A new student paper, the Truth, appeared anonymously. But support came to the authorities; several of the trustees commended President Morgan for his action in dismissing Professor Sprowls, the Knoxville merchants passed resolutions of approval, and, best of all, the Methodists, Baptists, Associate Reform Presbyterians, and federated Presbyterian churches of Fayetteville, Tennessee, in a united meeting solemnly resolved:

> That we consider the great State of Tennessee fortunate in having at the head of our great university a man who has the courage to combat evil in high places; that the people of Tennessee are to be congratulated that this State institution does not follow in the footsteps of the German infidels [Darwin!] in teaching that man sprang from a lower order of beings, but that man was created in the image of God, that the Bible is the true word of God, that man was destined for a future existence.

And then, with the end of the college year, reaction went on the loose. Five more professors were dismissed. One of them, Professor Radford, head of the Latin department, had refused to answer the dean's question: "What member of the faculty was it that asked you to sign a petition?" When he was notified of his dismissal he asked the reason for it. The dean merely said that he had refused to answer certain questions. John R. Neal, professor of law, was dismissed because he was suspected of sympathy with the "student movement"; Robert S. Ellis and Asa A. Schaeffer because they signed the request for an investigation by the professors' association; Dr. Mulvania, dean of the pre-medical school, because he made a survey of the faculty to get suggestions for improving the university. Such, at any rate, are the reasons assigned by Knoxville newspapers; the university authorities did not bother to give any.

Behind these individual outrages lies a situation that is dangerous and terrifying. It is vividly described by President Morgan himself, who is quoted by Professor Sprowls as saying that he believed in evolution "as much or more than you" but that he feared that Tennessee was going to have a "monkey legislature" such as Kentucky had had, and that therefore it was necessary to put the "soft pedal" on evolution, much as he disliked to do it. In how many States, during the next decade, will the education of our children and the freedom of our teachers be at the mercy of "monkey legislatures"?

Those Terrifying Farmers

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

HAVING trembled itself pretty well out on the subject of subterranean communists in the cities, Washington is now beginning once more to quake on the subject of socialistic agriculturists out of the Northwest. The communists were, and are, in fact a feeble folk numerically, and they have been greeted with shivers only by grotesquely misled or viciously misleading people.

The case is very different with the Northwestern farmers. They are in the true line of American historical development. They do not scorn "the forefathers." They think George Washington is on their side. They do not see Abraham Lincoln as the representative of Northern capitalism and wage-slavery against Southern plantationeering and chattel slavery. They see him as the great protagonist of human freedom historically for the Negroes and prophetically for themselves. They add the glamor of all American political heroic mythology, if it be a mythology, to their ardent passion for a better price for wheat.

That is the first consideration which in battle makes them terrible. They believe themselves to be in harmony with their country's origin. Never, for instance, from Henrik Shipstead, the first Farmer-Labor Senator from Minnesota, have I heard a word about American history that would not in sentiment grace the periods of an oration at Bunker Hill. The second terribleness which these farmers have is equally overlooked by their opponents who quake before them but quake for the wrong reasons—reasons which lead them quite astray in their methods of resisting Mr. Shipstead, Mr. Brookhart, Mr. Frazier, and the other recent apparitions of abiding American frontier rural radicalism. On the frontier—and elsewhere, too, but especially on the frontier—the farmer has been taught by his opponents and by his whole environment to summon the power of the state, of government, to redress almost any wrong and to cure almost any evil, great or small.

Arriving in North Dakota last year to report an election, I entered a dining-room in a hotel and noticed over the door a sign which said: "Smoking in This Room Prohibited by State Law." On inquiry I learned that the law in question —a law forbidding the use of tobacco in restaurants—had been passed by the North Dakota Legislature long before the Nonpartisan League came into power. This was a "conservative" law. It used the arm of government to prohibit a practice which at its worst is the tiniest sort of personal social inconvenience.

Looking at grander matters, the visitor is bound to notice that all these North Dakotans, all these Northwesterners, are living on land which but recently was governmental domain. The government is in a most immediate sense their parent. It gave them their homesteads. It endowed them with their livelihoods. Moreover, and even more importantly, it took vast stretches of the lands of "the people" and gave them to railroads in order to make the railroads possible and prosperous.

The silver mines of the West have for several years now been proceeding on the principle that if the price of silver is below the price of production, the difference should be contributed by the government through purchases made for the Treasury. The Pittman Law illustrated that principle; and now that the Pittman Law has expired, a steady agitation for further governmental "relief" is conducted daily by silver interests and by silver Senators.

Our new radical Senators are for the most part mere faithful reflections of this economic philosophy, as turned from the reviving of capital in distress to the reviving of distressed farm effort. Nor is a regard for capital—for their own farm capital—at all absent from their minds. If governmental purchasing of wheat, if governmental financing of marketing operations, if governmental reorganizing of grain exchanges and of stock yards should restore their lands to the altitudinous capital values which they enjoyed in 1919, and if thereby the access of the poor man to the soil should be increasingly checked, it is no part of the present national rural radical program to be alarmed by that development.

The present rural radical movement wants the price of land to go up. It wants governmental action which, if successful, will inevitably cause the price of land to go up. Philosophically there is absolutely no difference in the end between this endeavor and the parallel endeavor for bringing governmentally created prosperity, and hence artificially enhanced capital value, to silver mines.

In harmony, then, with our national worship of our national history, and in harmony also with the traditional tendency of the West to strike the rock of governmental action for the outpouring of private prosperity, these radical farmers and their representatives are conscious of no departure from our institutions, and they advance into the approaching national legislative struggle not as soldiers of any new philosophy of society but as defenders simply and explicitly of the doctrine that what the government has done on behalf of "the interests" it shall now do on behalf of "the people."

Senator Brookhart, who goes farther than any other new rural radical representative toward preaching a splendid doctrine of self-help through cooperative buying, cooperative selling, and cooperative banking, is nevertheless determined to use the power of government not merely to give a fair field to cooperative enterprises but to restrict the field of enterprises not cooperative.

The value of Senator Brookhart and of the other new rural radicals is not that they are prescribing any new medicine but that they are taking the old medicine and handing it logically around in such a way as to complete the circle. They will presently compel the country to meditate as follows:

"Is this remedy the right one? If it is, then the farmers are just as much entitled to use it as the privilege-seeking corporations which have gone before them. If it is not the right remedy, then we ought to move forward into a period of true and actual private self-help without public subsidy in the case of the chemical manufacturers to whom the government has made a virtual present of its confiscated German dye patents as well as in the case of the farmers to whom it is asked to make a present of governmentally heightened wheat prices."

Youth and the American Colleges

By NORMAN THOMAS

IN those far-off days when William Jennings Bryan was smiting the money power instead of Darwin, and the victors of Santiago and the survivors of training camps were marching home in triumph, and men were beginning the weighty discussion: Does the twentieth century begin January 1, 1900 or 1901?—in short, at the close of the golden nineties—it was the custom for representatives of the colleges of the great State of Ohio to peddle their wares through the high schools. Many a time did the walls of the high school in Marion, Ohio (then not famous save on Erie Railroad folders) ring with the exhortations of these apostles of the higher learning: "Young men and women, statistics prove that if you will go to college your chance of getting your name in 'Who's Who,' or a good rating in Dun's or Bradstreet's, will be as sixteen to one* if you don't."

On the whole such teaching fell on stony ground—at least compared with the harvest that was to follow later sowings. There was an increase in college attendance, but it was not phenomenal. Then came the war. Its sharp harrows broke up the stony ground. Many a youth impervious to the cultural appeal of "Who's Who" learned the great lesson: the officers of a democratic army are recruited from among college men. What the army began, the wave of enthusiasm for college athletics in general, and football in particular, completed. The sons of George F. Babbitt were won for higher education.

A large and successful Y.M.C.A. advertises thus: "For Pep, Personality, Popularity, Prosperity—join our classes." Add to these athletic prestige, and you have the appeal of the average American university. It does not depend for its success on the limited appeal of culture or pure science, but on the great trinity: "practical" courses (business administration and the like), fraternities, and organized athletics.

And the greatest of these is athletics. One Pennsylvania denominational college lacking in endowment, standards, and most things that a college ought to desire set out this winter to improve itself. Its first step was to organize a drive for funds sufficient to build a stadium large enough to hold five times the population of the town in which it is located. Its open defense was that, possessed of athletic equipment and fame, all other things would be added unto it. The reasoning is characteristic of American educational institutions.

If athletic success is the local college deity, the supreme god over all for most of our students is Success, measured by the usual standards of the credit rating one possesses and the kind of automobile one drives or in which one is driven. Witness this naive editorial from the Yale Daily News, an editorial which the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company has widely circulated in a series of advertisements in college papers in various sections of the country:

> Someone, probably an insurance agent, was quoted recently as saying that from the mass of one hundred college graduates one individual only rose to the polo and butler class, perilously near the top of the financial ladder. Five others became comfortably off and found themselves after twenty years at the small-yacht and chauffeur stage. The other ninety-four presumably congregate in the great section of the American people who drive their own Buicks [no Yale man it would appear sinks so low as a Ford] to the golf club. In other words, dreaming about being a rich man is one thing, and making the grade is "something else again."
>
> Yet the ninety-four presumably work just as hard as the sumptuous six. Their business is the axis on which a small and uninteresting world revolves. They have become devotees of the dollar, and when the fickle deity deserts have nowhere else to turn. Jammed in a dull, straight rut of business they can never leave the road and jump the fence into finer fields of life. This, then, is the portion of the ninety-four men out of every hundred now in the campus.
>
> The answer to the problem lies in the proper choice of a career.

It would be easy to gather from this statement an impression of college life devoid of ideals and standards, cynically devoted to material ends. The impression would be false. Youth is an antidote to cynicism and to an utterly sordid materialism. Our colleges inculcate loyalty and good-fellowship. They call forth the devotion of thousands of young men and women who work their way through for other than purely selfish reasons. He does not understand American life, still less college life, who does not understand our curious capacity to join piety, friendliness, and "idealism" to the worship of Success—a capacity illustrated by every rotary club, and even an occasional chamber of commerce.

Of two of the most apparent faults of our colleges something is to be said in extenuation. First comes their tendency through classrooms and fraternity houses to turn out a standardized product. There is an old story of a father who looked vainly for his son at Yale. Finally he went home in despair and telegraphed President Hadley: "Send home my son at once." The President replied: "Which is he?" To which the answer came: "Any one will do. They all look alike."

That particular story, true or apocryphal, might be told of other colleges with more justice than of Yale today (adversity in football—or something else—has produced an intellectual awakening in New Haven). In so far as the story is illustrative, it may be explained in part by the effort of a new nation necessarily without common traditions, made up of men of all races, to create that homogeneity among its people which older nations more easily possess.

A more serious criticism of our universities has lately been proffered in Upton Sinclair's own inimitable manner. The colleges are drill grounds for our industrial potentates. They teach the greatness and glory of the God Mammon, and train his high priests. The charge is in the main true, sometimes grossly true; yet in supporting colleges our industrial magnates are not always consciously seeking to protect their power and place. They are acting often with that real belief in "education," not too closely defined, which has been a fine American quality. They are inspired less by personal interest than by a general belief in the excellence of the present politico-economic order. They do with the approval of their contemporaries what every generation, capitalistic or socialistic, will do: seek to give the younger generation a short-cut to the philosophy of life it has acquired.

---

* I do not vouch for the accuracy of this ratio. I may have confused it in the mists of memory with another more famous ratio.

The most recent backset to liberal education, the Amherst catastrophe, involved not merely the economic prejudices of trustees and alumni, but opposition to Mr. Meiklejohn's "skepticism" in the name of religion, and to his athletic policy in the name of success and the fame that shrieks in the columns of the sporting page. Even more did it involve the susceptibilities and prejudices of a somewhat fossilized faculty not tactfully handled. The Amherst incident is an illustration of the complexity of the problem of college educational standards and methods, rather than of simple and obvious financial control.

A more direct and definite illustration of a sordid materialism in control is to be seen in President Atwood's administration at Clark University. It is likely that the president's loyalty to reaction will not prove profitable even for his own purposes. The lack of morale at Clark needs to be seen to be fully appreciated, but the outside world has seen a number of striking manifestations of it within the last few months.

Few colleges are locked and barred against all representatives of a radical organization like the League for Industrial Democracy. If the welcome sign is not hung out, at least there is a crack where one can get in. One institution—the University of Missouri—exercised great care lest its liberal club hear Kate Richards O'Hare—its president was after a $3,000,000 appropriation from the legislature; another college would have no speaker who wrote for The Nation address the students at convocation; Scott Nearing is generally on the academic black-list; various student editors have been disciplined. But despite these things many university trustees would have goose-flesh if they knew how liberal some of their professors were and how ready to let "radicals" talk. If the experience and the observation of officers of the League for Industrial Democracy is a criterion, a growing honor roll of genuinely liberal administrations could be inscribed. I shall not attempt to give a complete list. East of the Rockies it would certainly include Amherst (under President Meiklejohn), Dartmouth, Oberlin, the University of Chicago, Wellesley, and Smith. The last-named college I found particularly interesting because the faculty proves to be so much more liberal than the student body.

Indeed, one must protest against the common notions of eager youth repressed by dull and reactionary masters. Better education undoubtedly would waken a finer response. The success of Reed College on the Pacific coast, the fine loyalty of Amherst students to President Meiklejohn, and the equal devotion of the graduating class at Clark University to the old traditional liberalism of that institution are proof of the readiness of many of our students to respond to other than the current educational practice. But youth is not always even moderately liberal or intellectually curious. I have before me letters from professors in a Middle Western State university and an Eastern private university who lament in almost similar language the lack of intellectual curiosity and "ideas" in the student body. They blame the homes and the schools, and there are plenty to echo their complaints.

It may appear from all this that in writing about the spirit of youth in American colleges I am writing about a non-existent or at any rate a feeble thing. Certainly there is no youth movement in the European sense, as the foreign students sent by the National Student Forum on tour of our colleges discovered. There is some liberalism, there is some revolt which goes beyond the familiar—and exaggerated—revolt of the flapper.

Particularly interesting is the growth of a journalism very critical of college idols. Readers of The Nation need not be told at length the stories of the Scorpion, published by Wisconsin students, the Tempest at the University of Michigan, the Saturday Evening Pest at Yale, and others. The experiences of their editors have been very different; their point of view is not identical; but they all would to some degree indorse the Pest's motto: "The beginning of doubt is the beginning of wisdom." Moreover, most of these journals of protest illustrate the shrewd observation of an experienced professor. "Students today," she told me, "know more and hope less than ten years ago." (But not all students are weighted down with knowledge. I have found appalling ignorance of European conditions. For many students the World War was a sporting event about on a par with the Dempsey-Gibbons fight.)

There are radicals in our colleges with the certainties and hopes we usually identify with young radicals. But they are few. The prophet of the minority of our youth is Mencken not Marx. Scott Nearing, whenever he is allowed to speak in a college, finds hearers and admirers, but I suspect that most of our liberals would rather be Scott Fitzgerald than Scott Nearing. First confessing my admiration of Mr. H. L. Mencken but my fear of Menckenism as a sterile thing, I must record my regret that college liberalism finds it so much easier to laugh at the "booboisie" than to understand or work with the proletariat; so much more satisfactory to criticize Main Street than to make an effort to re-create it.

I comfort myself by reflecting that it is good that our youth should be armored in something beside sentimentalism. Some disillusionment is an inevitable and wholesome reaction to the orgy of the war. If disgust of accepted standards of life is a step on the road to a truer philosophy, it will be abundantly justified.

There are, moreover, happenings in the college world which make one cautious about too critical generalizations on the qualities of college liberalism. Here and there youth is taking account of the processes of its own education with refreshing vigor and intelligence. The suggested curriculum of the Barnard students was not only a remarkable document but has aroused interest among students as far off as India. An occasional college graduate today quietly throws his lot in with labor in a practical, non-melodramatic manner that is a joy to behold. There is astir some sense of the obligation students owe to labor. The quality if not the quantity of local college meetings or more general conferences held under the auspices of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, the Student Forum, the League for Industrial Democracy, and even the Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A. argues a capacity for generous service of the common good from which much may be hoped. Assuredly the college situation is not hopeless for those who realize that we must look to the young, in whom habits are not strong as steel bars and thought patterns rigid as iron molds, for the intelligence and devotion which may yet reshape civilization and enrich the individual life.

Stray Thoughts on a College Pilgrimage

By WILLIAM A. ROBSON

IT was in New York. At a luncheon party—a very nice affair, too. There was I, a pilgrim from England who had been wandering about for nearly five months, seeing American university life and trying to discover what kind of a country America was. And there was the party, in luncheon assembled, brooding over the wreckage of the dead meal.

I was expected to speak, and so far as I could see there was no way of getting out of it gracefully. I was caught, trapped. For five months I had been allowed to wander at large about the American continent, talking (when occasion arose) about anything that occurred to me, about "ships and shoes and sealing wax." But at last my hour had struck, and I knew that America, speaking through the persons of this agreeable group of men and women, demanded an account of my pilgrimage, demanded to know what I thought of it all. The day of reckoning had come; and I had before me the task of reducing a complex truth to a simple falsehood.

The ideal thing, of course, would have been to be efficiently, unassailably, preposterously statistical. "Ladies and gentlemen," I should have said, "at the moment of speaking I have been in this country five months, one week, three days, six hours, and twenty-three minutes. During that time I have traveled 8,497 miles, have visited thirty-one of your colleges and universities, have met 4,783,421 people, consumed 64,892 portions of ice cream ——"

A buzzing noise interrupted my thoughts. It was the voice of a fellow-countryman from England, newly arrived in America, analyzing the situation in Great Britain. He was trying to describe what it felt like coming to America from Europe. It suddenly dawned on me that, whereas he felt that he had left Europe behind him, I felt on the contrary that in coming back to New York I had already returned to Europe; that the difference between New York and London was as nothing compared with the difference between New York and the Middle West and the extreme West.

But what did I think of it all? I asked myself. The dominant thought in my head was a sense of the enormous complexity of America and the diversity of the American college system, and of the difficulty of making generalizations which should be true of the whole country and not of a mere fraction. The sheer scale of the thing is so staggering to the average European, I had found, that he usually fails to grasp its significance. At that moment a vision appeared to me. The vision had nothing to do with angels, demons, fiery steeds, or my speech; it consisted merely of the translation of the United States territory into European terms. I saw (and subsequently my vision turned out to be a mere memory of some charts I had seen in a geography room) that from Oklahoma City to Boston was as far as from Paris to Petrograd; that from New York City to San Francisco was as far as from London to Bagdad; that California was larger than Italy, and the State of New York nearly as big as England. Put that in your pipe and smoke it, old Europe, I thought—unless the influence of Kansas and Utah has made you give up smoking!

I glanced at the speaker. He had settled down into a comfortable jog trot, whereas my attack of mental indigestion was still in full swing. Suddenly I remembered an incident which had occurred during my visit to Harvard. "Suppose," a world-famous economist had said to me there, "you were asked what were the three most remarkable things an Englishman ought to see in America, what would you choose?" In reply I had dived in recklessly—where angels might well have feared to plunge. "Of course," I said, "he must see Niagara Falls; they are unique." "Of course," I continued, "he must see the Grand Canyon; it is one of the sights of the world." And then I hesitated—for a long time. What on earth was the third most remarkable thing I had seen in America? I finally selected a policeman I had noticed in Los Angeles wearing silk socks. You could search all Europe, Africa, and Asia without finding a policeman wearing silk socks. The economic condition which enabled a policeman to buy silk socks, and the social system which permitted him to wear them, struck me as extremely significant.

Suppose I tried to apply the same method to the university system. What had been the three most important features relating to college life which I had seen? Well, there was that never-to-be-forgotten sight of thousands and thousands of students streaming out of the University of California when the lunch bell chimed at one o'clock. I thought that that spectacle summed up in a flash the huge problem presented by the enormous expansion of university education in America. Then there was that wonderful circumstance of college life, so widespread and commonplace in America, so unknown in Europe: myriads of impecunious boys and girls working their way through college by handing round potatoes and washing dishes, or doing other trifling jobs for two or three hours a day, earning their keep thereby. How better summarize the unique opportunity in higher education which America offers her younger generation; how better pay tribute to the lack of snobbishness which enables a student to earn his way without shame? But the ability to work your way through college has nothing to do with the excellence of the Constitution, as so many students had fondly suggested to me!

For the third item again I hesitated. Then I remembered staying at a famous Middle West coeducational college, where certain members of the faculty had received from the editor of the college paper a questionnaire asking what six books they would take to a desert island if they were to be banished there. One professor said to me: "They will expect me to put down the Bible; so I must put that down for one." That was a significant incident; I wondered if my audience would see the point or whether they would think I was attacking the Bible?

I looked around at them. Yes, they were certainly very intelligent. And very delightful. I felt vaguely sorry that each one of them represented only $\frac{1}{100,000,000}$ part of the American nation. It seemed such a tiny little fraction. My chest swelled as I remembered that I represented no less than $\frac{1}{39,000,000}$ part of the English nation.

I wondered if that fact had anything to do with the queer atmosphere in the universities. In America you felt such an infinitesimally small part of the whole; and that tended to do away with a sense of civic responsibility. The boys and girls in the colleges and universities were very jolly, many of them; but no one could accuse them of having a sense of responsibility. That was one of the big differences. People called them boys and girls (and in private sometimes "kids"). With us it was always men and women. Were they, I reflected pragmatically, boys and girls in fact because they were called boys and girls; or were they called boys and girls because they really were boys and girls? How paternal the system was on the whole! History was something divided into periods; reading was something divided into assignments; education was something divided into A.B.'s, semesters, fraternities, hazing, athletics, and flunks.

Yet how nice some of the boys and girls were, I remembered affectionately. And how light-hearted and carefree they seemed after poor old Europe, with her cares and her trials and her miseries. But they ought to think a bit more.

I remembered some of the questions they had asked me. Did most people in England wear monocles? Did we still have real live dukes and duchesses? Then there was one of my traveling companions who had come from Czecho-Slovakia. He had been introduced as a native of Graeco-Slovakia; of Poland; and finally asked if his country was a province of Russia whose capital was Vladivostok! It wasn't always as bad as that, but still ——!

And then there was that beastly system of credits—everyone always being taken on credit; and compulsory lectures, and quizzes, and assigned reading, and incessant examinations. All very well in their way but out of place in a university. Life was too organized.

The buzzing noise had subsided. I glanced at the head of the table. The chairman was calling on me to speak.

I rose to my feet. . . .

Boston: A Journalistic Poor-Farm

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

IF, as it has been so wittily said, Boston is the abandoned farm of American literature, journalistically it is the country's poor-farm. Nothing in Boston astonishes foreigners more than its press; nothing more clearly illustrates the passing of what was once the Athens of America. To understand in full the degradation of its dailies one must know the extraordinary transformation which has come over the stronghold of the Puritans; one must realize that the Boston of today has comparatively little in common with that of forty years ago. A thin blue line of descendants of the colonials, who learn nothing and forget nothing, is intrenched on the Back Bay and in State Street, and does its best to confront and hold back the multitudes of Irish, Jews, and Italians who today comprise the bulk of the city's population. The Puritan is yielding to the Catholic; the Catholic in turn may yield to some one else.

Now the decay of the press has naturally not been due merely to the city's changed character; it has followed the press of the whole country downward. The surprising thing is that the ultra-conservatism of Boston did not retard the change, but, I am inclined to think, rather accelerated it. Perhaps the explanation is this: one of the worst faults of the Boston press is its parochial character. No other large American city has such localized newspapers. That trait comes from the Back Bay itself. Even when literary Boston was in fullest flower, its attention was riveted chiefly upon itself. It knew nothing of the rest of the country and did not wish to know anything of it. Some years ago a charming young bride from Albany, descendant of the most patrician of Dutch settlers, was taken to visit on Back Bay two of her husband's maiden aunts, then nearing their seventies. They looked upon her with mingled trepidation and wonder. "So you come from the West," said they. "Well, from Albany," faltered the guilty bride. "Well, we've never been further west than Worcester!"

This parochial character is unquestionably at the bottom of the success of more than one Boston newspaper. About thirty years ago the Hub rejoiced in some excellent and most intelligent journals. There was the old Post, a fine Mugwumpian morning paper of the type of the old New York Evening Post and the Springfield Republican. Under John Holmes the Herald was independent, honest, and aboveboard. The Advertiser personified Republican dignity, respectability, and conservatism, with the Record not far behind. The Traveler, too, had its day. But the Post failed, was bought up, and became, under E. A. Grozier, a particularly low but successful scarlet woman of journalism. The Herald fell upon hard times and bartered its virtue like any drab. The Record and the Advertiser had their ups and downs; the Record is honorably dead and the Advertiser in its old age has sunk dreadfully to being a Hearst tabloid picture daily after the model of the New York Daily News. Others have faded out; the American and the Telegram have come in—to lower the general average still further. Aside from the Christian Science Monitor, they are all fatally petit bourgeois. They are filled with small-town gossip, with the chatter of the suburbanite.

It was General Charles H. Taylor of the Boston Globe who led the profession downward. It was also he who first understood how best to exploit the new-type residents of Boston. He printed sensational headlines and "played up" crime. He issued orders that, if possible, every reader of the Globe must find his name in the paper at least once a year. Even today it prints long lists of "among those present" and gives pages and pages to clubs, societies, and society news, to meetings of fraternal orders—anything which makes possible the printing of names, names, names. A story of General Taylor further illumines his policy. Being informed one day by an excited employee of the alarming news that the Boston Herald had engaged another London correspondent, the General exclaimed: "Then, by God, we'll have to get another in South Boston!" To this must be added General Taylor's second recipe for sure success: Never say anything unfavorable of anybody in your daily if it can in any way be avoided; never give offense.

That rule has long governed the Globe. General Taylor adopted it not merely because it was good business, but because he was himself a simple, sweet-natured person, utterly undiscriminating, utterly conventional, utterly ignorant that there were such things as deep economic currents and terrible economic injustices. Possessed of a really creative mind, he should have been a man of action instead of a publisher who owned 50 per cent of his paper —Mr. Eben Jordan of the Jordan Marsh dry-goods store owned the other 50 per cent—and made money much too easily.

This is the inheritance that has come to General Taylor's sons, of whom the younger, William O. Taylor, is now the head of the paper. He inherited his father's kindly heart as well as his limited social vision. The Globe changes amazingly little; while it still has exactly the headlines and the cheap, splashy make-up which once made it appear the yellowest of Boston dailies, it has been so outstripped in yellowness by others that it seems almost conservative. Why should it change? It still has (April, 1923) 280,000 readers on week days and over 328,000 on Sundays, and still makes considerable money.

Curiously enough, it does do something worth while; it contributes the best editorials printed in any Boston newspaper. One appears daily, over the signature "Uncle Dudley," which is always worth reading. Whether the Taylors realized at first the commercial value of editorials which give evidence of thought and brains and liberalism is questionable, but it is today true that the views of the apocryphal "Uncle Dudley" sell thousands upon thousands of copies to people who don't like the rest of the paper, but seek its editorial page as an oasis in the desert. The several men whose identity has been hidden by "Uncle Dudley," Lucien Price, the late Thaddeus C. Defriez, James Morgan, William S. Packer, and James H. Powers, form a roll of honor. In the war days when it was dangerous to be an American loyal to his country's spiritual ideals "Uncle Dudley" found pleasure in dwelling upon fundamentals; he wrote about the basic ideals of spiritual and moral liberty, dealing, it is true, largely in generalities, but often pointing the moral to adorn the tale, or leading up to an inevitable (sometimes almost treasonable) deduction which one had, however, to make oneself. One often finds in the Globe the only accurate, unbiased reporting of labor troubles or of famous trials—Frank Sibley's accounts of the famous Lawrence strike were the best reporting done in New England in years and became a part of the subsequent court record.

As Hearst out-trumped Pulitzer in yellowness in New York, so Mr. E. A. Grozier went General Taylor one better in Boston. The Post can be dismissed briefly: there are few newspapers of lower standards in America; this one has a circulation of 361,000 daily and of over 370,000 on Sundays, a great decrease from its high-water mark of 540,000. It still pervades all New England, degrading as it goes, destroying ideals, lowering the public taste, and familiarizing the homes of Vermont, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, and parts of Maine with crimes, scandal, and the baser part of life. It is a frankly commercialized enterprise beside which the two Hearst newspapers, the American and the Advertiser, seem tame and respectable—some excellent editorials creep into the former occasionally, doubtless from the pen or through the influence of Grenville S. MacFarland, an able writer and thinker.

As for the Hearst papers in Boston, they differ not a whit from the others of the group. That the once staid and sober Advertiser should now be Mr. Hearst's first tabloid pictorial daily is truly the irony of fate, and is in many respects a measure of the low estate which the whole Boston press has reached. For some excellent policies the Hearst papers have stood in Boston, as elsewhere; notably in the matter of the street railways. Their managers believe, moreover, that it is in their editorial liberalism or radicalism that their strength lies. They will demonstrate to you that the chief sensationalism of the Boston American lies in its headlines; that if you were to eliminate those, a daily comparison would show that there is less of the bizarre, the scandalous, and the sensational than appears in the Post and the new evening paper, the Telegram. This statement is doubtless correct; but what a light it casts upon Boston journalism that two dailies actually out-Hearst Hearst!

When one turns to the Boston Herald and its editor, Robert Lincoln O'Brien, one comes upon the greatest disappointment in Boston journalism. Yet one must ask oneself whether, given the ownership of the Herald as it was when Mr. O'Brien took hold, any other outcome was possible. A Harvard graduate, private secretary to President Cleveland during his second term, then for years Washington correspondent of the Transcript, and later its editor, he had a wonderful opportunity when asked to take over the direction of the Herald. True, the paper was then venal and was losing so much money that its rich owners, who have at times included Senator W. Murray Crane, the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, some of the United Shoe Machinery Company group, and Morton F. Plant, were sorely tried by its plight. These big-business men and corporations were unquestionably a barrier to the making over of the Herald into a free and independent daily, but it was supposed that if Mr. O'Brien accepted the task of rehabilitation he would obtain for himself a charter of liberty. It speedily appeared that Mr. O'Brien, too, had sold himself to the god Success. He was determined to make the Herald rich and prosperous and his efforts have succeeded. Its joint circulation with its evening edition, the Traveler, is now 258,000. It printed in 1921 more "national" advertising (that is, general announcements as opposed to advertising of local origin) than any other daily. Mr. O'Brien, who receives a percentage of the earnings, is believed to draw about $100,000 a year for his services and he is also a stockholder.

But the Herald, for all that it bears a fair face and is typographically the best of the Boston papers, after the Transcript, is false behind its pleasing aspect. It is still a creature of the big corporations; it is subservient to the big advertisers. Nor is it always quite square in its advertising. A couple of years ago it joined in the general abuse of Joseph Pelletier, the former District Attorney of Boston, for not punishing or interfering with the perpetrators of the Emerson Motors swindle. But while properly berating Pelletier, it failed to state how many thousands of dollars had gone into its treasury for the extensive Emerson Motors advertising in its columns through which many dupes lost their savings. During the war the Herald refused to carry out a contract for publishing a perfectly proper advertisement urging the public to purchase only necessaries—evidently the dry-goods stores forbade it—for which breach of contract the Herald paid five hundred dollars. At one time it even ruled automobile accidents off the front page on Mondays to oblige the motor-car advertisers. Once it went so far as to print the headline "(Governor) McCall and Moxie at Barnstable Fair." So the Herald is without a soul, and is ruled by fear. Whereas General Taylor's policy of offending nobody was in part due to his own kindly philosophy, with the Herald it is business, pure and simple.

Then Mr. O'Brien has the good sense to stick by his friends. Sometimes this leads to amusing complications. There was Mr. X, for instance. Coming to Mr. O'Brien's sanctum one day he explained, with some embarrassment, that a publication would be made about him in the next few days and he did so hope that the Herald would deal kindly and gently with him. Mr. O'Brien assured him that it would. Mr. O'Brien, about to go off for a few days of vacation, left orders that not one single word should appear in the Herald in his absence about his friend, Mr. X. Three days later, the news of Mr. X's honorable appointment to a high Federal office in Boston duly appeared in all the Boston newspapers except the Herald! Not until Mr. O'Brien returned could the lips of the loyal staff of the Herald be unpadlocked.

If loyalties, as Mr. Galsworthy as well as Mr. O'Brien shows, can lead us astray, I think the Herald typifies only a bit more strongly than the other Boston papers the slavish adherence to convention and sham which distinguishes the whole of that parochial press. Take that midget statesman, Calvin Coolidge, Vice-President of the United States, for instance. Every honest Boston journalist knows the inwardness of the police strike and how little, if any, credit Mr. Coolidge deserves for his part in it. I happened to be sitting among the Massachusetts journalists at the Chicago convention when Mr. Coolidge was nominated as Vice-President. Their astonishment and their disgust were amusing to witness. Returning later to the Congress Hotel I found two of the most influential editors in New England in excited conversation about Mr. Coolidge's nomination. Never have I heard more vigorous profanity; each sought to outdo the other in his epithets. "Never," said the elder, "in years of political experience have I met a man in public life so despicable, so picayune, so false to his friends as Cal!" I marveled still more when I read the dispatches those two gentlemen sent to their respective dailies, for they were full of congratulations to Massachusetts upon the honor done to her and to Mr. Coolidge for this magnificent national recognition of his splendid services to his State, his admirable personal qualities, his statesmanlike vision, etc., etc.

Finally, there is the Transcript, staid, dignified, the personification of reaction and conservatism, catering to the business men whose minds are closed and to the Back Bay conservatives, male and female, whose horizons are as limited as their prejudices are unnumbered. Where the Globe's readers are hungry for new ideas and open-minded, the Transcript's are of the Brahmin caste whose broadcloth ancestors mobbed Abolitionists and resented any interference with the slave trade or slavery because it might affect their dividends. For such as these the Transcript is beyond praise and it must, in all justice, be set forth that the Transcript is in many respects an excellent news-purveyor. Its criticisms of books, plays, art, and music are excellent; they are free, honest, often very able; some people rate them higher than those of any other American daily. Certainly the Transcript gives a more comprehensive view of musical news and progress the world over than any other American newspaper. It does endeavor to keep up Boston's interest in things intellectual, and it has been rewarded by a slow but sure circulation growth; it sells 34,000 daily except when it jumps on Saturdays to 55,000.

Had the Transcript the right kind of spiritual, intellectual, and political leadership it would have to be ranked very high in American journalism. But it, too, is in its viewpoint parochial, narrow, nationalistic, extremely prejudiced, and filled with the spirit of caste. It is a violent partisan; its editorial page, and often its news columns, are poisoned by bitterness and hate.

All the British and French propaganda during the war found its way into the Transcript; no lie about Russia is too stale for its retailing. Fortunately for its readers, its news headlines are no longer quite so colored as during the war, when it was one of the worst adulterators of news that we had. Not content with partisan writing of headlines it began its stories with a "news-lead" badly colored, so that when you got to your news you were likely to read it wrong. It deliberately distorted President Harding's stinging rebuke to the railroad presidents who refused to make peace with their striking shopmen by putting these entirely false headlines over the President's statement: "Should End Shop Strike, President Harding Tells the Union Officials; Blames Strike for Prevailing Coal Shortage; Also for Unsatisfactory Railroad Conditions; Continuance on Some Roads Without Reason."

Of George S. Mandell, who has been for many years the moving spirit of the Transcript, it has been said that "his personal ideals are bounded by the heavens and his social sympathies by his elbows." He has the highest personal standards and is so truthful and honorable that it makes the Transcript's lapses all the more curious and censurable. But his standards are all conventional; one thinks of him instinctively as a Tory squire.

This, then, is the daily newspaper menu of Boston, chief city of New England, foremost inheritor of the Puritan tradition, and, in the eyes of many, predestined conservator of the ideals of the Revolutionary Fathers. Worshipers of the Revolution of 148 years ago, the foremost concern of the Boston editors of today is the prevention of any future progress.

Death-Watch

By VINCENT STARRETT

The great man lingers in the arms of pain,
Serene before the creeping shade of doom. . .
He comforts those about him in the room,
Whose tears fall silently. . . . Out in the rain
A youth in oilskins, vividly profane,
Trudges beside the splendid house of gloom
And waits the moment it becomes a tomb,
Thinking the world waits with him in the lane.

Not his the sorrow, and not his the smart,
Though vaguely pity may oppose his ire;
His but to wait a signal; nothing more.
It comes! . . . And with a fiercely beating heart
He shrieks his message o'er a humming wire:
"Dead!" . . . And afar the hungry presses roar.

A Far Cry

By ZONA GALE

AMONG the red porch chairs Elmer Dasher sat in a denim swing which leniently dissented. He did not seem like a man who would sit and swing; such a molested-looking man.

Hands parted the curtains of a window behind him and hung there a pink card on which was printed "Ice." It was evening, but tomorrow morning's slumber must not be flawed by this task. Immediately the hands appeared upon the porch. Mrs. Dasher's hands wore all the expression that she had. They seemed to have done so much. Her face had experienced so little.

"Hot," said she.

"Why shouldn't it be? It's summer time," said Elmer Dasher.

He tilted the swing, and the spirited disclaimer of the frame did not annoy them. She rocked and they did not hear the creaking board. Near the cement pavement the sprinkler fizzed and squirted; they did not observe that in order to avoid it passers were obliged to make a detour under the maples.

Elmer Dasher took his watch and held it. The last bright cloud hung on Patch Hill and stained the air. Shadow floated and fell. For five minutes while airy dissolution ran upon the light, Mr. Dasher eyed the dial. Then he descended the steps and turned off the city water. Unconscious that it is a triumph of social evolution for a community to be organized like that, and without a casual glance at the elemental glory of the sunset, he returned to his swing.

Ludlow, his neighbor, crossed the connecting lawns and desired to know how everything was. Ludlow had a woman's eyes. Elmer Dasher held him in subconscious contempt, for he made disconcerting observations, such as he made now to Dasher's inevitable reply that everything was complete, complete:

"Sometimes I wonder why Patch Grove doesn't collapse and slide down Patch Hill and pile up in the valley."

Dasher inquired why on earth it should do that. He knew his town; "hard-boiled business, hard-boiled recreation, hard-boiled family life," he had once summed it up; but he could not imagine why business blocks, houses, garages, and folk should ever give way, of their own futility, and slide down to the valley of the Patch, the brown river. Ludlow's long harangue only confused him.

"You won't find any better place to live," he indignantly defended.

"I'm afraid not," said Ludlow, sighed, mentioned the thunder heads in the west, and went home.

"Queer duck," Elmer Dasher thought.

Abruptly, distinctly, he heard a cry. He could not divine its direction nor tell whether it was the voice of man or woman. It might have been a signal, very clear, though from a distance. He looked at his wife but she, with moving lips, was counting something and had heard nothing. He thought that the boys must be playing ball on the school grounds, and he tilted the swing again.

The hall gas flared up. Over her who had lighted it the warm tide surged, showed her pointed face, her thin arms—Geraldine Dasher, a name to which her faint self of forty bore no relation. She emerged, announced a destination, was met by "Why not ever sit down here at home with us?" and pregnable, without resentment, sank to the top step.

Within the houses, behind the dying brilliance of the brick walls, girls were dressing. In Patch Grove no one dresses before dinner. The virginity of the toilette is preserved for its main purpose. On the porches sat those who did not dress for the evening any more. In many of these the desire to give life had changed to a dynamic hostility to those already alive. As with the Dashers:

"Hot." "Why shouldn't it be? It's summer time." "That isn't funny." "My dear, nothing is funny to you." "My clothes are—they're so funny I don't like to go to church." "The churches have gone to the dogs. Best keep out of them." "You would insult my religion!" And so on to: "I'm rather sick of this whole thing." Whereon Geraldine cried abruptly: "How do you think I feel about that?" and laughed, harshly, so that a silence fell.

In their silence a telegram was given over the telephone in the hall. Dasher took the message, came back, his face sagging with concern, and said:

"Mama, Katy's sick. She wants us to go to the city and bring the boy home with us."

Mrs. Dasher asked for details which had not been given, made and rejected fractions of plans, objected. Dasher said: "Nonsense. Katy's the only niece I've got in the world. Going, too, Jerry? Don't keep us waiting."

The enormous night received the little car. Ten miles of dusky cornland, warm with the breath of the day; eight miles of city streets, sleepy with heat, nervous with light, washed by a thin black stream of beings. Pearl City traffic formed the veins of some vast undivined body. That body seemed to have a voice, raucous, unresting. The powers of that body were evident—to give death, to give life, to sin, to rejoice, to agonize. Was there no more to that unknown being? Could it only bellow with its body while its veins flowed with the traffic?

Katy was at a hospital and with her the little boy, wondering, frail. The ward was shared with a woman, a Bohemian, red and black. Katy was a yellow shadow on a pillow. Old in cell and in spirit she said: "Don't bother to stay. He'll be here. But he can't work and see to the boy, too. Me? I don't know and I don't care." She lay like a little animal left too long in a trap to be watching any more.

Elmer Dasher was shaken, said "But my God, Katy"; and Katy, turning her head fretfully from him, was caught by the aspect of the Bohemian woman, and cried out. The Bohemian woman was sitting erect and trying terribly for breath. No nurse was there, the passages were quiet. The Dashers, always lax, uncentered, were thrown into distraction. Elmer ran and rang and called. It was Mrs. Dasher who reached the woman and, in some deep impulse to physical contact, held her as she died. Mrs. Dasher kept saying: "I don't understand this. I don't understand this."

Jerry caught up the terrified little boy, ran by the nurse who was moving upon the room, crouched in the tonneau, and hugged the child. He wept, was stilled, and later roused to faint interests. She was stirred by his quiet, then by his motion. While they waited, she sought for ways to give him protection. Passers glanced at them and it flashed to her: They think he's mine. She adjusted his collar and said in an admirably imitated abstraction: "Yes, darling."

At last her father and mother came crossing the street. To Jerry they seemed detached and of a familiarity strange and passionate, such as she felt in saying over her own name.

"I don't understand that," Mrs. Dasher was still saying weakly. In the seat beside her husband she wept and seemed rapt, unaware of anything save that which had just happened. Elmer Dasher was silent, but wholly in the body, as was clear when he cursed in a traffic crisis.

This crisis he assumed to have been imagined: He heard a car, with a strange siren, a faint melodious siren; a car seeking, he thought, to pass him, and nearly succeeding. Dasher could hear the silver alternation, a cadence such as three pipes might give, softly blown. When had a man ever devised a siren like that? "Some music hound," thought Dasher. And when a tight place narrowed in before him and the light cry of insistence followed close, he drew far to the right to let the fellow pass. The fellow did not pass. Amazed, as he looked back, Dasher saw the street momentarily empty. "Must have been a fire whistle," Dasher thought, and slid back into the channel.

They drew into the country, into the tender vacant air of fields. Now emerged the sky, which in town they had forgotten. The sky was void of stars. To the southwest were thrusts of lightning, incessant, at innocent play, unconcerned with any fruit of death. A faint huskiness came deepening of thunder.

"What's that?" the child asked and, grown shyly accustomed, questioned of fireflies, of miasma, of the smell of honey and hay. These questions gave Jerry rapture. His breath and his brushing eyelash gave her rapture. The child fell asleep, and in dear discomfort Jerry held him; for mile upon mile she held him and dreaded the ride's end.

She felt a lift of pleasure when the car was stalled. At the foot of a sharp slope up to a road-bed the car stopped. Elmer Dasher, who could not so much as set a hinge on a door, was helpless. He lifted the hood, produced tools, said names of parts; but it was plain that he was helpless. No farmstead light was near and they set themselves to wait for passers. It was a road little frequented. And now the high black clouds were shot with flame.

They faced a meadow made limitless by night. The life of the dark was there, the dark peopled by rustle, breath, odor. In the stillness these influences came confidently to the car. The night breathed, and along its vast invisible veins coursed some faint fluid, tincturing the darkness, flowing through the little bodies of men.

Suddenly Elmer Dasher felt a frightful nostalgia. Home, home! He wanted to be at home. But when he thought of his house, his porch with red chairs, it was not these that he wanted. Home. Some core of the word seemed to emerge and demand him. Where did he want to go?

Far away, as if from another meadow under another night, there came a call, of no remembered bird. A bird call which fused with the rising wind, threaded the thunder, haunted the ear, and died. It voiced his nostalgia, it was pure and pleading. It bore an echo of unbearable sweetness. Or was it a bird call? He thought now that it might have been a wavering engine whistle. . . . Far down the curve of the railroad across the distant swamp, a yellow eye outrayed in the first rain.

"The 'way freight," said Elmer Dasher. "It's none too good for us. We'll signal them, and if they row we'll report them to the directors!"

The highway was level with the fields. To the fields' edge they rolled their car, an ancient servant, and left it locked in darkness; with its lamps lighted their way and flagged the freight train. In magnificent languor, like a train of the Orient, the thundering thing rolled indolently down and stopped. A blown torch brushed out a little pool of light. A Patch Grove voice hailed them, exclaimed, bade them climb aboard. Received into the warm cave of the cab, these four blinked at the red throat of the fire-box and felt the rich reprieve of some convalescence.

The enormous night held the little train. The enormous sky held the little storm. Standing in the gangway Elmer Dasher threw back his head and took the hour. Motion, roar, electricity blue on the metal, thunder of wheel and of cloud, and he in their midst. He felt in flight over farther spaces. They swept by a steel plant, saw the belch and glare, made out men and mounds of slag. One of the sheds stood drenched in the red beauty of the pouring, and naked figures flowered from wild color. In that flash were the tumult of farther industry, roar of innumerable trains, glitter of all the cities, their veins flowing with men and women in sin, joy, anguish. He was feeling all that there was to feel! He could have cried a challenge as the engine went challenging the lit blackness.

But why did the engineer blow the whistle, running through open country? Or did he blow the whistle? He was sitting quietly on the seat, his attention on the track. One hand lay on his knee and one on the window-sill. The engine whistle was not blown! That insistent and sovereign call which had seemed like the voice of their flight, it came toward them from some horizon. What horizon? Who was calling? Calling whom? Beauty and anguish flowed together in Elmer Dasher. He felt drunkenness, incredibly enhanced.

"The glory of the Lord—eh, old girl?" he shouted. No one heard him.

On the fireman's seat Mrs. Dasher, cowering with covered eyes, looked round at him. She had not heard what he said, had not seen what he saw, had felt nothing that he felt, had been puzzled by no cry; but her face held its own emotion, wore now as much experience as her hands.

"Elmer," she cried, "I don't understand what happened to her and I don't believe I ever shall."

But this he did not hear. "The glory of the Lord, by the great horn spoon!" he bellowed, and looked about.

Neither death nor the fury of the hour occupied Jerry. In the thunder of the engine and of the storm, she had found that the child clutched at her.

Before midnight they were dry in their rooms and the little boy was sleeping. Elmer Dasher's exaltation, his wife's pity and terror, Jerry's brief motherhood, all boxed dry in their rooms.

The storm cleared and left the air sultry, intolerable. Dasher could not sleep. He went downstairs and sat in the swing. Ludlow was moving about the lawn, barefooted in the drenched grass. He came to the Dashers' veranda rail.

"Been up in town, have you?" he said. "I tell you, if there's reason why Patch Grove should collapse and slide into the valley, Pearl City ought to drop into the ground with no warning. Ought to disappear from the human eye."

Something shook Elmer Dasher. He seemed to remember that this destiny of man he had recently been stirred to resist. But automatically he replied:

"You won't find a better city anywhere than Pearl."

"I'm afraid not," said Ludlow, and went home.

Faintly, a far horn which would wake few, Elmer Dasher heard the cry again. In it was the nostalgia of the night, of the world, of some hidden being striving to be heard. But of this cry he could not divine direction nor meaning. It might have been a signal or a challenge. To whom? And from where? Boys could not be playing ball on the school grounds now. . . .

He moved nervously in his swing and the frame dissented leniently. He felt an instant and acute relief and comfortably concluded that this faint squeak was all that he had noted.

Hearing this squeak, his wife descended, quavered. "That you, Elmer?" and came to her rocking chair on its creaking board. The moon in its third quarter, a trinket of silver gilt, was tilted above the elms, but the Dashers did not observe. Nor did they note the clean new anger of the second storm cutting its low way along the west.

Beneath the hall burner Jerry passed, came to the threshold, and when her mother said "Better sit down" emerged and obeyed.

"I don't understand it and I never shall," said Mrs. Dasher heavily.

"Don't say that again!" Elmer Dasher cried. "There isn't a woman in the world that'll keep on saying the same thing over and over the way you will."

"I won't be here long to say anything. I'm sick of the whole thing."

Jerry interposed: "It's hot again, isn't it?" She heard: "Why shouldn't it be It's summer time." And: "Can anybody see whether I hung up the ice card?"

"Vacation" at San Quentin

By MIRIAM ALLEN de FORD

THIS being the season when all well-conducted respectables lay aside the cares of office and take to the woods for a long rest, Californians paid little attention to the tiny paragraphs which recently appeared in a few San Francisco newspapers to announce another strike among the criminal-syndicalism prisoners at San Quentin. Isn't I.W.W. synonymous with "I Won't Work"? What more natural, then, than that these faithless fellows should prefer solitary confinement to the torments of labor?

Among a group of criminal-syndicalism victims sent up from Sacramento last May was one William Flanagen, aged twenty-one. Like all the other prisoners of the same kind, he was charged with no overt act, his only crime being membership in the Industrial Workers of the World. In his case the "offense" was a very recent one; his red card was only a few days old when he was arrested and charged with violating the laws of a State in which he had not resided long enough even to obtain a job.

Flanagen is a member of a "good" Massachusetts family, which made frantic efforts to save him from the fate due his inconvenient opinions. It was finally intimated to him that if he would come home while he was out on bail no one would complain of the cost of the skipped bond. But the young man's education in solidarity had been in a very good school—the Sacramento County Jail. Flanagen did not see why chance should release him from the same misfortune that beset his fellow-workers, and he refused to accept the offer, taking his sentence of from one to fourteen years with the rest of the defendants.

All new prisoners at San Quentin are set to work in the jute-mill. Ordinary convicts serve from three to six months there; politicals are lucky if they get out in a year. One of the previous protest strikes at the prison had its origin in the three-year service of one of the "Wobbly" prisoners in this breeding-place of consumption. The machines are worked at top speed and are forced to compete against each other in production. To Flanagen, who never before had seen the inside of any kind of factory, the regular daily task in the jute-mill was the limit of attainment. Then when a "rush order" for extra work came on, and the jute-mill superintendent as usual picked a political to handle it, and placed it on this new and inexperienced worker, with the best will in the world the amount of labor commanded was beyond his powers. Flanagen tried hard but fell behind in his task. He was ordered to the dungeons.

These dark and filthy holes, the cells of which are scarcely large enough for a man to lie down in comfortably (if one can find comfort where the only bed is a stone floor), dripping with moisture, alive with vermin, with open buckets for toilet purposes and an outrageous insufficiency of food and water, have at one time or another harbored most of the criminal-syndicalism prisoners at San Quentin. Word filtered through the prison that Flanagen had been condemned to this place "until he was willing to work"—i. e., until, weakened by the conditions of the dungeon, he was stronger and more skilful than when he went in! Immediately another protest strike was on.

Most of the other I.W.W. prisoners, by reason of their longer service, were in far more comfortable working positions than the jute-mill. But there was no hesitancy; out of the forty-five "Wobblies" in San Quentin, thirty-six left their tasks and refused to work again until Flanagen was out of the dungeons.

Warden James A. Johnston, no friend of industrial rebels, ordered the entire thirty-six to solitary. There they are fed on nothing but bread and water, and precious little of that. Except that there is a little light during the daytime, and that at night a lousy mattress and blanket are thrown in, to be taken away next morning, the men in solitary are almost as badly off as the men in the dungeons. And there the strikers are to stay, by the warden's orders, until they are willing to go back to work with their demands ungranted.

One of the thirty-six, George Ryan, was the only San Quentin inmate on the Workers' Prison Comfort Club's June list for birthday cards and letters. Only a prisoner can know what this proof that the world outside has not forgotten means to the man inside. Of course all privileges of correspondence, coming or going, are taken away from the men in solitary. George Ryan celebrated his birthday by joining in the strike.

Of the criminal syndicalism prisoners not on strike, four are out in the road-camp and do not yet know of the protest. Old Jim Roe, over seventy and crippled with rheumatism, spends his time in the "old men's ward" and has no job to leave. (Jim Roe has a heart fifty years younger and stauncher than his worn-out body. He used to peddle shoe-strings and collar-buttons around San Francisco. Among his stock were copies of Solidarity and the Industrial Worker, which he sold to the boys on the "skid road." It was for this heinous crime that he was sent to San Quentin. The Defense Committee wanted to appeal his case. "Don't waste that money on lawyers for me, boys," said old Jim Roe. "I'm too old to be of much use if I were out. Keep the money for defense for the young fellows." So Roe will perhaps die in prison—and maybe his appeal-money freed another man to organize the workers.)

John Hannon is another who is not on strike. Hannon was in every other protest strike before this, and because of his experiences in the dungeons and in solitary, he is nearly blind and probably soon will be entirely sightless. He had one weak eye when he went to prison; now one is altogether blind, and the disease spread to the other and has nearly destroyed its sight. At the last strike he had to give up and be carried out to the hospital.

Jack Gaveel is out because the very day of the strike was the date of his deportation hearing, and he was off the job. Gaveel is a Canadian, whose term has one more year to run; but the authorities are trying to shunt him back to Canada immediately. He is fighting deportation proceedings, which if successful will establish a precedent for several other criminal-syndicalism cases.

At least one veteran of the war to make democracy safe for the world—W. I. Fruit—is down with the rest in solitary. Another striker is John Golden, who spent over a year in the dungeons, till his physical strength gave out, because as a political prisoner who had committed no crime he refused to accept the status and tasks of a convict. Then there is Ramon Sanchez, a Mexican who is suffering from "San Quentin tuberculosis." He too had to be removed to the hospital when Hannon was taken out, during the last strike; but as long as he can keep up he will stick it out with the others.

Thirty-six forgotten men (the District Defense Committee's telegram of protest to Governor Richardson went unheeded)—90 per cent of them bearing familiar Anglo-Saxon or Celtic names, a Jew, a Mexican, a Finn or two, one or two Italians—men from every sort of social background, with every kind of history, united on just one issue; all undergoing the horrors of solitary for the sake of a young man most of them never saw till last May, and because of the principle that his "punishment" violates.

And not one of the thirty-six on strike, or Flanagan in the dungeon, or the eight looking on in sympathy, has ever committed any crime except that of belonging to a militant labor union in Sunny California!

In the Driftway

RECENTLY the Drifter stopped at a hotel in which a bankers' convention was housed, and he found himself completely surrounded with bankers. Young bankers, hardly more than bank clerks, perhaps, skipped around in spotless white trousers and blue coats; middle-aged bankers, much more serious but equally prosperous, smoked very long cigars in the lobby; and large, aged, impressive bankers, certainly bank presidents, accompanied by correspondingly large wives gowned in white lace and jet, occupied the largest chairs in the lounging room.

* * * * *

EVERY inch of the hotel seemed to ooze prosperity. It was easily possible to distinguish a banker from one of the few remaining guests, not only by the little white card pinned to his lapel but by his confidence, his calm, his air of knowing that all was well with the world and not caring who else knew it, too. The Drifter, seated in an obscure corner, watched the wave of well-being and good-feeding advance and recede.

* * * * *

HOWEVER, it was a banker who saved the Drifter's peace of mind and at the same time demonstrated the incredible good-fellowship which is at once America's blessing and curse. On the Sabbath the Drifter was compelled to do an inconsequential, except for him, errand. He found every necessary shop closed tight; but the banker, indigenous to the city, drove five miles, climbed stairs, performed feats of physical labor, and at almost unheard-of trouble succeeded in doing the little errand for one whom he had never laid eyes on before and doubtless never would again. The Drifter strongly doubts whether he himself would have worked so hard for his blood brother; he is quite sure he would never have done it for a stranger. Yet it was done unsolicited, cheerfully, and evidently without hope of reward. The Drifter has often puzzled about the matter, for such things have happened to him before. Possibly it is a desire for companionship on an off day, or a feeling of superiority engendered by helping some poor unfortunate, or perhaps simply the milk of human kindness. This friendly good-fellowship is at its best when it is relieving the desperate, and at its worst when it calls conventions and attends them. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Letters to the Editor should ordinarily not exceed 500 words, and shorter communications are more likely to be printed. In any case the Editor reserves the right to abridge communications.

Joy Unconfined

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Somebody is always taking the joy out of life. President Harding has just heard some very unpleasant news, arousing enough anger to melt the Murier glacier in Alaska, viz.: The people of Minnesota have acted like a pack of red bolshevik wolves, overrunning the stronghold of the G.O.P., attacking the high-tariff walls, and in a manner à la Firpo destroying all traces of normalcy. The State that hitherto has had the proud distinction of being the proud mother of a pair of twin cities, which within its bosom harbored the source of the Mississippi, has decided to take both the Republican and Democratic parties, put them together in a canoe at the source of the Father of Waters, and send them down the river into the Gulf of Oblivion. When the news of this dastardly deed spreads through the land of the Minnesotas the banker will drop his banking, the farmer will drop his hoe, the bricklayer will drop his bricks; and a new anthem will be heard: "Yes, we have no normalcy! Yes, we have no G.O.P.! Yes, we have no Democratic Party!"

Everywhere you go the name of Magnus Johnson resounds. Magnus! What a name for a hero of the people! The Indian medicine men of Alaska predict a stormy session in Congress for the Heap Big Chief, Harding. They have advised him to take along several totem poles to give him protection against the two mighty warriors, Shipstead and Magnus.

Hail to Minnesota the victorious! Hail to the sons of the soil!

Kenmore, Ohio, July 18 LOUIS GROTSTEIN

P.S.—An annual subscription to the world's greatest periodical will follow in a few days.

[After reading the postscript we disobeyed our original impulse not to print this letter.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

Mr. Stuart Chase's Junk

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your issue of June 27 Mr. Chase says: "All the philosophies . . . and all the religions . . . and all the moral doctrines—junk Useless to me, useless to you, and . . . useless to our children. Hardly a word of sound advice have we to give our children as to how to know, or enjoy, or live." Is this true? May I suggest a few substantial facts which I for one always find most wholesome to correct my pessimistic moods even in view of the late horrid war and the pestilential peace which has grown out of it?

Thus, more than two thousand years ago gifted men desiring precisely what Mr. Chase wants were experimenting with what they called "Wisdom"—that is, a guide of life, of which one of them in the enthusiasm of his discovery writes: "Her ways are ways of pleasantness and all her paths are peace." Another seeker for the same kind of truth says in his quaint fashion: "What doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God?" Observe he says "do justly," not make others do it; and then note that he has laid down the three foundation principles of all human conduct and intercourse that we men invariably admire and love to see in one another—namely, integrity, friendliness, and modesty. These things constitute the happy life.

Take one more pure nugget of wisdom; no one knows who first discovered it. "Blessed, that is, happy, are the meek, or better, the gentle, for they shall inherit the earth." In other words, they are the coming people. The violent have no living chance by the side of the men of good-will! Was there ever a war that did not really go to demonstrate this? Hear what Benjamin Franklin writes to an Englishman at the close of our Revolutionary War, proposing a "compact between England, France, and America," and saying: "What repeated follies are those repeated wars! How many excellent things . . . tending to the common felicity might have been made . . . with the money and men foolishly spent during the last seven years by our mad wars in doing one another mischief."

I am only one man and others have had far wider experience, but I think that I have known hundreds of people who have made constant use of this way of life in varied circumstances, and often against painful odds, and have won success and happiness. I have never known anyone to make a failure of it. Moreover, there is already a large biographical literature, the reading of which would be an education in the humanities.

Finally, why cannot we have a big Union of Humanity above every divisive boundary of nation or race or sect, with its legends, "Humanity Over All; Good-Will Not Violence," committing ourselves to treat men always as we like to be treated? There is a wealth of truth and goodness in the world waiting to be seen, as soon as we look for it.

Southwest Harbor, Maine, July 2 Charles F. Dole

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In his excellent article, Junk, in The Nation for June 27, Mr. Stuart Chase entirely overlooks the science of language and greatly underestimates the vigor and extent of behavioristic psychology. These exceptions do not invalidate his thesis, but rather strengthen it by contrast; in fact his failure to appreciate them goes to show how science is hidden by the litter of junk, even from a willing observer.

The science of language has been on a scientific footing for a century—a generation less than chemistry. In the last fifty years its method has been comparable, and favorably comparable, to that of the biologic sciences. It escapes the notice even of students like Mr. Chase because it is unpopular, and it is unpopular because the amassers of junk are repelled by its humble attention to detail and by the accuracy of its method.

Behaviorism is not, as Mr. Chase implies, the message of a lone "man named Watson"—a role which Dr. Watson would probably decline—but is firmly rooted in the scientific past and flourishes in the present. It really dates back to the movement in science which first brought into question the fact of special creation. In biology this doubt began with Darwin and his contemporaries and gave birth to the conception of organic evolution, which in science is regarded as firmly established but which still furnishes much material for the perpetuators of junk. After organic evolution the next step is social evolution, and this in turn demands an evolutionary explanation of human conduct. From this demand our modern behavioristic psychology, which is much more widespread among scientists than Mr. Chase suspects, has developed. But again, it is unpopular because it takes from psychology the cheap thrill of mystery and substitutes for it the less spectacular scientific analysis indicated in the writings of Dr. Watson and in greater detail by such books as "The Fundamental Laws of Human Behavior," by Max Meyer.

Leonard Bloomfield
Columbus, Ohio, July 2 Albert P. Weiss

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Mr. Stuart Chase, in his recent article, seems to think that unless a principle is universally accepted it cannot be soundly established; and he draws the inference that all ethics, philosophy, etc., must be classed as "junk." This is to confound knowledge by intelligent experts with universal acceptance.

He says almost everybody is agreed as to the best way to build a cantilever bridge, but people differ illimitably as to the best way for human beings to live and behave. All facts in physics, however, are not so universally accepted as the right way to build a cantilever bridge. The experts now know that the best way to run a railroad is by electricity, not by steam, yet our railroads are not electrified and are not likely to be for a good while. This is a case where human wishes and business profits prevent the acceptance of a demonstrated truth.

So with ethics. All intelligent experts, and millions who are not experts, know that justice and kindness are better than injustice and cruelty; that when the Golden Rule is practiced it solves most difficulties, and when it is defied all sorts of troubles arise. Yet people go on defying it, because their wishes and their business profits draw them another way.

The great underlying principles of ethics are as well established as the main laws of physics, although their detailed application in many particulars has still to be worked out, and we are still making discoveries in both fields.

If Mr. Chase is in doubt what to teach his children he might begin with the Golden Rule, and point to what is going on in the world today as a striking proof of the bad results that come from disregarding it. Alice Stone Blackwell

Chilmark, Massachusetts, July 4

A German Dreyfus

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your readers will recall that Kurt Eisner's secretary, Fechenbach, was condemned last year to ten years in prison because he had in 1919 given a copy of an official telegram to a foreign journalist. The Munich professor of law, Dr. Kitzinger, after studying the evidence in the case, has concluded that there is no basis for the charge of treason preferred against Fechenbach. The Reichstag did, indeed, finally appoint a committee to investigate the case, but after a few hearings it has adjourned without action.

The event has a double significance. In the first place, the text of the telegram sent by the Bavarian Minister to the Vatican on July 26, 1914, has been published. This casts a curious light on the attitude of the Catholic church at the opening of the war. The minister reported after a conference with the Papal Secretary of State: "The Pope approves sharp action by Austria against Serbia. The Papal Secretary hopes that this time Austria will stand firm. He asks if Austria could ever make war if she were not determined to oppose by arms a violent foreign movement which had brought about the murder of the Archduke and threatened Austria's continued existence. His remarks revealed the fear of the Roman Curia, a fear of Pan-Slavism." A semi-official paper has explained that this telegram was based upon a misunderstanding by the Bavarian minister—which is difficult to accept.

More important is the question of Fechenbach himself. France reestablished her moral position in the world when she rehabilitated the innocent Dreyfus; Harding honored himself when he finally freed Debs; Germany would improve her moral position if she undid the wrong done to this German Dreyfus.

ALEXANDER HOHENLOHE

Badenweiler, Germany, June 1

The Price of Gasoline

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As an experienced operator in the California oil fields for many years I must take issue with E. C. S. on Why Gasoline Is High. Gasoline is high because the Standard Oil Company fixes the price of crude and refined oils, and for no other reason. This corporation absolutely controls the oil industry from every point of the compass and there are no "if's" or "and's" about it. The Standard has a monopoly of from 65 per cent to 70 per cent of the refined oil business of the country—it never allows this monopoly to drop below 65 per cent or to go over 70 per cent. It never cuts prices on the refined product except in cases where some independent is brash enough to cut prices to get one of its customers—then look out. In price-fixing of the crude product it enjoys an absolute monopoly. When the Standard cuts the price of crude no consumer would be foolish enough to pay a higher price to one of its competitors; therefore the price goes up or down all along the line simultaneously. Furthermore, the price of crude has little to do with regulating the price of the refined product. That is done with a "lead pencil," as the late P. D. Armour once said pork-packing was done. Has our friend E. C. S. any recollection that a cut in the price of crude was followed by a proportionate cut in the price of gasoline? We think not. Nor has anyone else.

"Our land system," "royalties," "superfluous drilling of oil wells," and the like have nothing whatever to do with the high price of gasoline. Gasoline is high because the Standard Oil Company enjoys a price-fixing monopoly, and for no other reason. If it were not so, it could not pass out annually 200 per cent stock dividends to the holders of its common stock. E. C. S. doubtless knows this.

New York, July 7 F. H. ALLEN

Christ and the Church Today

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When the fatal morning in August, 1914, dawned, the entire world found itself spiritually bankrupt. The power of the institutional church in the crisis was almost a negative quantity, because religious interests and values had not been developed correspondingly with material and economic ones. Notwithstanding this fact, never in the history of the world was there so gigantic an exhibition of individual spiritual power seen, and it was this individual power aggregated that won the war. But it would not be just to separate this power from the institutional church. We hear many say that the church has no place in modern civilization, but the great moral value of that civilization is the true child of the church's production. A man finds himself free, independent, and self-reliant, but for all that, does he discount the fact that he is what he is by right of the nurture and care of his mother? A man does not minimize the influence of his mother, simply because he has reached a point where her protection of his earlier days is no longer necessary. Every spiritual effort that was made by the individual in the Great War, every noble motive, every high ideal, every act of heroism and self-sacrifice, owed its effectiveness to the moral fertility of the teachings of Christ.

There never was a time when men should be more loyal to the church than now. The contemporary opinion that the church can suddenly adapt herself to the present crisis is irrational. No institution, short of a great period of time, could accommodate itself to a situation so colossal as the present one. Hateful as the term compromise is to some people, it seems to me that the path of constructive action takes a middle course: First, the church ought to be willing to surrender the rigidity of her position. She ought seriously to meditate upon the sacrifices she has to make to meet the modern demands of a modern civilization whose spiritual teacher she ought to be. To teach means to awake an interest in knowledge by stimulating a desire for it in somebody else; but the prerequisite of stimulating anybody is sympathetically to understand the needs and conditions of that person. Secondly, the laity ought to put aside all bitterness and petty animosities toward the church, and cooperate in arousing an appeal which would invite the preservation of a forceful and dynamic idealism. In the twentieth century I fail to see how the spirit of Christ can be kept alive in the church in any other way.

Jersey City, May 19 WORCESTER PERKINS

Why Ford? Well, Why Not?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have read with interest why Mr. Villard thinks Mr. Ford poor presidential timber and also the opposing contentions of certain readers published in The Nation. But the point ignored is, What essential difference does it make who is president anyway? We have had with equal success, or lack thereof, both dolts and messiahs in the office. These governments, organized for the dual purpose of transferring the wealth of certain of the governed to certain others of the governed, and of restricting the liberties of the governed, become in time wealthy and powerful self-perpetuating machines, and the personality, character, and equipment of the man who nominally rules matter not at all. The machine continues to function in its relentless way from pure momentum.

Until some sincere effort is made either to view government economically instead of politically, or to make government serve rather than rule and restrict the governed, I cannot for the life of me see that it makes an iota of difference what figurehead we adopt or how impotent mentally said figurehead be, or why you bandy so many words over a matter so patently inconsequential.

Beltsville, Maryland, June 27 T. SWANN HARDING

Contributors to This Issue

NORMAN THOMAS spent a large part of the past scholastic year in organizing and speaking among American colleges and universities in behalf of the League for Industrial Democracy.

WILLIAM A. ROBSON was the English representative in the European student mission that recently made a tour of American universities at the invitation of the National Student Forum.

ZONA GALE achieved her first marked success with "Friendship Village." For "Miss Lulu Bett," produced in 1920, she was awarded the Pulitzer prize for the best play of that season. Her latest volume is "Faint Perfume."

MIRIAM ALLEN DE FORD is a correspondent of the Federated Press.

Books

French Masters

The Collected Novels and Stories of Guy de Maupassant. Translated and edited by Ernest Boyd. Alfred A. Knopf. $2 a volume. Volume I. Boule de Suif and Other Stories.—Volume II. Mademoiselle Fifi and Other Stories.—Volume III. That Pig Morin and Other Stories.—Volume IV. A Woman's Life.

Nana. By Emile Zola. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

THIS new edition in English of the works of Guy de Maupassant is distinguished by sound editorial judgment, excellent translation, and good book-making. Four volumes have appeared: if the twelve that are to follow measure up to the high standard fixed by their predecessors, the whole set will be a model of what a definitive translation of an author's work should be. Few French writers have suffered in English the mutilation that Maupassant has suffered. Ernest Boyd's edition should make full atonement.

Reviewing these volumes is somewhat different from reviewing merely four books of fiction: when one approaches them one approaches a reputation and an influence. And reputations are rather hard, solid objects that are slippery in the critical grasp; one seeks to remodel them a little, and they roll from one's hands much as one picked them up. It requires a Sainte-Beuve to deal with reputations. And influences are equally difficult to deal with, because they are vague, dispersed affairs, elusive of seizure. But Maupassant, today, must be considered as a reputation and as an influence.

As to the reputation, it is an impressive one: the greatest short-story writer who ever lived, according to the author's most unrestrained admirers. The precise meaning of such a claim is difficult to formulate. Does it mean that Maupassant wrote more excellent short stories than any other man has produced? That he wrote a few that are superior to any that can be set beside them? That he cast the finest short-story form that has yet been discovered? Or does it, perhaps, imply all of these?

Whatever the critics who make this claim may mean by it, I think that the claim itself means that Maupassant has been accorded the ill-regulated adulation that has been the reward of a number of literary pioneers. Like Cervantes, and Boccaccio, and others, he has been lifted out of his time and place and praised with no regard to time and place, instead of being evaluated in close relation to them. Literary landmarks are important, and convenient for literary historians; but literature is a living, growing thing, and we should be careful not to mistake landmarks for unsurpassable monuments. They should be seen in perspective.

One has no desire to rob Maupassant of the great credit that is due him: he cleared a good deal of ground, and he built well in his clearings. But where he cleared others have built better since. Some of Katherine Mansfield's stories are comparable to some of his in kind, and better than his. In James Joyce's "Dubliners" we can find the sort of story that Maupassant sometimes attempted, more successfully handled by the Irishman than by the Frenchman. And we come upon many magazine tales that recall Maupassant and do not shame their master by any lack of competence.

But the question of reputation seems to merge immediately with that of influence, and the amazing fact to be recorded about this influence is its effectiveness along divergent lines. Maupassant's plots stare at us from our most widely circulated magazines; we find his method persisting in the work of our most modern and most intellectual short-story writers. He has helped to teach mechanics to the authors of reading matter, and he has been a model of auctorial impersonality to the authors of literature. With Flaubert, Maupassant may be considered a father of the impersonal school of fiction; in his stories the author never intrudes either for the purposes of sentiment or of irony: he is out of the picture; the irony in such stories as "That Pig Morin" is of plot, not comment.

Another lesson that Maupassant has taught to many is that of thrift. Narrative flowed from him as water from a fountain, but he did not waste a drop. The slightest incident, the least idea furnished him with material for a story. Anatole France said of him that he wrote like "un bon propriétaire normand, avec économie et joie." In consequence much of his work is very slight, reminding us of sketches for a large painting; but almost every sketch has an organic life of its own. Maupassant in his choice of material, for his earlier tales at least, was as much of a realist as Chekhov; but his simple ideas and trivial incidents were almost always plotted in the handling. He was a realist, but he was selective. A serving wench, or a train ride furnished him with a whole story, but he was interested in the wench or the journey only if it suggested to him something approaching a plot, however slight a one. He insisted on shaping his commonplace material, not content merely to convey it from life into print.

But perhaps Maupassant's greatest achievement is his directness. He marched past a given point at a pace unequaled by writers who preceded him, and scarcely exceeded by those who have come after him. Many of his opening paragraphs are masterpieces: read the first paragraph of "Madame Tellier's Establishment," and then marvel at the amount of information essential to an understanding of the story that is packed therein. Almost instinctively, it seems, Maupassant seized upon the essentials of a narrative; both he and Katherine Mansfield knew how to make the most of a few words, but there is an interesting difference in the methods by which these two writers accomplished equally effective results: the man expressed all at a single stroke, while the woman suggested all.

It was a happy idea to make the translation of Guy de Maupassant's stories in chronological order, for according to this sequence the earliest volumes give us the best of the author. His was a talent that was full blown when it first sought expression: toward the last it withered. Story-telling was as natural to him as breathing; he did not pant until he began to study respiration as an art of pleasing others. In his later stories artifice triumphs over art: he did not see so clearly in the atmosphere of Parisian bedrooms as he did in provincial air. The time has passed when we can say with Remy de Gourmont, "On peut encore lire tout Maupassant"; but we can still read, with pleasure, almost everything in these first four volumes of translation.

In Zola we encounter another reputation, and one that has suffered strange vicissitudes; but I shall confine myself to the single volume under review. "Nana" is, I firmly believe, a very bad novel. The real tragedy of the book, though not the one the author intended, is the transformation of a woman into a symbol. At the outset Nana is a perfectly credible trull, unscrupulous, voluptuous, shameless, and vigorous; but her life, for the reader, has scarcely commenced before she starts to change slowly from a full-blooded animal into a symbol of evil. She becomes the scarlet woman, riding Paris on the whirlwind; the personification of fleshly lust, the eternal object of masculine desire; an incinerator in which man after man is consumed, so that the ashes may be dramatically displayed by Nana's creator. None can resist her, none can survive her. And while the author is achieving this magnificent result, he incidentally provides the model for modern French and, derivatively, Broadway farce. Nana's house resembles the stage of the Bordel Theater: there are men in every room of it, each supposedly unaware of the others' existence until unfortunate meetings occur; they tumble out of closets, they collide on the stairs, they hide under Nana's bed, behind the curtains, and the invaluable maid, Zoé, runs the show like a ringmaster with fraying nerves. "Nana" could never have been written by a man who possessed a shred of humor: it is grotesque.

BEN RAY REDMAN

The Idea of Space

La Notion d'Espace. By D. Nys. Oxford University Press, American Branch. $6.

THIS study is an expansion of some of the chapters which M. Nys wrote for Cardinal Mercier's "Manual of Modern Scholastic Philosophy." It is divided into two parts, one on the nature of space, one on its properties. The first attempts to refute what the author calls ultra-realistic and ultra-subjectivistic theories, and ends by suggesting a moderately realistic theory, "the theory of Aristotle rejuvenated." The second part is occupied with developing the characteristics of this moderately realistic space.

M. Nys founds his doctrine on what he says is the one fact given in experience which makes our concept of space concrete, namely, distance. Distance is always a relation between two physical objects, which may in certain cases be the walls of a single solid. In fact, this philosopher like Aristotle thinks of solids as swimming in a medium more or less dense. The relations between the medium and the solid constitute the external space of the object. Thus the place of any object is the material substance which immediately surrounds it, even though that substance be in movement, like a flowing river. Here M. Nys departs from Aristotle to follow St. Thomas, for Aristotle held that the place of an object was determined by the nearest stationary medium. This was to prevent the implication that a ship at anchor in a river changes its place as the stream flows by.

M. Nys can follow St. Thomas here because of an entity which he assumes as a supplement to external space. This entity is internal space, which he defines as "the portion of space which each body fills and which corresponds exactly to its real volume." Internal space is not, like its supplement, determined by relations. It is a kind of attribute, like color or shape. It is assumed to explain how a body in movement may change its position without changing anything else. What does it change when this happens? Simply the attribute of internal space. The source of this concept, which is fairly bewildering, seems to be Aristotle's use of the word "motion," to indicate one of the four kinds of change which appear in his writings.

One of the interesting consequences of this theory is the possibility of absolute motion. So long as motion is relative, a single object existing in a universe by itself could never move. For there would be no other object by which to determine its motion. M. Nys admits that the determination of motion is a relative matter, but insists that motion may be studied apart from the methods of determining it. If motion consists in the successive acquisition of new internal places, as an object might acquire successive shades of a color when a window curtain is lowered, then of course a single body may undergo this change as well in isolation as in company.

The rest of M. Nys's rich and important theory belongs to discussions of a more purely technical nature than can be given here. We shall state simply his conclusions that readers may feel themselves more or less oriented in reflecting upon them.

In the first place, space is not unified, in the sense that there is a large system called "space" in which all physical objects have positions. Such unity seems reasonable only because of the appearance of the domed heavens, which look as if they were a container of all things. It is incorrect then to speak of "space"; one should speak rather of "spaces." In the second place, space is not relative, for each object has its own space irrespective of other objects. In relativistic theories, each object is located by reference to another. This has led to the dramatic conclusions of the followers of Einstein and similar thinkers. Third, space is never absolutely at rest; spaces upon earth are at rest with relation to one another for all practical purposes, which allows a man to go on a journey and come back to find his home where he left it. But M. Nys emphasizes the fact that this immobility of certain terrestrial spaces is purely apparent and not real. Fourth, there is no metaphysical reason why God should not have created a world infinitely extended; scientifically the infinity of space can never be proved, since—it is M. Nys speaking—it can never be observed. Here M. Nys, though leaning away from Aristotle and St. Thomas, does not lean far enough away to fall over. As for whether space is full or has gaps, he believes that the probabilities are with Aristotle, that space is full. The sixth conclusion is that material objects alone can be located in space; the seventh that space is homogeneous, because, eighth, it is three dimensional.

This meager, rough, and possibly misleading synopsis of a long and exquisitely detailed exposition must suffice for a general idea of M. Nys's aim. It indicates how far he clings to the traditional philosophy of the Thomists and how far he departs from it. The impression must not be allowed to survive that he is dogmatic in his exposition and argument; on the contrary it is needless to say how cautious and deliberate he is in propounding his evidence. The book would be of remarkable value merely as a compendium of theories of space. Happily it has other merits, those of a clear and definite expression of the neo-scholastic point of view.

GEORGE BOAS

Girls and Their Wishes

The Unadjusted Girl. By W. I. Thomas. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

"CIVILIZED societies," says Mr. Thomas, "have endowed the young girl with a character of social sacredness. She has been the subject of a far-going idealization. . . . The attitude has its useful side, though it has been overdone." This is a sample of the subdued sort of opinion which Mr. Thomas has sparingly permitted himself to express. His volume is principally made up of uninterpreted sketches of young girls' revolts against, or submergings under, their surroundings. The reader, after being provided with some clues to conduct, has to do his own generalizing; a job, on the whole, not too difficult.

The book begins with an account of the four sorts of wishes that govern the human heart: the wish for change and adventure, the wish for security, the wish to be favorably thought of, and the hunger to spend and receive affection. To this the author has added an appreciation of community control, including gossip as a constructive element, and a chapter on individual rebellion against such control, with an account of how (and partly why) it is increasing. He thinks this must be an era of individualization, set in between two eras of socialization—an era in which "the modern world presents itself as a spectacle in which the observer is never sufficiently participating." This last phrase seems to me the fragment of closest thinking in the book.

After these generalizing chapters the girls themselves enter, delegates, as it were, from the insurgent and the drifting armies beyond. No two are the least alike. No collection of human documents ever showed more richly and sadly the wealth of uniqueness in human nature. Not one of these histories takes the center of the stage in the reader's recollection. They just come and go on the pages, each absorbing the interest until another blots her out: Esther, who stole stockings and a hat, whose lawyer and doctor preyed on her fears of prison and syphilis, who made fun of the social workers in her letters to her fellow-culprit and beloved friend Lilian, and tried to cheat and conspire her troubled way to freedom; Margaret, who frequented Hell Hole because she found the drunkards and prostitutes there so human and lovable; Helen, who looked so childish with her bobbed hair, whom any casual man at any moment could so easily possess, who ran away from so many official rescuers, in whom Dr. Brown managed somehow to release the power and will to do rarely beautiful embroidery; Geraldine, seduced by the under-director of a moving picture company, "handed from man to man," yet whose "health, self-confidence, and charm" (and charm!) were restored at El Retiro, that wonderful school outside of Los Angeles, president of whose alumnae she became, with a cohesive influence over the others which no social worker had ever approached. But what sore and inflamed young spirit would not have revived in a school where the persons in charge looked upon it as part of their job to restore her charm?

Bolder in his ignorance than Mr. Thomas in his studious wisdom, the reader soon singles out one preeminent fact about these girls. They were practically all poor. They practically all felt poor, inferior, and left out. Their lungs were full of the stale air of poverty, and their ears were deafened with the weltering noises of poverty, and their eyes were tired of the dismal uncomeliness of poverty, and their self-esteem was dressed in the contemned clothes of poverty, and their ambitions were taunted by the narrowness of the yards upon which the doors of poverty open.

Mr. Thomas seems to bestow upon poverty only a brief, mysterious stare. He mentions often the sense of inferiority, without seeming to feel that it is usually in these cases an aspect of poverty.

Prostitution appears here, however, quite frankly as the offspring of poverty. Girls go into it apparently in a matter-of-fact, almost listless mood, as into something "embarrassing and unpleasant," but better paid than other work; and like other work, it is often abandoned. It must be far more intermittent than the uninformed reader has supposed. Mr. Thomas quotes from a "profound work" on French prostitution by M. Parent-Duchatelet, "Prostitution is for the majority only a transitory stage; it is abandoned usually during the first year." A few girls, very few, it seems, are moved by sexual impulse; and some unmarried mothers are discouraged into prostitution by the contempt of society. But most wild girls, Mr. Thomas points out, become wild long before the sense of sex awakens. Many young girls brought up in extreme poverty seem to take no interest of any sort in their bodies, except as commercial assets, and as vehicles for clothes. "Life," said a young foreign girl, "is mostly what you wear." Here we seem to reach the antithesis of such an exaggerated idealization of girlhood as I began by mentioning; an antithesis inevitable, I suppose, in a society of economic extremes. SARAH N. CLEGHORN

Suggestion and Digestion

The Hope of the Variant. By John George Gehring. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

A CERTAIN old lady in our neighborhood was wont to sniff disrespectfully when the matter of doctors was broached. "Humph," she would say, "they look at your tongue and say 'How's your insides? Two dollars, please!'" And, indeed, this is all the therapy needed in some cases. We have seen comfortable, jovial, Cheeryblian family doctors whose very laugh was a tonic and whose approaching footfall tended to moderate a tachycardia and reduce a pyrexia. Little as is yet known of psychotherapy, we do know that the sort of personality that inspires confidence and radiates optimism has a favorable effect on the morbid processes of the patient, irrespective of any drugs. This is the sort of thing that the Freudians mean when they speak of the transfer.

Such a physician, we fancy, is Dr. Gehring. The history of medicine is replete with instances of individual healers whose personality is such that their success with the neurotic and suggestible patient gradually gains for them a widening circle of disciples and admirers so that their fame becomes national and sometimes, as in the case of Coué, international. It is a becoming modesty which leads them to believe that there is doubtless something magical in their methods, which they then proceed to publish for the benefit of others. But, alas! transplanted from its native soil, the method is as many others; and we find that it was the man that cured.

So the physician who reads Gehring's book, believing that he will learn the secret of healing, will be disappointed. It is evident that Gehring himself does not know how he attains his results. Overlooking the fact that psychic disturbances, even the most ephemeral, invariably produce gastro-intestinal symptoms, he believes that the soul is in the solar plexus. Thus he says:

"The patient should be taught to keep in mind that the focal point of his psychic and emotional distress is invariably in his abdomen since it is there that the storm center resides, owing to the liability of disturbance to numerous ganglia."

Aside from this he uses a sort of superficial suggestion. His psychology is the old faculty psychology. To psychoanalysis he bows respectfully—and passes by on the other side. Sexuality is to him a somewhat distressing by-product of defective digestion. On page 124 he says: "The entire field of psychic research appears infinitely too vast to permit of conclusive deductions of a single factor type." Then he proceeds calmly to refer all of his patients' troubles to the digestive factor.

His book is, in short, the unsuccessful effort of a medical artist to explain his effects. He is much better than his book. All one can gather is, aside from the personal influence of benign personalities such as Dr. Gehring's, the hope of the variant is digestion plus suggestion. JOHN E. LIND

Sinbad

Sinbad. By C. Kay Scott. Thomas Seltzer. $2.

CONFESSION is human. Fiction writing is a craft. In face of this fusion of them by Mr. Scott one is forced into the Hedda Gabler role of wishing he had done it beautifully. The man who "possesses a psychic harem" and the people who "flippantly discuss art" make one's hair curl, especially those who toss off the names of Matisse, Cézanne, Greco & Co., Inc., as if the names belonged to the Republican Party or the Anti-Saloon League. Do people really talk this way, or is it only in American novels, when they fly the banners of modernism à la Craven, or lucubrate à la Scott? I suspect Mr. Scott of having wanted to throw the originals of some of his people out of the window. Instead, he tried to write them down for all time. Only, he has not made their sterility sufficiently convincing, as Knut Hamsun did with a similar group in "Shallow Soil" and as Artzibasheff did with bored provincials of Russia.

Mr. Scott's resentment interferes with both his autobiography and his fiction. He has fixed his attention upon his stuffy little Greenwich Village clique, has suffered in it, but failed to relate it to the relentless machine New York of which these unhappy people are a human phase. Mr. Scott seems desperately, even finely and sensitively trying to explain to himself the frustrations of unhappy man-and-woman imbroglios, but despite quotations at chapter heads from Spinoza, Dickens, Nietzsche, Hofmannsthal, Blake, Shelley, Borrow, Aristotle, Swift, Mother Goose, Sudermann, and others he does not convince that much is being added to interpretation of life in New York through the endless introversions and tortures of his protagonists. They do not transcend their pains. Neither, it seems, does Mr. Scott. That is not to deprive him of credit for an interesting venture. He has attempted Greenwich Village as he saw it, and has loosened the manner of writing he employed in "Blind Mice" to suit his new subject. "Sinbad" gives evidence that its author allowed himself to be persuaded by the resources of such prose as is derived from Gertrude Stein and other contemporaries. His insight into moments of struggling souls has loveliness. It is for such qualities rather than for complete realization of his intention that I am moved to look with interest for his new work. HERBERT J. SELIGMANN

The Middle Ages

The Middle Ages. By Frantz Funck-Brentano. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

THIS is the volume on medieval France in the notable series known as The National History of France. The author, M. Funck-Brentano, who is also the editor of the series, is one of the most distinguished of living French critics and historians. From him we may expect an authoritative treatment of that picturesque and romance-laden age in which the culture of France was much the most attractive and significant.

As one might expect from the characteristic traits of French historians in general, and from the interests and earlier achievements of M. Funck-Brentano in particular, a large portion of the book, nearly one-half in total aggregate, is devoted to cultural, social, and economic history. The early epics, the culture of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, the universities, the cathedrals, the minstrels, the work of architects, copyists, and painters, the manors, towns, and guilds are treated with remarkable charm, insight, and discrimination, and on the basis of the most evident acquaintance with the sources and mastery of the latest researches. Of these chapters, that on the medieval ecclesiastical architecture is, perhaps, the most adequate and illuminating.

The political history begins with the story of the evolution of the feudal monarchy out of the anarchy which followed the disintegration of the Roman power in Gaul. Unfortunately the author does not exploit the works of Fustel, Jullian, and Flach to indicate the continuity of Gallo-Romanic institutions in medieval France. The chapter on the evolution of feudal institutions and the feudal monarchy is notable for the emphasis placed on the family background of feudalism. In no other place has the reviewer noted so clear an exposition of this important point of view. In treating the details of political history, M. Funck-Brentano wisely organizes the majority of his material around the reigns and work of the great monarchs—the consolidation under Louis the Fat; Philip Augustus, Saint Louis, and the perfection of the feudal monarchy; Philip the Fair and the struggle against the Papacy; and the administrative reforms of Charles VII and Louis XI. In dealing with the Hundred Years' War the author has once more to consider the case of Jeanne d'Arc. She is justly portrayed as a patriotically inclined paranoiac who, after having rendered the indispensable service of uniting French sentiment behind Charles VII, became a nuisance by refusing to cease her military exploits, and who paid with her life for her irresponsibility and lack of self-control. While there are many entertaining anecdotes introduced in the narrative, the main purpose and net result of these chapters is to make clear the genesis and mutations of French political institutions during the medieval period.

The book is clearly and vividly written. It does not possess the severe analytical tone of some of the German and English works, nor is it distinguished for a continuous and smoothly flowing narrative. Rather it is written in the characteristic and delightful style of the French historians, well planned and organized chapters, profusely illuminated with countless illustrative episodes and anecdotes, usually drawn from contemporary chroniclers. What is lost in continuity of thought and logical marshaling of facts is gained in pictorial intensity and compelling interest.

While the author is appreciative of the beauty and romance of medieval French culture and portrays most effectively its major outlines, he does not hesitate to reveal beneath its chivalric, mystic, and romantic externals a basic sub-structure of shocking brutality, revolting cruelty, and repelling coarseness. While he is justly proud of la Belle France of the Middle Ages, there is in his narrative little of the nationalistic obsession of Raynouard. A national history of France from the pen of contemporary scholars like Funck-Brentano and Louis Madelin means something quite different from what it did a generation or two ago when produced by Jules Michelet and Henri Martin. For the first time we have available in English an up-to-date, reliable, and readable history of medieval France. Those who have been compelled hitherto to rely upon such books as Kitchin's History of France will best appreciate what this means.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

Culture and Civilization

Kultur un' Civilizacia. By William Nathanson. Chicago: New Society.

THIS book is more significant for its implications than for its achievements. One of the earliest original works in Yiddish in the realm of aesthetics and metaphysics, it is to be welcomed as an expansion of the literature beyond belles lettres: "Culture and Civilization" is the first of a proposed "neo-socialism" series. It is, in the main, a revised version of a number of articles which the author published in the Yiddish press, unified by a definite thesis and supplemented by popularizations of Spinoza, Kant, and of contemporary philosophers. Mr. Nathanson's title might well have been "Culture versus Civilization," for he bases his critique of society and present-day institutions on the distinction between culture, the spiritual expression of mankind, and civilization, its physical and intellectual development. On this ground he points out the inadequacy of Marxian socialism as well as of the capitalistic organism. To those who are aware of the principles of the Russian Social-Revolutionary party the author's position will be familiar. Mr. Nathanson was a colleague of Dr. Jitlowsky, the intellectual leader of that party, and carries on his theories, tempered, to be sure, by the philosophy of Bergson, whose influence is evident throughout the volume.

J. J. SMERTENKO

A Pleasant Essayist

Occasions. By Holbrook Jackson. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

HOLBROOK JACKSON set himself a harder task in the production of a collection of miscellaneous essays than in the writing of his well-known book on "The Eighteen Nineties." In the latter case he was dealing with a singularly colorful period in English literature and art and with names that blazed like oriflammes—Beardsley, Wilde, Dowson, Symons, Crackanthorpe. The subject matter in itself was almost sufficient to insure the success of the book.

But to produce a distinctive book of essays on stock subjects—that is another matter. Most essays suggest antimacassars and polite conversation by ultra-respectable people sitting stiffly erect on horse-hair sofas and munching muffins. Or they throw up a picture of an old gentleman with his feet in carpet slippers, and a glass of hot toddy at his elbow, thinking aloud. A rich and virile talent is hardly likely to turn to essays on such standard topics as reading, gardens, fishing, or the town versus the country.

Mr. Jackson has divided his essays into four groups headed Landmarks, Prejudices, Adventures, and Books. In the first group we find our old friend Town; in the third such good old standbys as Woodfires and Talking About the Weather; the third division consists of the stock subjects Bookmen, The Uses of Books, Of Cheerful Books, and On Reading Aloud. It is difficult to say anything new on such matters. However, Mr. Jackson writes gracefully and lightly, shows a nice feeling for words, and frequently, as in his sketch of Marseilles, evokes atmosphere with considerable subtlety.

The publishers carefully printed the book on beautiful paper, chose the clearest of types, used a binding in excellent taste—and then clapped on a jacket containing a blurb which refers to the author's previous success, "The Eighteen Hundreds"!

REX HUNTER

Books in Brief

The Bonadventure. By Edmund Blunden. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

Edmund Blunden went down to the sea in a coal tramp. He details the phenomena of a strange milieu with a gusto that is partly childlike joy and partly conscious quaintness. Throughout, the effect produced upon honest sailors by the young literary person in their midst bulks larger than his own reactions to them, to the ship, and to the ocean. They discuss art, literature, religion, the universe with him. They bring him poems of their own. He is asked to pass judgment upon drawings. Thus we are not allowed to forget that this journey from Cardiff to South America and return was undertaken by the poet and reviewer to recover his health which had been lost in the trenches. It is herein that the charm of the book lies, and it would be churlish not to yield to it. The reward is ample: a full share of Mr. Blunden's boyish delight in his adventure and a glimpse into the minds and the habits and the haunts of sailors on sea and ashore.

Free Thought and Official Propaganda. By Bertrand Russell. B. W. Huebsch, Inc. 75 cents.

This is a brilliant lecture by one of the few outstanding men in the world who have something of the mental outlook of the inhabitants of H. G. Wells's latest Utopia. With rapid vigor Mr. Russell traces, from his own life, the practical penalties England inflicts upon the religious freethinker. He suggests a "wish to find out" instead of William James's harmful "will to believe." He pays his respects to the late New York statute which would have debarred Washington or Christ from teaching in this advanced commonwealth. Education is briefly exposed as one of the chief obstacles to intelligence and the freedom of thought; propaganda—statements designed to make people believe such absurd propositions "as that Blank's Pills cure all ills, that Spitzbergen is warm, and that Germans eat corpses"—earns a merited castigation; and economic pressure is isolated as the chief preventive of freethought. It is the scientific temper that the author desires. From its use he foresees a serene skepticism which will render humanity immune from those "appeals to idealism by which decent people are induced to further the schemes of scoundrels." The study is brilliant, temperate, and sound.

Mystics and Heretics in Italy. By Emile Gebhart. Translated by Edward Maslin Hulme. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

The author of "Mystic Italy," a title twisted into "Mystics and Heretics in Italy," looks like a president of a Rotary Club, and writes like an inspired bookworm. He pictures Italy thrilled by the false dawns of that harsh day that came in with the Reformation. The quiet saint, Joachim of Flora, with his devastating "Third Testament," revealed after his death; the gentle son of Assisi, who preached to the grasshopper and the little birds; Gerard de Borgo-San-Donnino, whose "Eternal Gospel," blent of Joachim's words, was an earthquake throughout Christendom; Pietro the peasant, who hung up his cloak on a sunbeam in the presence of Gregory X; the rhapsodic poet Fra Jacopone of Todi, who walked, half naked, on all fours, saddled and bridled like an ass, and flung all his venom against the established church; Dante, shrewd dispraiser of institutionalized religion—these are the chief figures that wind through his thronged pages. There were as many wild voices then as today; but there was a silence beside them, where we have voices not so wild. The book is an authoritative and valuable summary of an hysteric age.

Behaviorism and Psychology. By A. A. Roback. University Bookstore, Harvard.

This is an impetuous scattering assault upon all forms of behaviorism—that modern interpretation of psychology which, in its purest form, holds that science is concerned not at all with mind, but that things called mental are properly reducible to a study of movements of limb and muscle and gland. It lacks clearness, taken alone; its points are only understood by the person familiar with the divergent nomenclatures and attitudes of the motley crew of behaviorists. Point after point is touched upon and dismissed in brief unpersuasiveness. The book lacks interest, except to those already upon the wordy battlefield to which it belongs. The chart at the end of the volume is more illuminating than many pages of text.

Galimathias. By Matthew Josephson. Broom.

These weird verses will be hailed as one of the masterpieces of today, as were "The Waste Land" and "Ulysses"; they are as grotesquely scrambled as either of them. There is a fascination about a poem concerning "The Goatherd with the Goiter"; and who can remain unmoved by lines as stimulating as:

> You are a sweet girl
> And I shall throw you into the river.
>
> my mother said to me my what flat feet you have Alfred > my brother said to me my what flat feet you have Alfred
>
> o the sad bad glad mad never seven o
> o the ever why when where whither bother o
>
> O wheels that do not turn. O wheels in the brain cease to turn.
>
> This gesture of my hands was to crush yesterday the bald head of the man which is the prow of a ship with warts upon it.

It is original, ultra modern, and full of a cerise Weltgeist. It is magnificent—from the standpoint of the new non-intelligence; to sane people it is unimpressive raving.

Our American Humorists. By Thomas L. Masson. Moffat, Yard and Company. $2.50.

Commercialized American humor is as deadening a thing as Billy Sunday or appeals to the flag. One of its gentle ringmasters crudely pastes together his minor recollections of our well-paid funny men in this unimportant study.

Music

The Elder Singers

THE four most stunning song recitals (I use that tarnished term of musical commerce in its wide, inclusive sense, and I put aside those specimens offered by Feodor Chaliapin as sui generis and hors concours) that I heard amongst the innumerable entertainments so styled in the course of the music season of 1921-22 (for the four-part illustration circumstances compel me to hark back a year) were given, in the order of the giving, by Emma Calvé, Edmond Clément, Emilio de Gogorza, and Ernestine Schumann-Heink. Now, none of these singers was a recent "discovery" of manager or public. Mme Calvé had begun her career as a professional singer (according to the book) in 1882; the year of Mr. Clément's debut was 1889(?), of Mr. de Gogorza's 1897; Mme Schumann-Heink's emergence (as the contralto member of the solo quartet in the Ninth Symphony) dates back to 1876! I will not go into the delicate subject of the veritable ages in years, months, and days of these four singers, though the books give them specific birthdays and gossip gives them others. The truth may rest untroubled between them and their maker. But the length of a singer's career, like the reign of king or pope, is common property. Suffice it that at the time I am speaking of, Mme Calvé had thirty-nine years of public singing behind her, Mr. Clément thirty-two, Mr. de Gogorza twenty-five, and Mme Schumann-Heink forty-six!

These four veteran singers (for even Mr. de Gogorza, though a mere babe in comparison with the others, may be permitted on the strength of five and twenty years of service to qualify as a veteran) belong to the little group of accomplished vocalists that exemplify the high-water mark of vocal art in my years of observing the musical tides. But even the oldest of them is of a later period than the age of the great bel canto, those "palmy days" of Italian opera and Italian singing (the practitioners of which were not, of course, limited to Italians), from whose golden plenty there survived here and there a Patti or a Battistini to prove to the doubting ears of a younger day that the storied feats of that pre-innocent age were not wholly of the consule Planco order. And those elder singers have names and dates (even though the latter, where they concern births, are not altogether to be trusted); you have only to turn to the dictionaries of biography to find them in abundance. Now, it is pertinent and enlightening to compare in length the careers of the great ones of that older epoch with the careers of such singers as the four of my original thesis.

Certainly no singing woman is more securely a "name forever" than Maria Malibran, whose untimely death Musset laments in verse that it is absolutely safe and sane to call immortal. Malibran had won her abiding fame and was dead at twenty-eight. Cornélie Falcon, after whom every singer possessing a "dramatic soprano" voice has been known in France generically as a "falcon," had a stage career of just five years, losing her voice at the age of twenty-five, a loss she was destined to survive, however, for sixty years. Jenny Lind, of whose London debut the incomparable Chorley wrote, "the town, sacred and profane, went mad about the Swedish nightingale," actually sang in opera for only eleven years in all, retiring from the opera stage exactly two years and fourteen days after her sensational triumph in London, though she continued to sing on in concerts.

Giuditta Pasta, most famous of all Italian dramatic sopranos, the great lyric tragedian for whom Bellini wrote his "Norma," and also, curiously, his "Sonnambula," and Donizetti his "Anna Bolena," had an effective career in opera of only seven years. Her successor in the role of Norma and in general public esteem, Giulia Grisi, was regarded as a phenomenon because for twenty consecutive seasons she could return to Covent Garden, London, as a reigning prima donna. Pauline Viardot, the younger sister of Maria Malibran, and perhaps the most cultivated and "intellectual" woman who has ever sung in opera, was thought to have strained at the limits of decency itself in achieving an opera career of a quarter of a century, though when she retired to private life no one maintained that she was in less than full command of her extraordinary abilities as a lyric artist. What would her critics have said of Lilli Lehmann, who in the seventh decade of her age was still acclaimed as an unsurpassable Brünnhilde, Isolde, Norma, Donna Anna, and even Violetta in "La Traviata," and may, for all I know, be contemplating more singing in the Salzburg concerts of this very summer, though the official year of her birth was 1848; or of Adelina Patti of the countless and everlasting "farewells"?

It is true that some of the men of the "golden age"—Rubini, Mario, Tamburini, and Lablache among them—lasted longer in opera than the women, but those careers began when the singers were very young, and invariably ended before they had entered the seventh decade. One looks in vain for a Battistini still in full career at threescore years and ten, even as the women in no case compete in length of service with Lehmann and Patti, or even with Schumann-Heink, Sembrich, Nordica, Melba, and Calvé.

To return to my big four of the four "stunning" song recitals. It is undeniable that the years had made some difference. In the case of the women the vocal scale had lost two or three notes from the top. But lower down in the gamut it seemed to me there was compensation. The Calvé soprano had taken on a big, luscious richness rarely heard save in a contralto voice, and the Schumann-Heink contralto was positively heroic in the massive grandeur of its depth and strength. Wisely, neither woman attempted to sing music that ran above her safe and easy range.

Mr. de Gogorza, being but a youngster in that company, bore unflinchingly his lighter burden of years. By the count he should still be in his vocal prime, as well as in the ripe flowering of his excellent art. Mr. Clément, on the other hand, showed a perceptible damage. The last previous occasion on which I had heard him sing was a little over six years earlier at the Paris Opéra Comique in a performance of "The Barber of Seville" which was memorable for the vocal atrocities of the prima donna and the baritone and for the easy, graceful, polished delivery by Mr. Clément of Almaviva's florid measures. Now, of all voices the tenor is the most susceptible to the inroads of time. In the six years' interval Mr. Clément's voice had lost something of its former fluidity. At moments he had to summon all his extraordinary resources of technic and style to do things which a few years earlier had gone, seemingly, of themselves. But the very fact that his singing had become something of a tour de force made the study of its working more engrossing than ever. The mechanics of an art that had formerly concealed itself could now be glimpsed, and at times, even, clearly made out, and to the many in the audience with whom singing was more or less of a hobby the occasion assumed on that very account an importance quite special. At the same time the charm, the distinction, and the obviously superb accomplishment of the tenor were altogether sufficient to entrance the portion of the audience that went to hear him without any object more special than pleasure, even as those qualities had in the younger years when the voice itself was as liquid as the lark's.

The deduction is obvious from even such figures as I have given here that the veteran singer who is also a master-vocalist has a vogue in our day which he certainly had not in the "golden age" of Italian singing. In explanation of the current careers that last so late in the allotted span of man's existence, and even beyond it, I have heard the theory advanced that the life of a skilfully used voice, regarded as apart from the life of its possessor, has a pretty well-fixed norm; that, singing "correctly," one may reasonably expect to sing from fifteen to fifty, from twenty to fifty-five, from twenty-five to sixty, and so on through another decade. Alas for this attractive theory, the careers of too many singers flatly contradict it. Adelina Patti, still singing when she was upwards of seventy, made her professional debut at the age of sixteen, and in a role no less exacting than Lucia di Lammermoor, under the engaging nom de guerre, by the way, of "the little Florinda." Lilli Lehmann was a month short of seventeen when she made her professional debut. Mme Schumann-Heink, if the date given officially for her birth is to be believed, was not more than fifteen. But there is an explanation which seems to me self-evident, and also entirely adequate to all the circumstances.

In the "golden age" of bel canto the master-vocalist was so numerous a species that a poorly trained singer seems to have been the rare exception, for the good and simple reason, if for no other, that he was an unmarketable product. A technical equipment and a mastery of style that are seldom met with today were in those other days accepted as a matter of course; anything else was in flagrant violation of the rules of the game. Accordingly, when the mere voice of a singer began to lose its high notes, or otherwise to deteriorate in quality or power, his market value fell. Singers equally accomplished and possessed of undamaged voices were on hand in sufficient numbers waiting for the chance to step into his place. Such is far from being the state of affairs in this time of an indisputable decline in anything like a wide currency of bel canto. We cling greedily to the veteran singers simply because their art has become so rare as to be trebly precious, and the few of us who care genuinely for singing are haunted by the fear that once they are silent the bel canto we crave may have vanished forever from the ears of men.

PITTS SANBORN

International Relations Section

The Trouble on the Saar

DISSATISFACTION with the somewhat anomalous regime established by the Treaty of Versailles in the Saar Valley has repeatedly been expressed by the German Government and the German inhabitants of that region. (See the Nation for March 14, 1923.) Friction came to a head last spring, and turned international attention to the Saar. A strike broke out in the coal mines. French troops, responsible not to the Governing Commission of the Saar but to the French Government, were used to maintain order. On March 7 the Governing Commission promulgated the stringent decree printed below, which later aroused world-wide protest. Mr. Branting of Sweden protested this decree before the Council of the League of Nations—to which the Governing Commission is responsible—at its session on April 23, but the League took no action. On May 10 the British House of Commons had a stormy session in which Mr. Asquith denounced the decree as a "monstrous specimen of despotic legislation" and "the greatest blow that has been struck at the moral authority of the League of Nations." The British Government thereupon announced its intention to suggest that the Council of the League appoint a committee to investigate the administration of the Saar. To this France objected. Meanwhile the Governing Commission, announcing that the strike emergency was past, rescinded the objectionable decree, the text of which, received from the League of Nations, is given below (The Old Saar Decree) for the first time in the United States, and substituted a new decree (also given below) which, however, is now declared by Germans and Sarrois to be almost as objectionable as the first.

The question came before the Council of the League on July 2. Lord Robert Cecil demanded a public inquiry, but finally agreed to a secret interrogation of members of the Governing Commission, which occurred on July 6. A committee representing the local bodies of the Saar was refused a hearing. On July 7 the Council adopted a resolution couched, as the Manchester Guardian put it, in "the milk-and-water terms of Interallied diplomacy." The resolution, the text of which follows, did not discuss the famous decree, which had been withdrawn. Lord Robert Cecil and M. Hanotaux made speeches of felicitation.

THE LEAGUE'S RESOLUTION

The Council of the League of Nations has been informed by the British Government of the proposal regarding the examination of the situation in the Saar district, and particularly the recent events which have given rise to the taking of extraordinary measures by the Governing Commission. The Council desired, by means of personal contact with all the members of the commission, to restrengthen the firm ties which ought to exist between the League of Nations and its representatives in the Saar.

The Council examined, in conjunction with the members of the commission, the principles of government in the Saar Basin established by the Treaty of Versailles. According to the treaty the Saar regime was set up in order to assure the rights and well-being of the population, and to guarantee France full liberty to work the French state mines, on which the prosperity of the country depends. In virtue of the instructions given to the Governing Commission when it was constituted on February 13, 1920, the commission is responsible to the League of Nations for the fulfilment of its functions in accordance with the stipulations of the Treaty of Versailles. The commission, of which the president is the executive officer, is always collectively responsible for the performance of duties which it may assign to any of its members with a view to facilitating the rapid solution of the problems of the government.

The Council considered it useless to discuss the provisional ordinance of March 7, this having already been withdrawn. As for the other extraordinary measures which the commission judged it necessary to take subsequently, the Council leaves it to the wisdom of the commission to decide when it will be convenient to revert to common law. The Council has learned with satisfaction of the amnesties recently granted by the Governing Commission. The Council appreciates the economic considerations which led the commission to introduce the franc as the only legal currency in the Saar.

With regard to the question of the maintenance of order, the Council has on several occasions declared its desire to dispense with the support of foreign garrisons as soon as the development of the local gendarmerie permits it. By its resolution of April 23, 1923, the Council took note of the measures already taken by the commission in this connection, and invited the commission to submit to it before the adoption of the budget for 1924-25 its program for the formation of the local gendarmerie.

The Council expresses once more to the Governing Commission its great appreciation of the administrative work accomplished during three and a half years in particularly difficult circumstances, and assures the commission of its full support in the accomplishment of the mission intrusted to it.

The Manchester Guardian commented upon this League resolution on July 9 as follows:

One may feel some disappointment that the principal scandal of the Saar administration, upon which total silence has been observed by the French press—namely, the actual constitution of the Governing Commission—has not been touched on. Possibly that will be remedied at the next meeting, in February, when the mandates of the commissioners will lapse unless renewed. Pending that date the Saarlanders will be well advised to submit themselves loyally to the rulings of the present "international" body, the composition of which may be once more recalled—a Frenchman, a Belgian, a "Dane" who lives in Paris and is for all practical purposes a Frenchman, a "Saarlander" who is a French nominee, and a Canadian who by a miracle is not a French Canadian. . . .

THE OLD SAAR DECREE

In pursuance of paragraphs 19 and 30 of Chapter II of the Saar Basin Annex to the Treaty of Peace of Versailles, and in pursuance of its decision dated March 7, 1923, the Governing Commission of the Saar territory hereby decrees as follows:

1. PENAL PROVISIONS

ARTICLE 1. Persons guilty of any of the following offenses, that is to say:

1. Committing or conspiring with others to commit acts of violence directed against members of the Governing Commission of the territory of the Saar Basin, or inciting to such acts of violence;

2. Approving or defending in public or at a meeting acts of violence committed against members of the Governing Commission of the territory of the Saar Basin and also rewarding persons guilty of such crimes, or aiding and abetting offenders or their accomplices (Penal Code, paragraph 257);

3. Taking part in secret meetings or meetings directed against the government of the territory (Penal Code, paragraphs 128 and 129) with intent to prejudice the regime set up in the Saar territory by the Treaty of Peace of Versailles, or aiding and abetting any member for the furtherance of that object by word or deed, and especially by financial assistance;

4. Becoming a member of a secret association or an association directed against the government of the territory (Penal Code, paragraphs 128 and 129), which is, or the members of which are, in illegal possession of arms;

5. Possessing or having the custody of a secret store of weapons and omitting to report to the authorities the place where such store is situated—for the purposes of this decree, rifles, mine-throwers, machine guns and automatic pistols shall be regarded as stores of munitions—

Shall, unless more severe penalties are elsewhere provided for, be liable to imprisonment for not less than three months and not more than five years.

In specially serious cases the offender shall be sentenced to imprisonment with hard labor.

In addition to imprisonment the offender may be liable to a fine not exceeding 50,000 francs.

ART. 2. Persons committing any of the following offenses shall be liable to imprisonment for a period not exceeding five years and, should the court so decide, to a fine not exceeding 10,000 francs:

1. In public or at a meeting (a) Casting discredit on the Treaty of Peace of Versailles; (b) insulting or traducing (1) the League of Nations, its members, or the states signatories of the Treaty of Peace of Versailles; (2) the Governing Commission, its members, organizations, or the officials responsible for the conduct of its administration;

2. Uttering threats or using insulting or defamatory language in public or at a meeting, calculated to prejudice the free and independent exercise of the rights conferred by paragraph 34 of Annex IV, Part III of the Treaty of Peace of Versailles.

3. Inciting or attempting to incite against each other—by threats, insults, slanders, or language calculated to bring the persons or institutions referred to into disrepute and under conditions capable of leading to a breach of the public peace—the various elements forming the population of the territory of the Saar, irrespective of their original nationality.

4. Insulting the colors of the Governing Commission in public or at a meeting.

5. Omitting to report immediately to the authorities the existence of any secret store of munitions of which a person may be aware, except in cases where the giving of such information would render the ascendants or descendants, brothers and sisters or husband or wife of that person themselves liable to punishment. The benefit of this proviso shall be granted to priests and ministers of religion, lawyers or physicians who have been intrusted with such information in the exercise of their profession or vocation. Under such circumstances paragrah 2, No. 5 of Article 1 shall apply.

ART. 3. In addition to the penalty inflicted for an offense against Article 1 a fine, the maximum of which is not established, shall be imposed.

Moreover, the accused may, by order of the court, be forbidden to reside in certain parts of the Saar territory or in certain places therein for a period not exceeding one year. Persons who have been convicted and who do not possess the status of a Saar inhabitant shall be expelled.

Offenses against paragraph 2 of this article shall be punishable by imprisonment.

ART. 4. A sentence of imprisonment with hard labor passed in respect of any one of the punishable offenses specified in Article 1 shall, in addition to the subsidiary penalties provided for in Article 31 of the Penal Code, entail ipso jure the loss of rights acquired through public elections, and in the case of officials the loss of their salary, or if they have retired from service the forfeiture of their pensions.

In the case of offenses specified in Article 1 or of any contravention of the provision of Article 2, in respect of which imprisonment is inflicted as penalty, the court may decree the loss of public appointments, the permanent or temporary suspension of the right to discharge the duties connected with such appointments, and the partial or total forfeiture either temporarily or permanently of any salary or pension derived therefrom. Nothing in this paragraph shall prejudice the provisions applicable to the loss of the rights conferred by public elections.

ART. 5. Legal proceedings may be brought against any person for offenses under Articles 1 and 2, even if such offenses have been committed outside the Saar territory.

II. JURISDICTION

ART. 6. A special chamber of the Saarlouis Supreme Court shall be instituted, which shall have power to hear and determine finally prosecutions for the offenses referred to in Articles 1 and 2.

This court shall consist of five members, including the president. They shall be appointed annually by the president of the Governing Commission, on the advice of the member of the Governing Commission responsible for the Department of Justice. An equal number of deputies shall be appointed under the same conditions from among the members of the Supreme Court or the courts of first instance (magistrats d'instance).

The procurator general officiating in the Saarlouis Supreme Court shall act as representative of the public prosecutor's department.

The procedure before the Supreme Court shall be the same as that applicable in the police court of the district tribunal.

The procurator general may instruct the principal public prosecutor at Saarbrück to institute proceedings.

III. PROHIBITED MEETINGS

ART. 7. Meetings, processions, and demonstrations may be prohibited when public feeling is so excited that there may be reasonable grounds for apprehending that language of a nature to constitute an offense under Articles 1 and 2 will be used at such demonstrations. Societies and meetings at which language of this nature is used and societies and meetings the object of which would render them liable to punishment under Articles 1 and 2 may be prohibited and dissolved.

A copy of the decision authorizing such prohibition or suspension with a statement of the reasons therefor must be issued free of charge and without delay to any party concerned who may apply for it.

ART. 8. The provisions of Article 7, paragraph 1, shall not apply to meetings held previous to the elections to the advisory council, to circuit councils, and communal councils, or to any other elected council which is intended to represent an organization recognized by law during the electoral period.

ART. 9. Meetings, even under the conditions laid down in Article 8, may be prohibited when offenses against Articles 1 and 2 are committed and permitted at these meetings.

ART. 10. The member of the Governing Commission responsible for the Department of the Interior will appoint the appropriate authority to take the measures provided for in Articles 7 to 9.

ART. 11. In the event of the dissolution of an association or society the property of such association or society may be seized and confiscated.

ART. 12. Persons committing any of the following offenses shall be liable to imprisonment and, if the court so decide, to a fine not exceeding 10,000 francs:

1. Organizing meetings, assemblies, and processions forbidden under Article 7 and subsequent articles, or speaking at such meetings, assemblies, and processions;

2. Retaining membership of societies dissolved under Article 7, paragraph 2, or furthering or assisting them in any other manner.

For the purposes of this article, any ostensibly new society which in point of fact has only been founded to replace a former society shall be regarded as a dissolved society.

IV. Seizure and Prohibition of Printed Matter

Art. 13. The stipulation of Articles 23 to 25 of the imperial press law of May 7, 1874, regarding the provisional seizure of printed matter, shall apply to the offenses specified in Articles 1 and 2, subject to the following provisions:

1. In Article 24, paragraph 1 of the press law of May 7, 1874, the words "District Court (Tribunal Régional) shall be substituted for the words "Competent Court" (Tribunal Compétent);

2. Article 25 of this law shall be amended to read as follows: "The public prosecutor's office may appeal against the decision of the District Court on the question of the validity of the temporary seizure. This appeal shall have the effect of suspending all proceedings."

The special chamber of the Saarlouis Supreme Court referred to in Article 6 shall be authorized to hear these appeals.

Art. 14. Any periodical publication containing matter which constitutes an offense under Articles 1 and 2 may be suppressed for a period not exceeding four weeks in the case of daily newspapers and not exceeding six months in other cases.

Any ostensibly new periodical which in point of fact is issued merely for the purpose of insuring the publication of a suspended periodical in a new form shall also be suppressed.

The suppression shall be published in the form of an order by the member of the Governing Commission responsible for the Department of the Interior.

Art. 15. Any person printing, issuing, publishing, or circulating a printed periodical which has been prohibited under Article 14 shall be liable to imprisonment. He may also be sentenced to pay a fine not exceeding 10,000 francs.

V. Appeal Procedure

Art. 16. An appeal may be made against the orders issued by the member of the Governing Commission responsible for the Department of the Interior, or the decisions taken by him or his representative, under Article 7 et seq., and Article 14 of this decree within a period of fifteen days from the date on which the order has been notified, or on which a copy of the decision has been submitted to the High Administrative Court of the Saar territory, which will then proceed to hear the appeal in the customary manner.

VI. Final Provisions

Art. 17. All provisions contrary to this decree are hereby canceled.

Art. 18. This decree shall come into force on March 12, 1923.

Art. 19. This decree shall be submitted for the consideration of the elected representatives of the people at their first session following its publication.

For the Governing Commission,
(Signed) V. Rault, Chairman, Councilor of State
Saarbrück, March 7, 1923

---

THE NEW SAAR DECREE

The Governing Commission in pursuance of paragraphs 19, 23, and 30 of Chapter II of the Saar Basin Annex to the Treaty of Peace of Versailles, and in pursuance of its decision dated June 18, 1923, hereby decrees as follows:

Section 1. After consultation with the elected representatives of the population regarding the provisional decree dated March 7, 1923, that provisional decree is annulled and the following provisions are substituted.

Sect. 2. Except as hereinafter provided no restriction is imposed on the freedom of the press and of speech, or on the right of holding meetings and forming associations, in the form in which those rights are established by the laws and regulations in force in the Saar territory.

Sect. 3. Any person who, by means of printed matter or at a public meeting, shall attack in a manner calculated to lead to a breach of the public peace the regime set up in the Saar territory by the Treaty of Peace of Versailles shall be liable to the penalties in paragraph 18 of the press law of May 7, 1874.

The foregoing provisions shall apply in particular to any person (1) insulting or traducing the Governing Commission, any of its members, organizations, or the officials responsible for the conduct of its administration in the discharge of their duties; (2) inciting or attempting to incite against each other the various elements forming the population of the territory of the Saar, irrespective of their original nationality.

Sect. 4. Any printed matter, the contents of which constitute the offense defined in section 3, may be seized in accordance with Article 23 of the press law of May 7, 1874.

Sect. 5. Paragraph 1 of Article 24 of the press law of May 7, 1874, shall be amended as follows: The words "District Court" (Tribunal Régional) shall be substituted for the words "Competent Court" (Tribunal Compétent).

Article 25 of this law shall be amended to read as follows: "The public prosecutor's office may appeal against the decision of the District Court on the question of the validity of the temporary seizure. This appeal shall have the effect of suspending all proceedings."

Sect. 6. The circulation within the Saar territory of any printed matter published outside the territory may be prohibited.

The publication, exposure for sale, and circulation of any printed matter appearing in the Saar territory may be suspended for a period not exceeding one month, if such printed matter contains articles which constitute the offense defined in section 3.

Any ostensibly new printed matter which in point of fact is issued merely for the purpose of insuring the publication of suspended printed matter in a new form may also be suppressed.

The suppression shall be published in the form of an order by the commissioner responsible for the Interior.

Sect. 7. Any person printing, issuing, publishing, or circulating printed matter which has been prohibited under the preceding section shall be liable to the penalties prescribed in paragraph 18 of the press law of May 7, 1874.

Sect. 8. An appeal against any order issued by the member of the Governing Commission responsible for the Interior under section 6, sub-paragraph 2, may be made within a period of one week from the date on which the order has been notified to the High Administrative Court, which will then proceed to hear the appeal in the customary manner. Such appeal shall not have the effect of suspending proceedings.

Sect. 9. Any public meeting which is manifestly intended to prejudice the regime set up in the Saar territory by the Treaty of Peace of Versailles, or any association with the same object may be prohibited or dissolved by a decision of the director of public safety.

A copy of the decision authorizing such prohibition or dissolution, with a statement of the reasons therefor, must be issued free of charge and without delay to any party concerned who may apply for it.

The decision of the director of public safety must be confirmed within twenty-four hours by an order by the member of the Governing Commission responsible for the interior.

Any party concerned may appeal to the High Administrative Court against the confirmatory order in the form and within the period prescribed in section 8. Such appeal shall not have the effect of suspending proceedings.

Sect. 10. Any infringement of the provisions of sub-paragraph of the preceding paragraph shall be punishable by the penalties laid down in paragraph 18 of the press law of May 7, 1874, without prejudice to any proceedings against the members of the prohibited or dissolved associations under sections 128 and 129 of the Penal Code.

Sect. 11. Any sentence passed in virtue of Sections 3 and 10 shall, at the request of the public prosecutor's office, be published at the expense of the convicted party, in the form and within the period fixed by the court which pronounces the sentence.

Sect. 12. This decree shall come into force on the date of its publication in the Official Journal.

(Signed) V. Rault, President of the Governing Commission
Saarbrück, June 18, 1923

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 8, 1923 No. 3031

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .......... 127
EDITORIALS:
  Uncle Sam, Hermit? .......... 130
  National Honor: Hughes vs. Hamilton .......... 131
  The Shoving of the South .......... 131
  Austria Saved .......... 132
DISASTER IMPENDS IN GERMANY. By Robert Dell .......... 133
THESE UNITED STATES—XXXV. NORTH DAKOTA: A Twentieth-Century Valley Forge. By Robert George Paterson .......... 134
YIDDISH LITERATURE: A PRODUCT OF REVOLT. By L. Talmy 137
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter .......... 139
CORRESPONDENCE .......... 140
BOOKS:
  Defiance. By Ludwig Lewisohn .......... 141
  Luminous Psychology. By Irwin Edman .......... 141
  Serbian Secrets. By L. S. G. .......... 142
  History. By Kimball Young .......... 142
  Leopardi Translated. By C. H. Grandgent .......... 143
  A Many-Sided Man. By Henry G. Pearson .......... 143
  Une Grande Dame. By Herbert W. Horwill .......... 144
  Books in Brief .......... 144
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
  Kuzbas Tells Its Own Story .......... 145

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
LEWIS S. GANNETT ERNEST H. GRUENING
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY, MANAGING EDITOR
JOHN MACY, LITERARY EDITOR
IRITA VAN DOREN, ADVERTISING MANAGER
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
JOHN A. HOBSON ANATOLE FRANCE H. L. MENCKEN
FRIEDRICH WILHELM FOERSTER ROBERT HERRICK
CARL VAN DOREN NORMAN THOMAS

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: Ernest Thurtle, 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N. W. 4, England.

Our civilization cannot survive materially unless it be redeemed spiritually. It can be saved only by becoming permeated with the spirit of Christ and being made free and happy by the practices which spring out of that spirit.—Woodrow Wilson in the Atlantic Monthly.

I tell you, my countrymen, the world needs more of the Christ; the world needs the spirit of the Man of Nazareth. If we could bring into the relationship of humanity, among ourselves and among the nations of the earth, the brotherhood that was taught by the Christ, we would have a restored world.—President Harding in one of his Alaska speeches.

WE do, indeed, need the spirit of Christ—but we irreverently read into that spirit our own individual politics and prejudices. To Mr. Wilson it means the League of Nations and included our intervention in the European war; to Mr. Harding it means the World Court (with reservations) and includes General Wood in the Philippines. We need the lesson of Christian brotherhood, but we do not know what it means. Mr. Wilson and Mr. Harding use almost identical terms, but they would probably disagree upon the application of them to almost any practical problem. If they psychoanalyzed themselves they might come to admit that the use of such lofty terms is, whether consciously or unconsciously, a political artifice for uniting men's minds in clouds of discourse while evading the hard task of seeking practical solutions of the problems of life.

WHAT the misery of the Ruhr is doing to Germany is shown in two recent elections—one the legislative election in Mecklenburg-Strelitz, the other in Germany's largest trade union, the Metal Workers' Union. Mecklenburg-Strelitz is the most rural state in Germany; its largest town has less than 13,000 inhabitants. Yet the small peasants there turned out and voted as the city-dwellers have been doing—they cast their ballots for extreme Right and extreme Left. The Communists, who had never before presented a ticket, won 10,633 votes, while the Socialists polled less than 12,000 where they had won 25,000 in 1920. The monarchist Nationalists, who in 1920 were so weak that they fused with other parties, took, with 12,600 votes, first place among the parties. The Metal Workers' Union was the vanguard-union of the 1918 revolution. Its leaders, Richard Müller, Urich, Robert Dissmann, have been regarded as radicals in the German labor movement. But they are Socialists, and while their party supports the Cuno Government they too seem entangled with it. In the recent Berlin metal strike they accepted a compromise settlement distasteful to the majority of their followers. And the result is that the union members have just voted Communist leaders into office, by nearly two to one. Only the parties of despair profit by the chaos in Germany today.

THE World Court has refused to give an advisory opinion, as requested by the Council of the League of Nations, on the Finnish-Russian dispute regarding the autonomy of Eastern Karelia, the semi-Finnish province of Russia which lies adjacent to Finland. Soviet Russia refused to recognize the court's jurisdiction or to present a case before it. By a vote of seven to four the court declared itself incompetent to pronounce an opinion in a dispute between a member of the League and a non-member without the latter's consent. Ordinarily such a decision would have seemed a matter of course in any court, but the recent attempts of the Great Powers to settle Germany's and Russia's affairs without consulting Germany or Russia, and their use of the League as a tool for imperial policy have raised natural suspicions of the independence of any organization sponsored by the League. If the court continues to show such independence it will win friends outside the circle of advocates of the League.

NOT Vae victis but Vae victoribus is the appropriate motto for the Treaty of Lausanne. If anything seemed absolutely certain at the close of the Great War, it was that the power of Turkey had been forever broken, and that Gladstone's policy of driving her "bag and baggage" out of Europe had at last reached fulfilment. When Turkey joined the belligerents on the side of the Central Powers the opinion was general that she was thereby virtually committing suicide. One remembers, for instance, a typical cartoon of the time in which a fez-crowned gobbler was pictured as swinging an ax for its own decapitation. This verdict seemed to be confirmed by the position in which Turkey found herself at the end of the conflict and by the terms of the Treaty of Sèvres. But the rivalries of the victorious Powers have given the proverbial sick man of Europe an opportunity not only to escape the undertaker but to regain health and vigor. Turkey emerges now not only retaining its ancient capital but reinstated in possession of Eastern Thrace and relieved of the humiliating concession to foreign residents involved in the judicial capitulations, the European Powers merely being permitted to have legal advisers to receive complaints. Naturally Constantinople celebrated the new treaty.

[illegible]
PUBLIC
LIB.

IMPERIALISM is very much the same the world around. We have our Leonard Wood in the Philippines. Every Filipino party united in the unanimous demand that Wood be recalled—how our newspapers would have foamed with rage had that happened in Ireland or in a French or German colony! The British, about to relax their martial law in "independent" Egypt, as a farewell reminder sentenced five Egyptians to death for alleged conspiracies to kill British officials. France reports that in the campaign for the "pacification" of Morocco which was inaugurated last March she had lost 253 men and officers killed and 587 wounded, and that friendly tribes had lost 100 killed and an unknown number wounded. How many of the "pacified" natives were killed the official report does not say; if the French pacify as efficiently in Morocco as the Americans did in Haiti, it would be something like 50,000.

ECONOMIC problems, as the present state of Europe attests, have no mercy on the whims of mere politics, and sooner or later demand solutions in which the most inveterate political prejudices have to go by the board. This truism has just been illustrated on a smaller scale in Ireland. Premier Craig, of Ulster, and President Cosgrave, of the Free State, have met for the first time as the heads of their respective governments. Appropriately enough, it is the question of communications that has brought them together. Politically Ireland may be split up into as many factions as the demon of discord pleases, but she must be a United Ireland in the matter of railroads or the social and industrial life of the whole country will be dislocated. In the face of the necessity of certain adjustments of the railroad situation, the old attitude of mutual aloofness has had to be abandoned, and Ephraim and Judah have accordingly sat down at the same table to talk things over. Such rapprochements are always gradual, and one is not surprised to learn that this first meeting was held on neutral ground—namely, in London—but it is officially reported that Mr. Cosgrave will shortly be visiting the North of Ireland and may then see Mr. Craig again. Other interesting announcements are that President Cosgrave, with a strong delegation, will attend the September meeting of the League Assembly in Geneva, and that the appointment of a minister to Washington is a prominent item on the agenda of the Free State Government.

SO South America, too, is to join in laying the way for the "next war." An Associated Press dispatch from Buenos Aires quotes La Razon as saying that the President of Argentina has sent to the Senate for "secret consideration" (note well that phrase!) a request for authority to spend some $150,000,000 to "modernize" the army. The "negative results" of the recent Pan-American Conference at Santiago, Chile (which has been described as a great success by our delegates), are put forward as the reason for increasing the military strength of Argentina, and "a high army chief" reveals that the plans call for a strong air force, an extensive acquisition of modern machine-guns, and machinery for the manufacture of projectiles. Naturally Argentina looks toward France, leader in modern militarism, for her equipment.

WHEN the labor struggle invades the labor movement itself, capitalists and their newspapers sit up and take notice. It gives them a chance to wag their heads sagely and arrive at wide conclusions about the ultimate chances of industrial democracy. They had such an opportunity lately in the strike of the workers in the establishments of the Cooperative Wholesale Society in England which tied up for some weeks the manufacturing and distributing activities of that great organization. The fight was as bitter as any ordinary strike could be. The employees, organized in the National Union of Distributive and Allied Workers, charged the Cooperative Wholesale Society with breaking its agreement and refusing arbitration; the society maintained that it had acted in accordance with its agreement and therefore had no use for arbitration. Charges of ill-faith hustled through the air, and the columns of the Daily Herald were filled with a barrage of statements and interviews and advertisements from both sides. The dispute finally ended in a practical victory for the strikers on terms drawn up by a joint committee of trade unionists and cooperators. It is fortunate at any rate that labor was able to find means to settle its quarrels inside its own ranks; but the more labor goes into business, whether it be manufacturing or banking or mining or distributing, the more necessary it will be for it to face and solve the knotty problems of democratic control. It cannot afford to have the capitalists wagging their heads.

IF the Ku Klux Klan succeeds in buying Valparaiso University, it will apparently take over only the shell of what was formerly a remarkable educational undertaking. In an age and country when most institutions of higher learning are finding it hard to make both ends meet, even when largely endowed, Valparaiso University, conducted on the "pay-as-you-go" plan, prospered until recently through selling education on a strictly commercial basis. Until the outbreak of the World War, it offered a higher education to the ambitious boy or girl for $120 a year, all expenses included, less, as the New York Herald observes, than the tuition alone at many colleges. If the student lacked the $120, there were means of self-help on the university's truck farm and otherwise. There was only one disadvantage from the youthful standpoint—one was expected to study! Work began at 6.30 a.m. There were no intercollegiate athletics, no Greek-letter fraternities, no "student activities." So it went until recently, when there was a change of management. A football team was sent east to play Harvard; fraternities were established. Result: the attendance, which in 1920 was 4,000, dropped last year to 1,500, and financial difficulties arose. Since the principles upon which Valparaiso University was established seem to have disappeared, the rest may perhaps fittingly pass to the Invisible Empire.

THE National Woman's Party achieved a successful coup d'etat in staging its demand for equal rights for men and women on the historic ground of the first equality convention held at Seneca Falls in 1848. Whatever may be its historic right to preempt that battlefield and to wage its own campaign on that ground, the Woman's Party has at least the right of conquest and of imagination. Its boldness and sense of dramatic values never fails it, and it is probable that henceforth the beginning of the woman's rights movement and the modern Woman's Party will be linked together in people's minds. The party convention has adopted as its program the pushing of an amendment to the Federal Constitution. In its new and simplified form this amendment reads: "Men and women shall have equal rights throughout the United States and every place subject to its jurisdiction."

THIS sounds fair and reasonable enough but in effect it would undoubtedly nullify all laws, State or National, for the special protection of women, and would work especial havoc with labor legislation. The Woman's Party recognizes this, but insists that the democratic way toward protective labor legislation is by combining the interests of men and women. In countries other than the United States this may be good tactics, but it happens that the provisions of our Constitution in regard to freedom of contract have been interpreted by the Supreme Court so as virtually to make it impossible to regulate the working hours of men or to fix other conditions of their employment. On the other hand, working hours and other conditions of employment for women have been largely and beneficially regulated through laws which the courts have sustained on the ground of their vital relation to health and the public welfare. If the Woman's Party will link with its suggested amendment another to restrict the provisions of the Constitution in regard to freedom of contract, then it will have a proposition worthy of consideration. Without that, the proposal will doubtless commend itself to reactionary employers, but will be viewed by the country's workers as certain to do incalculable harm.

IT is too bad that Federal divorce legislation has come to be synonymous in the United States with reactionary divorce legislation. If the light of Scandinavia shone over this country it is likely that most of us would support a movement for unifying and simplifying our legal methods in this field; for they are undoubtedly wildly disorganized and absurd. But when the fact is that darkness and obscurantism dominate the making of our laws, especially in the field of morals, the result of Federal action would be to fasten a medieval system of divorce on every State and every individual. "As bad as the worst" seems to be the motto of the Federal divorce-law advocate. The movement for Federal legislation is growing, however, and Senator Capper's uniform marriage-and-divorce law is receiving much support, especially from women. At least one woman's magazine of fabulous circulation has thrown itself into the fight, and the recent national convention of business and professional women's clubs held at Portland, Oregon, indorsed the measure. It is all too easy for those of us who are ourselves unconcerned lightly to recommend measures that will fetter and ruin the happiness of a helpless minority and at the same time bind the country to dead and decaying social traditions.

"MOST of them use it for pin-money anyway." This has been the historic excuse of department-store owners, sweat-shop operators, and other employers of girls for the low wages paid to women workers. And as long as nobody knew anything about it the statement carried conviction. "They live at home, so they don't need more." Unfortunately for these theorist-employers the Women's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor has recently published a pamphlet entitled "The Share of Wage-Earning Women in Family Support," and the pin-money theory has been completely devastated. As the result of several careful investigations of industrial communities containing fair proportions of native and foreign-born workers it appears that (1) practically every married woman wage-earner contributes every cent she earns to the support of the home; (2) of unmarried women workers living at home, as most of them do, from 59.9 to 90.5 per cent contribute their entire wages to the home; (3) among the unmarried children a greater proportion of daughters than of sons contribute their total earnings and have done so during the entire time they have been at work; (4) no appreciable number of women workers keep their wages for their own use. In one typical industrial community figures were secured from several thousand men and women in the textile, clothing, glass, and silk industries. Taken all together the women contributed from 86.4 to 96 per cent of their earnings to their families; the men from 78.2 to 84.6 per cent. That the actual money contribution of the men was higher reflects only on the indecently small wage paid to the women.

HIDDEN among the New York theater advertisements we find this choice bit of publicity for the steel trust:

> JUDGE ELBERT GARY says:
> TAYLOR HOLMES in "NOT SO FAST" is a clean, wholesome, and entertaining play. It deserves a long run at the MOROSCO Theatre. I hope to see it again. Eves. 8:15. Mats. Wed. & Sat.

In return for Judge Gary's courteous indorsement of the not-so-fast principle we shall expect to find on the financial pages some such statement as this:

> MARION MEARS, ingenue in "NOT SO FAST," says: "The UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION, in a clean, wholesome, and philanthropic way, is distributing forty million dollars as a quarterly dividend. Its directors and the mill workers (to whom the abolition of the twelve-hour day has generously been promised for the twenty-third time in as many months) deserve long life and prosperity." Shares on sale by all stockholders.

THE Crystal Palace, London's famous amusement resort, is ten inches longer in summer than in winter, according to Sir Martin Conway, who explains this as due to the expansion of the metal framework in warm weather. The Eiffel Tower and like structures are subject to similar variations with the temperature; doubtless also steel or iron steamships. The idea suggests itself that, relying upon this law of nature, the United States Shipping Board succeeded in making the Leviathan the world's largest steamship by taking her latest measurements in summer, whereas those of her nearest rival, the Majestic, were perhaps made in winter. The enterprise of the Shipping Board is commendable, but what is it going to do next January when snow envelopes the North Atlantic route and the Hudson River docks are jammed with broken ice? Possibly the cost of passage will be reduced on the ground that the cabins, so luxurious in summer, are less spacious in winter. Or the ship may be withdrawn entirely from the North Atlantic service and sent into southern waters. It would doubtless be welcomed by thirsty Americans as a ferry between Key West and Havana.

Uncle Sam, Hermit?

"IGNORE Europe," Hiram Johnson exhorts us, and straightway sets the example by discoursing of her in a speech that fills nearly a page of the daily paper. Even across "the God-given vantage of 3,000 miles of protecting waters" he cannot resist the pull of the European magnet, struggle against it as he may. Nor can anyone else who is ambitious of influencing American opinion. It is easy to poke fun at the flight of so many Senatorial swallows over the ocean this summer, but their instinctive resort to Europe to see conditions there at first hand is full of significance. Consciously or subconsciously, they realize that our relation to the Old World is an outstanding problem in American politics. And, however they may differ in the details of their reports or in the conclusions about American policy to which their inquiries have led them, they are virtually unanimous in the account they bring back of the general situation abroad. Senator Hiram Johnson's picture of present-day Europe is no blacker than Senator Underwood's. Moreover, the same story is told by observers who approach the subject from a very different angle from that of the Washington politician. Soldiers like General Allen, religious leaders like John R. Mott, and journalists like Mark Sullivan are equally despondent.

The most startling confirmation comes from a source where the personal equation counts for nothing. The financial exchanges are ruled not by opinion or theory but by actualities. Their day-by-day quotations are not inspired by the impressions of tourists, but are decided by the known conditions in the various countries represented in the money market. You may think what you please about French or German policies, but there is no evading the bare fact that, whereas a dollar would formerly buy only about four and a half German marks, it will now buy a million. Money, measured by purchasing power, is getting to be about as valuable in Berlin as on Robinson Crusoe's island. The German mark today is worth less than the Polish mark or the Austrian krone, less even than the soviet ruble was worth two years ago.

The outlook was grave enough at the beginning of the year, but the French occupation of the Ruhr has gratuitously added a new and disastrous element to the forces making for the disintegration of the life of Europe. The effect of that occupation on international trade, said Premier Baldwin a few days ago, is exactly the same as if you inserted the blade of your penknife into the works of your watch. The peace of his own country, with all her traditional stability, is seriously threatened. A collapse of foreign trade, with its consequent unemployment, means far more to England than to France. To the Englishman, unlike the ancient Roman or the modern American politician, the sea is a symbol not of separation but of intercourse, and unless he can send out his products over the waterways of the world he must suffer a privation so acute that it may lead to a revolutionary discontent. Such is the prospect, and the crisis in the Entente may further exasperate the situation by transforming the relations between England and France into those of open hostility.

Meanwhile, what of America? She appears from time to time upon the scene, to use Sir Edward Grigg's striking figure, like a comet which for a moment illuminates the horizon and then disappears. No wonder the foreigner is puzzled by our attitude. He finds us rigidly determined to abate not a cent of what is due to us by other nations, yet utterly indifferent as to whether or not our debtors go bankrupt. He sees Mr. Fall, lately our Secretary of the Interior, chaffering for trade concessions with that Soviet Government which only yesterday, as a member of the Cabinet, he spurned as no government at all. Our people have spent generously of money and personal service for the relief of distress in Europe, yet the contribution of official America during 1923 to the resettlement of the world has so far consisted of (1) a refusal to have anything to do with Russia, (2) a refusal to consider any solution of the reparations problem that involves the canceling or scaling down of foreign debts, (3) the closing of the door of hope in the face of thousands of Europeans who, like our own forefathers, seek a career in the New World, and, as a worthy climax, (4) the seizure of liquor brought under seal to our ports in foreign ships, not for the purpose of violating our domestic law but for the use of ocean passengers.

The choice that lies before us is not really between association with Europe and abstention from her affairs. Unless we are prepared to accept frankly the status of a hermit nation, closing our embassies and consulates and placing an embargo upon imports and exports alike, we cannot avoid the responsibilities of a twentieth-century Great Power. Nothing is more absurd than the idea, implicit in so many discussions of the subject, that we can continue to trade with foreign countries while holding politically aloof from them. There can be no keeping international commerce and international politics in water-tight compartments. Every business man who goes abroad is a potential cause of international complications. There is a further consideration that should be prominent in the mind of the American trader—the fact, namely, that every business transaction between individuals in different countries depends fundamentally on the stability of their governments. Without stable government, you cannot have the assurance which is the basis of all trade. And today the equilibrium of the government of the greater part of Europe is rapidly approaching the equilibrium of an earthquake.

What we have to decide is whether we will be content to be dragged into European affairs at intervals by recurrent crises that are none of our creation or, by intelligent cooperation, will help to make things go somewhat more smoothly and sanely. Of course, if our American statesmen are afflicted with an inferiority complex and shrink from venturing beyond the three-mile limit lest they be outwitted by the shrewder and more practical European, it would be unkind and futile to thrust upon them tasks for which they feel themselves so unfitted. The implied confession, however, is somewhat humiliating to national self-respect, and one would be better pleased to hear that America, strong in her very freedom from entangling alliances, open or secret, was willing to help in the task of restoring peace to a distracted world.

Hiram Johnson was quite right when he pointed out that it would mean nothing to the peace of Europe for us to join the League or the World Court. But we have in our hands, if we are willing to use it, a powerful lever—the debts Europe owes us—which might be used to promote disarmament, reconciliation, and peaceful commerce in Europe.

National Honor: Hughes vs. Hamilton

WHEN President Harding dedicated a monument in Washington to Alexander Hamilton he called attention to various advice on the subject of economic and financial integrity which that statesman had enjoined on the nation, and he took pride in the fact that the following of that advice had made us great. He failed to call attention, however, to one great utterance of Hamilton, which has a very concrete application to a policy now before the country and which some Americans, including Secretary Hughes, seem willing to forget, thereby dismaying those who believe that disregarding Hamilton's advice in this respect subverts our traditions and our reputation for financial integrity.

Speaking of the policy of regarding as inviolable the private property of foreigners in the United States, even of the citizens of enemy nations (Great Britain was then our enemy), Hamilton said, in his nineteenth Camillus letter:

> The right of holding or having property in a country always implies a duty on the part of its government to protect that property, and to secure to the owner the full enjoyment of it. Whenever, therefore, a government grants permission to foreigners to acquire property within its territories, or to bring and deposit it there, it tacitly promises protection and security.
>
> There is no parity between the case of the persons and goods of enemies found in our own country and that of the persons and goods of enemies found elsewhere. In the former there is a reliance upon our hospitality and justice; there is an express or implied safe-conduct; the individuals and their property are in the custody of our faith; they have no power to resist our will; they can lawfully make no defense against our violence; they are deemed to owe a temporary allegiance; and for endeavoring resistance would be punished as criminals, a character inconsistent with that of an enemy. To make them a prey, is therefore to infringe every rule of generosity and equity; it is to add cowardice to treachery. In the latter case there is no confidence whatever reposed in us; no claim upon our hospitality, justice, or good faith; there is the simple character of an enemy, with entire liberty to oppose force with force. . . .
>
> The property of a foreigner placed in another country, by permission of its laws, may justly be regarded as a deposit, of which the society is the trustee. How can it be reconciled with the idea of a trust to take the property from its owner when he has personally given no cause for its deprivation?

In disregard and defiance of these profound words of wisdom, which had become an American tradition and a fundamental principle of international law, the present Secretary of State recently urged Congress not to return the private property of German, Austrian, and Hungarian citizens which we had sequestrated during the war on the theory that it was to be held only during hostilities in order to prevent its belligerent use against the United States. But when the war closed, other uses for the property seem to have been found and the Secretary of State, promoter of world courts, has taken a leading part in subverting the law and traditions of the United States.

It is hardly possible that Mr. Hughes can fail to appreciate the revolutionary effect of the precedent he is helping to create. Oblivious of his own disregard of the principles of international law and American tradition, he boldly preaches to Russia and Mexico the illegality of confiscating the private property of foreigners, and his emissary in Mexico, Mr. Charles B. Warren, unctuously says to that Government: "There can be no compromise with the fundamental principles essential to international business." Is it just stupidity or perverseness that keeps the Secretary from realizing that he is not practicing what he preaches?

So long as we retain the private property of foreigners who invested their funds in the United States in reliance upon our good faith we have no standing to protest against the confiscatory acts of foreign governments. It becomes then not a question of "fundamental principle," but a question of whose ox is gored. Until the Allies and the United States retrace the revolutionary step they have taken with respect to German, Austrian, and Hungarian private property, they are estopped from making accusations against Russia on this score; they are rendering the whole institution of foreign investment unsafe and unsound. We ask the Secretary of State to reflect upon the anomalous position he is assuming at home and abroad and, notwithstanding the pressure of the British and French governments, to save his reputation and that of his country by returning to the paths of legality which Alexander Hamilton so ably and forcefully pointed out.

The Shoving of the South

W. W. Alexander, in the Christian Index, ascribes the exodus of Negroes from the South not to the "pulling of the North" but to the "shoving of the South."

WHEN Celia Shevick, a sixteen-year-old white schoolgirl, was murdered in Richmond, Virginia, on April 28, the energetic police immediately arrested twelve Negroes who happened to be in the vicinity and held them without bail. Two days later Richmond papers stated that "Joseph Enoch . . . last night was lodged in the city jail, charged with two capital crimes, [having] made and signed a complete confession [of the murder of Celia Shevick]." The papers omitted to say that Enoch was white.

A white woman writing to the editor of the Jacksonville (Florida) Journal (in the State where seven Negroes were lynched in the first six months of 1923) reported that she was riding on a city street car, several seats of which were unoccupied, when an old colored woman boarded the car and remained standing. "She looked very tired and carried a heavy handbag. I asked the poor old woman to sit beside me. She thanked me but said she did not like to raise a fuss. She admitted she had a very bad knee, too, but only said, 'I must not sit down. . . . There is no help.' "

After being sentenced to death in 1919, after having had five dates set for their execution, and after passing through four State and Federal courts and awaiting retrial two years, six Negro farmers were finally released on June 30 by order of the Supreme Court of Arkansas. The men had attempted to organize to obtain legal redress against peonage under the share-cropping system, and had been accused of a "plot to massacre whites." Indiscriminate hunting, shooting, and killing of Negroes had followed. H. F. Smiddy and F. K. Jones, white members of the sheriff's posse, swore that the white man for whose murder the Negroes were convicted by a white jury was killed by members of the posse. They further swore that they personally whipped the prisoners with straps studded with metal, put strangling drugs in their nostrils, and compelled the Negroes to sit in an electric chair to force testimony in the manner desired by the mob. Six other Negro defendants remain in the penitentiary at Little Rock awaiting action by the Federal judge. The freedom of the six innocent men just released was won after four years' fighting by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at a cost of $14,000.

Within three weeks in July, these three items: Two hundred of the "best people" of Schulenberg, Texas, removed Jesse Bullock, Negro, accused of attacking a white girl, from a city jail and hanged him until dead; Willie Minnifield, accused of attacking and wounding a white woman with an ax, was taken by a mob from a posse near Yazoo City, Mississippi, tied to a stake, and burned to death, the mob then continuing its pursuit of another Negro said to have been standing outside the house during the attack; Regina Almstedt went to Mexico, Missouri, to look at Ollie Watson, now suspected of being the man who really attempted to attack her, a deed for which James T. Scott was lynched on April 20.

Florida, with one colored resident for every two white residents, has invested thirteen times as much money in schools for white children as in schools for colored children. Florida spends only $1.13 on each colored pupil and $10.47 on each white pupil, spends more than five times as much for white teachers' salaries as for colored teachers' salaries, and has an average school term of 111 days for the colored children as against 142 days for the white children. Louisiana, with 212 high schools for white children, has none for the colored. While her Negro population is more than a third of the total the school property for the use of white children is ten times as valuable as that for Negro children. The State spends, on an attendance basis, only $11.28 per colored child and $46.15 per white child, pays its colored teachers only $360 per year as compared with $1,198.98 paid white teachers, and offers 114 days of education per year to the colored child and 165 to the white child.

It is estimated that more than 250,000 Negroes have migrated North in the last six months. No wonder!

Austria Saved

AUSTRIA was dying. Austria had to be saved. The makers of the crazy quilt of Versailles had created a land without bread or coal or outlet; they had left a city of two millions without a hinterland. The cities were decaying; the children were starving to death. Austria had to be saved. It was clearly seen from the start. No French armies occupied Vienna or Gratz; no one attempted to collect indemnities. Then Seipel went a-begging and the loan was arranged. The world drew breath more freely. One good deed had been done.

There is no question of the necessity or the goodness of the deed. It is a fact, however, that the Austrians for whose sake one cares for Austria look upon the loan and its results with bitter misgiving. The scholars, artists, men of letters, liberals, educators who have sustained the ancient glory of Vienna—these have been but little heartened by the bread which the loan has brought. Man does not live by bread alone. What are their thoughts? What do they lack? What do they want?

After the crash in 1918 the Socialists seized the government in German Austria and instructed their Secretary of State, Dr. Otto Bauer, to negotiate at once for the union of the country with the German Republic. Even Versailles insisted on solidly nationalistic states except in such cases—as Czecho-Slovakia—where not to insist would make for a dismemberment of the German folk. Every Pole had to be gathered under the Polish flag. The Austrians did not underestimate their difficulties from without. They did not anticipate opposition from within.

But the opposition came. It came from the clericals who feared the predominance of Protestantism and liberalism in the Reich; it came from the bankers and industrialists whose interests were still scattered in all the lands of the Hapsburg crown, who had no care for the fate of this fragmentary Austria that was left, and who feared the competition of the bankers and industrialists of Prussia and the Rhine. Thus the anti-annexationists were the reactionaries, both clerical and capitalist. Hence all socialists, liberals, idealists, the representatives of Austrian civilization, became annexationists. They knew that Austria could not remain a "Kultur-Staat" if left to her own resources. They saw clearly that the alternative to union with the German Republic was international charity.

Charity means spiritual pauperization. He who receives gifts is supposed to strip himself of all wants except the humblest. So at this moment Austria is entering upon internal economies. The functions of the state are being reduced to the keeping of order and the administration of justice. Policemen and judges are to be the only officers of the pauper state. One hundred and twenty-five thousand government officials, for whom there is no place in the economic order of the country, have been thrown into the streets of Vienna. But that is not the worst. It is not the suffering of bodies that is the worst. This state which, despite all its political follies and iniquities, was among the leaders of mankind in education, in its fostering of art, science, public welfare, is to be reduced to spiritual poverty and obedience. With a vengeance, too. For the same reform that throws out the upholders of the intellectual culture of Vienna makes the priests of the Catholic church officials of the state. The country is back where it was in 1855. "Prälat" Seipel is content.

The crown has been stabilized. Imports have been reduced to a minimum. Hence industry is paralyzed but agriculture is untouched. Again Seipel is satisfied. He is content to let Austria sink to the status of a peasant state. The agrarians of Styria and the Tyrol look upon the socialists and artists and liberals and scientists and Jews of Vienna with no kindly eyes anyhow. The capitalists are satisfied. They don't need the schools and universities and laboratories. They need order and good hotels.

So everybody is satisfied with the loan and its internal consequences except the people that count, the people who have added so largely to the beauty and wisdom and spiritual wealth of the world, the people for whose sake the loan was made. It was these people in Vienna who drew the sympathies of the world to the fate of their country. Now there will be security in Austria and less starvation and, by and by, a prosperous ultramontane peasantry. There will be nothing for the traditions and the work and the influence of Vienna. The civilization of Gluck and Mozart and Beethoven and Grillparzer and Anzengruber and Schnitzler and Hofmannsthal and the great scholars and physicians and psychiatrists seems doomed. The body of Austria is saved. What of her soul?

Disaster Impends in Germany

By ROBERT DELL

Berlin, July 9

IT is a painful experience to live in Germany just now. One is oppressed by the sense of impending disaster and by the misery that one sees on every side. The streets of Berlin are full of starving people many of whom have not the courage to ask for money but make only a mute appeal. A present of 5,000 marks—less than three cents—overwhelms them and brings tears to their eyes. They are grateful for even 100 marks, although controlled black bread now costs 4,500 marks a quarter loaf, of course a very low price for people with the money to buy it. Behind the closed doors of flats even in fashionable quarters many middle-class people are slowly dying of starvation, too proud to tell even their friends of their need. Some of them prefer a more rapid end—suicides are becoming more and more common. Profound pessimism prevails. People seem to have lost almost all hope.

There is only too much reason for pessimism about the internal situation in Germany. A strike has just begun in the metal industries and when, as is the case in this country, no workmen are earning even a bare subsistence wage, one strike may easily lead to others. One of the demands of the metal workers is that their wages should be fixed according to a gold standard, so that they would be adjusted automatically to changes in value instead of being periodically revised as paper prices rise. The workmen have refused to accept a sliding scale based on the index numbers of the cost of living. They want a fixed wage in gold value which would of course be paid in paper marks at the current rate of exchange. In a country with a depreciated and constantly varying currency, this is the only just and rational way of fixing wages and salaries and it is surprising that German workmen have waited so long to make this demand. It is likely that other workmen will follow the example of the metal workers and demand wages fixed in gold value and, if the employers refuse to agree, as they have in the metal industries, a general strike may be the result.

How low wages are in Germany is shown by the fact that the workmen in the metal industries are at present asking for 12,000 marks an hour, whereas the employers have offered them 9,000 marks. At today's rate of exchange 12,000 marks are about six cents and the weekly wage (forty-eight hours) works out at about $2.90. Since the general cost of living in Germany (in gold prices) is on an average about 56 per cent of the pre-war cost, this wage is equivalent in purchasing power to about twenty-six marks before the war. Dr. Kuczynski's estimate of the minimum weekly wage required for the bare subsistence of a married couple with two children under ten in Berlin before the war was 28.80 marks. As I have said, no Berlin workmen are now earning the equivalent purchasing power of 28.80 marks a week before the war, although of course the pre-war wages of all skilled workmen were above it. For example the skilled workmen in the Berlin printing trade earned on an average before the war 34.38 marks a week—19 per cent more than the subsistence minimum. In 1920 their wages were 30 per cent below the subsistence minimum, in 1921 8 per cent below, in the first half of 1922 9 per cent below, in the third quarter of that year 40 per cent below, in the fourth quarter 50 per cent below, in January of this year 44 per cent below, in February 47 per cent below, in March 7 per cent below, and in April 5 per cent below. The pre-war weekly wages of Berlin bricklayers and carpenters were Mk. 41.82—45 per cent above the subsistence minimum. In 1920 their wages were 13 per cent below the subsistence minimum, in 1921 4 per cent above it, in the first half of 1922 10 per cent above it, in the third quarter of 1922 23 per cent below it, in the fourth quarter 43 per cent below it, in January of this year 39 per cent below it, in February 40 per cent below it, in March 8 per cent below it, and in April 5 per cent above it.[1] They are now certainly much below the subsistence minimum, having not yet risen in proportion to the enormous rise in paper prices, caused by the slump in the mark.

On no previous occasion have prices been raised so quickly and so much. In many cases the increase in prices exceeds that in the value of the dollar, with the result that even gold prices are higher than they were two or three weeks ago and the general cost of living is now probably more than 56 per cent of the pre-war cost. I happen to have bought this week at two different shops exactly the same article that I bought at each of them on June 16. In one case the gold price is now 30 per cent, in the other 70 per cent, higher than on the date mentioned. The increase in prices has been particularly excessive in the restaurants, many of which are now twice as expensive in gold value as they were a month ago. Two friends of mine paid 450,000 marks (nearly $3) a week ago for a dinner which, to my knowledge, would not have cost more than $1 or $1.25 in the same restaurant a month ago. What is more serious is that food prices in general are higher in gold value, as I know by my housekeeping expenses. In April food prices (in gold) were 65 per cent of the pre-war prices, but I should say that they are now about 80 per cent. This increase in gold prices is arbitrary and quite without justification. The tradesmen are able to make it because people are so confused by the constant changes in the value of the mark that they do not know where they are.

A very serious factor in the situation is the growing scarcity of provisions. The cold wet weather that we have had for three months—it changed a week ago—has ruined the fruit and vegetables, the prices of which are as high as, sometimes even higher than, before the war, in consequence of the shortage of the supply. Fruit and vegetables are imported from Holland, but they are necessarily expensive. Those with money to buy do not yet perceive the shortage in the supply of many foodstuffs. One can get as much butter as one wants but only because most Germans cannot afford to buy it. The best fresh butter now costs about twenty-five cents a pound, which is about 15 per cent less than it cost before the war at this time of year, but then the gold value of the average German income is less than one-fifth of the pre-war income.

It may already be too late to avert a catastrophe. In any case, there is not a moment to be lost, if we do not wish Germany to be plunged into anarchy and the payment of reparations to become forever impossible.

---

[1] I take these statistics from Dr. Kuczynski's Finanzpolitische Korrespondenz, May 15, 1923.

These United States—XXXV*

NORTH DAKOTA: A Twentieth-Century Valley Forge

By ROBERT GEORGE PATERSON

THE drama of North Dakota has been one of the great American epics. Scene of a gigantic struggle for independence, fought almost as fiercely and tenaciously as the Colonists' revolt in 1776, its far-stretching prairies have been a continuous battlefield since the bloody days of Custer. There is a sparkle in the piercing northern air "out in those vast spaces where men are men" that prompts the clash of dominating spirits. Regarded by the sedate East as America's enfant terrible, its numerous reforms have made its name a synonym for radicalism, for amazing governmental ventures that have startled the conservative world, shivering its spine with the latest spectacle of the Nonpartisan League, whose daring shadow has broadened across the whole Western horizon. There has been real romance in the story of its forceful dramatis personae, stalwart builders who visualized empires, political chieftains who slapped each other's faces, earnest home-makers converting the great plains into a chrome-yellow sea of ripening grain, strong men bold enough to strike out for ideals and break the invisible chains of unseen rulers exacting tribute from afar.

Aside from the war, North Dakota's revolt has been one of the century's outstanding political events in America. It has had as many interpretations as it has had observers. Many passively noted it as one of those freakish experiments in which in the name of progress certain Western States occasionally have indulged themselves, a temporary obsession to be viewed with no more concern than a city changing to the commission form of government. To some it has seemed the heroic effort of the second generation of a pioneer people to conquer political chiefs, economic overlordship, and the forces industrial civilization has erected, as their fathers subdued Indian chiefs and the forces of nature. Others saw it as a conflagration fired by the incendiary bombs of demagogues whose personal destruction offered the only hope for its extinction. Still others have fancied it everything from the first American foothold of the foreboding International to a revolt of the tenantry. Ample evidence may exist for these contentions. It certainly was not a revolution without its Jacobins, its carpetbagging exploiters suddenly swooping down upon it to direct its generals from behind the scenes, its feverish mob howling for the political decapitation of all survivors of the old regime. Nor was it without its Dantons sincerely seeking the economic deliverance of the State's agricultural classes from a system that ground them into vassalage while they produced the world's daily bread.

Yet none of these estimates is wholly correct. North Dakota has been greatly misunderstood, for it is not a State of Marxian idealists. Prior to the Nonpartisan League's appearance it had but a straggling Socialist element scarcely able to muster two thousand votes on election day. Unlike its neighbors of South Dakota and Iowa to the south, it never had any land tenantry worth mentioning. It has not been bothered by labor disturbances, as it has no laboring class except its floating farm helpers who come and go with the spring and autumn. While in 1913 there was a brief I.W.W. flurry at Minot the rioters were not North Dakotans but the typical Western rovers who frequent the trans-Mississippi region during the harvest season together with a boisterous handful of Butte's mining element who had strayed eastward out of Montana. Of all the States North Dakota is one of the freest from poverty. Nearly all of its half million people are landowners. A country of magnificent distances, its mighty expanse adapted itself to the acquisition of enormous tracts. The "bonanza farm," covering thousands of acres, sprang into vogue. Inconsequential indeed was the farmer possessing less than a section—640 acres—of land. The forty- or eighty-acre farm of the Eastern or Middle States is inconceivable to the average North Dakotan. The majority of the 30 per cent of its people that are not Scandinavian are keen-faced Yankees who migrated from Iowa, Illinois, and western New York to get rich quick in the early land boom, but on seeing the country's possibilities decided to stay. The years have dealt generously with them, and though North Dakota boasts only a few millionaires nearly every one is well to do. Virtually every farmer has his car, some three and four. A few years ago the tremendous business of the Ford plant at Fargo ranked it near the top of that company's branches throughout the country.

North Dakota's revolt came as the direct result of its complete subjection to outside domination. Hunger, poverty, class distinctions, religious oppression, political graft and chicanery all prompt rebellion. But nothing is more certain to provoke it than the attempt of one people to govern another.

Nominally a sovereign State, in reality North Dakota has experienced few of the thrills of sovereignty. From the hour of statehood it has been merely the "flickertail" of the Minnesota gopher. Albeit Bismarck is the capital where the Governor resides and the legislature convenes, the actual seat of the State government always has been in St. Paul and Minneapolis, homes of the overlords who played with its destinies. At the outset James J. Hill became its acknowledged patron saint and colonized it with Norwegians as Minnesota already had been settled by their Swedish cousins. Throughout his years his excellent paternal care well entitled him to the fond sobriquet of "Father of North Dakota." From St. Paul he watched over its interests—so closely interwoven with his own—with the same anxious eye a keen guardian displays for a wealthy ward. From a carefully guarded chamber in the West Hotel in Minneapolis its political wires were manipulated with rare dexterity by that most astute of all the Northwest's political chiefs, the frequently mentioned but infrequently seen "Alec" McKenzie of Klondike fame—fame suggested, if not exactly extolled, by Rex Beach in "The Spoilers." Perchance because of the proprietary concern exhibited in the State by these two gentlemen, the financiers, merchants, and millers of Minnesota's chief centers assumed that North Dakota was their private preserve. And few moves in North Dakota became possible without their sanction, as its legislators, bankers, and grain growers soon came to understand.

---

* Reproduction forbidden. Quotation limited to 300 words. Copyright, 1923, The Nation, Inc. All rights reserved.

Whenever a North Dakota politician aspired to public office in North Dakota it first was necessary to run down to Minneapolis and see McKenzie. Whenever a new general business policy was promulgated for the State its announcement usually followed the return of some prominent North Dakotan from the Twin Cities. When Fargo wanted a new chief of police it sent to Duluth, and as a new Commercial Club secretary it selected one discarded by St. Paul. When Fargo was chosen as the site for the French Government's gift to the Norwegians of the United States of a statue of Rollo—the Norseman who invaded France ten centuries ago—the Hill interests managed, despite Fargo's spacious parks, to have it placed on the tiny greensward of their Great Northern railroad station where it has an uninspiring background in a yellow brick wall. When Minnesota's big-business interests learned that the North Dakota farmer no longer was producing enough to meet the advancing cost of their operations they launched a "Better Farming Association" in North Dakota to scrutinize his efforts and to make him produce more, sending up an energetic young man from Minnesota to run it. And upon discovery that, instead of ever becoming self-supporting, the "association" always would be a drain on their purses, they calmly tried to unload it on North Dakota's State Agricultural College and replace the college president with the energetic young man. Never has North Dakota been free from the supervision of its eastern neighbor. Its first submitted constitution, indignantly rejected as "a piece of unwarranted outside intermeddling," was drafted by James Bradley Thayer of the Harvard law faculty on request of the Northern Pacific Railroad's president, Henry Villard. There is no doubt that Mr. Villard was actuated by the best of motives in his desire to assist the new State's admission into the Union. But that he was not a North Dakotan militated against the acceptance of his good offices. Even the turbulent upheaval which finally overthrew the yoke of alien domination failed to restore to North Dakota's soil the seat of its government. The shrewd Loftus, the Robespierre of its revolution, and the autocratic Townley, grabbing the tempest with Napoleonic opportunism, both directed their annihilating campaigns from St. Paul.

Sporadic outbursts from the beginning revealed North Dakota's unconscious groping for self-determination. Queer things, impulsive and incoherent, were done in this battle for independence, but all revealed the underlying aim. At its second election it chose a Populist governor. The experiment did not last. The next uprising in 1906 had more enduring effect and made North Dakota a vital contributor to the subsequent Republican schism. For six years a Democratic governor and an "Insurgent" Republican legislature fought the McKenzie "Stalwarts" for control. In that time they enacted into law nearly every suggestion that promised hope of deliverance from outside political and financial influence. The statutes bristled in their defiance of the railroads and all outside business operating within the State. They affected nearly every commodity used, inasmuch as North Dakota is wholly agricultural and manufactures practically nothing for its own consumption. The rigidity of the State's pure-food laws for a number of years barred entrance to the products of several concerns of national prominence.

These caprices disturbed distant campaign managers, not because of North Dakota's power in national conventions, but on account of the misleading impression its unexpected treatment of their chosen candidates might give the electorate at large. It inaugurated several disquieting political novelties. It was the first State to hold a Presidential primary, and in it forsook the magnetic leadership of its once widely boasted foster son, Roosevelt, for the progressivism of La Follette. Later, in the effort to rid itself of Nonpartisan rule, it established another disconcerting precedent as the first State to recall its governor—the inoffensive Nonpartisan figurehead, Frazier—whom it subsequently elected to the Senate in place of the veteran conservative, McCumber. Its great organized protest followed in natural sequence to this list of reforms. It was but another, more emphatic, more defiant step toward independence. The protest subsided gradually, partially due to the overwhelming outside financial pressure marshaled to kill it; but chiefly because the Nonpartisan League as conducted proved it was not wholly an agrarian nor a cooperative movement. As distasteful in its dictatorial methods as any previous experiment, it failed in its five years of virtual State power to fulfil its chief promises to the North Dakota farmers for whose express benefit it was supposed to exist.

Farming on a huge scale, the ills of the North Dakotan lie in marketing. His crop is wheat and small grains. He is dependent on the railroads to move it and on the grain commission men of the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce to sell it. Between the two he early found himself a helpless victim of strange price fluctuations and freight tariffs that more frequently favored the big elevator, milling, and railroad interests than himself. The chief Twin City millers and elevator magnates controlled the Chamber of Commerce, and the trading privileges of its floor were largely restricted to their representatives. As they were in position to buy grain virtually at their own grading, the North Dakota farmer felt himself at their mercy.

Amelioration of this condition was sought through a railroad commission empowered to adjust shipping disputes, through elevator commissions created to sit in Duluth and Minneapolis and seek fairer grading. Finally came a proposal for the construction of North Dakota State-owned and State-managed terminal elevators at Duluth and the Twin Cities. This caught the popular fancy and gradually edged its way into the political platforms. But owing to that happy lapse of memory with which politicians seem blessed after election the cherished projects always found a waiting grave in legislative committees.

Meanwhile a Farmers' Equity Society sprang into being to market the crop independently, and opened a Cooperative Selling Exchange in St. Paul. Immediately it became the target of the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce. Both were located in Minnesota's Twin Cities, but as North Dakota furnished the crop it became the battleground of the conflict. The North Dakotans welcomed it, for they always relish a fight and are ever ready to take sides. Loftus, president of the Equity Exchange, a spectacular figure with a keen knowledge of crowd psychology, staged his skirmishes in Fargo every January when it was filled with farmers attending its annual grain growers' convention. His bizarre appeals and escapades stirred the State. He rented auditoriums, threw men out bodily, and applied for the removal of that police chief who dared refuse him protection. Townley sat in his audiences, an obscure but studious observer. When Loftus had keyed the farmers to open revolt and marched them on to Bismarck, while the legislature sat, to demand the long-promised State-owned elevator, Townley cleverly stepped in and wrested away the leadership for himself. He steered the Equity's membership into an organization of his own. Until that moment this new king, suddenly rising over this Egypt which knew not Joseph, had never been heard of even throughout his own county, the "slope country," on the western edge of the State. Dynamic, resorting to all the bombastic tricks of Loftus, he swept North Dakota like a Billy Sunday whirlwind. Staking his fortunes on this spirit of revolt at its height he toured the State in an automobile and secured the signed pledges of the farmers to support the child of his brain—the Nonpartisan League—which was to make him North Dakota's dictator for the next half decade.

Ostensibly the Nonpartisan League began as an association of North Dakota farmers formed to run their own State. But it gathered its leaders from the earth's four corners. While Townley was its czar he was not so unwise as to conduct it without advisers. One came from faraway Australia and New Zealand, another from Colorado and Washington, some from New York, several from Minnesota, but few from North Dakota. Some of these special importations had been prominent I.W.W. attorneys, and nearly every one of them had a record in several States as a candidate for some exalted office on the Socialist ticket.

Under League rule North Dakota launched energetically into numerous enterprises and sought to become its own financier. It opened a State bank. It started a home-building scheme. It attempted coal-mine seizures. It enacted legislation to seize necessary industries either in peace or war. It created an appointed State sheriff to whom all elected county sheriffs were made answerable. It subverted its public educational system to propagandize the League in all the public educational institutions. It attempted its own immigration commission to determine who should enter the State from Canada. That one tribunal expected to be the exemplar of law and order, its Supreme Court, indulged itself in a travesty of all order which might have gone well in opera-bouffe but was hardly expected in a serious government. Three newly elected League justices appeared at the capital and demanded their seats a month before their predecessors' terms expired. One of the court's League justices, evidently of journalistic bent, found a unique pastime in penning for the press a weekly letter which commented freely on his associates and discussed important cases up on appeal before they were decided. The League taught North Dakota some new tricks about how to perpetuate a State administration's power. It legally supplied the voter with advisers to help him prepare his ballot correctly. It then granted him the ingenious supplemental privilege of re-marking it at the polls upon discovery that he might have checked the wrong candidates.

It would be difficult to imagine a tranquil hour in North Dakota. Born in strife, it has been seething ever since. Long before the battle of the bottle made the American flag its champion and attacked the freedom of the seas, North Dakota wrestled single-handed with the demon rum. With its twin to the south it was the first State to write prohibition into its constitution when framed.

North Dakotans love their State with an admirable devotion. Their language describing it is rich with superlatives. They call Fargo the "biggest little city in the world" and don't relish having it belittled. They like to think of the Red River valley as the "world's bread basket" and to compare it to the Nile. Fargo assumes importance because it is the State's cultural, financial, and political clearing-house, but in more densely settled sections it wouldn't pass for a town of secondary consequence. Quite usual, Eastern in tone, similar to towns of 30,000 in Ohio or any Middle Atlantic State, it has a couple of bishops, plenty of churches, good public schools, an enterprising daily press, some handsome homes and streets, and an "exclusive set." There is considerable civic spirit in the State and nearly every hamlet has its "white way."

Yet with all its boasted State pride, notwithstanding its readiness to spend money on futile impeachment trials, on all sorts of elections and primaries, on new governmental experiments, North Dakota never has found the energy or wherewithal to build a decent State capitol. The nondescript hulk it calls a capitol unblushingly is shown to Bismarck visitors as one of the sights. And it is one. Although its location is superb on an ideal spot overlooking the town and the bald hills beyond the Missouri, it is a ramshackle, pieced-together arrangement, constructed in three sections, each of a different kind and color of brick—the front dark red, the middle wing vivid yellow, and the rear white. On all sides handsome new State capitols have been erected but North Dakota makes no effort to replace this architectural monstrosity. On its sloping grounds are the log cabin Roosevelt occupied during his three years at Medora, and a bronze statue the North Dakota women have reared to the Indian "bird woman" who guided Lewis and Clark across the Rockies.

Educationally North Dakota is quite abreast of other States. Its percentage of illiteracy is surprisingly small. Except for a meritorious but unknown epic drama of its famous Indian massacre by Aaron McGuffy Beede, an old Episcopal missionary among the Sioux, so far it hasn't figured much in literature and produced no distinctive literary geniuses of national renown—unless the monthly preambles of Sam Clark in his Jim Jam Jems could possibly rank him as a littérateur.

To live North Dakota's life is thrilling. It has a bleak, white winter when the mercury occasionally plays around forty degrees below and the railroad rails snap in the crispness. But there is a mighty call in its summer with its nine o'clock sunset and lingering twilight. And it has an irresistible autumn when the prairie chicken and wild-duck hunting is unequaled. From the picturesque undulations that pocket Minnesota's myriad sparkling lakes the country flattens out into the broad surface of North Dakota's smooth, fertile prairie which stretches away in a vast sweep to where the Bad Lands' jagged cliffs trace their lonely outline against the leafless Western sky. North Dakota possesses some strange germ that enters the blood and makes whoever leaves it always want to go back.

The next article in the series These United States, to appear in The Nation of August 22, will be Illinois: First Province of the Middle Kingdom, by Howard Vincent O'Brien.

Yiddish Literature: A Product of Revolt

By L. TALMY

IN Berlin in the summer of 1921 I chanced to come across a placard announcing something to the effect that the Society for Disclosing Unknown Art was presenting some Jewish performers who would act and recite in Yiddish.

I felt deeply stung with the insult of it. I knew the aim of the particular society: to introduce to an oversatiated European public the "unknown art" of semi-civilized tribes. But I could not make out what this noble aim had to do with Yiddish, the language spoken by my friends and myself, besides twelve million more people living in the very midst of modern civilization. A language the sound of which may be discerned amid the din and clatter on the streets and boulevards of the great capitals of the civilized world; a literature thriving in a dozen countries of Europe and America, and yet—"unknown art," to be introduced to super-aesthetic European audiences as something exotic alongside the strange and "unknown art" of semi-savage tribes living on the fringe of civilization.

This was sad enough. But sadder still was the further reflection that there really are millions of cultured people for whom it would be nothing less than a revelation to discover that there exists in this world anything that goes by the name of Yiddish literature, and those who have a faint idea of its existence would hardly be able to name a single Yiddish author. The number of Yiddish books translated into other languages is ridiculously small, and even these have gone practically unnoticed. Yiddish literature has remained quite provincial. Its influence has not gone beyond the limited circles of Yiddish readers. Its paths have not crossed the highways of world literature. Although living and thriving in the midst of modern civilization it is, indeed, still something to be discovered.

It is an anomaly. Probably Yiddish literature remains in the shadow because there are so many Jewish writers in the "accessible" literatures, just as the assimilated or assimilationist Jews are too frequently mistaken for the bulk of the Jewish people. The few feeble attempts which have been made by Jewish lovers of Yiddish literature to introduce it to the world by translating individual works have failed because these well-wishers could not approach their task with the necessary perspective. It still remains for the outsiders to dive into the depths of the Yiddish language in order to discover Yiddish literature in its native soil and then interpret it to the world and, in a way, to itself.

There is no doubt that such daring explorers will find their expedition an interesting adventure, even if they find little wealth of purely aesthetic values. They may be disappointed if they look for perfection of form, play of color, richness of music, or flights of exotic fancy. But in reward for their pains they will find a literature which is different, a literature the very shortcomings of which, from an aesthetic point of view, are perhaps most worth considering.

Yiddish literature bears little resemblance to the literature created by Jews in other languages, in that it is an outgrowth of and deeply rooted in Jewish life. Its characteristics are those of a life which, in form and substance, may be traced back to the Judean days of early Christianity. Although Yiddish literature is a product of modern times, it should be projected against a background stretching almost uninterruptedly over a waste of 1900 years. For, if "Christianity"—not in the glory of legend and fable, not as a religion but as a mode of life—has lived through all these centuries, it has done so under the name of Jewish life. This vestige of an early Christianity unfavorable to the flourishing of aesthetic values has determined the nature, in a general way, of Yiddish literature and its history, which is the history of the struggle for expression of a sensuality becoming articulate after it had been repressed through long generations.

That the Christian nations have made great achievements in the fine arts is but added proof that these nations have never really been converted to Christianity but have remained essentially heathen. It might seem that at a turning-point in history the rulers of the Roman world saw fit to stage the comedy of proclaiming Jesus a God and thus to concede enough to the poor and the slaves to appease their unrest and subdue the latent rebellious spirit. Not that it necessarily was a cleverly designed scheme to fetter the dissatisfaction of the masses—but ultimately it amounted to that. Christianity degenerated into a powerful weapon in the hands of the masters to command obedience. It was reduced to dead, meaningless formulas which were drowned in the splendor and display of heathen ritual. Communication between man and God became an extremely complicated affair. There was between them the hierarchy of heaven's representative on earth. Man was more than ever removed from God, and paganism ran riot as of yore. And this fact has proved rather a blessing to the growth of art. Man could give greater vent to his senses. Personality had more freedom to assert itself. And it is in the assertion of personality that the fine arts thrive.

It was quite different with the Jews. For them what is called Christian life crystallized into a mode of life indeed. It was in its origin the expression of the state of mind of a weak people in the dusk of its national independence—the instinct of a people which had plainly seen the hopelessness of the fight and groped for some mode of existence that would insure its self-preservation. It was after the irreconcilable zealots had laid down their heads on the walls of Jerusalem in a final desperate struggle against the legions of Vespasian and Titus that the people, in danger of utter extinction, turned instinctively to the path of physical nonresistance counterbalanced by the sense of spiritual superiority furnished by the old religion, and thus succeeded in steering with some measure of safety through the dark and cruel ages that followed. The people were panting for breath in the heavy grip of the Roman mailed fist. They saw the hopelessness of the struggle, and hopelessness breeds meekness, resignation. "Whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also." For consolation they looked to the life in the beyond. "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." The people's sense of justice could not admit the possibility that God would allow evil to rule the world. God was theirs. He was the "father in heaven." And ultimately justice would be done on earth. Then, with the coming of the Messiah, the Jews, the most oppressed, would come to their own again. This life was only a passageway. Real life began in the hereafter; meanwhile struggle was hopeless. If the Jews suffered and were persecuted such was the will of the father, and it was for the best. The more suffering, the greater the reward.

This essentially Christian acceptance of fate defined the life of the Jews and guided them—passive onlookers and sufferers in a world of brute force and pagan riotousness—through the darkest centuries up to the present time when even this last stronghold of original "Christianity" is tottering. This is an age of revolution, of social upheaval forming new social strata, new classes, sharpening distinctions, edging differences. But this revolution which swept over Europe in the nineteenth century was very late reaching into the Ghettoes of Eastern Europe. Within the walls was a different life, an established order of things which remained almost untouched by time and its changes, the life of a purely religious community. One had to make a living, too. The Jews traded, or toiled. But that was secondary. The big thing was religion, and every spare moment had to be devoted to it. Life centered in the synagogue, which for the Jew was not only his place of worship, but also his place of study and his club, his pride and consolation. The rabbi was the spiritual leader, counselor and judge, teacher and interpreter of the commandments of God and the great savants of old. There were no marked class distinctions, no caste differences. The aristocracy was one that had scholarly distinctions. To be a scholar meant to be versed in the Talmud and the writings of the later great rabbis. It meant to be nearer to the source of knowledge which is God's.

Things worldly were shunned. In so far as they were necessities, they were fitted into the religious system. Everything was foreseen and foreordained. Love affairs were unknown. Sexual relations were regulated by religion. Matches and marriages were arranged according to ancient patriarchal customs. One even had to wash his hands as a matter of religious duty. Nature was foreign, no Jew who was true to the commands of the ancestors would stop to meditate on nature. Every leisure hour had to be devoted to religious study and prayer.

The heroes of the Ghetto were not those who distinguished themselves by physical strength or by deeds of valor. Valor was only in the spiritual field—the valor of asceticism, achievement in the field of learning and in union with God, martyrdom, to die in torture with the name of God on the lips.

The members of these religious communities—they were even called "holy communities"—were united by strong bonds. There was the one religion penetrating every phase of life, shared by no other race or nationality. There were the mutual sufferings and persecutions. All Jews are brethren and children of one father in heaven. "All children of Israel are responsible for each other." They learned this from bitter experience. Contact with the outside world was feared, because this outside world was always hostile and menacing. They gave Caesar what was Caesar's. But in their inner life these communities might as well have been behind impenetrable walls. It was a gray and colorless life, turned inward and heavenward, never outward and earthward—the life which might have been that of an ideal Christian community.

Needless to say there hardly was any place for a secular literature and the arts in this life. Religion was a purely spiritual affair. God was one—and he was without an image. To make images was sin. If there were artists in the Ghetto, little remains except a few ornaments and woodcarvings in synagogues or on gravestones. If there were poets or fiction-writers they had to become maggidim, sayers, wandering preachers popularizing God's laws and the teachings of the great rabbis or badhons, public buffoons hired to sing, recite, and make merry at weddings or at religious festivals.

Out of this life a secular literature began to develop as late as the sixties or seventies of the past century. (It is true there are Yiddish books and manuscripts dating back to the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. But Yiddish literature, as a literature in the modern sense of the word, has developed only in the last half century.) It was then that the great revolution touched upon the Ghetto, and unrest began stirring amid the stiffness of ancient forms. Breezes from the outside world penetrated the Jewish communities, bringing messages from a beyond which was not of heaven but of the earth. The social upheaval in Europe could not leave Jewish life wholly untouched. There began a process of the disintegration of the Jewish community. The advent of industry in Eastern Europe brought economic changes into the Jewish town. With these the social distinctions became more marked. The youth was lured by the cities.

Yiddish literature was born. It sought to revolutionize Jewish life from the bottom up by battering away at the Jewish community with satire and ridicule. Its influence was no doubt revolutionary, at least among the poorer classes and the working people. But withal it had to adopt, in its first period, the characteristics of the life it was striving to uproot. Whether satirical or apologetic, Yiddish literature still plainly bore the marks of the traditional "holy community"; the spirit of Christianity was heavy upon it. Yiddish literature had to fall back upon an unmaterial spirituality wherein everything tangible and sensual had long been deadened by centuries of suppression. Religion had been a Procrustean bed which had effaced every trait of individuality within the life of the "holy community." It had deprived Yiddish literature of that moving force of artistic expression—the outstanding, dominating personality. It had robbed it of active heroes. For in the "holy community" a hero is he who conquers temptations, who subdues the emotions. The flesh was clay, form of the earth. Heaven, spirituality, needs no form.

Yiddish literature was groping for artistic expression. But where the senses had been subdued through many generations there was no outlet. It was turned inward, toward spirituality, schematization. Words were in the nature of flesh which only tended to imprison the spirit. The soul can be purified when the flesh is neglected, and for the sake of the purity of the spirit it would be well if it were possible to get along without words altogether. The ideal of the Cabbala student in Peretz's story is to attain a degree where he would sing not only without words but even without sounds—a literature of naked ideas, seldom clothed in the thin flesh of symbols, and more often in transparent allegories. Naked ideas on a background of gray.

However, the life of the traditional Jewish community with all its characteristics is swiftly passing away, and with it goes a period of Yiddish literature which is itself a monument to the spiritual and material rigidity of that life.

The revolution came late to the Jewish community, but the revolutionary process moved rapidly—as though Jewish life all at once made a tremendous and painful exertion to straighten its lines along the front of the surrounding world. This process was accelerated by the emigration which began in the eighties. The old community was broken up. The city, and especially America, uprooted and shattered the old unity of customs and traditions. New classes were formed. There appeared a Jewish laboring class which cast its lot with the workers of the respective countries. A Jewish bourgeoisie clamored for its place at the banquet table. The walls of the Ghetto fell, and the earthly beyond flooded in in heavy streams.

The immediate effect upon Yiddish literature of these swift changes was a wave of romantic reaction and a revival of hassidical mysticism which achieved their height in the years just preceding the World War. But this was also the swan song of those who remained spiritually bound to the old community, a parting mournful accord with a lingering echo. For already a new generation was springing up —a generation of those who have not known the life of old, or who were transplanted from its soil before they were too deeply submerged in its holiness. They brought into Yiddish literature what it lacked in its first period: personality, form, artistic expression.

It is probably not by chance that this new generation arose first in America. Here for the first time the old pressure of national persecution has been lifted from the shoulders of the Jewish immigrants. The Jewish masses from the secluded communities of Eastern Europe have shaken off the dust of centuries, straightened their backs, looked around them without apprehension, and seen life on earth. While in the Old World the Jewish community asserted itself by the passive means of "Christian patience," here the Jewish personality asserted itself by active struggle. The new Jewish writers and poets of America have frankly adopted this country as their own. They have conspicuously avoided reference to the "Jewish town" of Eastern Europe. That became something to be vanquished within oneself. Personality was the one precious treasure to be guarded zealously against the inroads of the collectivity. Away from the paths which might be paved with bricks labeled "problems"! Yiddish literature in America has thus reached the other extreme. It has become the apotheosis of personality.

This same struggle for the assertion of the Jewish personality has marked the development of modern Yiddish literature in Eastern Europe. There, however, it has asserted itself in the death-grip of armies and in the great social strife of the classes. The Jewish masses were shot out of their inertia and forced as active participants into the very midst of world history. The new Jewish personality which was hammered out in these struggles merged itself with the group—not of the passive herd, but a group determined to fight for the mastery of life, for the possession of the world, determined to conquer and build life anew. The young Yiddish writers and poets of Eastern Europe are not as jealous as their American colleagues of the integrity of their personality. They are children of the revolution, imbued with the powerful emotions of a self-conscious fighting group. They have learned to hate with passionate hatred and to show defiance with the abandon of outcasts. In the convulsions which the Jewish masses have lived through in Europe they have shaken off the last vestiges of their Christianity.

If some of the younger Yiddish poets indulge in blasphemy against Christianity and religion, it is from an awakened consciousness of what these things have been to the Jewish personality. It is as though Yiddish literature were aiming a final shot at the ghost of its former self, while it is establishing itself as the vigorous artistic expression of the new life begotten by the revolution.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter went to see Hiram and Hylan. He had never seen either of those great tribunes of the people, and it occurred to him that it was a little curious that New York City's defender of the people's right to be jostled a dollar's worth for a nickel should greet the California apostle of plain Americanism in evening clothes amid the gilt and crimson of the Waldorf-Astoria. Still, he reflected, the Waldorf has a political past, and the Mayor of New York certainly looked quite democratically uncomfortable in his dress suit.

* * * * *

BOTH the Senator from California and the Mayor of New York City read their speeches, but the Senator read better. The Mayor worked hard; the Senator was at ease on his feet. While his left hand held the manuscript his right hand was as busy as his voice, pointing heavenward, thumping thunderingly, stretched out flat in warning, refusing, questioning, insisting, with gestures as expressive as a Frenchman's. The Mayor, however, listened eagerly, intently, and appreciatively. His features beamed when the editor of the Boston Transcript quoted Emerson, Isaiah, and George Santayana in paying tribute to Hiram Johnson. But for his warmest approval Mayor Hylan had a method all his own. As the Drifter gazed about upon the faces of Tammany politicians and others gathered to do honor to Mr. Hearst's favorite candidate on that warm July night he gradually realized that while some clapped their applause and others expressed it in vigorous and rapid puffs from their cigars, Mayor Hylan chewed approval. His mouth, usually open, came to with a snap, and hands and jaws began working in perfect unison. It was a masterpiece of magisterial enthusiasm.

* * * * *

THE Drifter, being a cynic in politics, is not required to have political opinions of his own, but as a sporting proposition he would be willing to place a bet on the gospel according to Hiram Johnson as against the gospel according to Oscar Underwood. He has wandered, very pleasantly and peacefully, in Europe, but he shuddered with Hiram's audience when the Senator painted the blood-stained carpet of Europe and hinted at the hereditary feuds into which wicked propagandists were seeking to drag the innocent American people. The greatest applause of the evening came when Senator Johnson declared, with a mild reservation of course, that he "would not send a single American soldier again across the seas."

* * * * *

FURTHERMORE, the Drifter discovered in Hiram an orator with a real prose style. He "iterated and reiterated," he "solved and settled" as eloquently and repetitively as the hero of Bayard Hale's study of presidential style. There is one practice, however, against which the Drifter would warn the Senator. Senator Johnson dedicated himself "in my humble fashion," spoke "in my poor way," "paused a moment to sound my feeble warning." This business of self-depreciation is dangerous; it sometimes leads to strange mistakes. There is the case of Josiah Royce who, in the preface of his "Philosophy of Loyalty," sought to pay his tribute to William James. What he actually wrote was: "William James, but for whom no poor book of mine would ever have been written."

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Letters to the Editor should ordinarily not exceed 500 words, and shorter communications are more likely to be printed. In any case the Editor reserves the right to abridge communications.

The "Quite Unintelligible" Emerson

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A reading of Professor Sherman's latest book and of Mr. Boyd's review in your columns suggests the following question: Why is it that so many ardent defenders of tradition are ignorant of the very tradition which they champion? It so happens that in several of my essays I have quoted the phrase, "Beauty is its own excuse for being." This seems to have earned the special wrath of Professor Sherman, who in "The Genius of America" (page 241) calls it "oracular and quite unintelligible" and states that it was "invented" by the anti-Puritan theorists of the school of art for art's sake. It seems difficult to believe that any American should need to be told that the phrase was "invented" by Emerson and occurs in his poem Rhodora. The idea that "beauty, like truth, is an ultimate end" (the phrase is also Emerson's) is not the creation of "more or less alien-spirited guides," but appears in the essays of Poe, Emerson, and their contemporaries, and runs like a golden thread throughout the nineteenth century down to the very matter-of-fact John Burroughs. It is, in fact, a vital part of the American tradition of culture, which is not so rich that it can afford to ignore this golden thread. Poor as that tradition may be, it is infinitely richer than Professor Sherman's knowledge of it may lead him to suspect.

Amenia, N. Y., July 18 J. E. SPINGARN

More About Tax-Exempt Securities

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The language of the Sixteenth Amendment discussed by Mr. Furth in your issue of the 18th instant, "from whatever source derived," is so clear that no less an authority than Mr. Hughes, when governor, in his message to the New York Legislature advanced as an argument against the ratification of the amendment that its adoption would make it possible for the Federal government to tax income derived from State and municipal bonds. The same position was taken by Governor Wilson of Kentucky. Professor Minor of the law school of the University of Virginia was of the same opinion. Elihu Root took the opposite view.

What strikes one as peculiar is that with all the hue and cry against this form of tax-exempt income, the opposition to which is both public and private—public because of the wholesale opportunities to escape taxation as well as the encouragement given to reckless local undertakings and the spending of State and municipal funds, and private because of the competition of local government in the field "preempted" by private bankers and houses of issue—no effort is made to amend the income-tax law by placing such income on the same footing as other income which is taxable. Why is the long, roundabout way pursued of trying to get a two-thirds vote of the Congress and a three-fourths vote of the States for a further constitutional amendment when legislation requiring only a majority vote could be put through in less than half the time? The effort at constitutional amendment by way of insurance against an adverse decision of the United States Supreme Court should not be abandoned, but what is lost by legislation? Merely the chance that that court might say when the precise case comes before it that the words "from whatever source derived" do not include sources which may by implication from other provisions of the Constitution be beyond the power of the Congress to "destroy." On the other hand, owing to the delay incident to the ratification of a constitutional amendment, the constant drain of sources of revenue continues, indeed accelerates, through increasing efforts on the part of localities to put out issues that are hoped to be tax proof.

The whole maladroit procedure gives rise to the suspicion that the method that has been pursued to reach that class of income has not been selected in good faith but rather to buttress and safeguard the huge investment in tax-exempts already made by a constitutional declaration to the effect that income derived from future issues of State and municipal bonds may be taxed, and therefore, though not stated but coming within the well-known doctrine of "practical construction," that income from issues prior to the adoption of the proposed amendment is forever exempt.

New York, July 18 B. T.

Turkey and Armenia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: We beg leave to reply to Miss Papazian's letter of June 12, wherein she objected to certain statements made in our article The Turkish Myth. The venerable Arslanian, present Patriarch of Christian Armenia and certainly more qualified to speak for his people than are absentee patriots, stated to the Chicago Tribune representative in Constantinople on April 30:

> There is no truth in the story that my people have appealed to Sir Horace Rumbold to raise any Armenian question at Lausanne. We formally disapprove of propaganda conducted by Armenians abroad. This only arouses animosity and accomplishes nothing. It makes the Armenian people a mere cloak for the selfish policies of the Great Powers. We Armenians are participating wholeheartedly in the elections as our duty. We are resolved to work hand in hand with Turkey in the interests of the nation.

The Patriarch was not under Turk coercion or influence, being at the time under the protection of Allied guns. Miss Papazian says that the recent independence of Armenia was achieved by the Armenians. True, but by Armenians at home, working hand in hand with members of the new government of Turkey. We did not, as Miss Papazian suggests, ignore testimony of eye-witnesses as to alleged massacres. One of the writers, Mr. Moss, has spent considerable time in the Near East and has first-hand knowledge of atrocities perpetrated by Kurdish bands (as was admitted in our article), and also knows of many atrocities committed by Armenian, Greek, Bulgar, and Serb comitadje.

ARTHUR MOSS

Paris, July 2 FLORENCE GILLIAM

Contributors to This Issue

ROBERT DELL, formerly Paris correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, now lives in Berlin.

ROBERT GEORGE PATERSON, formerly the Legislative Correspondent and later the City Editor of the Fargo Forum, is now with the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.

L. TALMY is the editor of Reconstruction, organ of the All-Russian Jewish Public Committee in America.

Books

Defiance

Escapade. By Evelyn Scott. Thomas Seltzer. $3.

THIS book tells the story of a high and heroic adventure, an adventure entered upon with complete intellectual lucidity and lived through with astonishing fortitude. Uncharted seas and poisoned trenches are not more deadly than that extra-social limbo into which the two people spoken of were plunged. For they evidently permitted themselves none of the easements, the subterfuges, and precautions which can mitigate even such a situation as theirs. Armed only with justice and love, stripped of money, friends, their own civilization, their very names, these two adventured forth. They found themselves in a purgatory all the more intolerable as there was nothing in them to be purged. All moral, as opposed to legal, values were on their side. To that consideration the world turned a front of granite. The martyrdom, while it lasted, was complete.

The scene of that martyrdom happened to be Brazil, not the Brazil of planters' or consuls' verandas overlooking the Bay of Rio de Janeiro, but the Brazil of the common people—a place of poisonous beasts, poisonous diseases, heat, stench, ordure. A place, too, of unbearably sharp colors. And since Evelyn Scott is acutely sensitive to color and the mood of color, the picture she gives us of the places in which her high adventure was lived has an iridescence like that of fiery death and glittering decay.

She lives largely through the eye. Clear as her mind was in regard to the quality of her adventure, great as were her sufferings and her fortitude, she never ceases for a moment to be an impressionistic painter in words to whom, quite ultimately, the "values" of the visible scene appear to be of more importance than the magnificent defiance she flung at the world. Thus her narrative consists of a string of tiny episodes, pictures, fierce, strange, garish little idyls, and is never permitted to gather sweep, passion, or the spiritual impact to which its substance and its story could so easily have aspired. A story of heroic adventure thus becomes singularly unheroic. It is clear visioned, skilful, even brilliant; it is unheroic. Its impressiveness must be inferred. The words never strike upon the heart.

They are not meant to do so. The book is written within an ultra-modern convention. It is not a convention of the impassive, nor of the stoic; the convention does not actually imply a fear of emotion and eloquence. It is a convention of morbidezza, of the trivializing, through a literary method, of things of large import, a convention that reduces imagination to fancy, figures to conceits, that is ashamed or afraid ever to speak largely, simply, passionately. It has not passed beyond sophistication. It is still fettered, unconsciously perhaps, by the opinions of peoples who sit in cafes and declare Swift and Milton and even Rousseau vieux jeu and insist on chattering about T. S. Eliot and Gauguin.

I make this point precisely because Evelyn Scott's talent seems to me so strong and rare and because to that talent is now added a confession which raises her human dignity, courage, strength at least to the level of that talent. Her gift, her experience, her moral power should have combined to produce a work that touched greatness through passion, conviction, through "exaltations, agonies and love and man's unconquerable mind." The touch of greatness is quite missing. There are morbid acuteness of vision, moments of intense literary skill, phrases of sudden, striking felicity. The reader is pleased, astonished, fascinated. He is never enlarged, never carried beyond himself, never lifted into a region where skill and acuteness are forgotten and merged into larger and nobler qualities and considerations. And the book ends with an episode of complete obscurity. What leaves a trained, attentive, and sympathetic reader puzzled is not literature.

Yet it is clear from these very considerations that "Escapade" is indeed literature, that the major portion of it belongs to what we have in America of quite serious art. Nor is it the critic's function to wish that an author should write otherwise than that author has, in fact, chosen to write. The critic may, however, assert that here is art which seems to him cramped, fettered, enfeebled by causes not rooted in the author's creative vision or faculty, but arising from a passing mood and fashion. The poets of England did not remain "metaphysical." Our period, too, needs plainer, manlier, more passionate expression. Evelyn Scott is young enough to become a sharer and a fashioner of that needed change of speech and form. LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Luminous Psychology

Psychology and Politics. By W. H. R. Rivers. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.75.

Conflict and Dream. By W. H. R. Rivers. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.75.

EVERY age has its pet credulities, and if our favored miracles have passed off as psychological science it is not the first time that a changeling has found its way into the history of thought. There has been in the last decade an unprecedented flood of books that have pretentiously anatomized human nature, and offered social psychology as social salvation. The war did something to cure us of our naive belief that new terms could cure old evils; we are ceasing to be gullible idolators of hasty science. But there have grown up, along with the more orthodox psychology of the crowd, the spectacular hypotheses of the Freudians. The subject matter of the latter, consisting chiefly of sex and dreams, has in itself been sufficiently glamorous to win widespread popular attention. Lurid generalizations about life, conduct, and the cosmos, based largely on material drawn from the pathological clinics, has penetrated even as far as the hack short story and the vaudeville stage.

The reaction has just about set in. In the words of the author of these two modest and luminous books: "There is now a serious danger that psychology will fall into discredit partly owing to the zeal of its votaries for the unconscious and infantile aspects of the mind, but still more owing to premature attempts to utilize its supposed discoveries practically while the basis upon which they rest is uncertain and insecure. It seems to me almost certain that there will be a reaction against the almost universal interest which the study of psychology excites today, and that we are approaching a period when it may even become a matter of ridicule to make those references to psychological explanation and interpretation which now arouse such hopes and interest."

But the excesses of its votaries and the overreaching ambitions of this embryo science need not blind us to its incalculably promising future. It needs only to be recognized that a science of human nature remains a desideratum rather than an accomplishment, a hope rather than a history. And it is from such sensible and unpretentious books as these two by the late Dr. Rivers that that hope will chiefly come.

"Psychology and Politics" is the title given to a book of lectures and essays prepared by Dr. Rivers at various times and for various occasions, and edited by his friend G. Eliot Smith after the former's untimely death. The essays are in varying measure suggestive; and that is all that they are intended to be. They have that frequent felicity of English scholarship, the distillation of much thought into a clear bright essence. From the point of view of insight and method the first essay is perhaps chiefly important. A psychiatrist by profession, called upon suddenly to stand for parliamentary election from the University of London, Dr. Rivers proceeds in his title essay to consider anew the relation between psychology and politics. He points out by means of several pointed illustrations that it is too early for the psychologist to teach the statesman or the political scientist anything. Rather the reverse is the case.

Knowledge of the facts of social and political behavior can make a far greater contribution to our psychology than any psychological knowledge we at present possess can make to our understanding and treatment of current social and political problems. It is from the data of social and political behavior that the psychologist must derive his hypotheses, and in the facts of social and political behavior that he must test them. Social psychology to be relevant to the collective action it tries to explain must be a formulation of the observed connections between the facts of collective action; otherwise it is doctrinaire metaphysics masquerading as empirical science.

In the chief of the remaining essays in this volume Dr. Rivers attempts to turn to account recent findings in his own field of psychiatry, in so far as these findings have clear social incidence. Thus he points out that there is, in a genuine sense, an analogy between the morbid in the psychology of the individual and the morbid in sociology. In both cases fundamental incoherences and maladjustments must be faced and cured; it is not sufficient that their symptoms be treated and palliated, and their causes left operative and obscure. In his essay on "Instinct in Society" Dr. Rivers seems to have been rather unnecessarily hypnotized by the "herd instinct" under which rubric so much explanation was a few years ago being performed. But even in this essay Dr. Rivers has wise and humane things to say.

"Psychology and Politics" might be described as a book of wisdom, the work of an expert technician and an intimate observer of life. "Conflict and Dream" shows Dr. Rivers perhaps in his more familiar professional surroundings. A student and practitioner of psychiatry, he tries in this volume, in a journalistic phrase, to edit Freudianism, to point its essential truths, and prune away its excrescences. The volume consists largely of a singularly clear and candid and documented analysis of dreams of the author and his patients. These analyses give the impression of directness, simplicity, and common sense. They are interpretations of what is there. Dr. Rivers's conclusions—and he is suggestive rather than dogmatic—differ in several important respects from those of Freud. Dreams are for him, in the first place, not characteristically wish fulfilments—nightmares are in essence the reverse; they are rather attempted solutions in sleep of waking conflicts in the life of the dreamer. Secondly, where Freud and his followers refer the origin, content, and structure of the dream back to infantile conflicts and repressions, Dr. Rivers insists that all dreams are traceable to some recent conflict in the waking experience. The apparent infantile character of the dream is explicable from the fact that the infantile mode of mental functioning alone is available when the higher or more recently acquired modes of mental functioning have been put out of activity in sleep. The adult personality is not completely dormant, however, and dreams are in consequence curious hodge-podges of recent adult contents confused with early infantile symbols. The cause and content of the dream are largely recent and adult in character; the symbols and modes of it are alone infantile. Thirdly, Dr. Rivers differs from Freud in insisting that, however transformed and disguised the essential meaning of a dream becomes, there is never a really radical displacement; that is, the chief element of the apparent dream is never a minor element of the actual conflict of which it is an expression.

It is difficult to pass judgment on the validity of these specific contentions; they are modestly and consistently developed and are supported by clear and impeccable evidence. But both these books are important for their suggestions rather than their conclusiveness. They are welcome additions even to the unending literature of the now no longer "new psychology." Both of them are examples of specific suggestiveness, of the opening of new avenues and new vistas to the understanding of human nature. That, for the present, is all that an honest psychology can set out to be. One regrets that Dr. Rivers's contributions to so important a human inquiry are at an end.

IRWIN EDMAN

Serbian Secrets

Die Ermordung des Erzherzogs Franz Ferdinand von Stanoje Stanojevic. Aus dem serbischen Manuskript übertragen von Hermann Wendel. Frankfurt a. M.: Frankfurter Societäts-Druckerei. 1923.

NOW comes a Serbian professor of history with a new explanation of the murder of Serajevo and the origin of the Great War. What he says of Serajevo is most important, for he was a member of and a lecturer for the Narodna Odbrana, which Austria accused of inciting the murder. Not this society, whose actions were public, but a secret organization, the Ujudinjenje ili Sinrt, "Union or Death," he says, was responsible. And not this organization but its chief, Colonel Dimitrijevic.

Of Dimitrijevic he paints an entrancing picture. Proud, gifted, aristocratic, a convincing speaker and a skilful organizer, he played a leading part in the palace murders of the revolution of 1903; sent a man named Jovanic, alias Lala, to murder the Austrian Crown Prince in 1911 (Lala mysteriously disappeared in Vienna); attempted an officers' revolution in Macedonia early in 1914, and tried to organize a Bulgarian revolution in February; obtained arms for the young Bosnians who did the deed at Serajevo in July, 1914, without informing his own committee (which disavowed him, too late to stop the murder); in 1916 sent a Greek from Corfu to kill Constantine, and was shot on the Salonica front in 1917 for an attempted assassination of Crown Prince Alexander.

Dimitrijevic was chief of the information service of the Serbian General Staff in 1914. After Kaiser Wilhelm and the Austrian heir met at Konopischt in the spring of 1914, he received secret information from the Russian General Staff that Germany and Austria had agreed upon a plan to destroy Serbia. This he believed, and he concluded that assassination of Franz Ferdinand, Serbia's arch-enemy in Austria, was the surest way to prevent war. Two young Bosnians came to Belgrade about that time, and the arrangements were made.

Thus Professor Stanojevic, who knew Dimitrijevic and played a part in earlier secret committees. The story has the value of Professor Stanojevic's memory; it sounds plausible; but one man's memory does not get us very far. L. S. G.

History

The Trend of History. By William Kay Wallace. The Macmillan Company. $3.

"WE are standing on the threshold of an unpolitical age. Politics has fallen from its high estate. . . . The preeminence of the state politically conceived has been called into question. . . . Other forms of corporate organization are pressing for recognition. We may in turn see arising before our eyes a new, great social organization . . . in its essence unpolitical . . . 'Industrialism,' which may serve to denominate this new institution, is a social and economic system, only indirectly political. Such would appear to be the trend of history."

This quotation characterizes the standpoint of this entire volume, which, barring a few minor flaws in emphasis and fact, is one of the best summaries of the historical "origins of twentieth-century problems" at hand. History to Wallace is not a dead-level cataloguing of dry events, but a socio-psychological reconstruction of past trends for present prediction. Starting with an analysis of the shift from the theocratic-legalistic idea of the state at the breakdown of Medievalism to the politico-juridic conception, the author reviews in bold, telling strokes the rise and meaning of the middle-class control of our Western world. Consequent to the Enlightenment and the Revolution in France, and the Industrial Revolution in England, the bourgeoisie, bringing the expansion of industrialism and the rise of nationalism with them, came rapidly into power.

The marriage of capitalism and the nationalistic state marks the significant epoch from 1750 to the twentieth century. All historical movements overlap and at the moment when this alliance of bourgeois economics and nationalism seemed supreme, even final, the new movement of proletarian class-consciousness was arising. The very forces of the industrial age—the internationalizing of markets and sources of raw materials—tended to divorce the nexus of narrow nationalism and laissez-faire economics upon which rests middle-class security.

Wallace believes that the super-state imperialism, the Realpolitik, of Disraeli and Bismarck is nearer the internationalism which the modern industrial world has created and hence, in that manner, nearer the proletarian movement than the timid, temporizing, bourgeois civilization could ever be. The notion of the state as power, so exaggerated by Bismarck, bears certain resemblances to the Hegelian notions poured forth by Marx. Therefore the grafting of an industrial state, rather than a middle-class democratic one, on an aristocratic regime in Russia is easier than a like movement would be in powerful but decaying capitalistic Western Europe or America.

The very forces brought to life by nationalism and middle-class industrialism have burst the frames originally laid down for them. "Economics henceforth was to dictate to politics the aims of policy." Exploitation, the forceful bearing of European industrial culture to backward countries, the struggle for markets, the militarization of Europe, even the pacific interdependence of art and science, all augured for a new era of which the recent war in Europe seems to have been definitely part and parcel.

While the present book stops with the Bismarckian period, it is hoped that the writer will add another volume which will bring the trend of history to date and show the subsequent steps, if possible, in the reorientation in the present world to this newer basis which he has here so well outlined.

KIMBALL YOUNG

Leopardi Translated

The Poems of Leopardi. By Geoffrey L. Bickersteth. Cambridge University Press. 30s.

IN a large, handsome volume the Senior Lecturer in English Literature in the University of Glasgow gives us a specimen of that complete mastery of subject, that fulness and clearness of presentation, which we oftenest associate with British scholarship in the ancient classics. The nucleus of the work is an edition of Leopardi's Canti based on Mestica's text, face to face with an English poetic version in the meters of the original. Some fifty pages of notes afford not only the explanations called for by difficulties of expression or allusion, but also everything in the way of biographical and literary connection that can enhance the reader's understanding. Bibliography and index bring up the rear.

At the front is an introduction, divided into three parts which of necessity more or less overlap: The Poet's Life, The Poet's Art, The Poet's Thought. Here one gets the impression of a critic thoroughly in sympathy with his author—a sympathy due, one surmises, rather to profound comprehension than to affinity of temperament. The first part is the most pleasing. Why is it that Leopardi's strange, pathetic career is generally so uninteresting in the narration? At last we have the story told with all its poignancy, with sufficient but not excessive abundance, with wise proportion, and with constant regard to its outcome in immortal song. The Poet's Art is attractive especially to the versifier, although, with its insistence on Leopardi's doctrine of clearness, simplicity, and adaptation of form to matter, it must in any thoughtful reader stimulate appreciation of that which makes verse poetry. The third part, The Poet's Thought, is perhaps the least satisfactory, not from any inadequacy of treatment, but rather because the theme itself seems to grow thinner the more one expounds it. Perhaps it is true of poet-philosophers in general—of Shelley, of Alfred de Vigny, of Leopardi, even of Goethe—that their philosophy is best apprehended in their own words, and seldom lends itself to restatement in prose.

As to the translations, which, one may conjecture, were the occasion of the rest of this truly monumental work, they show, in addition to the fine understanding which one naturally takes for granted in the case of such a student, a delicate sense of movement and euphony and a resourceful intelligence in coping with a tremendously hard task. For Leopardi's poetry, despite its suggestion of spontaneous flow from the author's pen, was really produced with immense toil, and offers the translator a problem of corresponding magnitude. One cannot have everything. The concise yet easy elegance, the simple grace which Leopardi derived in great measure from his study of Petrarch and the Greek poets, defy continuous reproduction in an alien language. To say that the version approximates the charm of the original is high praise. Mr. Bickersteth's greatest success lies perhaps in his copy of Leopardi's melody and rhythm. In the poet's canzone libera, rhythm is of the acoustic elements by far the most important; and this rhythm, so fitful yet so regular, so exactly harmonized with syntax and with sense, the translator has with surprising dexterity transferred to our hyperborean tongue.

C. H. GRANDGENT

A Many-Sided Man

A Life of Francis Amasa Walker. By James Phinney Munroe. Henry Holt and Company. $4.

THIS biography of Francis A. Walker is the record of an American who, in the space of fifty-seven years, won distinction in four careers: as a soldier, in the civil service of the government, as an educator, and as an economist.

Inheritance and opportunity combined to give Walker an unusual start in life. His father, Amasa Walker, was a man of high standing as a writer on economic topics, as a teacher, and as a public-spirited citizen; when Francis was twenty-one the outbreak of the Civil War summoned him, and he enlisted in a Massachusetts regiment. His rise was rapid, and as assistant adjutant general of the famous Second Army Corps (Hancock's) he won recognition for his ability and his bravery. His work as a military historian in later years was by no means an inconspicuous service to his comrades in arms and to his country. In the years following the war up to 1881 he made a notable record as Superintendent of the Ninth and the Tenth Census, as Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as Chief of the Bureau of Awards of the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia, and as professor of history and political economy in the Sheffield Scientific School at Yale. From 1881 till his death in 1897 he was president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; to this period also belong his major writings in the field of political economy.

To the economic thought of his time Walker made a contribution of sound common sense and independent judgment. Doing pioneer work in this field, he incurred at first the contempt of the old practitioners; but the ancient abstractions yielded before his searching analysis, his grip on reality, and his humanizing sense that he was dealing with questions affecting the welfare of living men. In England, as in the United States, "he woke men up and made them think again." His championship of international bimetallism before and during the campaign of 1896 is an illustration of independence of surrounding influences not often seen in a college president. At the same time he was the stimulating comrade of fellow-workers in the field of economics. Few things reveal so vividly his genius in leadership as the encouragement he gave to the younger men in the American Economic Association, of which he was the first president.

Courage and independence were again the watchwords of General Walker's career as president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. In 1881 all that the institution had to its credit was one building, a handful of students, and the great name and inspired vision of its founder, William Barton Rogers. It was almost a discredited pioneer, and had barely escaped absorption into the Scientific School of Harvard University. With all his powers of mind and soul, Walker made himself the champion of the Institute. He insisted on the validity of the new type of education based on science and scientific method; he reiterated the importance of autonomy. The response to his call in money, students, and teachers was little short of marvelous, and in an incredibly brief time the prestige of the school was high.

Of the author of the biography just issued it may be said that a considerable portion of his life has served as preparation for this labor of love. He was intimately associated with Walker in the administrative work of the Institute, he has been for many years secretary of the corporation, and he is known among Tech alumni and in the world of education for his furtherance of the ideals for which Technology stands. The volume which he has written is distinguished by its fine balance in the presentation of the character and achievements of a many-sided being. To him Walker has never ceased to be a living influence, and it is Walker the man who stands forth in these pages.

HENRY G. PEARSON

Une Grande Dame

Lady Palmerston and Her Times. By Mabell, Countess of Airlie. 2 vols. George H. Doran and Company. $7.50.

IN "The Education of Henry Adams" a high tribute is paid to Lady Palmerston, attendance at whose "at homes" the young American, in his lonely days in London, found to be "a lesson in social education." This book consists mainly of a collection, accompanied by necessary interpretation, of letters exchanged between her and her brother, Lord Beauvale, together with correspondence that passed between her and Lord Palmerston. The period covered ranges from the death of Princess Charlotte in 1817 to that of Lord Palmerston himself in 1865. Lady Palmerston was almost the last of the powerful grandes dames of the old Whig party, and it was well worth while to preserve her sprightly chronicle of those events of British politics and London society which she had such exceptional opportunities of observing at close quarters. The Dowager Countess of Airlie has performed her editorial task with sympathy and understanding, and has added to the value of the book by introductory chapters in which she skilfully summarizes the characteristics of the circle in which Lady Palmerston moved and the most noteworthy social conditions of the time.

HERBERT W. HORWILL

Books in Brief

Old English Grammar. By Joseph Wright and Elizabeth Mary Wright. Humphrey Milford. Oxford University Press. $2.70.

This grammar, like the others in the series in which it appears, is historical and comparative in plan. But the treatment is not unified. The volume falls into two distinct treatises. The first, Phonology, is an exceedingly able introduction to the whole range of Indo-Germanic philology; the second, Accidence, which deals with Old English Grammar proper, will not serve the student as well as several existing manuals nor the scholar as well as Sievers's monumental work.

Times Have Changed. By Elmer Davis. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.

The rather hesitant opening pages of this book lead the reader to expect an easygoing tale of the trials of suburban married life, and he is surprised to find himself suddenly involved in a whirl of haphazard adventures that turn the mild solace of the hero's "evening off" into a feverishly active week-end. The complications are designed solely for the reader's entertainment; character development is an extraneous consideration. But as the performance of willy-nilly antics is on the whole ingeniously planned and swiftly carried out, the reader ought to ask for nothing more.

Psychoanalysis and Suggestion Therapy. By Dr. Wilhelm Stekel. Moffat, Yard and Company. $2.

Stekel is candid, sensible, and moderate. Working with the really profound truth that "every neurosis is the result of a mental conflict" which the patient doesn't have to solve so long as he can hug his neurosis, the author illustrates the patient's general reluctance to be cured at all and thence shows the true nature of the many apparently queer results of psychoanalytic treatment. Especially refreshing is Dr. Stekel's warning against our American tendency to make of the new therapy a game, a fad, and a mystery.

Farewell to America. By Henry W. Nevinson. B. W. Huebsch, Inc. 50 cents.

This tiny essay of Mr. Nevinson was thoroughly worthy of book form by virtue of the wit, wisdom, good humor, and imaginative insight with which it records, in symbolical fashion, some of the salient differences between American and English civilization.

The New Education in Europe
An account of recent fundamental changes in the educational philosophy of Great Britain, France and Germany which record distinct progress.
By Dr. FREDERICK W. ROMAN Price, $5.00 E. P. Dutton & Co

RAILROAD MELONS RATES AND WAGES, a Handbook of Railroad Information, by Charles Edward Russell, gives in 332 pages the relevant facts about the railroads with the clearest possible argument for buying them on the basis of what the capitalists really put into them, instead of buying back what was stolen from the public in the past. Cloth, $2.00 postpaid.
Charles H. Kerr & Company, 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

MJ The Amherst Books MJ

PARTIES AND PARTY LEADERS

By ANSON D. MORSE

Introduction by
DWIGHT W. MORROW

The origin and development of the American party system from the close of the Revolutionary period down to 1914 is here given by a clear-minded analyst of American institutions. The subject is intensively treated, from the place of "party" in a political system to the significance of the Republican and Democratic parties of the present day.

Price $2.50

MJ MARSHALL JONES COMPANY
212 Summer Street, Boston MJ

International Relations Section

Kuzbas Tells Its Own Story

STIRRED by the charges aired in American newspapers by disgruntled ex-members of their colony, a group of American workers in the pioneer industrial colony "Kuzbas" at Kemerovo in the Kuznets basin, Siberia, sends the following statement to the American public through The Nation:

TO THE AMERICAN PUBLIC:

From time to time during the past few months word has come to us, in clippings and in letters, that many false statements have been published in the American press about Kuzbas Colony in Kemerovo. We feel impelled, therefore, to write the following report of actual conditions here in order to correct any false impressions.

The American colony is only a small percentage of the working force of the industry, Kuzbas. There are 2,100 workers and employees in the Kemerovo mines and chemical plant, and a census of the American colony taken in April showed the total number of colonists to be 333. Of these, 183 men and 48 women work in the enterprise, 32 women do housework, and 70 are children.

These 231 American workers represent the various trades and professions as follows: 60 qualified miners, 50 mechanics, 25 carpenters and construction workers, 10 electricians, 15 lumber workers, 15 farmers, 25 technicians and office workers. The balance include miscellaneous trades—cooks, bakers, shoemakers, tailors, nurses, etc.

The general manager of the Soviet State Enterprise Kuzbas is S. J. Rutgers, a well-known Dutch engineer, a graduate of Delft University. Rutgers has had many years' experience in engineering work in Holland (where he built the port of Rotterdam), and in the East Indies, China, Japan, and America. Alfred Pearson, Jr., technical director of the enterprise, is a mining engineer of long experience in America, and is thoroughly American in his ideas and training. During the World War he was captain of engineers in the United States army. There are several other members of the colony who are ex-service men. W. H. Kingery, the present farm manager, came with a special recommendation from the speaker of the legislature of his State, as an expert agriculturist. Dr. William H. Mahler, chief engineer of the chemical plant, is a graduate of the University of Vienna and holds a degree from the Zurich Polytechnic School. He has had thirty years' experience in coke by-products and dyes, fifteen of which were spent in the United States. There are representatives here of the best-known educational institutions, including graduates of Cornell University, Columbia, the universities of California, Wisconsin, Michigan, Ohio, and Indiana, Lehigh University, Barnard and Williams colleges.

Colonists becoming members of Kuzbas bound themselves to work at their highest capacity for a period of two years in the enterprises of Kuzbas. During this time they were to provide themselves with clothes from America, and were to pay $100 to cover part of the food to be consumed by them, and $200 to cover transportation and tools. At the end of the period they were to receive a bonus of an amount not fixed, but to be determined by the success of the enterprise during that time. They were at all times to be subject to the decisions of the Soviet authorities and signed a pledge accepting this condition. In case the management and the Soviet authorities came into such conflicts that they could not agree, all of the colonists were to be given free transportation for themselves and their belongings to the Russian border. All moneys paid to the organization Kuzbas were accepted as loans, payable without interest, at such time (not sooner than two years) as the production of the industry should warrant it. No promises were held out which would lead any person to invest money for the financial rewards to be obtained. The basis for loans and contributions was that Kuzbas is an industrial experiment to aid in the rehabilitation of the disrupted Russian industries. As such it is functioning today.

Since the colony, far from being in disagreement with the Soviet authorities and breaking up, has actually received a subsidy, for the development of the enterprise, of one million dollars gold credit, and since the colonists are actually paid wages in money above the satisfactory standard of living promised them, it would seem that those colonists who have left are failing in the fulfilment of their contract, whereas, in all major particulars, the Soviet Government has made more liberal terms than promised. It would seem, therefore, that those colonists were not entitled to anything beyond their releases under a strict reading of the contract. However, the following terms are accorded to all leaving prior to the expiration of the two years' contract: Third-class fare to the border, including sleeping accommodations; cash allowance of one-half milliard per person (averaging, according to the rate of exchange, $10 American money); food allowance for one month, equivalent to ration allowed in Kemerovo; in cases where people were in bad health, all expenses to the United States for themselves and their families; and the management adopted the policy of purchasing tools from departing colonists to increase their traveling funds.

The industrial basis for Kemerovo lies in its mines and its chemical plant. Eight large brick and concrete and numerous small buildings constitute the chemical plant, which is the only one in Siberia. It is designed to produce from the one battery which is completed 200 tons of coke per day. While this plant is 85 per cent complete, and the one battery of fifty ovens entirely finished, it does not pay to operate until the by-products can be utilized. A special mission has just returned from Germany, where those materials were purchased which are necessary for the completion of the plant.

On the opposite side of the river are three working mines. According to the report of Professor Usoff of the University of Tomsk, one-fourth of the entire known coal deposits of the world are in Kuznets Basin. An aerial bucketway transports the coal across the river Tom to the railroad and chemical plant. All the auxiliary equipment for a plant far from its source of supplies is here in a degree that is not usual in America. We operate two saw-mills, a lime kiln, two brick kilns, three power stations, two machine shops, a foundry of 30-ton capacity, a boiler-making plant, a small coke plant, and other separate small industries.

This is a government enterprise, and as such we find the same rigid adherence to maximum labor conditions as obtains in government enterprises in the United States. The eight-hour day is universal, except that underground workers, office employees, and those under eighteen work only six hours. It is carefully prescribed, and even more carefully enforced, that youths and women shall not work at night, or in heavy or dangerous occupations, or overtime. It is required that the enterprise carry a given percentage of apprentices who now number over 100 out of the 2,100 employees. It is also required that all workers be given two weeks' vacation with pay annually, the enforcement of which increases the working force 10 per cent. Those engaged in dangerous or unhealthful occupations get one month. In cases of childbirth, women are given vacations of eight weeks before and eight weeks after confinement, with full pay and hospital treatment. According to the collective agreement between the enterprise Kuzbas and the Miners' Union, the management pays an amount equal to 17 per cent of the pay roll to the workers' insurance fund, so that all workers are taken care of in sickness and accidents. Medical services—major and minor—together with medicines are furnished free, being included in the insurance costs of the industry, covering also treatment in sanitariums free of charge. . . . All of the American colonists and over 80 per cent of the employees belong to the union.

The American colonists are industrially on a footing equal to the Russians, but when their ability enables them through the use of better methods to increase their production, they benefit to the full extent of that increase. This enables the Americans to average considerably higher earnings than the Russians, though the work is based on the same norms of production. As more and more machinery is introduced this is becoming increasingly apparent.

Prior to February 1, 1923, the American colony was not in control of the industry and was attempting to function under an impossible condition of dual management. But since the Americans took over the management of the Kemerovo Mines there has been a steady progress in organization and production. The plants and equipment were in a run-down condition; there was an enormous overhead due to inefficient management and an inordinate number of employees. A complete reorganization is being effected; the American management is steadily reducing forces, and at the same time increasing production. The accompanying statistics show this.

UNDER RUSSIAN MANAGEMENT

| Article | Unit Metric | Oct. | Nov. | Dec. | Jan. | Average |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Coal | Tons | 5,688 | 6,408 | 8,630 | 7,096 | 6,950 |
| Per cent of Government Program... | | 40.56 | 45.7 | 59.8 | 53.41 | 49.9 |
| Coke | Tons | 203 | 172 | 216 | 48 | 160 |
| Per cent of Government Program... | | 103.3 | 87.5 | 109.7 | 24.4 | 81.2 |
| Sawmills | 100 cu. ft. | 237 | 162 | 179 | 95 | 168 |

UNDER AMERICAN MANAGEMENT

| Article | Unit Metric | Feb. | March | April | May | Average |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Coal | Tons | 9,214 | 12,783 | 10,190 | 10,441 | 10,657 |
| Per cent of Government Program... | | 70.22 | 77.94 | 87.51 | 79.6 | 78.82 |
| Coke | Tons | 177 | 222 | 255 | 257 | 228 |
| Per cent of Government Program... | | 89.8 | 112.6 | 199.2 | 130.7 | 133.1 |
| Sawmills | 100 cu. ft. | 62 | 305 | 522 | ... | 296 |

Note: This has been accomplished with a reduction of over 20 per cent in the number of employees.

In reporting on the living conditions in Kemerovo it must be stated at the outset that housing has been bad during the past winter, but is rapidly improving. In general it was not possible to assign more than one room to a family, and in cases where there were children this worked a hardship. The single men were assigned to log barracks and found conditions very similar to an army camp. As one ton of coal per month is allotted to each stove, everyone kept warm during the winter. . . .

A sufficient percentage of the wages of the American workers (at present amounting to 60 per cent) is deducted for food and laundry service. In other words, each worker, regardless of his category, turns over 60 per cent of his wages to the common food fund, and thus all have an equal standard of living. It must be pointed out that this common fund also supports, besides the 231 workers whose wages are contributed to it, 102 dependents, including thirty-two women who, having young children, cannot work in the industry, and seventy children. Thus the essentials of the original conception of the colony have been preserved while at the same time it has been brought into harmony with the changed economic policy of the state.

Around the World

Another Cruise
on the "SAMARIA"
1924
Jan. 26th—June 3rd

Sailing Eastward in the Path of Spring

TO TRAVEL around the globe, into the heart of strange continents, where the call of the muezzin, the tinkle of temple bells, the songs of Geishas weave the spell of enchantment complete! A dream which you too, perhaps, have wished to see come true.

Within the compass of 130 days, you will come to know old civilizations, different people, odd customs; will visit Madeira, Gibraltar, historic and picturesque Mediterranean borderlands, including Egypt and the Nile, India, Burma, Ceylon, Java, China, Philippines, Japan —at the height of Cherry Blossom time —Hawaiian Islands, San Francisco, Panama, etc.

Cook's Travel Service—with its unique chain of permanent offices all along the route — is conducting the cruise; the ship chartered is the now famous SAMARIA, which proved herself so eminently suitable during our 1923 Golden Jubilee Cruise.

Leisure, Comfort and Luxury
the Keynote

Cruise Limited to 400 Guests

Illustrated Literature on Request

THOS. COOK & SON
NEW YORK
245 Broadway 561 Fifth Ave.
Boston Philadelphia Chicago San Francisco
Los Angeles Montreal Toronto Vancouver

The carrying out of the farm program will automatically improve food conditions. The enterprise has taken over 25,000 acres of land. Two expert agriculturists have recently arrived from America. The tractors are preparing vast tracts of land which the Siberian peasants could never hope to cultivate with their crude tools. Ultimately we hope to produce grain, vegetables, fruit, and dairy products not only for the American colony, but also for the whole population of this district, numbering 10,000.

It will be seen by the above simple statement of conditions in Kemerovo that life for the American colony in "Kuzbas," while not as comfortable as in America, is still quite tolerable and even happy. The call was sent out for pioneers and yet we have had to do little pioneering in the American sense of the word. Most of our difficulties have come, not through physical hardships, but through conflicts among ourselves and antagonism on the part of officials of the old Russian management, combined with a prolonged uncertainty as to the future status of the colony. Certain bad elements in the colony caused friction but these have gradually eliminated themselves, along with many good members, who left for a variety of reasons: some did not like the climate or were suffering from chronic diseases; others became discouraged because the American colony was so long in getting control of the enterprise; others, despite published facts to the contrary, came expecting to improve their material conditions; some did not like the introduction of the wage system, and still others did not find a need for their special qualifications.

The most trying stage of our history is past. Profiting by its experiences, the Kuzbas organization is admitting to membership in the colony only workers of industrial qualifications to fill specific needs who have a thorough understanding of the project.

IRWIN E. AUERBACH, 315 W. 79th St., New York City; WALTER T. CONROW, Moorstown, N. J.; FRANK R. KENNELL, Methodist Book Concern, San Francisco; RUTH KENNELL, San Francisco; J. E. MCDONALD, Wolf Point, Montana; ALFRED PEARSON, JR., Newburyport, Mass.; JOHN C. TUCHELSKI, 5645 Celeron St., Detroit; SAMUEL S. SHIPMAN, Brooklyn, N. Y.; W. A. WARREN, Seattle, Washington.

Indorsed by American Section, Miners' Union:

LEO J. WYDRA, secretary; WILLIAM LUGGE, delegate; FRANK GRUND, delegate.

Kemerovo, Siberia, June 10, 1923

Is Germany Acquitted?

From the secret archives of the German Foreign Office comes this remarkable refutation of pre-meditated guilt.

In August

CURRENT HISTORY MAGAZINE

Read this astonishing article: "Germany Acquitted of Pre-War Intrigues," by A. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, in which official records reveal Germany absolved of damning accusations.

One of 20 Big Feature Articles

Foreign Policy of Great Britain Criticized.
By E. D. Morel, of the House of Commons, Editor of Foreign Affairs and a leader of the Labor Party.

Decadent Fiction.
Edwin Markham, Dean of American Poetry, has a brilliant article on the Decadent Fiction of Today, which will create a profound impression upon readers of new books.

What of Our Women?
Charlotte Perkins Gilman, the famous author, has a striking article on the New Generation of Women. She deals boldly with the woman question from the standpoint of motherhood, birth control, physical development, economic freedom, retaining maiden name, etc.

Civilization Deteriorating.
William Dudley Foulke, President of the National Civic Service Reform League, writes on the decay of public spirit, the disregard of law, the loosening of family ties, the decline of religious faith, as combining to prove that Modern Civilization is on the decline.

Wets Destroying Nation.
Wayne B. Wheeler, General Counsel of the Anti-Saloon League, attacks the wet hostility to the prohibition amendment as an assault on our fundamental law.

Scrambled Households.
Dr. Howard C. Robbins, Dean of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, has a noteworthy article on divorce.

World-Wide Range.
There are numerous other articles of equal value by authorities in every instance, covering such subects as: Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell on Labrador; Africa's Rebirth; How Britain Won Her Sea Empire; the Language Crisis in Belgium; How the United States Is Investing in Canada; Details of the Tax Burden of Great Britain; Poland's Threat to Peace; the Playrounds Movement in the United States and Europe; the Confederate Army 1,000,000 Larger Than Usually Believed; America's Scandalous Treatment of Her Indians; a Comprehensive Survey of the History of Forty Nations During the Preceding Month.

August
CURRENT HISTORY MAGAZINE
On news stands 25 cents, 196 Pages, Profusely Illustrated
N. Y. Times Co., Publisher

Send this COUPON to Current History Magazine and receive August issue free and 12 additional months for $3. postpaid.

COMMISSIONS executed and representation given in London by journalistic executive taking up residence there after September 15th. Will visit continent and transact business in English, French, or German. Address communications to Box No. 181, The Nation.

"BELL SYSTEM"
AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
One Policy, One System, Universal Service, and all directed toward Better Service

PARTIES DESIRING TO BUY HOUSE on Rochdale cooperative plan, downtown New York, want one or two more families to complete group. Investment several hundred dollars. State number rooms and conveniences required. Reply immediately. C. C. H. A., Room 411, 70 Fifth Ave.

THE RUSSIAN INN
[illegible] West 37th St., nr. 5th Ave., New York
Table d'Hote Luncheon and Dinner
also A la Carte. Open till 1 A. M.
Music by the Russian Inn Trio

A BEAUTIFUL PLACE IN THE BERKSHIRE HILLS FOR a WEEK-END or an EXTENDED VISIT

Among our guests such persons as Mr. Louis Untermeyer, E. E. Robinson, F. Luis Mora, Dr. Ludwig Lewisohn, Mme. Helen Teschner Tas, Sara Teasdale, B. W. Huebsch, Jessie B. Rittenhouse, C. Bertram Hartman, Suzanne La Follette, William and Marguerite Zorach and Mary Ellis have found this mountain farm an ideal spot for a week-end or an extended visit. Rates $7 a day and $35 a week. Address E. G. Ohmer, Western View Farm, New Milford, Conn.

Let's Beat the Babbitts!

One of the best business magazines in the country boasts that the enthusiastic help of its readers has brought it to its goal of 100,000 readers "two months earlier than schedule." Factory superintendents order extra copies for distribution among their branch managers "to introduce them to the merits of the publication."

The Babbitts of the country do not fail to support their own. Their support happens to mean added dividends for the stockholders of a commercial publishing company. Similarly the thinking men and women who read The Nation are trying to extend the influence of liberal journalism. Their efforts bring profits to nobody's pocket, but gradually widen the circle of people who share their interests.

We believe that the ideas The Nation stands for are more vital, more far-reaching, and of greater human importance than the propaganda of profit put forward by an organ of business boosters. We also believe that the readers of The Nation, because of their faith in a juster order of society, will do more for a paper that expresses their point of view than business men, no matter how enthusiastic, will do to make dollars and cents for somebody else.

The new readers whom some of our subscribers have already brought us prove that this confidence is well-founded. They also prove that a magazine like The Nation, unlike profit-making business publications, must look to its own subscribers as the principal source of new circulation. What will you do to help us find as wide an audience for The Nation's ideas as the devotees of big business have secured for their magazine?

Will you order extra copies to distribute among persons who would appreciate The Nation? Will you use these book offers to get us a new subscriber today?

Note that the two-book offer is still open. A book for the new subscriber and a book free for yourself, both titles selected from the Modern Library.

Some Modern Library Numbers:

105 Ancient Man, by Hendrik Van Loon
89 Green Mansions, by W. H. Hudson
110 The Queen Pedauque, by Anatole France
94 Madame Chrysantheme, by Pierre Loti
109 Sons and Lovers, by D. H. Lawrence

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York City

For the enclosed $............, please send The Nation regularly for the next twelve months, with the book checked as a premium.

Name ....................................

Address ....................................

....................................

8-8-23.

$5.00 Annual Subscription

WITH THE NATION FOR A YEAR:

$5.00

The Goose-Step, by Upton Sinclair
The Economic Basis of Politics, by Charles A. Beard
Triumphant Plutocracy, by Ex-Senator R. F. Pettigrew

$5.25

The Decay of Capitalist Civilization, by Sidney and Beatrice Webb
The Boy Grew Older, by Heywood Broun
Homely Lilla, by Robert Herrick

$5.50

Henry Ford, by Samuel S. Marquis
The Bloom of Life, by Anatole France
The Roving Critic, by Carl Van Doren
Three Centuries of American Democracy, by William MacDonald
Faint Perfume, By Zona Gale
The Captain's Doll, by D. H. Lawrence

$5.75

The Goose Man, by Jacob Wasserman
The Critical Game, by John Macy
Eminent Europeans, by Eugene S. Bagger
Reminiscences of Anatole France, by Paul Gsell
Shall It Be Again? by John Kenneth Turner
Poems of Wilfrid Scawen Blunt

$6.00

The Decadence of Europe, by Francesco Nitti
Up Stream, by Ludwig Lewisohn
Against the Grain, by J. K. Huysmans
These United States, reprinted from The Nation

$8.00

The American Language, by H. L. Mencken

Single Copy, 15 Cents

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 15, 1923 No. 3032

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS ... 149
EDITORIALS:
- Warren G. Harding ... 152
- Calvin Coolidge: Made by a Myth ... 153
- Political Confusion ... 154

JIM CROW IN TEXAS. By William Pickens ... 155
"IT RETURNS HIM TO YOU A BETTER MAN." By Alan Ralph ... 156
PROGRESS (AND POVERTY) IN PORTO RICO. By Arthur Warner 158
HOW "NEWS" IS MADE. By a Newspaper Man ... 160
THIS IS LIFE. By Elisabeth Sanxay Holding ... 161
THE FLOWER-VENDOR. By Ann Hamilton ... 162
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter ... 162
AN APPEAL TO AMERICA ... 163
CORRESPONDENCE ... 165
BOOKS:
- The Federation of Labor and the State. By Henry Raymond Mussey 167
- War on Civilization. By Herbert W. Horwill ... 167
- Cocky Cocteau. By Joseph T. Shipley ... 168
- Pseudo-Classic. By J. W. Krutch ... 169
- Nature and Human Nature. By Eva Goldbeck ... 169
- The Evolution of Jahweh. By Clement Wood ... 169
- Hungary Misinterpreted. By Emil Lengyel ... 170
- A Courteous and Conciliatory Diplomat. By William MacDonald ... 170
- The Problem of Style. By Edwin Seaver ... 171
- An Argentinian Knight-Errant. By Roy Temple House ... 171
- Books in Brief ... 172

ART:
- Cézanne. By Temple Scott ... 172

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- Russia's New Constitution ... 173
- Mexico Pensions a Political Prisoner ... 176

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT ERNEST H. GRUENING
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY, Managing Editor
JOHN MACY, Literary Editor
IRITA VAN DOREN, Advertising Manager
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON ANATOLE FRANCE H. L. MENCKEN
FRIEDRICH WILHELM FOERSTER ROBERT HERRICK
CARL VAN DOREN NORMAN THOMAS

Subscription Rates—Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: Ernest Thurtle, 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N. W. 4, England.

IN accordance with custom the new President has asked the present Cabinet to remain at its tasks. Also in accordance with custom the Cabinet will probably stay together until the new Administration is firmly established. Then, as in the past, some resignations will be in order. We sincerely hope that they will include those of Messrs. Daugherty, Hughes, and Hoover. Mr. Daugherty's going is desirable from every point of view. For the other two the opportunity to resign ought to be looked upon as a chance to free themselves from an utterly impossible situation. We refer, of course, to the advice they gave to their fellow-citizens who favor the League of Nations to vote for Mr. Harding as the surest way to get the country into the League. Were these gentlemen thin-skinned or sensitive they must have resigned long ago—especially when Mr. Harding declared that the United States should never, never enter the League, and when the late President took three separate positions as to the World Court. As long as they remain in the Cabinet they are unmistakably in the position of men who gave false advice and profited by it. More than that, both of these gentlemen are still candidates for the Presidency. They will both be free to nurse their little booms if they now retire from official life. Certainly no one could accuse them of disloyalty to President Coolidge if they should leave and openly announce their ambitions; he has no claim upon the party or upon them. And the Cabinet would be the better off for the change—even if mentally inferior men should succeed them.

FOR wire tapping, that is "listening in" on a military telephone wire, three men were sentenced to death, two to hard labor for life, one to prison for five years with an impossible fine, and one to prison for three years with a similar fine. No, interested reader, this incredible severity was not an act of the Germans in the heat and passion of war during their occupation of Belgian territory. No, indeed. It was the act of a French court-martial at Werden, Germany, on July 31, 1923, in a territory occupied by the French by violence in time of peace. If we could imagine the situation reversed, every American newspaper would be raving about German barbarity and brutality. The welkin would be ringing with protests; we doubt not that there would be mass-meetings of execration. Instead, the American press pays almost no attention to this amazing incident, which is but one of many such. One New York paper headed the item, which it cut in half, "Stiff Sentences in the Ruhr." The New York Herald and the New York World omitted it altogether. Is it any wonder that the American public is failing to understand what is happening in the Ruhr?

SINCE Premier Baldwin's brave utterance on Anglo-French relations in the Commons, approved by Ramsay MacDonald on behalf of the Opposition as heralding a forward policy, nothing has happened. The promised publication of the documents in the recent exchange of opinions has at this writing not taken place. France is thus successful in her deliberate program of delaying the game in the hope that a German collapse—so confidently predicted by Poincaré to take place on May 1 or May 31 at the latest—will end the whole matter. From London come only rumors of a coming conversation between Curzon and Poincaré; otherwise the British lion appears as helpless as the netted king of beasts who was freed by the mouse. Meanwhile the German collapse is approaching with the mark at a million for fifty cents or less, and General Degoutte is playing his last card—he has threatened to take over and operate every mine, furnace, and factory in the Ruhr. That is a foolish proposal certain to fail of its purpose, but barbarously certain to plunge the Ruhr into final misery. Already a spokesman of the German industrialists declares they will ruin the Ruhr rather than submit to this. So France steadily pulls down the pillars of civilization, glorying in her shame, reveling in her position of military dictator of Europe, and too infatuated with her theory of force to understand that it leads but to the grave.

WE have signed a treaty of amity and commerce with Turkey; it is called a triumph for the diplomatic genius of the American people. Every commercial concession seems to be safeguarded by flawless phraseology. Not that the treaty mentions concessions; but a labyrinth of most-favored-nation clauses covers the case. The opium-restriction convention is, however, omitted; the guaranties for the protection of minorities, such as the precious Armenians, are virtually nil; the troublesome question of war claims is "reserved" for further consideration. In other words, the shibboleths of sentiment, of so-called "honor" and "idealism" are forgotten, but we are to be permitted to do business as usual with Turkey and to treat the Turks as human beings. Mr. Hughes did not insist that Turkey modify its laws or change its form of government. Like a practical man he took what he could get. It is to be hoped that his representatives in Mexico City will be as gentlemanly and matter-of-fact as Mr. Grew at Lausanne. Russian-American relations would gain by similar treatment.

> I think I may flatter myself, gentlemen, that I have always been a faithful partisan of the Franco-British alliance. Before the war, at a time when there were in France some who more or less openly aimed at a policy of rapprochement with Germany, which would have meant officially consecrating the Treaty of Frankfurt and definitely abandoning Alsace-Lorraine, I was always of those who urged, on the contrary, a close union between the two great free nations of western Europe.—M. Poincaré at Senlis, July 15.

M. POINCARE has indeed the right to flatter himself, if flattery it be, that he always opposed a policy of friendship with Germany and hoped, expected, and prepared for war. But is he not giving aid and comfort to the nationalist Germans when he thus praises a defeated nation for seeking alliances in the hope of breaking the treaties which consecrate its defeat? After all, he only shows that his fine words about the sanctity of treaties are but the usual politician's hypocrisy. Treaties which he happens to like are sacred to him; treaties which he does not like are mere scraps of paper.

IN the House of Commons' debate on Singapore the Admiralty spokesmen made out, technically, a fair case. To the charge that at the Washington Conference Great Britain "kept the ace of Singapore up her sleeve," Colonel Amery replied that the very choice of the meridian of 110° as the limit of the neutral zone made it clear that it was not proposed to exclude Singapore from the possibility of being made a naval base. Again, he dealt with the suggestion that this new scheme was aimed at Japan by advising his critics to consult a large-scale map, from which they would see that Singapore was as far from Yokohama as Gibraltar from Boston. Moreover, if England had had any aggressive designs against Japan, she would never have agreed to an arrangement that deprived her of the effective use of Hong Kong, which was much nearer. All the same, a naval base is not constructed merely as an ornament to the landscape. If the Singapore base is not aimed at Japan, who is the prospective foe? Can it be Holland? The Dutch are now discussing a navy bill for which the necessity of countering the British plans is put forward as one of the main arguments. The Dutch East Indies are not so very distant from the Straits Settlements. The moral advantage in the debate was surely with George Lambert, late Civil Lord of the Admiralty, who pleaded: "Let us give the Washington Treaty a chance and afford a breathing-space to the Angel of Peace."

GENERAL JOHN J. PERSHING and Admiral William L. Rogers seem to be doing their best to convince the country that the only way out of militarism is to abolish the army and the navy and put the fighting men to work at other jobs. General Pershing told an audience at Del Monte, California, the other day that not only the men but the women of the country should be trained in military tactics. They would be needed, he felt, to suppress "Red" activities. This may seem like the ne plus ultra of nonsense, but that grizzled sea-dog, Admiral Rogers, succeeded in surpassing it at Williamstown. Admiral Rogers objected to the slogan "Law—Not War." He could see no difference between law and war. "War," he said, "is the agency whereby law is made to prevail." We find this a little difficult to understand. Law implies an accepted code; war is the effort of one government to force its own will on another. Would Admiral Rogers hold the invasion of Belgium an act of law? The fact is that as long as we have an army and a navy its chiefs will invent nonsense to justify their jobs, and otherwise sane people will listen patiently, somehow believing that because a man wears a bit of tinsel on his shoulder he must know what he is talking about.

OKLAHOMA is having another one of its periodic political fits. The Farmer-Labor Reconstruction League, supported by the railroad brotherhoods and the farmer organizations, last year won for "Jack" Walton the Democratic nomination for governor. After the primaries, their funds were exhausted. Walton accepted help from oil men who could hardly be expected to be sympathetic with a Farmer-Labor program. After the victory came the great inaugural barbecue when Governor Walton, obviously subsidized by someone, provided 289 whole beeves, and hogs, sheep, bears, turkey, opossum, chickens in proportion, to help his constituents celebrate. Labor and the farmers seemed to like it. They still liked it when he had George Wilson, late organizer of the Farmer-Labor League, named president of the State Agricultural and Mechanical College. Wilson, it seems, was a real dirt farmer, but the Legion and the Klan denied his loyal patriotism, and a few highbrow Oklahomans took exception because he had no college degree. Then Walton's ambition grew and he began cultivating the friendship of those who might finance a Senatorial campaign. He removed Wilson after swearing that he would stand by him; worst of all, in Oklahoma eyes, he let himself be photographed in knickers on a golf links; he denounced the League, and the League denounced him. The Oklahoma Leader, his past supporter, drew this lesson:

> What happened to J. C. Walton is happening to politicians all over the world. No man can serve two masters. No man can serve God and mammon. No man can take money from the rich and votes from the poor without becoming a traitor to one or the other.

CUBA'S legislature has, by an almost unanimous vote, adopted a resolution condemning the American Government for interference in Cuban internal affairs and has passed a lottery bill of which General Crowder, the American Ambassador to Cuba, disapproves. The result is another crisis; General Crowder has been summoned to Washington for a conference, and a new intervention is threatened. There was one crisis last summer, when Cuba showed a certain reluctance to pass the set of financial reform bills which had been prepared for her in Washington. But at that time Cuba was in dire financial need, and the bills were forced through. A second crisis occurred last April, when President Zayas permitted four able ministers who were virtually appointees of General Crowder to resign. Meanwhile, however, a syndicate of New York banks had floated a $50,000,000 loan to Cuba, the price of sugar had risen, and Cuba was no longer an impotent mendicant. Today Cuba has a surplus of $12,000,000 in her treasury, and is seeking to repay part of the New York loan in advance. The financial reform bills are largely responsible for the improvement in Cuba's position, but she has little gratitude. Quite naturally; for no people likes to have reform bills poured down its throat like a dose of castor oil. Today Cuba wants to return to her traditional lottery, and there is no good reason apart from our Anglo-Saxon missionary zeal to make everybody else like ourselves, why she should not do so if she wants to. But there are effective if not good reasons why Cuba obeys General Crowder's whims: 75 per cent of Cuba's foreign trade is with the United States, more than a billion dollars of American money is invested in Cuba, and Uncle Sam's navy is accustomed to practising on Latin American peoples.

Foreign tourists, forgetting they are our guests and therefore bound to respect our customs and our laws, recently on several occasions have forcibly manifested their aversion to seeing colored men born in the French colonies sit by their side in public places. They even have gone to the length of demanding their expulsion in insulting terms. If such incidents are repeated, punishment will be exacted.—Note issued by the French Foreign Office, July 31, 1923.

NOT often in recent months have we been tempted to throw up our hats and cheer because of a statement of French policy. But this reply to the boorish conduct of some white Americans in Paris is a worthy statement of a noble French tradition. The French habit is to judge a man by his worth, not by the color of his skin. We abhor the French policy of spreading militarism into black Africa—not because we fear Africa, however, but because we hate militarism. Black men sit in the French Chamber of Deputies and black men hold high positions in the French civil service—and hold their positions by virtue of their honest achievements. For prejudiced Americans to attempt to eject black citizens of France from French cafes, to refuse to ride on French buses which carry colored soldiers of France, and even to throw such men off the buses, is a flagrant form of provincialism which merits punishment. We should like to have our own Government, which conscripts, taxes, and punishes its Negro citizens, show as decent a respect for human beings regardless of skin color—by disciplining, for instance, the upstart young second lieutenant who recently informed Negro applicants that they could not be received into the summer military camps.

PAWNBROKERS and dealers in precious stones need to give careful study not only to the laws and police regulations affecting their trades, but to the provisions of the peace treaties. Otherwise they may, all unawares, get into trouble as receivers of stolen goods. The widowed ex-Empress Zita, of Austria, purposes selling the Florentine diamond to an American, in order to provide a livelihood for herself and her children. It ought to bring in a decent sum, as it is one of the clearest and most brilliant large gems known, and weighs 139½ carats. But the Italian Government has issued a warning that any such sale will be null and void. This valuable gaud was originally one of the crown jewels of Tuscany, and it went to the Hapsburgs in the middle of the eighteenth century, when the husband of Maria Theresa acquired it with the Grand Duchy of Tuscany, which he obtained in exchange for Lorraine shortly after his marriage. The Treaty of St. Germain specifically requires these jewels to be restored to Italy, so the ex-Empress no longer has a lawful title to any of them. Singularly enough, the Italian Government does not seem to be anxious to make her return the diamond; the sole object of concern is that it shall not get into any one else's hands. This incident sets one speculating on the future of the Kohinoor, the brightest jewel in the British crown. It came to Queen Victoria in 1849 through the conquest of the Punjab. In the event of India's separation from the British Empire, will the terms of settlement send it traveling back to the East again?

A COMMITTEE called by the Newark Museum Association is sending out an appeal to all interested in the application of artistic designing to articles of common use. The decay of the handicrafts, according to this organization, is due to the low esteem in which the designer and fashioner of beautiful homely things are held among us. Thirty and even twenty-five years ago immigrant craftsmen supplied our wants. The younger generation, mostly American-born, refuse to apply their talents since there is no reward in either money or appreciation. An American maker of excellent pottery, for instance, feels compelled to put a French label on his product, which obviously is not encouraging to the craftsmen who made the designs. Those who are almost daily offended by what seems the deliberate hideousness of articles of common use will give their cordial support to Mr. John Cotton Dana, the director of the Newark Museum, and his associates in their inquiry and their effort. It is as cheap to produce a well-shaped jug or pot or electric fixture as an ill-shaped one, and these things influence and educate the eyes more than is commonly realized.

WE note with regret many indications lately of the decay of banditry. The death of Pancho Villa removed the foremost practitioner of the profession in North America and now Bandit Raisuli, whose name for twenty years has been printed in red ink in "Who's Who in Morocco," has gone and got married. Mr. Raisuli laid the basis of his fame and fortune by capturing and holding for ransom an American, Ion Perdicaris, later taking into camp a British subject, Kaid McLean. For many years after he did a thriving business playing Spanish against French and the Moors against both. His capture and his reform have been reported as many times as the collapse of Soviet Russia. We have never believed that either catastrophe had overtaken him, but now he is married and, sadly, we accept the incontestability of both. Not that we had conceived of Mr. Raisuli as a woman-hater. But when banditry was in flower the method of a man who craved the society of a woman was to carry her away by the hair. To have a ceremony, to have it reported in the newspapers, and to have it told by cable that "many wedding presents were sent by the tribesmen" means the end of Mr. Raisuli's old ways. Perhaps bobbed hair is to blame, making difficult the old way of carrying away a woman. Or perhaps it is just that industrialism is taking the joy out of banditry as out of other things. Unless Bandit Raisuli wishes to give up entirely and lead an honest life, we see no future for him except to come to America and go into business.

Warren G. Harding

A GENIAL, kindly, well-meaning, lovable man, typical of a large group of Americans—this was President Harding. Every one who met him was attracted to his personality. To this favorable impression his fine appearance contributed not a little. Nobody could have been seen to better physical advantage than Mr. Harding on such state occasions as the burial of the unknown soldier and the opening of the Conference for the Limitation of Armaments. He was then both dignified and impressive. Moreover, after the presidency of Woodrow Wilson, it was a profound relief to have in the highest public office a man to whom one could make an appeal to the heart. The very fact that he had risen from humble origins, that most of his life had been spent in a small town characteristic of the Middle West, gave him a fellow-feeling for the plain American of which no rise in situation could deprive him. That kindliness and understanding made him release Eugene Debs, made him feel sympathy for many victims of the passions of the war, and disposed him generally to a kindly view of the world and its people. It is this quality of generous good-will for which Mr. Harding will, we believe, be chiefly remembered; it is with this that the saga we build up about our Presidents will largely concern itself when time deals with Warren Harding—precisely as William McKinley is remembered for his amiable personal qualities.

If one could stop here it would be a pleasure. But he who would record contemporary truths cannot afford either to paint but one side of the picture or to color the whole with that feeling of compassion for Mrs. Harding and the poignant regret and sorrow which every American must have felt when he read that not wholly unexpected news from San Francisco. The fact is that as President Mr. Harding was much to be pitied. He was pitchforked into the position not by the pre-nomination votes of large groups of his fellow-countrymen, but as a result of the final secret confab of a few machine leaders in a private parlor in the Blackstone Hotel in Chicago. Not by training nor by antecedents nor by knowledge was he equal to his position, in which he could hardly keep abreast of the current work. To map out any really constructive policies was beyond him. The defects of his amiability made themselves felt hourly, for he found it harder and harder to take a position and stick to it—witness his three several positions upon the question of American participation in the new World Court.

In domestic problems he was as helpless as every similar Republican President is certain to be, being bound and pinioned by the historic party policies and that invisible big-business control which constitutes the real government of the country. He was aware that the times were out of joint; yet he had no remedies to suggest save the old salves and cures that were supposed to work wonders thirty-five years ago. So far as the situation of the world is concerned, Mr. Harding's incumbency of the presidential office, together with the dominant influence exerted by Messrs. Hughes and Hoover in foreign affairs, has been a dreadful misfortune.

Never has there been such an urgent, world-wide call for American leadership, never such a wonderful opportunity for the American President to lead the world to paths of peace and of sanity. With Europe sinking rapidly into ruin, as the British Prime Minister has just again declared, it is hard for us to understand how Mr. Harding could have held back from insisting upon exerting our enormous influence for a solution of the deadlock because of which civilization itself totters. One word from President Harding, and the French would never have entered the Ruhr to stain their good name with crimes against humanity which will never be effaced. One word from President Harding would have brought about a conference which under American leadership would have begun with possibilities of success which the European conferences have totally lacked. A proposal for the solution of the reparations problems, not put forth haphazardly by a cabinet officer in a speech to a group of learned men, but carefully worked out by economists with the aid of French and German experts, would not only not have been resented, but must have been widely welcomed by our British allies and by all the neutrals who are now suffering grievously because of the French madness. But the Harding Administration could only mark time. Perhaps it is possible to deduce from Mr. Harding's final state paper, his speech published but not delivered, that after all he was beginning to realize his duty. It is an extraordinary coincidence at least that in this address he declared for closer international relations precisely as William McKinley's last utterance similarly appealed for wider and better trade relations with the rest of the world.

For the rest, President Harding's family and friends may find some consolation in the hour of his going as well as in the absence of all suffering. The remainder of his term could have added nothing to the public's kindly feeling for him personally. Had a successful attempt been made to renominate him he must have experienced the bitterness of repudiation and defeat. That especial tenderness with which Americans think of Presidents who have died in office will always inure to him.

And now the Presidency sinks low, indeed. We doubt if ever before it has fallen into the hands of a man so cold, so narrow, so reactionary, so uninspiring, and so unenlightened, or one who has done less to earn it, than Calvin Coolidge. A child of marvelous fortune, he becomes the thirtieth President of the United States because of a newspaper fiction which falsely presented him to the country as a great and vigorous personality who in a dark and troubled hour had saved Boston from a strike misrepresented as a wanton blow at law and order by some of its duly constituted authorities. In an hour when America aches for constructive leadership of a broad and liberal kind its official destinies are to rest for a year and a half in the hands of one whose writings and public utterances reveal no spark of originality, no vision, no tolerance, no sympathy with progress and advance. Every reactionary may today rejoice; in Calvin Coolidge he realizes his ideal, and every liberal must be correspondingly downcast. Fortunately, there are checks and balances in Washington; the Congress still lives. Fortunately, in this case, the President is not today a free agent. Fortunately, not even the prestige of the office will conceal the intellectual nakedness of a man whom a Minnesota audience refused last year to listen to after a brief taste of his discourse.

Calvin Coolidge: Made by a Myth

CALVIN COOLIDGE is President of the United States because of a fiction. A fiction lifted him overnight from the comparative obscurity of State politics into national view and gave him the reputation which led to his nomination for the Vice-Presidency in 1920.

In 1919 the public was given to understand that Mr. Coolidge, then Governor of Massachusetts, had broken the Boston police strike and restored order to a helpless and crime-menaced city by his courage, firmness, and patriotism in calling out the State militia. Calvin Coolidge was hailed as a savior of the nation from the forces of disintegration and disorder. Since Mr. Coolidge has succeeded to the Presidency the story has been retold by nearly every newspaper in the country; it is the cornerstone of his career. The only flaw is that it rests on about the same foundation of historical truth as the legend of George Washington and the cherry tree. The police strike was broken by public opinion, led by a business-controlled press, while order was restored by militia in Boston called out by Andrew J. Peters, the mayor. Governor Coolidge sat discreetly on the fence until he saw on which side public sentiment was gathering. When this had manifested itself distinctly against the police, and after Boston's danger had been averted, Governor Coolidge climbed down from the fence on the side with the crowd and issued a bombastic proclamation needlessly mobilizing the entire State Guard.

In recounting this today we are not actuated by hostility toward Mr. Coolidge personally. Amid the flood of sentimentality and banality that is filling our daily press it is right that some people should know that the reputation by virtue of which he has risen to our highest public office rests upon a fiction. Nor is what we have to say an expression of editorial opinion. It is drawn from Document 108, 1919, of the city of Boston, in which in 5,000 words a citizens' committee tells without comment the story of the police strike. This committee was not a body of radicals or of partisans. It was appointed, it is true, by a Democratic Mayor, and its chairman, James J. Storrow, of Lee, Higginson, and Company, was of like political faith, but its other members were of various parties, including leading lawyers, bankers, and merchants. The president of the Boston Chamber of Commerce was on its executive committee, and its report was indorsed by a special resolution of that body. Its findings have never been disputed by Mr. Coolidge; but (oh, irony of history!) they were withheld from the public until a month after the police strike was over; until accidental and purposeful misrepresentation in the press had established the Coolidge myth throughout the country.

This citizens' committee was appointed in August, 1919, when a police strike had become imminent. It worked out a plan that was apparently acceptable to all parties and sought the assistance of the Governor. The Police Department of Boston is part not of the city but of the State government, and the Commissioner is appointed and removable by the Governor. It would seem, therefore, that a statesmanlike Governor would have been trying to prevent a strike, but when his cooperation was sought Mr. Coolidge replied, "that he felt it was not his duty to communicate with the commissioner on the subject." On Sunday, September 7, with the police trouble at a crisis, the committee sought another meeting with Mr. Coolidge, but the "law and order" Governor was not in Boston, and the committee was not able even to ascertain his whereabouts. The next day, in the words of the committee:

> The Mayor, in cooperation with the members of your committee, again endeavored to obtain a conference with the Governor, and such a conference was arranged to take place early in the evening of that day. At that time the commissioner had taken final action in regard to the police officials. . . . Your Honor and the members of your committee emphasized the prospective seriousness of the situation which would result from the absence of the great majority of patrolmen, and expressed their strong conviction as to the necessity of troops to the number of not less than three to four thousand to be present in Boston on the following day at 5:45 p. m., either upon the streets or ready in the armories.

To this plea the Governor sent a formal answer the next day. It is sufficient to reproduce merely the final sentence: "I am unable to discover any action that I can take." To quote again from the report of the citizens' committee:

> The volunteer police were not called to duty until Wednesday morning. On Tuesday evening, September 9, riots, disorders, and robbery occurred, and on Wednesday morning, September 10, Your Honor assumed temporary control of the Police Department, acting under the statute of 1885, section 6, chapter 323, which gives Your Honor the power to do so, tumult having then occurred. Your Honor also immediately called out that part of the State Guard located in Boston, which you then had authority to do, and requested the Governor to order out three additional regiments of infantry.

Then follow these brief, illuminating, and, for Mr. Coolidge, annihilating sentences: "By Thursday morning order had been generally restored in the city. On Thursday afternoon, September 11, the Governor assumed control of the situation, as indicated by his proclamation of that day."

By way of explanation it is necessary to add only that, up to the actual moment of the policemen's walk-out and the disorder and danger in which Boston found itself in consequence, public sentiment seemed to be pretty evenly divided on the merits of the issue. Then it swung sharply and unmistakably against the policemen. The Governor, who up to that moment had been unwilling to assist in preventing the strike, who had not had troops in the streets to prevent lawlessness after the police walked out, who had left it to the Mayor to call out the National Guard in Boston to protect the city, now took his first public action. On the afternoon of September 11, after the trend of public sentiment was unmistakable, and after "order had been generally restored in the city," the following proclamation appeared:

> The entire State Guard of Massachusetts has been called out. Under the constitution the Governor is the commander-in-chief thereof by an authority of which he could not, if he chose, divest himself. That command I must and will exercise. Under the law I hereby call upon all the police of Boston who have loyally and in a never-to-be-forgotten way remained on duty to aid me in the performance of my duty in the restoration of order in the City of Boston, and each of such officers is required to act in obedience to such orders as I may hereafter issue or cause to be issued.
>
> I call on every citizen to aid me in the maintenance of law and order. CALVIN COOLIDGE, Governor

Such are the facts upon which rests one of the most remarkable political myths of our time, a legend by the grace of which Calvin Coolidge has become President of the United States.

Political Confusion

PRESIDENT HARDING'S death creates no new political confusion; it merely reveals the appalling lack of issues in American politics. When it was understood that Mr. Harding would run again for office the politicians felt familiar ground under their feet; they did not have to argue issues but could talk personalities. Was one for or against Mr. Harding? It did not much matter who or what manner of man the Democratic candidate might be—he would be ag'in' the government, and the Republicans would have to defend the government's every act. To such a campaign the Democrats looked forward with unadventurous satisfaction; they anticipated another election by disgust, like that of 1920, and the fact that they would find themselves after victory as faltering and uncertain what victory meant did not disturb them. Nor did the old-guard Republicans much fear such a defeat. The Democrats would have no policy, and the country would soon weary of them and send the Republicans back to office again, after the time-honored tradition of alternating Tweedledum and Tweedledee.

A President has died, and the politicians are scuttling about as madly as a host of ants when their protecting stone has been overturned. Trusted political charts have overnight become worthless. The politicians do not know where to turn. Their intellectual nakedness is distressingly apparent. The fact is revealed in all its tragic simplicity that national politics in these United States have become a meaningless treadmill, that there is no essential difference, apart from personalities, between the two great national parties, and that neither is making any serious attempt to understand the groundswell of the age, to seek out the economic causes of the farmers' distress, to discover the sources of labor's unrest, to look ahead, or lead the way. Republicans and Democrats alike seek only political tranquillity, some empty issue—like the tariff (in which one party defends a protective policy to equalize costs of production, and the other says the same thing in different words and more frankly) or the world court (which cannot possibly affect the present distress of this continent or Europe).

It is a healthy thing that we should have this spectacle revealed to us. A President who confessedly had as little personal policy as possible, who asked not to lead but preferred to be led, has died—and there is nothing left. The grand old Republican Party stands before us, as significant as a telephone directory, a meaningless hodge-podge of men whose minds run in contrary directions, including Judge Gary and Senator La Follette, Leonard Wood and the North Dakota Nonpartisan Leaguers, Hiram Johnson and Elihu Root, Secretary Hughes and Smith W. Brookhart. There is not an issue worthy of the name upon which these men agree. Nor is the Democratic Party of more meaning as an organization. It cannot decide whether it will nominate a "wet" Catholic governor or the "dry" Senator from one of the Ku-Kluxedest of southern States, the son-in-law of an ex-president or a manufacturer guiltless of a political past. "Anyone to win" is the motto of both big parties. They mean nothing, they stand for nothing, they have no platform. So far as the real life of the country goes they are corpses blocking the road to progress.

There are forces astir that would remove these corpses from the road. The progressive movement of the Middle West, solidly footed in an economic alliance of farmers and city workingmen, has shown its power in Minnesota. The powers of reaction are attempting to break that alliance, and the death of Mr. Harding gives them new hope and a new opportunity.

There can be little doubt that the Old Guard in the Republican Party is already casting about for a candidate who can wear the label "progressive" and wean away the liberal voters while yet remaining "safe." Neither La Follette nor Borah will be nominated—they are too independent; they are not "safe." Let us not be deceived by any Medill McCormick or Hiram Johnson wearing about his brow the halo of the Progressive Armageddon of 1912. 1912 lies eleven years behind us, and most of the warriors of that day have crept back to safer camps, while some, like Senator Borah, who played safe in 1912, have shown a new readiness for political adventure. Hiram Johnson encourages the tradition that he is the St. George who downed the Southern Pacific dragon in California. But some Californians insist that the dragon is still alive and active, and that it seems dead only because the senior Senator has ceased shouting about it. Senator Johnson showed his old courage when he took up the fight against the Treaty of Versailles at a time when that fight seemed hopeless, but his struggle against an iniquitous treaty is today little more than a doctrine of national isolation, and the European issue seems dangerously like a red herring obscuring his party loyalty on the tariff and other acts of devotion to the Old Guard.

Perhaps more likely and more dangerous is the nomination of some good man without too definite a political record like Senator Pepper or Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania. These are good men, but the time has passed when good individuals suffice. Good men are the stock in trade of old-line politicians. It is an ancient trick to nominate a good man, an "independent' 'in politics, when the party hacks become discredited and the meaninglessness of party shibboleths becomes too evident. Let us not be deceived by this stale trick. Personalities have too often blurred issues in American politics. The Republican Party is just what it was before President Harding died, and the Democratic Party has not changed since the people turned it out in 1920.

There are real issues at stake; there are things worth voting for. Perhaps our method of political government is incapable of realizing them. Perhaps political government has so encumbered itself with meaningless mechanisms that the machinery of government will—such is the trend in both Europe and America—pass to the economic organizations which already hold the real power behind the political facade. If so, we shall have to confess a defeat for democracy and begin again. Political democracy without the democratization of industry, it has long been plain, is a rather empty achievement. But there has seemed to be a chance worth fighting for that economic lines might make themselves felt in politics and give to the political struggle a reality which it has increasingly lacked. The farmer-labor alliance in the Middle West has been significant precisely because it seemed to foreshadow such an intrusion of economics into politics. If it yields again to mere personalities and fictitious party slogans we shall have to look elsewhere for permanent hope.

Jim Crow in Texas

By WILLIAM PICKENS

THE classics tell about the tortures invented by the Sicilian tyrants, but the Sicilian genius for cruelty was far inferior to that of the fellow who contrived the Jim Crow car system to harass the colored population of the South. There are tens of thousands of white people in this country who would be uncompromisingly opposed to this exquisite torture if they only understood it. But they are not "jim crowed," they have not the experience, and they do not and almost cannot understand what the colored brother finds to complain of. Have you noticed how difficult it is to explain a sensation or a pain to some one who never experienced it?

Fourteen States have Jim Crow car laws. Not one of them maintains "equal accommodations" for colored people, although the law generally calls for accommodations "equal in all points of service and convenience," so as to square with the Fifteenth Amendment. Nobody expects the railroads to go to the expense of duplicating their accommodations for the colored, non-voting, minority population. The result is that the colored traffic is usually attached to the general service with the least possible expense: a small waiting-room in one corner of the station, generally unswept and otherwise uncared-for; a compartment in one end of the white men's smoker for all the colored people—men, women, and children—to ride in; generally no wash basin and only one toilet for both sexes; with no privilege of taking meals in the diner or buying a berth in a sleeper. Colored passengers taking a journey of several days must either carry cold food enough to last or else buy the high-priced trash of the newsboy. A colored woman traveling three nights from El Paso, Texas, to Charleston, S. C., with a baby and small children, is compelled to carry cold food and to sit up on straight-backed seats for the whole trip. A colored woman of Portland, Oregon, editor of a paper there, bright, intelligent, and attractive, respected by the best-known white and colored people of the State, was visiting her parents in Texas, carrying her infant and a small child of three years. On their third night's ride, in Texas, she was compelled to get up, dress herself and babies, and vacate her berth because some short-distance white passengers objected to her presence in the car. A colored person who was hurrying from Florida to undergo an operation by an expert in Chicago had to risk death by a twenty-four-hour ride in a Jim Crow day coach. Sick colored people sometimes have to be carried on stretchers in the baggage car.

Let us look at an actual case of Jim Crow, which is typical of practically the whole South. This system is not designed to rid white people of the mere physical presence of the Negro, for a white man who objects to a colored person who rides in the other end of the car may have a colored servant with his family in his end of the car, and this colored servant may sleep in his house and be a wet-nurse for his baby. I shall use the first person singular and attempt to tell of Jim Crow experiences, without exaggeration and without abatement. I sit in a Jim Crow as I write, between El Paso and San Antonio, Texas. The Jim Crow car is not an institution merely to "separate the races"; it is a contrivance to humiliate and harass the colored people and to torture them with a finesse unequaled by the cruelest genius of the heathen world. The cruder genius broke the bodies of individuals occasionally, but Jim Crow tortures the bodies and souls of tens of thousands hourly.

In the last two months I have ridden many thousands of miles in comfortable Pullman reservations out from New York to the great Northwest, with many stops and side trips; then down from Tacoma and past the Golden Gate to the City of the Angels, from the red apples of Spokane to the golden apples of the southwestern Hesperides; and then on by the petrified forest, the great canyon, and through the ancient cliff-dwellings of man to Albuquerque, New Mexico. In Albuquerque I had bought my reservation to El Paso, Texas. El Paso is where the train would enter Texas, and both my tickets terminated there. But so thoroughly is it understood that Jim Crowism is not designed merely to "separate," but also to humiliate, colored passengers that the thing is always in the consciousness of the railway employees, even those who operate in and out of Jim Crow territory, and they begin to "work on you" as soon as you buy a ticket that leads even to the limbo of this hell.

"Well, you can't ride in this car after you get into Texas. You'll have to get out of this car in Texas, and I suppose you know that?" This from the Pullman conductor, in a very gruff and loud voice, so that the whole car might hear him, while he and others stare and glare upon me. His speech is absolutely unnecessary since my tickets call only for El Paso, but the object is to "rub it in." I answered with not a word nor a look, save such mild and indifferent observation as I might bestow upon idiots who should spit at me or lick out their tongues as I passed by their cells of confinement.

In El Paso, because of the miscarriage of a telegram, my friends did not meet the train and I had to call them up and wait till they came down. I was meanwhile shown to the "Negro" waiting-room, a space of about twenty by twenty, away off in one corner of the station structure like a place of quarantine or a veritable hole in the wall. I had to traverse the entire length of the great main waiting-room in order to reach this hole. This main waiting-room has all the conveniences, 'phone booths, ticket offices, and what not. And whom do you suppose I saw in this main waiting-room as I passed through? Not only the "white people," but all the non-American "colored peoples," yellow Chinese, brown Japanese, and the many-colored Mexicans, some dirty with red handkerchiefs around their necks and carrying baskets and bundles with fruits, vegetables, and live chickens. These Mexicans are the people whom the colored soldiers of the Twenty-fourth Infantry held off those white people some years ago. And if we should go to war with Japan the colored American will again be expected to rush forth from that hole in the wall to the defense of his white compatriot. I say all this without the slightest feeling of animosity toward any race, and absolutely without scorn of any human misfortune. I am only stating the case plainly. And when I reached the little humiliating hole assigned to "Negroes," I found there only four or five colored people, all intelligent, not one of them conspicuously unkempt like some of the Mexicans in the main waiting-room. Those Mexicans were being treated as human beings, as they should be treated. These colored people knew that this arrangement was not so much for their separation as for their humiliation and attempted degradation, and it formed the burden of their conversation.

I stayed in El Paso two nights and three days. Its colored people are alert to the situation. By means of their automobiles they protected me against the "rear-seat" treatment of the electric street cars. They took me across the shallow Rio Grande into Mexico, just a few hundred yards from Jim Crowism. And over there, bless you, white and black people come out of Texas and gamble at the same table, drink at the same bar, and eat in the same restaurant, while the dark and almost black Mexican stands around as the policeman and the law.

Then I went to buy a ticket for San Antonio. I did not expect to buy a Pullman ticket, but I did expect to buy a day coach ticket on any train. But I found that colored passengers are allowed to go to San Antonio on but one train a day, the one that leaves at night. The morning train carried only Pullmans, and colored folk are made to wait twelve hours longer for the train that carries a Jim Crow compartment. A colored man's mother may be dying in San Antonio, but he must wait. Any Mexican, however, whom the colored infantry fought on the border and did not happen to kill, can ride on any train. Any foreigner, or any foreign spy who happens to be loose in the land, can travel freely, but not the mothers or wives or sisters of the black Americans who fought, bled, and died in France. All the rest of the world, be he an unlettered Mexican peon, an untrammeled Indian, or a representative of the uncivilized "white trash" of the South, can get either train; but the Negro, be he graduate of Harvard or bishop of the church, can go only once daily. Now if the Negro can be limited to once a day while others ride on any train, the Negro can be limited to one day a week while others ride seven, or even to one day a month while others ride thirty.

I took the train that leaves at night. It is a ride of about twenty-four hours. Through friends it had been arranged that I be given a berth, late at night, after all the white people had gone to sleep and could not see me, and perhaps be called early before any of the whites were up. The money was accepted from my friends, even tips, but only the porter was sent to bring me a pillow into the Jim Crow car, and they still have the money. In the morning I went back to see if I could get some breakfast in the dining car, before 7 o'clock, before the whites got hungry. And what did I find as I passed through the whole string of Pullman cars in the rear? All the races of the world, as usual, save only the most loyal of all Americans.

In the Jim Crow car there was but one toilet and washroom, for use of colored women and men. And the Jim Crow car is not a car, mind you, but only the end of a car, part of the white men's smoker, separated from the white smokers only by a partition that rises part of the way from the floor toward the ceiling, so that all the sickening smoke can drift over all night and all day. And yet what do you suppose the colored porter said as he swept out the Jim Crow end this morning? Nobody asked him, he volunteered as he swept: "Well, this is the cleanest floor I have to sweep every morning. Them white folks and Mexicans and things back yonder sho' do mess up the floors!"

When I reached the dining-car there was not another person there. I was asked did I "want anything." I replied briefly, breakfast. Then there was confusion and much conferring between the steward and several colored waiters at the other end of the car. The steward kept glancing at me meanwhile, as if endeavoring to "size me." Finally I was given a seat at the end of the car where the porters eat. Oatmeal, eggs, and postum were brought, and then a green curtain was drawn between me and the rest of the vacant dining-car! Remember, this did not all happen in some insane asylum, but in Texas. The check on which I was to order my food was a green check, a "porter's check," so that I should not need to be treated to such little formalities as an extra plate or a finger bowl. I deliberately wrote my name down in the blank for "porter," but I was charged a passenger's fare. It all meant that I would not eat any more that day, although I was not to reach San Antonio till eight or nine at night.

One must be an idiot not to comprehend the meaning and the aim of these arrangements. There is no such thing as a fair and just Jim Crow system with "equal accommodations," and in very human nature there will never be. The inspiration of Jim Crow is a feeling of caste and a desire to "keep in its place," that is, to degrade, the weaker group. For there is no more reason for a Jim Crow car in public travel than there would be for a Jim Crow path in the public streets. Those honest-souled, innocent-minded people who do not know, but who think that the Jim Crow system of the South is a bona-fide effort to preserve mere racial integrity on a plane of justice are grievously misled. Any man should be permitted to shut out whom he desires from his private preserves, but justice and Jim Crowism in public places and institutions are as far apart and as impossible of union as God and Mammon.

"It Returns Him to You a Better Man"

By ALAN RALPH

TUCKED away among a lot of army odds and ends gathered together directly after receiving my discharge I recently ran across a typewritten letter on "flimsy" from the headquarters of the fort where I had been on duty. During the first hurried reading I smiled, then carefully rereading it laid it aside and thought—and thought. Legions of personal incidents, facts, bits of information, sights came crowding into my mind. Here's the letter in full:

> My dear—(next of kin):
>
> In a few days your soldier will receive his honorable discharge and return home.
>
> He is bringing back many fine qualities of body and mind that he has acquired or developed in the military service. The Army has done everything it could to make him fine, strong, self reliant, yet self controlled. It returns him to you a better man.
>
> You have been an important member of that Great Army of Encouragement and Enthusiasm which has helped him and us all to be better soldiers. You can now be a great help in keeping alive those good qualities he is bringing back, in making him as good a citizen as he has been a good soldier.
>
> His fare and necessary expenses to his home will be paid by the Government. He will receive all pay due him. He may, if he wishes, wear his uniform for four months from the date of his discharge. The Government will allow him, for the benefit of his family, to keep up his insurance at the very low rate he is now paying.

His return to civil life will bring new problems for us both to solve. The qualities he is bringing back will help you, as your encouragement helped him while he was away. In your hands and his rests the future of our country.

As his commanding officer I am proud of him. He has done his duty well. I and his comrades will bid him goodby with deep regret and wish him every success after he returns home, that spot in every man's heart which no other can fill.

Sincerely yours—

Very charming sentiment, very lovely, very fatherly, and all that. But——How much truth in it? What, if any, "fine qualities of body and mind" did you acquire? Are you a better man?

Since the letter mentions qualities of the body first, we'll briefly deal with that question. Immediately I'm willing, yes anxious, to grant that, excluding those chaps who were injured in action, 90 per cent of us gained physical ruggedness and weight; in a number of ways were greatly benefited physically. Beyond a doubt we must have been in splendid condition to have consumed all those vineyards of wine and cellars of cognac. Be that as it may, the regularity and plain substantiality of the food alone soon put and kept in fighting trim many thousands of jaded appetites and wobbly stomachs. True, a gourmand sometimes had reason to complain of the quantity as did the epicure of quality and artistry. However, the American army was mighty well fed.

Speaking of the many fine qualities of mind we are said to have acquired while in the service, I read that sentence to a former major of the Second Division who before the war was a successful banker and yet is. Here's what he had to say: "War of a necessity must be brutal, ruthless, destructive, and demoralizing. How can it be possible for it to develop 'fine qualities' or return a participant a 'better man'? Let's see, that letter doesn't mention the possibility of a man bringing into the service excellent qualities that surely must have 'developed' it. I seem to recall some such men."

This banker, a fine, soldierly appearing man, seemed to invite questions, so I asked him if he would mind telling me in what manner the World War had permanently affected him.

"You ask a thoughtful question," he replied, seeming to weigh each word, "and I grant you a thoughtful answer. Before the war I was moderately successful and I may say that I yet am. But, for one thing, never again can I have that faith and confidence and good fellowship for men—any manner of men—that I had when I entered the service, for during the war I saw many things happen that made me close my eyes and brought a lump to my throat. I don't mean horrible sights of wounded and torn men; I mean something far worse—the sight of cowardice, of degraded humans, of lustful, ravaging men, of cupidity, of terrified, trembling officers upon whose next command depended the lives of hundreds of splendid, brave fellows. Those are the sights I mean. In Fismes, 1918, I saw an American boy, slightly behind his advancing comrades, in a hand-to-hand struggle with a German who had played possum. The boy finally tripped the German and managed to get a bayonet into him before he could get up. And then I saw what I wish I could forget but have many times seen in my dreams. The expression on that youngster's face—well, I just stood there, fascinated. No, in an instant a man may change into a beast. And women into worse."

We were trained to be ruthless. Do you remember when you were a recruit how your French or British sergeant-instructor used to conduct bayonet drill? He used to insist rightfully, that when thrusting, your expression be one of hate, fierce determination, brutality—anything to strike terror into the sawdust heart of the swinging dummy. I could have granted my instructor half the expressions he demanded of me I should have immediately deserted and signed up with David W. Griffith. No, like all the others in line I tried to satisfy that sergeant and miserably failed. But the point is—we tried. That sergeant had seen the expression he wanted us to imitate; we hadn't, and to my present way of thinking for that very reason at that time we were better men than our instructor. But, oh, how we envied him!

During the war life was held cheap, very, very cheap indeed; immorality was flagrant; time-honored moral barriers, traditions, instincts, and safeguards being swept away, acts and actions in civilian life that before the war would have raised a storm of indignation were not bothered with; drinking to excess, especially among the young and those unaccustomed to drink, became a passion. All this is true of civilians at home in their own country, those who merely read of war or were touched by those returning from war. Can it be that those who were very much in the the war gained "fine qualities" and returned "better men" and women?

Opinions are so various that I shall pick a few at random. For instance, the wife of my favorite bootblack was vehement in her praise of the army and the virtues it had invested in her Tony. She said: "It'sa make heem fina hoosband, my Tony. Evera day Tony heesa wash heem teeth, maka scrub hees neck like hell, and washa back hees ears! Yes, the army heesa fina ting."

A former doughboy, one of those still watchfully waiting in the parks, was asked if any of his former comrades had returned to comfort or affluence. "Sure thing," he answered, "the Old Man's big auto near run me down in Wall Street the other day. I could see his nose sticking over his fur collar. And I seen Major Blank blowin' out of the Commodore yesterday."

He was reminded that those were not his "comrades," so to speak. "I get you," he chirped. "Sure, I seen two 'em all dolled up neat and pretty—in uniform. They had re-upped."

Naturally a bartender would have an opinion. One did. "Sure, they're all nervous and drink," he replied.

Dozens of returned soldiers have been asked truthfully to tell of any way whatsoever in which they had benefited by service during the war, and the very best have answered somewhat like this: "Oh, well, I learned discipline and respect of authority," or "I learned to do what I was ordered without kicking," or "I learned to stand up straight and learn my right from my left hand," or "I learned that the people were kiddin' us when they waved all them flags as we climbed aboard transports." Not one man has given any interesting answer to support the contention of Paragraph 2 of that letter.

What did I learn? Well, let's see. I learned to be a good mixer, not to be surprised at anything, to spot a mean officer at a glance, to quit kicking the iron bound shins of Old Man Fate, to stand like a wooden Indian while the parade ground looked like a merry-go-round, and—oh, lots and lots of other things. But I have not yet been able to learn where the author of that letter got his information for Paragraph 2.

Progress (and Poverty) in Porto Rico

By ARTHUR WARNER

I. Twenty-five Years in Retrospect

PROGRESS—and poverty. One finds much of both in Porto Rico in its twenty-fifth year under American sovereignty. In previous articles I have outlined the political situation and sketched the labor movement.* I shall tell here of public instruction and national health; of agricultural and industrial conditions and their bearing on the vital issue of increasing the means of subsistence and thus the standard of living of the poverty-stricken masses.

There have been two conflicting currents in our administration. One, flowing strongly in the early days, assumes that Porto Rico should as soon as possible be made like the United States; that the Spanish language should give way to English, and native customs and ideas be replaced with those of Indianapolis and Galveston. The other current, growing first out of doubt and finally out of resentment on the part of the Porto Ricans, regards the island's individuality as its greatest heritage and proposes to continue its Latin-American culture, modified by that of the United States only through natural evolutionary processes. The two theories follow closely those held in the United States in regard to the foreign population within its borders.

Happily, the second theory now seems more likely to prevail. A recrudescence of the first under the influence of Governor Reily roused an antagonism that led to his resignation, and the recently appointed governor, Horace M. Towner, may confidently be expected to pursue another course. His long experience as chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives gives him an advance knowledge of Porto Rico that no other governor has taken with him, while his known sympathy toward the people should be a great help in obtaining their cooperation. Unfortunately the Republican Party has recently given signs of adopting a policy of opposition to him similar to that taken by the Unionists toward Governor Reily.

Whatever the blunders of American administration in the past, they have been those of ineptitude and tactlessness more often than of autocracy and violence. Porto Rico, under civilian government, has not suffered from an autocratic naval regime such as that in the Virgin Islands and Samoa, not to speak of the worse indignities heaped upon Haiti and Santo Domingo.

In retrospect some of the blunders of the early days seem amusing, but unfortunately they all went into producing what finally became a definite (if not an extensive) anti-American sentiment, to remove which a good many years of tact and sanity will be required. For instance, there was the Porto Rican seal, given to the island by Ferdinand and Isabella. Some of the early administrators decided that the seal was an old-fashioned religious device that ought to be replaced with something modern and snappy, not to say nifty and nobby. So a new seal was devised and officially adopted which horrified both respecters of tradition and students of heraldry. Fortunately, Mrs. Regis H. Post, whose husband was then governor, realized that a seal without history is like soup without salt, and through her intervention the old device was restored.

Then again some of the early comers from the United States were appalled to find that no Santa Claus, shaking snow out of his beard, came with prancing reindeer and well-filled sleigh to help the children of a tropical island enjoy Christmas. They regarded as little short of impious the slighting of Christmas and the celebration instead of Three Kings' Day, on the eve of which thoughtful Porto Rican children do not go to sleep until they have first put under their bed a box of grass for the camels bearing the Three Wise Men on their long journey toward the Star of Bethlehem. But Santa Claus has not yet become acclimated to Porto Rico, and it is a sign of progress that at this time nobody seems to be much disturbed over the greater popularity of the Three Kings.

"We have no race question and no religious issue," a Porto Rican said to me in commenting on the favorable aspects of the island. The absence of a religious issue is probably due largely to the weakness of all organized religion. The hold of the Roman Catholic church on the people of Porto Rico is markedly less than in Latin-America generally, while Protestantism has made little headway. Although it cannot be said that there is no "color line," it is so inconspicuous as to cause no friction between the races and apparently no resentment on the part of the Negro. Negroes work side by side with whites in fields, factories, and offices. They patronize the same restaurants and occupy adjoining houses or apartments. A white man can do business with a Negro and take him to lunch at the leading hotel without exciting remark. Negroes attend official or other public social affairs, and are elected or appointed to all kinds of government positions. The only restriction seems to be that they are not usually admitted to the white man's clubs nor invited to his house in a social way. Natives of the United States, resident in Porto Rico, have for the most part adapted themselves to this attitude handed down from Spanish days, with its roots in the origin of the people.

Three races have gone into the making of the modern Porto Rican: Indians, Spaniards, Negroes. The Carib Indians were exterminated, or absorbed by marriage with the Spanish conquistadores many years ago. They no longer exist in a pure-blooded state, but the strain is still visible in the features of many Porto Ricans, especially in the mountain districts of the interior. The Negroes were introduced by the Spaniards in slave days. There has been a great deal of mixing, in consequence of which complexions in Porto Rico vary from charcoal to café au lait. The census returns indicate a gradual absorption of the Negro. The 1910 enumeration showed the inhabitants as 65.5 per cent white, 30 per cent mulatto, and 4.5 per cent black; the 1920 figures were 73 per cent, 23.2 per cent, and 3.8 per cent. But color is largely a matter of self-determination. For census or other purposes one is virtually allowed to choose his own. If anybody not too unmistakably Negro in features and hue wants to set himself up as white, nobody will rake up his ancestry to disprove it.

---

* The Pot and the Kettle in Porto Rico, January 31; Porto Rico's Workers Awake, April 11.

II. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOLING

When the United States took hold of the government of Porto Rico a quarter of a century ago there were 25,000 children in school; this year there were 230,000. The development in education that this indicates is on the whole the most satisfactory result of American administration in the island. With the extension of the public school has come a reduction of illiteracy. The 1920 census, it is true, classifies 55 per cent of the population as illiterate, but bad as this is, it shines by comparison with conditions twenty-five years ago when 85 per cent of the population could neither read nor write.

In spite of the remarkable increase in school attendance, education still fails to reach a large proportion of Porto Rico's young. According to the 1920 census, four out of ten of the children from seven to thirteen years of age are not in school, and in the rural districts the pupils get instruction only through the first four grades. To obtain schooling above that point it is necessary to go into one of the towns, something virtually impossible for most children to do. There is no free transportation such as exists in so many of our rural communities. Not only is money lacking to organize this, but the absence of roads makes it out of the question in most cases anyhow.

Many persons jump to the conclusion that after twenty-five years of American schools English must have become the prevailing language of Porto Rico. It has not, and is not likely to do so within the discernible future. Only one in ten persons pretends to speak it at all. Spanish is the historic language of the Porto Rican; he wishes—and should be encouraged—to retain it. To be sure, he should be encouraged to acquire English also. For the most part he apparently wishes to do so, but a certain prejudice has been created against English through attempts to force it unduly in the public schools—attempts that produced an impression, rightly or wrongly, of a desire to subordinate and eventually to eliminate the Spanish language.

Originally an effort was made to conduct all classes in the public schools in English. It did not work; whereupon it was arranged to conduct the lower four grades in Spanish, with English taught as a subject, and the upper grades in English, with Spanish taught as a subject. This would seem to be sensible and has apparently worked fairly well. Under the Reily regime, however, it was proposed to return to the method of conducting the classes in English from the first grade up, a suggestion that produced a great deal of hostility. Under the present governor I believe and hope that the plan will be dropped.

The scheme is probably unworkable anyhow at the present time, in view of the fact that a large number of teachers do not know enough English to carry it out. Of 4,000 teachers all but about 150 are natives of Porto Rico and have learned their English in its schools. Their pronunciation is naturally defective and in many instances their powers of expression are most circumscribed. A young man from the United States told me that when he went out to a rural town to take up school work he found that the other teachers could hardly understand a word he said. Possibly it was his fault, but the story gives an idea of the difficulties in the way of all-English instruction.

The hope that some day Porto Rico may become virtually a bilingual country is a fine one. Situated midway between North and South America, it might thus become a link between the two continents. But Spanish is as essential to this eventuality as English, and must not be subordinated by any over-eager effort toward Americanization.

III. HEALTH OR HOOKWORM

It cannot be emphasized too strongly that the Porto Ricans are a sick people. Smallpox and yellow fever were virtually wiped out a few months after American occupation in 1898, but the hookworm, with its enervating and disastrous consequences, lives on. What is thought to be the first discovery of the hookworm in the Western Hemisphere was made in Porto Rico shortly after the American forces entered. Dr. Bailey K. Ashford, who identified the parasite, also gave many years—under government support—to fighting it. Uncinariasis, or the hookworm disease, is easily and simply cured, but without a change in living habits reinfection occurs speedily. The hookworm parasite, breeding in human filth, enters the body through the bare feet of the natives. It is easy to answer that they should wear shoes; practically they cannot afford to, and in any event it is much more desirable that they should be led to adopt more sanitary habits of living.

A vast amount of effort was spent in the early days of American occupation in curing the natives of uncinariasis. In consequence, Dr. Ashford thinks that the intensity of the disease—it was formerly exceedingly virulent—has been much reduced and that the natives as a whole are 50 per cent stronger and more able as workers than they used to be. However this may be, the extent of the disease, due to constant reinfection, seems hardly to have been diminished at all. At least the Department of Health estimates that 90 per cent of the rural population is still infected. A new method has recently been begun which promises more permanent cures. Limited areas are picked out and made the object of a campaign. The Rockefeller Foundation supplies physicians to treat the people while the Department of Health undertakes to obtain the general construction of latrines. This effort seems to be on the right lines, but is proceeding pathetically slowly.

It is impossible to determine how much the hookworm has had to do with making Porto Ricans undersized and underweight, and how much this may be due to other causes, but it seems fair to attribute most of the blame to the scourge. Certainly until it is eliminated the native cannot be expected to become a first-rate and enduring worker. At the same time, poor food, bad housing, and inadequate medical care make survival difficult in Porto Rico for any but the hardiest individuals, and many of them go through life with diseases and defects which greatly reduce their capacity either for usefulness or enjoyment. The director of school hygiene in San Juan told me that of 3,000 children examined last year 66 per cent were undernourished and 64 per cent had defective teeth; only 15 per cent were normal.

The municipalities of Porto Rico generally employ a physician on salary to care for their sick poor, but the demands far exceed the powers of one man even when he devotes himself sincerely to the work, which is not always the case. Dr. W. F. Lippitt, Commissioner of Health, estimates that half of the population is born and dies without medical attention at any time. Hospital facilities are improving, but are pathetically deficient in funds, in equipment, and in trained personnel. In one hospital of which I heard the nurse in charge gets a salary of only $15 a month. In another the appropriation for feeding a staff of thirteen persons is $2 a day!

(To Be Concluded Next Week.)

How "News" Is Made

By A NEWSPAPER MAN

IF you ever passed through the coke country of Pennsylvania, you probably retain an unpleasant impression of what you saw. You remember the rows of ovens stretched along the railroad spurs, the red flames reaching out from the opening in the top of each, the thick, oily smoke curling black off the flames and growing gray as it dissipated itself in the wind. And you remember where the wind carried the smoke—

The rows of bleak houses, painted gray or a dull red to show the least effect of contact with the smoke-laden atmosphere. Square, two-family houses, unadorned, without porches, without shade of any kind. The poisonous air from the close-by ovens the only relief from the sun's rays in summer. Utterly barren yards. No trees. No grass. No flowers. Outdoor toilets built together in rows of four, to serve the four families of each pair of houses.

That much of how coke workers live in the vicinity of Uniontown, Pennsylvania, you may have glimpsed from your train or your automobile in passing through. So you doubtless were surprised when you read the following first-page article in the New York Times of July 14:

COKE WORKER GOING TO DAILY TOIL IN AIRPLANE; SEDAN CARS TAKE COAL MINERS TO THEIR WORK

Special to The New York Times

UNIONTOWN, PA., July 14.—That the luxuries of peace in the Fayette Company coke region far outshadow war prosperity was indicated today when Edmund Henriques, a coke worker, returned to his home in Gates from New York with a Sopwith airplane which he will use to carry him "to and from his daily toil."

For several years the flivver, which had been domesticated among the mining towns of the Connellsville region, has been passé, and high powered sedan cars have traveled the highways bearing the miners from their homes to the coal pits and back again when the day's toil was ended.

Henriques startled the "aristocrats of the coke region" when he returned from New York with his Sopwith "camel," a British built airplane with which he is familiar through five years' service in the Royal Air Forces. He made the flight from New York in his new machine in four and a half hours, and will use it during the summer to attend Sunday baseball games in Chicago and Cleveland.

His home is several miles from the coke ovens at Gates, where he is employed, and he has found it annoying to be forced to arise so early in the morning to go to work. Being a high class employee with a good job, and not wishing to lose his place from lateness, he concluded that the safest and fastest method of transportation, the airplane, would just about make his lot a happy one. Acting on this conclusion, he "got himself one," according to his way of putting it.

Henriques has been the owner for some time of a high powered motor car, but tire troubles and other mechanical accidents exhausted his patience. His Sopwith will take him anywhere he wants to go in a few hours and he has no fear of being late at the coke plant in the future.

In 1920 Henriques piloted an airplane from New York to Nome, Alaska.

Other newspapers carried similar stories.

Well, the average reader read and smiled. The yarn appealed to him as being amusing and without importance. He had taken a certain amount of poison into his mind, and this poison would reveal its effect when next he came to judge of any labor dispute, but at the moment he took no thought of that. The average, hardened newspaperman likewise read the dispatch and smiled. He recognized it as a fake and let it go at that.

In just one newspaper office, apparently, did the significance of this kind of misinformation register. That was the Washington office of the Scripps-Howard newspapers. From this office a reporter was sent to Uniontown to investigate. Here is his story in the Washington News:

FLYING MINER'S STORY NOT TRUE

UNIONTOWN WORKERS AMUSED AT FANCIFUL YARN

UNIONTOWN, PA.—That story of the "Coke Worker Going to Daily Task in Airplane; Sedan Cars Take Miners to Their Work," to quote a headline from the New York Times, and to check up on a dispatch carried on some press wires Saturday, may be a good story; but it is not news. It is not true.

The coke oven workers of this town where the coke worker was reported to have been gliding to work in his airplane had a good laugh when told that the rest of the country believed they were taking up aviation as a means of getting to and from their work.

Miners and cokers spent a part of yesterday watching Edmund Bran Quixano Henriques doing stunts with his new Sopwith plane, it is true. But Henriques is not a "coke worker." He is an assistant superintendent over a score or so of Frick mines in this neighborhood.

Henriques told me in his polished Oxford University English how he learned to fly with the British Royal air forces, how after the war he attracted attention in this country by flying from New York to Alaska, and how he bought his present plane to use it as an advertising medium for a new fire extinguisher which a Masontown concern is putting on the market.

Henriques is a modest, business-like chap, and was highly amused by the weird effort to use his activities to spread the idea that the miners were scattering their excessive wages in the air. On the contrary, miners in this region working in the United States Steel Corporation mines are not very flush now, they having been defeated not long ago in a strike which was broken by the importation of Negroes from the South.

This Uniontown incident is a typical example of the levity of the newspaper profession. The Uniontown newspaper has been sympathetic to the employers in a nine-months' labor fight. The reporters, largely unconsciously no doubt, pick up the publisher's attitude. An undertaker, the news source in a little town out in the country, tells a reporter on the telephone that Henriques has bought him an airplane. Who's Henriques; what's he do? Oh, he works for the coke company. What's he want with an airplane? Gonna ride back and forth to his work, I guess. Mutual enjoyment of the jest, and the reporter sits down to write an amusing yarn. Realizes when he has it finished that it would probably sound even better in Pittsburgh. Sends it to the Pittsburgh paper for which he is correspondent. The Pittsburgh correspondent probably sends it to the New York Times, and there you are.

Contributors to This Issue

WILLIAM PICKENS, field secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and the author of several books, is a Negro who won the honor of Phi Beta Kappa at Yale University, from which he was graduated.

ALAN RALPH is a journalist of New York City.

ELISABETH SANXAY HOLDING is making a reputation as a writer of short stories.

This Is Life

A Story in the New Manner

By ELISABETH SANXAY HOLDING

I

HE was unawakened. He knew nothing. He was happy. He walked home from the high school along the tranquil suburban streets; no one walked with him, or wished to do so, but he was not yet aware of the pain of this. He was a slight, dark boy with black hair that needed cutting and a suit badly in want of pressing; he had an ordinary, pleasant face and incurious, grave eyes. He was really happy just then; he was going home to study, and he liked to study; he had a sober and practical ambition. He even liked his home and his mother, without marked or vivid complexes. He pushed open the gate and walked up the path; so sunk in his joyous ignorance was he that the small brown house, the dreadful lace curtains, the rocking chairs on the veranda with red tidies on them had for him no significance. He would have called the brown house brown, not knowing it to be liver colored; he did not know that those curtains and red tidies really expressed his mother's soul, and her revolt, anguish, and suffocation. She did not know this either.

A big fly was buzzing about in the darkened parlor; he did not know it as a symbol of decay and corruption; in fact, he killed it without thinking at all. He then ate sordid bread, butter, and jam from a plate which was cracked; it was a thick, white china plate with cracks like hairs from some disgusting animal, and a design of flowers of a nauseating pink. He didn't know. . . . He didn't know. . . . He saw only a plate. . . . His soul slept. . . .

His mother came in from some club meeting of thwarted, soul-suffocated women; she was a neat, cheerful little body; he imagined her to be benevolent and immeasurably consoling; he did not yet know how revolting were the signs of approaching age, the flabbiness of her throat, a false tooth. . . .

He spread out his books and began to work; he had not the faintest idea of the complete futility of everything; he saw his examinations as rungs of a ladder which would lead him to a certain definite height. He wanted to be a lawyer. . . .

"Well, Marcus!" said his mother. "I've brought you those books from the library."

He muttered "Thanks, mother!" and pushed them to one side. It had seemed to him necessary that he should do a little modern fiction. . . .

Later in the afternoon he began. The scales fell from his eyes. Little by little he saw. . . . In six days he had read six books; his soul was awakened and writhed like a worm. . . .

First he saw his environment. He saw now the cracked plate with the revolting pink flowers, the obscenity of the darned tablecloth, the vileness of the vinegar cruet; he saw a cockroach in the kitchen, and he moaned, "O God!"

Then he saw his mother. It was too awful to put into words. In fact, he knew he could never again see anything but her flabby throat and her false tooth. He was sick with the pain of the world. . . .

Then he realized the horrible mysteries of adolescence. He had never realized that he was adolescent; he had thought he was a boy. The cosmos was poisoned.

The last revelation was the worst. He saw that he was poor and unpopular, that he was, indeed, a pariah, outcast, sufferer from every injustice. He smiled bitterly; he hugged this anguish; he went about among his fellow adolescents cold, cynical, always smiling. . . .

He passed every examination with ferocious brilliancy. Each good mark was a fresh hot iron pressed against his soul. He smiled. . . . He received his diploma; he took it home to the house, which he now knew to be liver colored; another fly was there, but this he did not crush; he watched it; it settled upon the diploma, left there a mark. . . . This symbolized everything in the world. . . . He laughed harshly, violently. . . . There was stewed rhubarb for supper, and the gas globe was cracked. . . . His mother ate, with her false tooth, her flabby throat worked. . . . Outside there was the sound of a speeding motor—where was it going . . . ? There was a scream of someone probably being murdered in the nearby woods. . . . O, God! This was life . . . !

He went to bed; a loathsome moon came oozing through the dirty clouds; he lay watching it. . . . The stars were like brass pins sticking into the seat of a black horsehair sofa. . . . The wind came over the woodland bringing a nauseous scent from all that teeming and savage life out there. . . . Downstairs the diploma lay neglected on the table; a mouse gnawed it. . . . Adolescence . . . !

II

He loved. He knew this because for a year he had stopped every morning before the window of the barber-shop where she worked as a manicure, and looked at the back of her neck as she bent over the fat hand of a customer. He had never seen anything but the back of her neck, white, strong, round, with reddish hair growing down her spine in a fiercely vital way. He had dreamed every night of her vital neck.

He was now a young man, studying at law school. His mother was older, with two false teeth, and his former home was now the color of diseased liver. He never went there; in his dreams he heard the garden gate swinging in the night wind. It symbolized life. . . . There were worms in the garden, rats in the cellar. . . . His mother sat there alone. . . . He wondered what she thought of. . . . Perhaps it was better not to know. . . . Age and decay. . . . .

One afternoon at dusk when he was coming home, lost in the thoughts of young manhood, which were less vague but still more hideous than those of adolescence, the door of the barber-shop opened and the manicure girl rushed out. . . . He followed her; she ran into the woods and flung herself down upon the pine needles. . . .

"O God!" she shrieked. "Men. . . . The brutes! The brutes! O God!"

His love vanished, left a frightful void in his heart. He laughed harshly in the dusk. . . . Love . . . !

He laid a gold coin on the back of her neck as she lay there, and went away. He heard her shriek again:

"O God! Men! The brutes. The brutes!"

He knew that he could never love again. His last illusion had perished. He walked henceforth in a world poisoned with the indiscretions of birds, the amours of flamboyant flowers, the erotic mysteries of the stark trees. . . . He alone was a man. . . . He repudiated and loathed his manhood. He wished to be one with the rushing wind. Or the ocean would do. Man . . . !

III

The birth of his eighth child. All the others had died of the most horrible illnesses. He had looked at them in their coffins; some of them had been blue, some scarlet, others mottled. . . . He clenched his hands. The waste! The waste! The waste! Why?

He thought of his wife. Who was she? A stranger, obese, remote; she hissed when she spoke. . . . She put sugar on lettuce. . . . Her heels were broad. . . . Marriage!

He looked at himself in the mirror. He was forty-five; he was a multimillionaire, only because this made Life worse for him. He had grown fat, ungainly; there was a bald patch on his head, about his right eye were horizontal wrinkles to the number of seven; a black hair sprouted from his left nostril. . . . He slept after dinner. . . . This was Success. . . . He laughed brutally. He thought of Pan and wood nymphs, of his stenographer, exquisite and aloof as a pond lily. . . . Of his eight children. . . .

IV

Only when he lay in the hospital he didn't know quite what to feel. He had no reliable guide for this interval. He knew about death as the supreme horror in a life made up of horrors, but he knew also that one doesn't begin to feel all that until the last moment. He was waiting patiently and decently for the last moment, of which he would certainly be warned by the monstrous terror. . . . He didn't know that it had come. . . . He allowed himself a strange and reprehensible relapse; he remembered himself when he had been merely a boy, not an adolescent, when his home had been brown to him, when a fly was a fly, and he had known nothing. He forgot his mother's throat and tooth, and thought of her singing in the kitchen. He forgot that his wife had broad heels and put sugar on lettuce, forgot that five million dollars meant the denial of Pan; he reflected with drowsy content that his family would never need worry except about the income tax. The room in the hospital, which in his senses he would have known to be a torture cell, the doctor who must of course be gross and callous, the nurse who must certainly be thwarted and suffering, even the sun that came in, although he knew it nourished the fetid life of the jungle, all these things had now something mystically soothing to him. He had no pain, even in his soul; he could remember no other moment like this since his awakening.

He looked up into the doctor's face.

"Perhaps," he murmured, "if I hadn't been told . . . about my soul . . . I'd have had . . . less . . ."

He was too weak to say more. He looked at the blue sky outside the window. He was unable at the moment to compare it with anything nauseating; it was blue, only that, and wide and clear. He wondered when the supreme horror would begin, and what the doctor and nurse would think of the shrieks of his tormented soul. He saw his wife's face; she didn't speak, so he couldn't hear her hiss; she had just then no opportunity to put sugar on lettuce, and her heels were not visible. He thought she was rather nice, and he smiled up at her.

She took his hand; it felt like nothing on earth but a kindly human hand; the sun was warm and the sky blue, and he was very comfortable. He closed his eyes and gave a quick, panting little sigh. And that was the end of him. He was cheated out of his supreme horror. . . .

The Flower-Vendor

By ANN HAMILTON

"Here I come
With flowers to sell!
Flowers from the country,
Who wants some?
Roses to smell
And geranium
Or purple pansy,
I grew each one
On my garden farm
With only the sun
To keep them warm;
Who'll buy one?
Come to your doors
And hear me cry
Flowers! Flowers!
Here's mountain fern
And mignonette
Out of the hills
With leaves still wet,
Now who'll buy?
Here I come,
Flowers from the country,
Who wants some?"

("Giddup there, horse,
Don't sleep on your feet,
Maybe there's more folk
Down the next street.")

In the Driftway

MOTORISTS now, speeding up and down the mountains from Cumberland, Maryland, to Wheeling, West Virginia, traverse a road perhaps twenty feet wide, in some places smooth macadam and in others the newer-fashioned concrete. If they think about the road at all it is with a sigh of pleasure, for it is hard to see how it could be better. Along the roadway are milestones about two feet high now, of stone, on which distances are carefully noted; and probably not one motorist in a thousand, including the Drifter himself—until he was taken with curiosity and found out—knows that these very milestones were once as high as a man and were set up when the road was built, more than a hundred years ago. Started in 1806 and built partly over the old road laid by the British under General Braddock in 1755, the Cumberland Road was finished about ten years later and was the main gateway to the West. Nor was it any of your puny, modern, twenty-foot roads; sixty-two feet wide it was, of good macadam, and all day long the stage coaches, drawn by four or six horses, rattled along it, doing their hundred miles a day with ease and assurance.

* * * * *

FOR once the Drifter is quite willing to let someone else tell his story for him. Thomas B. Searight in "The Old Pike" records his reminiscences of the Cumberland Road:

> As many as twenty-four horse coaches have been counted in line at one time on the road, and large, broad-wheeled wagons, covered with white canvas stretched over bows, laden with merchandise and drawn by six Conestoga horses, were visible all the day long at every point, and many times until late in the evening, besides innumerable caravans of horses, mules, cattle, hogs, and sheep. . . . The road was justly renowned for the great number and excellence of its inns and taverns. On the mountain division every mile had its tavern. . . . Whiskey was the leading beverage, and it was plentiful and cheap. The price of a drink of whiskey was three cents, except at the stage houses, where by reason of an assumption of aristocracy the price was five cents. The whiskey of that day is said to have been pure, and many persons of unquestioned respectability affirm with much earnestness that it never produced delirium tremens.

Which the Drifter, for one, is quite willing to believe.

* * * * *

THOSE were the days when a hungry traveler could regale himself on "wheat-bread and chicken fixings," which included, strangely enough, broiled ham, sausages, veal chops, and various other dainties, for the sum of twelve and a half cents, with two drinks of the good, pure whiskey thrown in for a "fippenny bit" extra. "It may seem a trifling thing to be written down in serious history," says Mr. Searight apologetically, "that the old taverns of the mountains excelled all others in the matter of serving buckwheat cakes."

* * * * *

IN the Drifter's opinion this is one of the trifles on which empires rise or fall, and his regard for Henry Clay has advanced on hearing that that worthy praised these mountain cakes with "as much fervor and more enthusiasm than he ever exhibited in commending his favorite measure, the Protective Tariff." Even after a day on this Prince of Roads, the Drifter can imagine that a dish of buckwheat cakes reaching two-thirds of the way to the ceiling would be acceptable.

* * * * *

NOR did the travelers have to fear the want of cheer on cold days.

> Another memorable feature of the mountain taverns was the immense fires kept constantly burning in the old bar rooms during the old-time winters. In many instances the grates were seven feet in length, with corresponding width and depth, and would contain an ordinary wagon load of coal. . . . The old landlord of the mountains took special pride in keeping up his bar-room fire. He kept a poker from six to eight feet long, and would not allow it to be used by any one but himself.

The Drifter lays down his book and sighs; a sixty-foot road, a seven-foot grate, an eight-foot poker, and a three-cent glass of whiskey! A heroic age indeed, and one that we shall not see again; we may conquer the air and annihilate space, but Plenty's Falstaffian appearance has been lost forever.

THE DRIFTER

An Appeal to America

FIFTEEN distinguished leaders of British thought have united in making the following appeal for American cooperation in European affairs:

> Many thoughtful men and women in Britain of various or no political attachment, but nourished upon liberal ideas and valuations, are convinced that the very existence of Western civilization is in jeopardy owing to the failure of Europe to make a good recovery from the material and moral injuries of the Great War. Believing that the strongest cooperation of liberal-minded people in all countries is urgently required if this peril is to be averted, they would naturally turn in the first instance to the people of America who have inherited so many of the same traditions and institutions as themselves.
>
> Though grave economic issues are involved in this task of safeguarding our common civilization, it is not for cooperation on the economic plane that we here appeal, but rather for a closer common understanding and sympathy upon other aspects of the situation.
>
> ### A CONFESSION OF ERROR
>
> Perhaps the best way of approach is by a short general statement of the situation from our point of view. For most of us that statement must be a confession of error and disillusionment. In the heat of the actual conflict many failed sufficiently to recognize the dangers of a victory so complete that the victors would be able to force upon the vanquished any conditions, political, territorial, economic, or moral, which the interests or passions of any one of them might prompt. Some of us were not even disabused by the doings at Versailles, but still believed and hoped that the lessons of the war would somehow liberate forces of reason and good-will adequate to redress any excesses in the operation of a dictated peace so as to make possible a pacific restoration of Europe.
>
> Such beliefs and hopes have now disappeared. The events of the past four years have shown us industrial and financial ruin, wars, famines, revolutions, springing up in quick succession over large tracts of Europe and West Asia from seed sown in the peace treaties and the subsequent policies of the great Western Powers. The professed conditions of a just and reasonable settlement in these treaties and policies are now seen to have been poisoned by the atmosphere of hate, greed, jealousy, and suspicion in which they were conceived and administered. The Sèvres Treaty for the settlement of the Near East quickly broke under the early strains of application, and has left a mere mass of political wreckage behind. The follies of the St. Germain Treaty have unfolded themselves in the unspeakable sufferings of Austria and the grave disorders which have occurred in most of the Austro-Hungarian Succession States.
>
> ### THE TREATY OF VERSAILLES
>
> But our most intense concern is now centered upon the operations of the Versailles Treaty in the ruthless hands of its chief executant. Experience has shown that the rigorous administration of that instrument can yield neither of the two chief results for which it was designed: "Reparations" and "Security." On the contrary, a sharp contradiction between these two prime purposes is contained in the fabric of the treaty, not in some simple error or inconsistency, but traversing the entire body of the treaty and penetrating its minutest recesses. Everywhere runs the contradictory purpose, the crippling of the economic recovery in the supposed interests of French security, and the demand for reparations on such a scale that a complete restoration of Germany's pre-war resources would not suffice for fulfilment.
>
> The occupation of the Ruhr is the supreme instance of the menace to civilization contained in France's separate action, and her now manifest determination to impose her will on

Europe, regardless even of the plainest obligations as laid down in that very treaty to which she constantly appeals in justification of her conduct. For though all the Allies are responsible for the follies and injuries contained in the Versailles Treaty, it is notorious that every other government whose will is not controlled by French power now holds it to be unworkable and favors either formal and complete revision, or the more face-saving method of a non-enforcement of its bad provisions. France alone still stands by its integrity. France alone insists upon terms of reparation which all economists and financiers in America as in Europe know and have declared to be impossible.

EUROPE'S STATE OF MIND

Our object in this statement of the situation is not, however, to arraign France, but rather to invite consideration of the state of mind which continues to make European recovery impracticable. This state of mind, though not dominant as in France, is still prevalent in many circles in our own and other Allied countries. But our people as a whole has thrown off the definitely war mentality, with fear and hate as its chief ingredients, and is anxious for a true peace of Europe and a realization of the ultimate community of material and moral interests between the combatants in the late war.

The signatories of this Appeal stand in a word for an international order, not based on a fortuitous harmony of separate national interests, or upon a balance of power, but upon a conscious regular agreement between the peoples of the world to preserve the common order of the world, and to cooperate in other ways for the achievement of objects which lie beyond the limits of merely national endeavor. That is not the cancelment or the abridgment of national patriotism, but its fulfilment. Just as an individual realizes his highest purposes in concert with his fellows, so a nation needs for its national perfection a society of nations. This is no merely pious aspiration or distant ideal. Such effective cooperation is an immediate need. Only by vigorous international cooperation can Europe escape the disaster we have indicated. The waste and ruin into which French policy is dragging Europe are implicit in two mischievous articles of her faith.

MISCHIEVOUS FRENCH POLICY

The first is her insistence upon administering justice in her own case. The second is the execution of this self-made justice by her national force. The recent exchange of notes between France and Germany is the touchstone. However inadequate the German proposals for reparations and security may be, they are strengthened by the offer to accept an impartial international tribunal as the final court of settlement. If France should continue to refuse this proposal she refuses the only way by which reparations and security can be made compatible. To extricate the mind of France from her fear complex and get her to recognize in international cooperation the only way of salvation, financial and political, is therefore the paramount need of the moment. France cannot extort by force from Germany either the money or the lasting security she needs. Only a wide cooperation in which she has faith can give her what she needs. It is to help in the establishment of that faith that we appeal to America. Will America participate, will she take that leading part to which her strength and disinterestedness entitle her? It is often said that she is not prepared after the recent unhappy experience to entangle herself again in the affairs of Europe. Even those Americans who are least intransigent may be disposed to say, "Let Europe first bring forth fruits worthy of repentance, let her cast out the evil spirits which still rule her policy, let her show by her own capacity of peaceful cooperation that she has learned the lesson of the war—and then we will consider your invitation." As a commentary upon the many ill-considered approaches from Europe in demands for debt-remissions and monetary aids, this may well seem unanswerable. How can America be expected to enter into closer political or economic relations with states which amid all their lamentations about poverty are finding fresh means to furnish armaments upon a more lavish scale than before the war, and are spending on them the money which they constantly profess their inability to repay to their creditors?

A SPIRITUAL NEED

But what if Europe is unable by her own moral resources to escape from this evil mentality? The efforts and suffering of war seem to have left an aftermath of spiritual lethargy, making Europe incapable of coping successfully, by her unaided moral resources, with the devastating ravages of fear and hate. Our appeal to America for cooperation is based upon a spiritual need. America is able to perform a great service of healing for the world, on the one hand, because of the position of detachment and security which she holds; on the other, because of the disinterested motives which brought her into the Great War.

Having proved herself a principal agent of victory in the war, she had every right to a determinant voice in securing the fruits of victory through a just and healing peace. Defeated in this work four years ago by the passionate conduct of her war-associates, she still retains the opportunity to rescue Europe from the path of ruin. European nations alone have not the moral power to enforce fundamental changes in the terms of peace and in the practical relations between their governments and peoples. America by her cooperation could perform this immeasurable service to humanity. Her weight could turn the scale in favor of a just and healing policy. Her cooperation, either by adhesion, with or without reserves, to the League of Nations, or by some other method of her own choosing, would enable her to exercise the greatest influence in the ordering of world affairs ever vouchsafed to any country. It is precisely because her action in the war carried so determinant a weight, precisely because her motives were disinterested that this opportunity to complete the work in which she was interrupted four years ago arises.

AMERICA'S OPPORTUNITY

The war and the subsequent peace do not admit of abrupt separation. By the same act of free choice and moral impulse under which America entered the war she is involved in the sequel. We cannot believe that history will record that America after throwing her force into the war refused to bring her contribution of wisdom to the making of the peace. For the peace is not yet made. We ask America's help in its making. We believe that America can, in that making, impose terms by which the future of world-history shall bear the clear impress of a just and clearer-sighted view of the needs of a distracted world and of the sane policies which should guide its statecraft.

WILLIAM ARCHER (Playwright and Dramatic Critic),
ARNOLD BENNETT (Novelist),
JOHN DRINKWATER (Author of "Abraham Lincoln" and "Robert E. Lee"),
A. G. GARDINER (late Editor, Daily News),
PROFESSOR L. T. HOBHOUSE (Professor of Sociology, London University),
J. A. HOBSON (Economist),
J. M. KEYNES (Author of "Economic Consequences of the Peace"),
EARL LOREBURN (formerly Lord Chancellor),
J. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leader of the Opposition, House of Commons),
H. W. MASSINGHAM (late Editor, Nation),
GILBERT MURRAY (Professor and Author),
SIR HORACE PLUNKETT (founder of the Irish Cooperative Movement),
MAUDE ROYDEN (Lecturer),
MRS. PHILIP SNOWDEN (Lecturer),
GRAHAM WALLAS (Sociologist and Author).

Correspondence

Letters to the Editor should ordinarily not exceed 500 words, and shorter communications are more likely to be printed. In any case the Editor reserves the right to abridge communications.

Another Dastardly Outrage

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The papers report that big employers in Chicago are requiring girls to wear sleeves or lose their jobs. How does this fadge with the Constitution, which says that the right of the people to bare arms shall not be infringed?

Ballard Vale, Massachusetts, July 28 STEVEN T. BYINGTON

Confiscation Pure and Simple

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your article in the issue of August 1 entitled "Are We Americans Thieves?" is certainly severe; but I can not find that its strictures are extravagant. Indeed, it appears to me that a plain statement of the essential facts would bring out even more strongly the immorality and the absurdity of our position.

It cannot be questioned that the intent of the act was to take over the property of alien enemies, for the double purpose of conserving it, and of preventing its employment against our country. This appears from the very clear statements made by Secretary Lansing and Assistant Attorney General Warren before the Congressional committees, as also from the discussions in the committees and in both Houses of Congress. It should be added that for a time Mr. Palmer, as Alien Property Custodian, accepted that interpretation of the law. His later statement that in the darkest hour of the war he asked Congress for more power "to hit the Germans where it would hurt" may be dismissed with a sense of gratitude that our interests were generally in charge of men who had a more comprehensive grasp of the factors that go to decide a war of such magnitude.

But be that as it may, the fact is that Congress did not, in adopting the amendment, give greater power to the custodian for the purposes which he now advances. If that had been the thought, Congress would have declared for the confiscation of the property outright. Instead Congress throughout reserved the power ultimately to dispose of the alien property as it might determine. There is nowhere either direction or suggestion to confiscate or to destroy. The additional power was given solely to enable the custodian to conserve the property more effectually. The use to which the custodian confessedly put his new power was therefore nothing short of abuse of authority. In the discussions it is customary to rest with the case of the Chemical Foundation. In my opinion this case is nothing more than an illustration of the conduct that generally obtained. When going concerns were taken over but were not sold, they were at least subjected to the burden of well-paid directorates which were frequently chosen without regard to experience or fitness. Even United States citizens interested in the concerns and qualified by years of experience were removed to make place for favored directors. In other cases, going concerns engaged in ordinary commercial business—prosperous and without the suggestion of embarrassment—were sold outright, at sacrifice prices. These things were done many months after the armistice when there was no more occasion for war measures, even of the Palmer type.

The fact is that an examination into the character and organization of purchasers affords a very strong intimation that in many of the sales the motive of private profit came decidedly into play.

The Chemical Foundation litigation is all very well. But so far the Government has spoken only in its own behalf. It has not put the stamp of disapproval upon the injury inflicted upon private owners. On the contrary, it has by legislation protected its officials from any chance to challenge misconduct, and it has, in other respects, rendered false the claim that private property has not been confiscated.

To retain such property after the war emergency which gave occasion for its taking has passed; to hold such private property as a pledge for public debt; to withhold income and principal after the war during years of grinding necessity; to permit property to be sold after the war at sacrifice prices; to burden it with heavy expenses for lawyers' and directors' fees; and to deny all right or chance for relief for misconduct constitutes confiscation pure and simple. From that conclusion neither patriotic declamation nor plausible sophistry, nor the otherwise competent and courteous administration of the office, will save us in the eyes of other nations.

St. Louis, July 30 CHARLES NAGEL

Misery in the Virgin Islands

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: We write with the hope that your readers, who, we believe, form a majority of the American people, will realize that down in the Virgin Islands—a new possession of Uncle Sam—the economic conditions may safely be termed deplorable, bordering on total economic destruction, ruinous on account of the application of Federal laws, viz.: quarantine and coastwise laws; the Eighteenth Amendment, and the Federal income-tax law.

Eventual wholesale starvation threatens the entire population if relief be not forthcoming in the immediate future.

Our merchants, in a large majority of cases, are unable to pay their taxes; our children are undernourished and their fathers move about in an undecided manner, desirous of working but unable to procure employment. Life is something miserable in these islands. Surely it is not the thought of this Great American Nation to keep our people in a state of semi-starvation.

We believe, and that implicitly, that they know very little of our condition and, therefore, we propose to tell them of it so that they may realize that in these Virgin Islands they have adopted children who need, in these trying days, their special attention so as to improve their deplorable economic condition.

We request that your paper make direct inquiries about our statements and, after investigation, give publication to the findings, so as to quicken the leaders of this nation's interest in these islands that "they acquired and then forgot."

We plead for immediate consideration and relief. We are not asking charity, but we certainly do believe that we ought to be given a chance to live as decent a life as we have been accustomed to.

PUBLICITY COMMITTEE
ROTHSCHILD FRANCIS, Chairman

St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, July 23

Presidential Primaries

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I suggest that the National Constitution be amended by adding the following article:

> Section 1. The President and Vice-President shall be elected by the people of the several States. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures.
>
> Section 2. Congress shall have full power to enforce and make this article effective.

Under the second clause of this amendment let Congress pass an act for the enforcement of the amendment. It should provide that every man and woman in the nation, of legal age, who is otherwise qualified according to his own State laws, should have the right to enter the primaries in his own State, and perhaps in one additional State, as candidate for the offices of President or Vice-President. It can be seen that many, perhaps hundreds or thousands, might enter the race in particular States, but it can also be seen that out of such large numbers of candidates only three in any one State could win—that is, a Republican, a Democrat, and probably an Independent. That would, if the winners all remained candidates, make 144 candidates for each of the great offices in the entire nation; but as many would no doubt withdraw and refuse to run, etc., it might be reduced to less than 100 candidates for each office.

Let this law also provide that the nation itself, or the separate States, shall print the names of those candidates across the top of the ballot to be used at the November election, placing the names in columns of about twenty-five each, and having four or five columns of them as might be necessary. The law should provide that at the November election every man and woman going to vote should, when in the booth, select and mark the ballot for his or her first, second, and third choice for President, and the same for Vice-President. This obliging the voters to make a first, second, and third choice, is in case no candidate receives a majority of the entire national vote to prevent a mere plurality candidate from being elected, and to make it compulsory to count second or even third choices under the Hare system in case that became necessary in order to determine who was elected to the great offices.

The act would provide for the most modern system of counting the ballots during the polling day, probably having two sets of election officers, so that the counters would be within thirty minutes of the final count at the close of the polling day. It is believed that within a couple of hours thereafter the result would be known at the several State capitals and at the national capital, and hence if any candidate for President or for Vice-President had an unquestioned majority of the votes of the entire nation, he or she would be known to be elected, and that would end it save for the mere official certification of the result. If no person received such unquestioned majority it might require two or three weeks to do the other counting and calculating, but it could be done and done correctly.

The most important provisions of the act of Congress would, of course, be provisions for the payment of at least the cost of the national part of this sort of an election, so that no candidate would have to be wealthy in order to be a candidate. Costs of all candidates would no doubt be strictly limited.

The people of this nation have never directly nominated any candidate for the Presidency or Vice-Presidency, and such a law as this is necessary to make ours a government of the people.

Albuquerque, New Mexico, July 11 B. S. Rodey

A Statement by Edward A. Rumely

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: "I am not guilty" is the answer of my own conscience to the wartime verdict of the jury [in the case of the New York Evening Mail], now affirmed by the [United States Circuit] Court of Appeals. I have always been ready to carry the responsibility for my acts to their final consequences. Now, I should either accept the sentence or, as was suggested by the court when it was imposed, ask for executive clemency, thereby making an implied acknowledgment of guilt. My manhood will allow me to do neither. The only course open is to petition the higher court.

Time has obscured the issues of the case. The jury upheld me as the sole owner of the newspaper stock. I did not conceal my debt but reported it. The issue of the case was whether this debt should have been reported as owing to the Imperial German Government or to Herman Sielcken, who under the terms of the law had become an alien enemy.

In 1914 I sent two emissaries—a great business man and a personal friend and director of a bank—to Herman Sielcken, who was interested in open trade relations between Germany and the United States, to invite him to join with me in the purchase of the Mail. The direct testimony of every witness who had any knowledge of the financial transactions, including the statements of Herman Sielcken himself to S. Walter Kauffmann, was that the moneys advanced in the spring of 1915 and afterward were for the account of Herman Sielcken and that I was so informed. By remaining in Germany until November, 1917, his property under the terms of the Alien Property Act was liable to seizure as that of an alien enemy.

There was not a particle of direct evidence in the case which took thirty days to try that my statement was not truthful. A mass of suspicion and circumstantial evidence was built up which under the stress of war feeling at the time of my trial resulted in my conviction and which the Court of Appeals could not consider.

There was no obstruction of our government, no disloyal act. The entire files of the paper were offered by us in evidence but disregarded by the jury. I challenge anyone to re-read the Mail, both in its editorial policies and news presentation, during the entire period of my ownership. Such an investigation will show it to have been a loyal, sincere, constructive, and worthwhile effort in American journalism.

New York, August 2 Edward A. Rumely

Educational Reaction in Canada

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The tide of reaction has swept over more than Amherst College. I am a student of Outlook College, Saskatchewan, where the trustees have just forced the resignation of Professor O. B. Grimley from his position as vice-president and teacher of history and economics. The forces to unseat him started this movement some three years ago and it was an expected thing that he would be forced out this year. In the seven years which Professor Grimley has spent at this institution he has won the admiration and respect of every student who has entered these halls by his love for the cause of suffering humanity and his fearless, uncompromising stand for truth and justice. When the president of the student body in the course of a conversation with one of the trustees told this gentleman of the unanimous protest of the students against Professor Grimley's dismissal, the reply he received was: "We are not asking for, nor do we care about, the opinions of the students in this matter." Is this the type of man who should be guiding the destinies of our higher institutions of learning?

Macrorie, Saskatchewan, July 16 George E. Britnell

Thanks to Nation Readers

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Truly, indeed, it may be said that the "Nation Family" is a generous hearted one. The response to the letter by Mr. W. T. Brown, published in the issue of June 20, has been overwhelming.

May I ask those kind persons who sent me valuable books, which were to be returned after I had read them, to send me their addresses, stating what books they sent and how many? Some children got into the cabin and destroyed the addresses and a simple little file I had.

Sometime and somewhere I heard the expression "literary wealth." It was an abstract statement then; now it is concrete. Thank you, every one—The Nation too.

Harry Dickens

Inwood, Shasta County, California, July 20

Books

The Federation of Labor and the State

Labor and Politics. By Mollie Ray Carroll. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

THE management of the Pennsylvania Railroad, after fighting the thing through to the Supreme Court and losing there, deliberately—and quite legally—rejects the decision of the Railroad Labor Board concerning its anti-union scheme of employee representation. The shopmen's unions, no less deliberately and no less legally, reject the board's wage decision and go on strike. In neither case is such action a defiance of law, but in both cases it is a conscious and deliberate rejection of a governmental agency established for the specific purpose of preventing just such one-sided attempts at settlement of controversies that involve three-sided interests.

What is to be done with such determined efforts at industrial self-assertion and consequent social dominance? Crush them, most persons will reply without hesitation; enforce the law and the supremacy of the state. The reply is too simple. It neglects a basic consideration. All obedience is at bottom voluntary. Society is held together by consent, not by force. Labor, under whatever compulsion, is yet rendered voluntarily. The supremacy of law depends fundamentally on our maintaining conditions that will secure the free and unenforced cooperation of all the important social groups. To that end those groups must be understood.

Of such groups in the American body politic, one of the most important, both in numbers included and in interests represented, is the American Federation of Labor. Mollie Ray Carroll's unfortunately named "Labor and Politics" is an admirable statement and explanation of the policies and ideas of that organization during the forty years of its existence. Written chiefly from the convention proceedings and official pronouncements of the Federation and the numerous writings of Mr. Gompers, the book is objective, informed, fair, severely and even dryly scientific, yet sympathetic and intelligently critical. Small wonder, perhaps, that it has already called down upon itself vitriolic condemnation in the columns of the American Federationist as another bit of meddling outside interference. Generously recognizing that industrial conservatism was probably political wisdom on the part of the Federation's leaders in the past, Miss Carroll concludes, after a careful study of the history and program of the organization and of its attitude toward the law and politics, that it "must develop constructive in place of its negative policies as regards legislation, research and higher education, and production, and that its progress in the future depends upon positive contributions to the welfare not only of its members, but as well of those outside its ranks, of industry, and of the state."

The Federation was born out of economic conflict. Its constituent organizations came into existence to bargain with employers. As a result of long experience, it therefore prefers wherever possible to strive for better wages, hours, and working conditions by the use of its own economic power through collective bargaining and the threat of the strike rather than by law. It believes that in general it can get more for its members by direct economic means than by political ones; therefore in its philosophy the relations between employer and employee lie outside the political realm. As regards special classes of workers, however, unable to bargain successfully—children, women, seamen, and government employees—the Federation has persistently urged state action. Further, in reference to problems too broad to be settled by bargaining, it has favored legislation covering all workers, as is shown in the chapter dealing with insurance, safety, occupational disease, unemployment, convict labor, immigration, and Asiatic exclusion. Its interest in general social legislation, however, has been slight, centering chiefly on matters of direct concern to its members. Its policy has been to get all it could by bargaining, and where bargaining was impossible to use legislation. In the latter field its methods have been lobbying and non-partisan political activity.

In the bargaining field, however, the Federation has wished to be free from the law, partly because of a general economic aversion to legal restriction, but perhaps more largely because of "the belief of the trade unionist that the law, as administered, is generally unduly favorable to the employer." Instead of trying to secure a positive legal status for the unions and their activities such as was gained by the British organizations through the Trade Disputes Act of 1906, the Federation has thus far followed the negative policy of trying to exempt the unions from the effect of laws.

Now all this, in the case of an organization of more than four million men, is a highly important phenomenon. While it contains sinister possibilities, it demands explanation rather than simple denunciation. Miss Carroll's explanation is suggestive rather than exhaustive, and it rests on an unsatisfactorily narrow body of evidence; yet it may be commended to those who are for the short and easy method of teaching labor once and for all to "know its place." The propertyless man is still in process of acquiring a legal status even nominally equal to that of the propertied, and in the administration of the law he inevitably finds himself at disadvantage—what else do laws for the protection of property mean? The inference, though Miss Carroll does not draw it, is clear. The only condition of social stability is the progressive modification of law to correspond with the changing distribution of economic and social power.

With full recognition of the achievements of the Federation during the past third of a century, then, the thoughtful reader of these pages can scarcely avoid the conclusion that it has reached the end of the road which it has traveled hitherto. If violent social revolution is to be avoided, and if the Federation is not to wander off into the wilderness of syndicalism or to march along the highroad of political socialism (and both possibilities are anathema to its present leaders), two things appear to be necessary. First, American society must find a place in its economic and legal scheme for labor organizations, not simply for "labor organizations, but—." Second, the Federation must discover that the world holds other possibilities than simply fighting employers. However essential, from labor's point of view, that policy may have been, and under certain conditions still may be, like all warfare it is socially barren and destructive. Miss Carroll expresses a sound judgment in concluding that "its contribution toward a comprehensive program for increasing efficiency in production" should be the test of Federation policy in the future, and that such a policy "should presumably include an increasingly wider labor membership in the organization, increased production with decreased costs to the consumer, the stabilization of employment and wages, the lessening of industrial warfare, and closer cooperation with those outside the labor group who can aid in the development of a constructive program along the lines indicated." While there are signs of progress, the development of such a program must presumably wait on new leadership; but in the American Federation, as in other political organizations, "few die, and none resign."

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

War or Civilization

War: Its Nature, Cause and Cure. By G. Lowes Dickinson. The Macmillan Company.

THERE is no one like your academic person to express himself clearly and forcibly when he is profoundly moved. The notion that a classical education is fatal to a simple and strenuous English style would scarcely survive a reading of this book written by a Fellow of King's and the author of "The Greek View of Life." Not even the editorials of Arthur Brisbane are more vigorous or easier to comprehend. We have here, indeed, an example of the most effective kind of pamphleteering. Mr. Dickinson has set before himself the definite object of making his readers, especially young men, feel as acutely as he does the menace of modern war, and of stirring them up to do something about it. Extensive as the literature of the subject already is, he believes the time has come for a fresh treatment, for there is one fact that puts out of date all the ordinary discussion of war—namely, that, if mankind does not end war, war will end mankind. This has not been true in the past but it is true in the present. Modern science can destroy as easily as it can create, and all that it creates is useless if it creates only to destroy. To men of science themselves Mr. Dickinson addresses one pungent chapter, asking them to consider whether they are content to place their expert knowledge, as a mere blind tool, into the hands of such governments as in fact we get and such soldiers as we must always have so long as there are soldiers at all.

But it is to the general public that Mr. Dickinson mainly appeals. Non-combatants are not allowed to know what war is really like. During the late war there was stretched, day by day, between them and the truth "the immense curtain of the press," as irrelevant to what went on behind it as is the curtain of any theater. Mr. Dickinson strips off these veils of humbug. Then he deals faithfully with the various arguments with which people delude themselves; the arguments, for instance, that war is inevitable, and that men are naturally bellicose. Wars are caused, he maintains, not by the passions of ordinary men but by the playing upon these passions by particular men. In a brief but admirable sketch of diplomatic history from 1870 to 1914 he lays bare the real causes of the Great War, and he is equally illuminating and remorseless in his scrutiny of the following peace. ("No war ever fought," he boldly asserts, "has ever been ended by anything but a base peace.")

If civilization is to be saved, the author contends, we must learn to change altogether our traditional view of our relation to other states and other peoples. The dominant motive of war is always the economic cupidity of certain interests which sooner or later can produce a situation in which it is possible to appeal to the blind patriotism of the ordinary man. The weak point of the book is perhaps its failure to suggest any practical means by which the power of this appeal may be destroyed. Should not the next step in peace propaganda be an honest and courageous attempt—it would need to be courageous because of the tremendous forces, secular and religious, that would at once be arrayed in opposition—to face the question whether or not patriotism is, after all, a virtue? Mr. Dickinson urges in particular that the theory commonly called "sovereignty" should be abandoned or at any rate modified. But the root of the evil lies far deeper, in a popular sentiment that urgently needs exposure to the light of common sense and Christian doctrine. HERBERT W. HORWILL

Cocky Cocteau

Le Grand Ecart. By Jean Cocteau. Paris: Librairie Stock.

AT last Jean Cocteau has furnished the world with a weapon against himself. His poetry—well, one must always be wary of new poetic forces, lest he comment condescendingly upon genius. His criticism—there is not much of it, and somehow through the scintillation of its many facets we hesitate to name it diamond or paste. His novel is a volume about which the fist can close, so as to thump it hard on the head of him who has so mocked his fellow-writers.

But where is the novel? The hero, if Jacques can support the title, is tossed gently from one sex adventure to another, while the reader has always a sense that the real story is still to come. The episode of the journalist who threatens to commit suicide in Venice, and does, would adorn the pages of Leacock's "Nonsense Novels"; the relations of the menage Berlin are pictured with the subtlety of Lawrence and the brilliance of Chesterton; in the lighter moments there is an underdepth, in the serious sections, a surface sparkle; one would have difficulty in concentrating a characterization of Cocteau's style.

Yet certain of Cocteau's ways are recognizable here. His manner of interjecting anecdotes that, Æsopwise, point the thought of the moment, the ease with which he develops unusual figures, still prevail. "His mother thought she was bringing back the same person. . . . In fact, he left a dry skin floating on the Grand Canal, one of those skins that adders hang upon eglantines, light as foam, open at the mouth and at the eyes." And later, after love had changed him again: "At the circus, an imprudent mother let her child act as subject for a conjurer. He was put in a coffin. The coffin was opened; it was empty. The coffin was closed. It was opened; the child reappeared and returned to its place. Only, it was not the same child. No one suspected it."

More welcome are the casual drippings of philosophy, the epigrams that run so readily from Cocteau's pen. "To love and to be loved: there is the ideal. Provided, of course, that it's the same person." "Her beauty hangs over ugliness, as the acrobat over death." "Germaine did not hesitate to break a heart. She agreed with maidservants that a precious object, broken, glues itself again." "He killed a little of the time that was killing so much of him." Smart-Aleck Cocteau smirks in: "He was named Nestor Osiris, like a box of cigarettes." But he draws us back to recognize that somehow, out of unreality and dazzling fancies, he has embodied a real Jacques. Jacques, who wants to become that which he desires; until he falls in love, and wants to possess—himself in the beloved. Through her infidelity he loses himself, experiences all the sensations of suicide, but revives to come to the decision that "to live on earth he must keep in style, and hearts are no longer being carried." JOSEPH T. SHIPLEY

Pseudo-Classic

The Literary Discipline. By John Erskine. Duffield and Company. $1.50.

DISTURBED by the vagaries of modern literature, Mr. Erskine bases his criticism on a theory of limits—the limits of decency, the limits of naturalism, and the limits of originality. His doctrine, he says, is based upon the belief "that language as a medium of expression has certain limits which the writer must respect, and that the psychology of his audience limits him also in what he may say, if he would gain a wide hearing and keep it."

Now something of the sort may possibly be true. The absolute and unchangeable may exist in manners, morals, science, and art. It may be said, however, not at all in cheap personal mockery but as the enunciation of a critical doctrine, that if rules exist in the realm of literature Mr. Erskine does not know what they are. The story of art, like the story of morals and the story of science, is the story of the breakers of tablets, and the business of a writer is not to be constantly afraid of overstepping the limits set by his material. Instead he should do all in his power to break through them, for every really important piece of writing is, in some sense, a crashing through the limits of what it was formerly believed possible to make words say and readers understand. The old saying that in art rules exist only to be broken holds true for content as well as for form, and what Mr. Erskine believes to be the eternal rules of propriety, for instance, are no more eternal than the rule of the three unities. Before a great writer who felt the need of breaking them he would be as impotent and as absurd as Thomas Rymer before Shakespeare.

What passes with the school of conservative critics for the spirit of classicism is in reality only a sort of timidity. They are so thoroughly habituated to a certain kind of literature and a certain code of manners and morals that they feel uncomfortable at the thought that there may be others. They would rather say to literature and society "Thus far shalt thou go and no further" than to expose themselves to the discomfort inherent in making a readjustment. In the interest of their own peace of mind they would set limits upon the human spirit, and shutting themselves up within the confines of one sort of literature and one group of social conventions they would say to the world "This is all." In such an atmosphere, Alexandrian rather than classic, men may grow learned and polished and sterile, but creative spirits will know that there is something to be said, felt, and done beyond the limits of safe thinking, good manners, and respectable behavior.

As a reproach to the spirit and aims of modern literature Mr. Erskine does not hesitate to quote once more "saw life steadily and saw it whole." Platitude though the phrase is, it is false. Not Sophocles and not Mr. Erskine's revered Aristotle saw life whole, for such a vision is reserved alone for whatever gods may be. Of their knowledge and their experience, Sophocles and Aristotle made a synthesis more satisfactory, perhaps, than any which we moderns have achieved, but their task was simpler. Since their day the world has learned much and suffered much, penetrated many secrets, seen strange visions, and tossed through strange nightmares. Men of the younger times with their calm, complete art were happier perhaps than we, but we cannot return to them. And if we are to attain for ourselves a synthesis and a serenity we must win our own, not return to theirs. Romanticism is to art what experiment is to science—a gathering of the material from which synthesis is made. The over-particularity, the contemporaneity, the barbarous novelty which Mr. Erskine perceives in contemporary literature are there, but they must be there as the waste products of our experiment and we must suffer them. For us there is but one alternative—to experiment or to abandon all hope of putting the modern soul into literature and to rest content in the platitudes of a pseudo-classicism.

J. W. KRUTCH

Nature and Human Nature

The Desert Horizon. By E. L. Grant Watson. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THE majority of readers, of metropolitan readers at any rate, do not care for stories in which nature plays a large part. Nature as a background for adventure is quite popular, but as an overpowering atmosphere it is distinctly out of favor with the fiction-devouring public. This may be due to any one, or to all, of a number of reasons. Most of us are out of touch with primitive nature; we cannot feel her moods as readily as the emotions of human beings, which are always in some way associated with our own; and because of this alienation it is more difficult for the writer to communicate the moods of nature. An analysis of them must necessarily be vague and leave much to the imagination. Descriptive passages cannot be read passively; they must be recreated and amplified to be felt. If the reader has seen nothing to parallel the environment sketched, a realistic description of it is likely to irritate him by exploiting what seem to be fantastic phenomena.

Nevertheless a large proportion of great writers have drawn the strength and flavor of their work from the free, the unexplored or hidden, places of the earth. Of these writers E. L. Grant Watson is one. He does not rank with Hardy and Conrad; he is, relatively, a beginner. It is doubtful whether he will be able to attain their might and inclusiveness. Compared to their books, "The Desert Horizon" is a miniature: no great human action moves in its pages, which are filled by the Australian bush with an undivided majesty that cannot be regretted. The story is slight. Martin O'Brien, the boy-hero, remains in the memory as a silent speck on the desert, watching it with wondering, awed eyes as he slowly becomes a part of its impersonal being. The characters and incidents are sparse, gripped in the relentless domination of the bush. Martin's marriage, which is not likely to be an unperturbed one, troubles the reader as an intrusion. But by his own submission to the spell of the desert he is persuaded that any conflict of loves in Martin will be a temporary one. Every personal passion must yield to that insatiable desire, that worship, for the bush.

There is in this book a spirit different from that felt in finely done stories of the sea or mountains. In those there is commonly a restlessness, an urge, on the part of the human being to be one with a greater turbulence expressed in nature; even the static mountains have some quality that arouses chaos in the individual at the same time it gives him serenity. Martin has a dark, inarticulate communion with the inscrutable character of the country about him, and the bush, like the sea and the mountains, is fierce and sinister, but in it these elements are feline, withdrawn like the claws of a cat beneath gentle paws. The impression created in the reader is one of peacefulness and light. It is as if the all-pervading sunlight annihilated strife and engendered single-mindedness. Martin's love for the bush is chaste and content. It is enough for him that he can live there—all else he leaves to the imperceptible workings of unknown forces. The bright light and soft hues of an arid land are in Willa Cather's earlier books, but they do not inform the consciousness of her characters as they do Martin's. Mr. Watson conveys the purity and indomitableness of Martin's love for the bush flawlessly in his brittle, pellucid sentences. His book is like a beautiful vase blown from the sands of the desert and tinted with its colors.

EVA GOLDBECK

The Evolution of Jahweh

The Literature of the Old Testament. By Julius A. Bewer. Columbia University Press. $5.

THIS is one of the admirable "Records of Civilization: Sources and Studies," edited by Professor James T. Shotwell. The first four volumes treated of Hellenic civilization, of Bishop Gregory's history of the Franks, of the popes, and of the study of history in general. The present book is an attractive outline of the whole Old Testament, giving the various portions in their probable approximate chronology, from the song of the terrible Lamech, with its bloodthirsty "If Cain takes vengeance sevenfold, Lamech will truly seven and seventy fold!" to the last part of Zechariah (the Third or Trito-Zechariah). Passing from such ancient lyric outbursts as the Red Sea song of deliverance, the pledge of eternal warfare against the Amalekites, the Ark formulae, the taunt song against the Amorites, and the splendid paean of Deborah, it turns to the well-told tale of the founding of the kingdom, and the early laws. Next the author takes up the two chief accounts of the history of man intertwined in the Old Testament, the Yahwist from the southern tribes, and the Elohist from the northern. As was to have been expected, the Judean, with its worship of Jah, inclines toward monotheism, while the Elohist, sacred to the deity known as El or its plural form Elohim, was polytheistic and, indeed, polydemonistic. Then the prophets, led by Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah, commence their process of expanding the conception of the incubus divinity to the all-creator, the all-father, to be incarnated in a man of sorrows, despised and rejected of men, who shall bring peace to the nations. There is a capable treatment of the poetic and wisdom books, of the smug Deuteronomist, of the post-exilic historians and prophets. The whole is amply garnished with quotations, and evidences a sound assimilation of the surface results of critical study of Old Testament sources. It closes with a broad implication that the whole is a part of the revelation of the living God.

If all that was needed were a corrective blue-print of the externals of this polyandrous literature, this volume would earn wholehearted commendation. But modern man is interested at least as much in interpretation as in mere picturing: a topographical map of the Panama region would gain immensely if it were explained that the winding clove in the hills was a great canal, marrying the commerce of two weighted seas. There are certain well-buttressed authorities in interpretation who throw light upon the very chronology of Old Testament material: for instance, such an investigator as Lewis Wallis, in his "Sociology of the Bible." His amazing contribution, that the major portions of the earlier covenant represent an economic conflict between the adopted city culture of the Canaanites and the primitive sheep-raising ideal and ethic of the nomad Hebrews—a conflict which blesses the products of the shepherd and curses those of the agriculturist; and the most tenable hypothesis so far to explain such an isolated key-story as the Cain-Abel narrative—this earns a directing part in all Biblical criticism and exposition; and the author is apparently unaware of it. Budde, Wellhausen, and the older authorities are cited; but from Budde a hint of the notable exotic origin of Jahweh worship, so felicitously amplified by Wallis, might have been gathered. The latter's theory is hinted at, although he is apparently not listed in the Bibliography. To locate the Garden of Eden myth as an agricultural product, as the author does, perhaps misses its entire point, namely, the impropriety of eating the fruits of the orchard, which is a form of agriculture; which might establish this, too, as a story with a shepherd moral concealed. Minor matters of over-enthusiasm, such as a pox of exclamation points, and loose superlatives of the type of "Jonathan, than whom no braver warrior ever lived," indicate a type of mind which, either innately or purposely, tends toward a factitious popularity at the expense of scientific correctness. The volume is an admirable one; but a better one should at some future time be written. CLEMENT WOOD

Hungary Misinterpreted

An Outlaw's Diary: Revolution. By Cecile Tormay. With a Foreword by the Duke of Northumberland. Robert M. McBride & Company. $3.

THE book of Miss Cecile Tormay is a so-called "historical diary," describing the political events which took place in Hungary during the regime of Count Michael Karolyi, from October 31, 1918, to March 21, 1919, when the Hungarian Soviet Republic was proclaimed. Miss Tormay makes use of a kind of pious exorcism when she declares in the preface of her book that "here is no attempt to write the history of the revolution nor is this the diary of a witness of political events." As a matter of fact, nothing upholds this assertion in the main narrative of the book, which is as peremptory and sententious in presenting its information as if the authoress had stood directly behind the governmental machine.

Not for a moment is there any doubt in the mind of Miss Tormay as to the motives of the occurrences reported. She traces them back to a fiendish conspiracy of the Jewish race and of some "bad Hungarians" whose only desire it was to have their native country invaded and dismembered by the enemy. For Miss Tormay the regime of Count Karolyi was the empire of the evil spirit; Karolyi and his associates the reincarnations of the devil. There is no lack of falsifications in Miss Tormay's book. When she thinks that her point would be more emphasized by showing the paramount Jewish influence in the Hungarian revolution she makes two members of Karolyi's cabinet, Professor Jaszi and Alexander Garami, both of undisputed Gentile origin, the "representatives of their Jewish race."

There is something elementally tempestuous in the hatred Miss Tormay feels toward everybody whom she suspects of having any connection with the regime of Count Karolyi or with progressivism in general. She hurls a legion of unjustifiable accusations at some of the most venerable participants in the shaping of contemporary Hungarian history. When characterizing Father Hock, the idol of the Hungarian nation, she describes him as a "guilty priest, a guilty Hungarian who betrayed his God and his country." She forgets to mention that but for Father Hock the Hungarian revolution of 1918 would not be called the "bloodless revolution." One could go over nearly every page of the book pointing out malicious invention and interpretation of events to which Miss Tormay must plead guilty.

If the second part of the diary containing the account of the Hungarian Commune, which the publishers promise to bring out very shortly, is written in the same partisan spirit and with the same inaccuracy of facts and statement as the present volume, the world will not get much nearer to an understanding of that mysterious phenomenon. EMIL LENGYEL

A Courteous and Conciliatory Diplomat

Under Four Administrations. From Cleveland to Taft. Recollections of Oscar S. Straus. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

IT is an exceptionally active life the larger part of whose story, happily not yet finished, Mr. Straus tells in this simply written volume. Rarely has it happened that an American public man, even when his views on national political questions were not very pronounced, has been appointed to political offices under presidents as different as Cleveland, McKinley, Roosevelt, and Mr. Taft. Most of the men who served these executives have been perforce content to receive preferment at the hands of one or other of them and then to be discarded, but Mr. Straus has served them all. Appointed Minister to Turkey by Cleveland in 1887, he was again appointed to the same post by McKinley in 1898. In 1902 Roosevelt made him a member of the permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague, and in 1909 he returned to Turkey as ambassador under Mr. Taft. A fifth administration is in fact to be added to the list, for in 1919 Mr. Straus served as a member of the second industrial conference called by Mr. Wilson.

The secret of Mr. Straus's success under circumstances so diverse lies very largely in his possession of personal qualities all too uncommon in American public life. He is uniformly courteous and conciliatory, sympathetic and considerate. He is never in a hurry to rush in where trouble reigns, and he has refrained from speaking or acting until he has looked the matter up and decided upon what he wanted to say. Clearly a born diplomat, he appears to have looked upon diplomacy rather as an instrument for settling controversies by making the way of international relations plain than as a forum for proclaiming an aggressive Americanism or arguing to the last point of form and technicality every national pretension. This is not to say that the obligations of diplomacy or administrative office sat lightly upon him or that the interests intrusted to him were neglected or compromised. The recollections which he has written down contain abundant evidence of his vigor and persistence when occasion required, and of the success with which he won from the Sultan, the only head of a foreign government with whom he had officially to deal, concessions which the Sultan appeared at first loath to grant. Only, in his hands, quiet insistence was a better tool than bluster or threats.

It did not fall to Mr. Straus, in the diplomatic portion of his career, to deal with any international question of the first importance, and his administration of the Department of Commerce and Labor, while characterized by useful achievements in policy and procedure, was without striking features. What he has to say about the activities of the Paris commission of the League to Enforce Peace, at the peace conference, adds something to our knowledge of what went on in Paris at that time. For most readers of the volume, however, we fancy that the greater interest will be found in the record of personal incidents and the allusions to notable people. There are informing glimpses of court formalities and social life at Constantinople, and suggestive comments on the status of Jews in various parts of Europe and on the activities of Christian missionaries in the Near East. That Mr. Straus should have been uniformly acceptable to the missionary interests in spite of the divergence of faith is one of his most gratifying claims to remembrance.

Mr. Straus's personal contacts have been wide. His "Origin of the Republican Form of Government," published in 1885, early attracted favorable notice abroad, and he was later one of the principal promoters of the American Society of International Law. He was on terms of special intimacy with Cleveland and Roosevelt, and the little-known history of cabinet meetings is enriched by a number of anecdotes which he records. It was characteristic of his general political independence, and perhaps also of his sense of personal loyalty, that he should have gone with Roosevelt into the Progressive movement, and accepted the nomination for governor which the New York convention of the party thrust upon him, without in either case cherishing any illusions as to the outcome of the revolt.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

The Problem of Style

The Problem of Style. By J. Middleton Murry. Oxford University Press. $2.20.

THIS is a collection of six lectures delivered in the school of English literature at Oxford, wherein Mr. Murry brings his grain of enlightenment to the consideration of the problem of style with some little clarification and a great deal of entanglement. All those who are somewhat of obscurantists when it comes to the conundrum of theorizing about style will find in these papers adequate support of the belief that the most which can be given us is the individual's conception, and none too lucid at that.

Mr. Murry discards Buffon for Stendhal. "Le style, c'est l'homme même" is altogether too naive for this sophisticated age. "Le style, c'est ajouter à une pensée donnée toutes les circonstances propres à produire tout l'effet que doit produire cette pensée" is much better, though that little word "ought" is a puzzler and leads to no end of speculation. It leads to six lectures.

Yet Mr. Murry takes an extremely common sense attitude toward the whole matter. He forbears to soar in those faery realms of superior criticism, so dear to the hearts of all Frenchmen, dwells rather on the consideration of the hard fact that the writer has something to communicate to his reader and that which best permits communication is the best style. He throws out Arnold's proposition that all great writing is primarily a "criticism of life" as dangerous on the strength of the very passages which Arnold quoted to support his theory. He believes that style is rather a "combination of the maximum of personality with the maximum of impersonality; on the one hand, it is a concentration of peculiar and personal emotion, on the other it is a complete projection of this personal emotion into the created thing." And if this may seem somewhat paradoxical, he repeats later that "to be impersonal is the best way of achieving personality, and it gives him [the writer] far less chance of deceiving himself."

The lecture on Poetry and Prose is masterly and clears up a lot of fol-de-rol about the inviolable wall dividing poetry and prose. Mr. Murry points out that the forms are interchangeable and are more often accepted than chosen, depending upon the taste of the age. Shakespeare, he believes, would have found himself entirely at home in the novel had be lived in the nineteenth century. It follows that a lesser artist who cannot so easily fit himself into the idiom of his period must necessarily be somewhat cramped, but Mr. Murry does not give much thought to the proposition. He is inclined to dismiss the minors with too summary a wave of the hand.

I wonder how many will agree with Mr. Murry's easy assumption that "Shakespeare was, after all, the greatest writer the human race has produced," or that Keats was a "poet of a higher order than Shelley." For this latter statement he builds upon figments of promise only, what Keats wanted to do as revealed in his letters, the objectivity he should have liked to reach. After all, we actually have the last act of "Prometheus Unbound," the great chorus of "Hellas," which are without doubt two of the grandest contributions to the lyric poetry of all time.

The English Bible and the Grand Style is a pretty keen piece of analysis and Mr. Murry brings a good deal of light to bear upon the advice so often given to aspiring young scribblers to study the Bible if they would learn to write beautifully. He believes that no little part of the effect produced by the Bible is due to the original religious predisposition of the reader which lends more significance to passages than can truly be ascribed to the literary style. Far better to play the sedulous ape to Shakespeare, he thinks. But, it seems to me, there is a simplicity, a directness stripped of elaborate detail and metaphor about the Old Testament language that permits one far more easily to study the tremendous force of words than the complex combinations welded together on the anvil of Shakespeare's genius. Shakespeare brought up rich handfuls of pure gold from the highways and the market-places and knew how to use his lavish treasures splendidly, but the husbandry of the inevitable word is nowhere better shown than in the Old Testament.

EDWIN SEAVER

An Argentinian Knight-Errant

Mi Campaña hispano-americana. By Manuel Ugarte. Barcelona. Editorial Cervantes. 1922.

ASIDE from Mexico, the reviewer has no first-hand knowledge of political and social conditions in Latin America; but as a student of Latin-American literature he has become convinced that it is no random accident, nor yet an evidence of incurable Latin-American jealousy and perversity, that literary men to the south of us are almost invariably bitter critics of North American "imperialism." The Latin is an enthusiast, a hothead, a lover of swelling invective, if you wish; but why do his verbal brickbats so generally fly in our direction rather than at the Spain of the conquistadores, the France of Louis Napoleon and Maximilian, the England of the Falklands, British Guiana, and Belize? The Lord endowed not only Anglo-Saxons, but also Spaniards and Indians, with reasoning powers; and if so many of the best minds of Spanish America dislike and fear us, it must be that in our Latin-American contacts we have at least sometimes been unkind and unfair.

In the bulk of their writing, the dislike and fear show themselves in vague rhetoric and random abuse. No race, perhaps, is quite so generally addicted as the Spanish Americans to the weakness of petitio principii; which, it is true, is only a phase of the impulsiveness and improvidence which have made it so easy for enterprising Yankees to dictate their policies and appropriate their customs receipts. But there are heartening exceptions. Manuel Ugarte, poet, essayist, novelist, is forceful, sober, responsible. He always writes well, and although he rises occasionally to flights of Latin eloquence, he is never ecstatic and never abusive. He is always careful, and always the gentleman. He would no doubt have deemed it both poor taste and poor judgment to manifest his disapproval of the Northern tyrant by undertaking, as did his fellow-patriot Blanco-Fombona of Venezuela, to chastise a New York policeman. He maintains that he is not anti-Yankee, but only pro-Hispanic. He is, however, courageous. In Barcelona and Cadiz he assures his audiences that the Spanish-American colonies threw off the yoke, not of Spain, but of a certain king's absolutism. In Paris he almost regrets that Maximilian did not hold Mexico (as a check to Yankee imperialism), and quite regrets the failure of the French canal enterprise, for a similar reason. But at Columbia University he repeats frankly in the second person what he told Spaniards and Frenchmen in the third, with the qualification, to which most of us can subscribe, that American aggressions in the Latin countries are not the work of Americans in general, but of certain shrewd interests.

It would seem that nothing could be less like the tactics of these "interests" than the generous Quixotism of the Buenos Aires journalist. On his own responsibility, it appears, and without financial backing, he covered three continents and delivered a hundred addresses, describing a circle, from Barcelona in May, 1910, to Cadiz in January, 1920, and including Paris, New York, Mexico City, and the leading capitals of Central and South America, pleading with Spaniards and French for moral support, with North Americans for fairness and justice, with Latin Americans for union, industry, caution, firmness. He was everywhere given at least a respectful hearing, except in Nicaragua, where the American marines ordered him out of the country—one of those tactical blunders which have hurt the American cause so often, by apparently establishing the shady nature of American activities. These addresses and their written record are a generous effort which can certainly do only good to Americans on both sides of the Rio Grande.

ROY TEMPLE HOUSE

Books in Brief

The Reds Bring Reaction. By W. J. Ghent. Princeton University Press. $1.50.

Ghent is an unhappy socialist who believes that all other socialists are out of step. "The cause of Socialism is still my cause," he says, after belaboring all socialists but himself in the columns of the Morgan-aided Weekly Review and Independent in essays here reprinted. The I.W.W., the Socialist Party, the Socialist Labor Party, the Communists, the radicals, the liberals, everybody has failed to agree with Ghent. But for these, Ghent seems to feel, he might have reformed America. As it is he concludes that "capitalism promotes political democracy" and constitutes satisfactory modus vivendi.

Things Near and Far. By Arthur Machen. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

The spiritual autobiography of a Grub Street mystic. Beautifully written in the style now familiar to American readers.

Giving and Receiving. By E. V. Lucas. George H. Doran Company. $2.

Mr. Lucas devotes an essay on The Five Chief Cities of Italy to a description of the national passion for Lotto. Such is the method of one of the few men who is really master of the much-abused art of the familiar essay.

Conquistador. By Katharine Fullerton Gerould. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

As good a romance of adventure as is likely to be written by a sheltered lady with considerable technical adroitness.

Art

Cézanne

PAUL CÉZANNE, the artist about whom the world of art is so much exercised these days, came from an Italian family of poor folk which had emigrated to France in the eighteenth century, to seek its fortune. His father was of Aix-en-Provence, where Paul also was born, and rose in time to be one of the leading and richest citizens of that little town. He objected strongly and shrewdly to his son's interest in drawing and painting, for he saw no material advantages in such pursuits. But his wife was not of his peasant breed, and Elizabeth Aubert with her Creole temperament wanted her boy to be another Veronese or Rubens, for these also were named Paul. There was much a to-do in the Cézanne home because of this difference between the parents, but in the end the mother had her way. She had an egocentric nature, and her son was blessed or cursed with a like disposition. It thus happened that the boy who had been an enigma to his father became, in after years, an enigma to the critics. But Paul Cézanne, the boy apprentice to art, no more troubled himself about his father's opinion than did Cézanne the master artist about his critics' opinions. He went his way and had that way all to himself.

M. Ambroise Vollard, the well-known connoisseur and Cézanne enthusiast, and the author of this sketch of Cézanne's life and art* tells us of the artist's school days and his friendship with Zola, who was also of Aix, and with whom Cézanne formed a close friendship which endured until the vanity of the man of letters was no longer bearable to the simple and honest nature of the painter. M. Vollard reveals the difficulties which Cézanne experienced in his efforts to obtain an entry into the Salon, and tells of his struggles against an almost concerted refusal of officialdom to put the stamp of its approval on his work. These facts have been history for years, but their recital now affords food for thought when we contrast the ridicule which was then heaped on Cézanne with the praise which his work now receives. There must be a strange power in this man's genius which has so moved the world to extremes of depreciation at one time and appreciation at another. M. Vollard has nothing to say on this matter. He is not a critic of art, but a dealer in works of art. His method of valuation is quantitative and not qualitative, so that his Life and Art of Cézanne is of the order of "ana" rather than of biography or criticism. Yet his brochure has an interest of its own which justifies its existence.

It tells a story of devotion on the part of M. Vollard which is strangely at variance with the customs and habits of the more modern adventurers in the business of art, and reveals an insight on his part which is almost uncanny. When a picture dealer has the courage which M. Vollard evinced in holding the exhibition of Cézanne's work in his galleries on the rue Lafayette, he deserves all the success and all praise. For that courage was charged with an enthusiasm which is akin to love. He championed this despised and rejected of men in the spirit of the religious fanatic, and risked his all on his faith. Despite the jeers and sneers of his contemporaries, M. Vollard has lived to see his faith justified and to reap the golden harvest which his shrewdness or his understanding or his intuition urged him to anticipate.

In 1895 people came to Vollard's windows to look at the "nightmares of atrocities in art" displayed there, as they would have gone to a circus or a raree-show. The honest vision of the painter of the pictures exhibited on the rue Lafayette was met by an equally honest vision of the crowd, and the crowd roared with mocking laughter. Even Huysmans shrieked that Cézanne was "an artist with diseased retinae who, exasperated by a faulty vision, has discovered the prodromes of a new art." In 1904 it was no better. The critics said that Cézanne chose "to daub paint on a canvas and spread it around with a comb or a toothbrush"; that he didn't know the first principles of art; that his work "might have been produced by a Zulu islander"; that his "daubed portraits bear witness to a fatal impotence"; that the room in which his pictures were hung was a chamber of horrors. But in 1912 he was "magnificent monster," and in 1923 people fought each other in the auction rooms to possess one of his paintings. Such is the way of the world of art, and those dealers who, like M. Vollard, have the foresight and the enthusiasm and the patience and who live long enough are to be pardoned if they relieve themselves of their surcharged vanity in being also among the prophets. This is the best that can be said of this book which as literature is negligible, and as a specimen of book-making far from distinguished.

TEMPLE SCOTT

---

* Paul Cézanne, His Life and Art. By Ambroise Vollard. Translated by Harold L. Van Doren. Nicholas L. Brown. $3.

International Relations Section

Russia's New Constitution

THE constitution adopted at the session of the Central Executive Committee of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics in Moscow on July 6 (published in the Moscow Izvestia of July 7) is an enlargement and an elaboration of the Convention Creating the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics signed in Moscow on December 30, 1922, by the representatives of the several republics (published in The Nation of January 31, 1923).

The new constitution is divided into two parts, the first part consisting of the Declaration on the Creation of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics (published in full in The Nation of January 31, last). The second part follows:

The Russian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic (RSFSR), the Ukrainian Socialist Soviet Republic (USSR), the White Russian Socialist Soviet Republic (BSSR), and the Transcaucasian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic (Georgia, Azerbaijan, and Armenia) are concluding the present treaty on their consolidation into one united state—the "Union of Socialist Soviet Republics."

ARTICLE I

ON THE SCOPE OF THE HIGHEST ORGANS OF AUTHORITY OF THE UNION OF SSR

1. The Union of Socialist Soviet Republics in the person of its highest organs of authority embraces in its scope: (a) Representation of the Union in its international relations, conduct of all diplomatic relations, conclusion of political and other treaties with foreign states; (b) changes in the foreign frontiers of the Union and also the regulation of questions relating to changes of frontiers between the several republics of the Union; (c) conclusion of treaties on the admission of new republics into the Union; (d) declaration of war and conclusion of peace; (e) making internal and foreign state loans for the Union of SSR and the confirmation of internal and foreign loans made by any of the uniting republics; (f) ratification of international treaties; (g) conducting the foreign trade and establishment of the system of internal trade; (h) establishment of the bases and the general plan of the entire public economy of the Union, taking charge of those branches of industry and separate industrial plants which are of importance for the Union as a whole, conclusion of treaties granting concessions in the name of the Union, as well as in the name of the several republics; (i) regulation of the transport and the postal and telegraph service; (j) organization and command of the armed forces of the Union; (k) confirmation of a unified state budget for the Union containing the budgets of the several republics, establishment of a system of taxes and other incomes for the whole Union as well as the deductions and allowances for the budgets of the several republics, and the issuance of permissions for substitutional taxes and duties for the budgets of the several republics; (l) establishment of a unified coinage and credit system; (m) establishment of unified land regulations and regulations for the use of mines, forests, and waters in the whole territory of the Union; (n) legislation on migration between the several uniting republics and the establishment of the migration fund; (o) establishment of the bases of the judicial organization and of court proceedings, as well as of the civil and criminal law of the Union; (p) establishment of constitutional laws on labor; (q) establishment of general principles of public education; (r) establishment of common measures in the field of public health; (s) establishment of a common system of weights and measures; (t) organization of statistical work for the entire Union; (u) constitutional legislation concerning citizenship in the Union and in respect to the rights of foreigners; (v) the right of general amnesty extending over the entire territory of the Union; (w) repeal of such decisions of congresses of the Soviets, central executive committees, and councils of people's commissars of the separate republics as are in violation of this constitution; (x) decision on conflicts which may arise between the united republics.

2. Only the Congress of the Soviets of the Union has the right to confirm, change, or amend the bases of this constitution.

ARTICLE II

ON THE SOVEREIGN RIGHTS OF THE SEVERAL REPUBLICS AND UNION CITIZENSHIP

3. The sovereignty of the several republics is abridged only within the limits defined by this constitution and only in regard to matters within the scope of the Union. Outside of this scope each of the united republics enjoys its independent state power; the Union of SSR guarantees the sovereignty of the several republics.

4. Each of the uniting republics has the right of seceding from the Union.

5. The several republics are amending their constitutions to agree with the present constitution.

6. The territory of the several republics cannot be changed without their consent; the consent of all united republics must be had for any change, limitation, or the repeal of section 4 of this constitution.

7. A uniform citizenship is established for the citizens of the several republics.

ARTICLE III

ON THE CONGRESS OF THE SOVIETS OF THE UNION SSR

8. The highest organ of authority of the Union of SSR is the Congress of the Soviets of the Union of SSR and, during the periods between congresses, the Central Executive Committee of the Union which is made up of the Union Council and the Council of Nationalities.

9. The Congress of the Soviets of the Union of SSR is made up of the delegates of city soviets, each delegate representing 25,000 voters, and of delegates of provincial conventions of soviets, each delegate representing 125,000 population.

10. Delegates to the Congress of the Soviets of the Union are elected at the provincial conventions of the soviets. In those republics where there are no provincial divisions, the delegates are elected at the congress of the soviets of the republic.

11. Regular congresses of the soviets of the Union are convened by the Central Executive Committee of the Union once during the year; extraordinary congresses are convened by the CEC either by its own decision, or upon the demand of the Union Council, or the Council of Nationalities, or two republics included in the Union.

12. Under extraordinary conditions hindering the convention of the congress at the appointed time, the Central Executive Committee of the Union has the right to postpone the congress.

ARTICLE IV

ON THE CENTRAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE UNION OF SSR

13. The Central Executive Committee of the Union is made up of the Union Council and the Council of Nationalities.

14. The Congress of the Soviets of the Union elects the Union Council to be composed of 371 members representing the United republics proportionately to their population.

15. The Council of Nationalities is composed of representatives of the united and autonomous socialist soviet republics, each of the united and autonomous republics being represented by five members, and each of the autonomous provinces of the RSFSR being represented by one member. The full body of members of the Council of Nationalities is to be confirmed by the Congress of the Soviets of the Union. Note: The autonomous republics Adjaria and Abhasia and the autonomous province South-Osetia are represented in the Council of Nationalities by one member each.

16. The Union Council and the Council of Nationalities pass on laws, codes, and regulations submitted to them by the Praesidium of the Central Executive Committee and the Council of People's Commissars of the Union, by the several people's commissariats of the Union, by the central executive committees of the several republics, and also on those originated within the Union Council and the Council of Nationalities.

17. The Central Executive Committee of the Union of SSR issues codes, decrees, regulations, and orders, consolidates the legislative and administrative work of the Union, and defines the scope of the Praesidium of the Central Executive Committee and of the Council of People's Commissars.

18. All decrees and regulations determining the general rules of the political and economic life of the Union of SSR, as well as those which bring radical changes into the present practice of the state organs of the Union, must be submitted to the discussion and approval of the CEC of the Union.

19. All decrees, regulations, and orders of the CEC of the Union must be executed directly on the whole territory of the Union.

20. The CEC of the Union of SSR has the right to repeal and annul decrees, regulations, and orders of the Praesidium of the Central Executive Committee of the Union, as well as those of the congresses of the soviets and central executive committees of the several republics and other organs of power acting within the territory of the Union of SSR.

21. Regular sessions of the Central Executive Committee of the Union are convened by the Praesidium of the CEC three times a year. Extraordinary sessions are held by the decision of the Praesidium of the Union Council, or the Praesidium of Council of Nationalities, or upon the demand of the central executive committee of one of the republics.

22. Legislative bills which are submitted to the CEC take effect only after they have been approved both by the Union Council and the Council of Nationalities and published by the CEC of the Union.

23. When there arises a difference of opinion between the Union Council and the Council of Nationalities, then the question is submitted to the decision of an arbitration board elected by both bodies.

24. If the arbitration board reaches no agreement, the question is submitted to a joint session of the Union Council and the Council of Nationalities, and if no majority of either the Union Council or the Council of Nationalities is reached, then the question may be submitted, upon the demand of either of these two bodies, to the decision of the regular or an extraordinary Congress of the Union of SSR.

25. The Union Council and the Council of Nationalities elect their praesidiums consisting of seven members each to prepare for their sessions and carry on their work.

26. In periods between sessions of the Central Executive Committee the highest authority of the Union is represented by the Praesidium of the CEC of the Union to be made up of twenty-one members and organized by the CEC in such manner as to include all the members of the praesidiums of both the Union Council and the Council of Nationalities.

27. The CEC elects four presidents to represent the four uniting republics. The presidents are selected from the members of the Praesidium of the CEC of the Union.

28. The Central Executive Committee of the Union is responsible to the Congress of the soviets of the Union.

ARTICLE V

ON THE PRAESIDIUM OF THE CENTRAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE UNION

29. The Praesidium of the Central Executive Committee of the Union represents in periods between sessions of the CEC, the highest legislative, executive, and regulating organ of the Union.

30. The Praesidium of the CEC of the Union takes care that the constitution of the Union and the decrees of the Congress of the soviets and of the central executive committee of the Union be executed by all authorities.

31. The Praesidium of the CEC of the Union has the right to repeal the decrees of the Council of People's Commissars and the several people's commissariats, as well as those of the central executive committees and the commissariats of the several republics.

32. The Praesidium of the CEC of the Union has the right to repeal the decisions of the congresses of the soviets of the several republics, but is obliged to submit such decisions to the subsequent discussion and approval by the Central Executive Committee of the Union.

33. The Praesidium of the CEC of the Union issues decrees, regulations, and orders, passes on and confirms projects of decrees and regulations submitted to it by the Council of People's Commissars and the several authorities of the Union, by the central executive committees of the several republics, their praesidiums and other authorities.

34. Decrees and decisions of the Central Executive Committees, its praesidium, and the Council of People's Commissars of the Union are printed in the languages which are in general use in the allied republics (Russian, Ukrainian, White-Russian, Georgian, Armenian, Turk-Tartar).

35. The Praesidium of the CEC of the Union decides upon the questions pertaining to the mutual relations between the Council of People's Commissars and the several people's commissariats of the Union on one hand, and the central executive committees and their praesidiums of the several republics on the other hand.

36. The Praesidium of the CEC of the Union is responsible to the CEC of the Union.

ARTICLE VI

ON THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS OF THE UNION

37. The Council of People's Commissars is the executive and regulating organ of the Central Executive Committee of the Union elected by the latter, and consists of the Chairman of the Council of People's Commissars of the Union, Vice-Chairman of the Council, People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs, People's Commissar for Military and Naval Affairs, People's Commissar of Foreign Trade, People's Commissar of Transportation, People's Commissar of Posts and Telegraph, People's Commissar of Workers' and Peasants' Inspection, Chairman of the Highest Council of Public Economy, People's Commissar of Labor, People's Commissar of Food, People's Commissar of Finances.

38. Within the limits of the rights reserved to it by the CEC of the Union, and on the strength of a special regulation, the Council of People's Commissars of the Union issues decrees and regulations which must be executed on the entire territory of the Union.

39. The Council of People's Commissars of the Union examines the decrees and regulations submitted by the several people's commissariats of the Union and by the central executive committees of the united republics and their praesidiums.

40. The Council of People's Commissars of the Union is responsible for all its activities to the CEC of the Union and to its praesidium.

41. The decrees and regulations of the Council of People's Commissars of the Union can be repealed and annulled by the CEC of the Union and by its praesidium.

42. The central executive committees of the allied republics may enter protests against decrees and decisions of the Council of People's Commissars of the Union with the Praesidium of the CEC of the Union, without, however, stopping their execution.

ARTICLE VII

On the Supreme Court of the Union

43. For the purpose of affirming the revolutionary law on the territory of the Union, a Supreme Court is created in conjunction with the CEC of the Union with the following functions; (a) To give the supreme courts of the several republics explanations on questions pertaining to Union legislation; (b) to examine, upon the suggestion of the leading prosecuting attorney, the decisions and verdicts of the supreme courts of the several republics and enter protests against such with the CEC of the Union whenever such decisions and verdicts are in violation of the Union laws or in conflict with the interests of the other republics; (c) to decide, upon presentations from the CEC of the Union, on the legality, from the standpoint of the constitution, of any decrees and regulations of the several republics; (d) to render decisions in legal conflicts between the allied republics; (e) to try the highest functionaries of the Union in cases of accusations of crimes committed in their official capacity.

44. The Supreme Court of the Union acts through (a) the plenary session of the Supreme Court of the Union, (b) the civil court and criminal court boards of the Supreme Court of the Union, and (c) the military and military-transport board.

45. In its plenary session the Supreme Court of the Union is made up of eleven members, including one chairman, one vice-chairman, the four chairmen of the plenary sessions of the supreme courts of the allied republics and one chairman of the United State political department of the Union. The chairman, vice-chairman, and other five members are appointed by the Praesidium of the CEC of the Union.

46. The Prosecuting Attorney of the Supreme Court of the Union and his assistant are appointed by the Praesidium of the CEC of the Union. The functions of the Prosecuting Attorney are: to render opinions in all questions which are submitted to the decision of the Supreme Court, to act as prosecutor at the sessions of the Supreme Court, and, when, according to his opinion, the Supreme Court has rendered a decision which is not right, to enter his protest against such decision with the praesidium of the CEC of the Union.

47. The submission of the questions enumerated in section 43 to the decision of the plenary session of the Supreme Court of the Union can take place only through the initiative of the CEC of the Union, its Praesidium, the Prosecuting Attorney of the Supreme Courts, the prosecuting attorneys of the several republics, and the United States Political Department of the Union.

48. The plenary sessions of the Supreme Court form court boards for the trying of (a) criminal and civil cases of extraordinary importance which, in their content, touch upon the interests of two or more of the allied republics, (b) cases against members of the CEC and Council of People's Commissars of the Union.

The Supreme Court of the Union may start proceedings in such cases only upon the separate presentation of the CEC of the Union or its Praesidium in each case.

ARTICLE VIII

On the People's Commissariats of the Union of SSR

49. For the purpose of managing the several branches of State administration which are reserved to the scope of the Council of People's Commissars of the Union, ten people's commissariats are formed, in accordance with section 37 of this constitution, which carry out their functions on the basis of regulations confirmed by the CEC of the Union.

50. The people's commissariats of the Union are divided into (a) exclusive people's commissariats for the whole Union of SSR, and (b) united people's commissariats of the Union.

51. The exclusive people's commissariats of the Union are the following: the commissariats for foreign affairs, military and naval affairs, foreign trade, transportation, posts and telegraph.

52. The united people's commissariats of the Union are the following: the Highest Council of Public Economy, the commissariats of food, labor, finances, and workers' and peasants' inspection.

53. The exclusive people's commissariats of the Union have in the several republics their representatives who are responsible to them.

54. The organs of the united people's commissariats in the several republics are the respective people's commissariats of those republics.

55. The people's commissariats of the Union are headed by the members of the Council of People's Commissars of the Union—the people's commissars of the Union.

56. Each people's commissar presides over the board attached to his commissariat and appointed by the Council of People's Commissars.

57. The people's commissar has the right to make independent decisions in all questions entering into the scope of his commissariat, but he is obliged to inform the board of his decisions. In case the board or any member of the board does not agree with the decision of the people's commissar, they may enter their protest with the Council of People's Commissars, without, however stopping the execution of the contested decision.

58. The orders of the several people's commissariats of the Union may be stopped by the Praesidium of the CEC and by the Council of People's Commissiariats of the Union.

59. Orders issued by the People's Commissars of the Union may be stopped by the central executive committees or by the praesidiums of the central executive committees of the several republics only in special cases when such orders are clearly opposed to decisions of the Council of People's Commissars or of the CEC of the Union. When such an order is stopped the fact should be immediately reported by the CEC or the Praesidium of the CEC of the republic to the Council of People's Commissars of the Union and to the appropriate People's Commissar of the Union.

60. The people's commissars of the Union are responsible to the Council of People's Commissars of the Union and to the CEC of the Union and its Praesidium.

ARTICLE IX

On the United State Political Department

61. In order to unite the efforts of the allied republics in their struggle against the political and economic counter-revolution and against espionage and brigandage, a common organ of State Political Management is created in conjunction with the Council of People's Commissars of the Union, the chairman of this Department entering the Council of People's Commissars of the Union with the right of advisory vote.

62. The United State Political Department of the Union carries on the activities of the local organs of the State Political branches through its representatives in the councils of people's commissars of the several republics acting in accordance with a special regulation to be confirmed in the order of legislation.

63. The control over the legality of the actions of the United State Political Department is carried out by the Prosecuting Attorney of the Union in accordance with a special regulation to be issued by the CEC of the Union.

ARTICLE X

On the Allied Republics

64. Within the territory of each of the allied republics the highest organ of authority is represented by the congress of the soviets of the republic and, in periods between congresses, by their central executive committees.

65. The mutual relations between the highest authorities of the several republics and the highest authorities of the Union of SSR are established by this constitution.

66. The central executive committees of the allied republics elect their praesidiums to act as the highest authorities in periods between sessions of the central executive committees.

67. The central executive committees of the allied republics form their executive organs, the councils of people's commissars to be made up of the Chairman of the Council of People's Commissars, Vice-Chairman of the Council, Chairman of the Highest Council of Public Economy, People's Commissar of Agriculture, People's Commissar of Food, People's Commissar of Finances, People's Commissar of Labor, People's Commissar of Internal Affairs, People's Commissar of Justice, People's Commissar of Workers' and Peasants' Inspection, People's Commissar of Public Education, People's Commissar of Public Health, People's Commissar of Social Maintenance, and also, with advisory vote, of representatives of the Union Commissariats of Foreign Affairs, of Military and Naval Affairs, of Foreign Trade, of Transportation, and of Posts and Telegraph.

68. The highest council of public economy and the commissariats of food, finances, labor, and workers' and peasants' inspection of each of the several republics are directly subordinate to the central executive committees and the councils of people's commissars of the several republics, and are guided in their activities by the decision of the corresponding people's commissariats of the Union.

69. The right of amnesty as well as the right of pardon and rehabilitation of citizens condemned by the judicial or administrative organs of the several republics is reserved to the central executive committees of the several republics.

ARTICLE XI

On the Coat of Arms, the Flag, and the Capital of the Union of SSR

70. The coat of arms of the Union of SSR consists of a sickle and hammer framed by spikes of wheat with the inscription "Workers of all countries, unite" in the six languages enumerated in section 34. In the top part of the coat of arms is the five-pointed star.

71. The flag of the Union of SSR is made of scarlet or purple red cloth with the representation of the coat of arms on it.

72. The capital of the Union of SSR is the city of Moscow.

Mexico Pensions a Political Prisoner

THE attitude of the people of Mexico in regard to political prisoners in the United States may be judged from the fact that the state of San Luis Potosí recently voted a pension to Librado Rivera, serving a fifteen-year sentence in the penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kansas. Rivera was not convicted of any overt act but of an expression of opinion in a manifesto issued in conjunction with Ricardo Flores Magoñ. The latter died in prison. Rivera was not included in the group of political prisoners to whom release on parole was recently offered. The decree granting him a pension (which he has declined to receive) follows:

The citizen Rafael Nieto, Constitutional Governor of the Free and Sovereign State of San Luis Potosí, to its inhabitants, makes known:

That the XXVII Constitutional Congress of the Free and Sovereign State of San Luis Potosí decrees the following:

DECREE NUMBER 129

The Constitutional Congress of the Free and Sovereign State of San Luis Potosí decrees the following:

Article First—It is conceded to the citizen Librado Rivera, now in prison in the United States by reason of his advanced ideas, a pension of $150 national gold monthly, on charge of the revenue of the state.

Article Second—He will enjoy this pension only during his actual imprisonment. It shall be understood by the Executive of the State, and he shall publish it, circulate, and obey.

Issued in San Luis Potosí on the fourth day of the month of May, 1923. D. P., Lamberto Rocha; D. S., José Fraga; D. S., Alfredo E. Garza.

Therefore, I command to be fulfilled and executed the present decree and that all the authorities make it effective and take care of, and to that effect be it printed, published, and circulated to whom it may concern.

Issued in the Palace of the Executive Power of San Luis Potosí on the 8th day of the month of May, nineteen hundred and twenty-three, Rafael Nieto; General Secretary of the Government, A. Silva.

THESE UNITED STATES

ILLINOIS

First Province of the Middle Kingdom

by

Howard Vincent O'Brien

Author of "Trodden Gold"

IN NEXT WEEK'S ISSUE OF

The Nation

PLEXO

"TOILET LANOLINE"

—the year-round skin treatment

This wonderful emollient is used with great success by noted skin specialists for pimples, blotches, facial eruptions, roughness, abrasions and chapped lips and hands. It protects the delicate skin surfaces against trying weather conditions and by supplying nourishment to the facial nerves and skin cells, effaces wrinkles and restores the bloom of youthful health. "Toilet Lanoline" is especially recommended for cuts and burns and for relief of pain after exposure. "Toilet Lanoline" is a remarkable skin softener and preserver. A delicately scented preparation that is safe for SMALL CHILDREN.

PREPARED BY

PLEXO PREPARATIONS, Inc.

NEW YORK

Sole Agents and Distributors

General Drug Co., N. Y., 94 N. Moore Street

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 22, 1923 No. 3033

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .......... 177

EDITORIALS:

The Collapse of the Unholy Alliance .......... 180
Coal: The Public's Responsibility .......... 181
The Timid American .......... 182
Confession and Photography .......... 182
The University and Marriage .......... 183
MISTREATING OUR EX-SERVICE MEN. By Samuel Danziger .......... 184
TO A BABY. By Maxwell Bodenheim .......... 185
THESE UNITED STATES—XXXVI. ILLINOIS: FIRST PROVINCE OF THE MIDDLE KINGDOM. By Howard Vincent O'Brien .......... 186
PROGRESS (AND POVERTY) IN PORTO RICO. By Arthur Warner 189
THE ROOTS OF THE WAR—AND OF PEACE. By Count Harry Kessler .......... 191
EASLEY TO THE RESCUE. By Hubert C. Herring .......... 193
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter .......... 194
CORRESPONDENCE .......... 194

BOOKS:

Damaged Souls. By Samuel C. Chew .......... 196
The Second Empire. By William H. Scheifley .......... 196
Translations from the Danish and Swedish. By John Koren .......... 197
Wide-Awake Dreamers. By Kathleen Millay .......... 197
The Government and the Worker. By Scott Nearing .......... 198
On the Trail of Pickwick. By Ben Lucien Burman .......... 198
Lytton Strachey's Encore. By Harry Salpeter .......... 198
From the Soil. By Eva Goldbeck .......... 199
A Torch in the Dark. By Edward E. Allen .......... 199
The Originator of the Monroe Doctrine. By William MacDonald .......... 199
Treatise or Novel. By Johan J. Smertenko .......... 200
Books in Brief .......... 200

MUSIC:

The Renaissance of English Music in England. By Henrietta Straus 201

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Labor Disunion in Italy .......... 202

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT ERNEST H. GRUENING
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY, Managing Editor
JOHN MACY, Literary Editor
IRITA VAN DOREN, Advertising Manager
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON ANATOLE FRANCE H. L. MENCKEN
FRIEDRICH WILHELM FOERSTER ROBERT HERRICK
CARL VAN DOREN NORMAN THOMAS

Subscription Rates—Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: Ernest Thurtle, 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N. W. 4, England.

HOURLY the German situation becomes graver; hourly more blood flows, and hourly those who have hounded Germany into this misery gloat over her suffering and prepare to profit by it. As the New York World points out, the French have created a vicious circle: By their occupation of the Ruhr they have brought about the economic collapse of Germany; the collapse of Germany will give France the excuse for permanently holding on to the Ruhr that Germany, being in anarchy, cannot govern herself. In Hilferding Stresemann has selected one of Germany's ablest Socialist economists to conduct the country's finances. But whether real reform is possible depends upon the German industrialists who with the French imperialists are the enemies of the German people. Count Harry Kessler is, we believe, right in declaring that this Cabinet is Germany's last hope. Is it not also likely to be Europe's last hope, since America will not act? More than ever is it clear that if Germany goes down France and every neighboring country will also pay the price. Even in Hungary, Count Bethlen, the Prime Minister, apropos of his urgent appeal to the League of Nations for help, declares: "If by winter the Ruhr question is not solved by America and England, I am afraid serious social upheavals can be expected in Central Europe."

PERHAPS, consciously or unconsciously, the long lassitude of British policy in the face of the Ruhr invasion was not unaffected by the boom in the British coal trade caused by the continental shortage, due to non-production in the Ruhr. Germany has been importing British coal; and the following French official figures are suggestive:

| First five months of | Deliveries of German coal and coke | Purchases of English coal and coke |
|---|---|---|
| 1921 | 4,260,000 tons | 1,985,000 tons |
| 1922 | 3,597,000 " | 5,183,000 " |
| 1923 | 1,141,000 " | 7,700,000 " |

THE League of Nations seems bent on proving its weakness and inefficiency just as rapidly and completely as possible. Not only has it steadily ducked the Ruhr issue and meekly consented to having its face slapped by the Poles at Vilna; it has failed utterly to make good its promise really to investigate the scandalous French misgovernment of the Saar (involving such flagrant violations of the Versailles Treaty that no Frenchman can deny them), and has accepted its Opium Committee's report, which carefully refrains from ending the Indian opium traffic whereby the British Government profits so greatly. As for the report of its Disarmament Commission, which Lord Robert Cecil proclaims a wonderful achievement, we are moved by it not at all, for it proposes an elaborate system of international guaranties which it would take a lawyer to understand, and it is all based upon the vicious principles of force, checks and balances, alliances and counter-alliances. True, it proposes to declare all "aggressive warfare an international crime." But who is to decide when a war is aggressive? The Central Powers insist that not they but Russia was the aggressor in 1914, and the causes of the last war are still not yet wholly clear. What is needed is the outlawry of all war as war. We shall get nowhere until this step is taken and until we have real disarmament. Meanwhile the French papers openly say that the League proposal will not affect France at all! We have no quarrel with the London New Leader for declaring that the League behaves "as an organized hypocrisy."

SIXTEEN Powers have presented a joint note to China regarding the capture by bandits last May of foreigners traveling on the Lincheng railway. The note tells China what she has to do. It is not a diplomatic communication from independent Powers to an independent Power; it is a set of instructions, signed by the strong Powers of the world, to a nation in trouble. The Chinese Government is ordered to pay damages, to dismiss certain officials, and to reorganize her army, and she is informed that the Powers are devising a plan for a special Chinese police force under the supervision of foreign officers. This marks one more stage in the subjection of China to Western capital. Let us not deceive ourselves. The foreigners in China who complain that life is unsafe and who move sixteen governments to act together are not missionaries of Christ; they are apostles of modern industry, of big business, the agents of Western finance. China is to be made safe, not for democracy but for investment. There is one consolation in the spectacle. In past decades the financiers of the European countries, seeking control of Africa's markets, raw materials, and opportunities for investment, brought their governments to the verge of war; in China they seem to have achieved an international community of interest.

SPEAKERS at the Williamstown Institute of Politics have referred to the new self-consciousness of the Eastern peoples. Philip Kerr recalls that the democratization of Europe has a history less than a century long and suggests that Asia may move more rapidly. We are wont too easily to accept the colonial status of Asia and Africa as an immutable fact. But the partition of Africa lies not a half century behind us, and has just been revised. Such decisions as that of the British to bar new Indian immigration into the Kenya Colony in East Africa, and such suggestions as that recently made by General Smuts for the compulsory segregation of Indians in urban areas in South Africa, take on a new significance when we look upon them as links in the chain of history. They are parts of the European white man's attempt to stake out all unfilled regions of the earth as exclusive reserves for himself, and to reduce all darker-skinned races to a subordinate position wherever the two come into conflict. They may seem expedient in the present, but they mean terrific race conflicts for future generations.

"DE mortuis nil nisi bonum" has always seemed to us an immoral motto. The only true respect for the dead comes in telling the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. No man of worth could relish the thought that when he died his political and personal opponents would join his friends and allies in fulsome, indiscriminate, half-meant praise. Had Mr. Harding been able to look down from the Great Beyond and watch the passage of his funeral train from West to East we suspect that he would have welcomed from his heart the silent crowds that paid respect to his human qualities; we feel as sure that he would have writhed at the use of mourning crape and black-bordered type to advertise banks and department-stores, and have been particularly disgusted had he seen the columns of newspapers which had been in constant opposition to him in his life-time mawkishly gush unlimited respect when he was out of the way. There is in much of this funereal display something as cheap and maudlin as the cry of the street hawker: "Get your President Harding buttons here! Show your respect to the dead President! Only five cents!" More dignified and decent is the attempt to analyze honestly, with a respect for truth which even death cannot lessen, the real qualities of a well-meaning but not great man.

OUR army officers, the press reports, are delighted by the accession of Mr. Coolidge to the Presidency because he is so thoroughly committed to preparedness for war. Has he not said that: "The only hope for peace lies in the perfection of the arts of war?" and that "One of our first duties is military training; we must never neglect military preparation again?" And is not a son of his in one of the military training camps in Massachusetts? Well, he comes to the Presidency in the nick of time. The very camp his son attends is 1,000 men short of its possible quota of candidates for military training. And as for the army, it is a fact that so few men are enlisting, and so many old soldiers are getting out, and so many more are distributed among the ludicrously topheavy brigade divisions and corps that some regiments are almost bereft of men. In one of our oldest regiments recently a battalion commander paraded four companies which altogether comprised just nineteen men! Plainly, we need in the White House a glowing enthusiast for the manly art of learning to murder by wholesale, to arouse our recreant sons to their duty.

GOVERNOR HARDWICK of Georgia by executive order last spring abolished the lash in convict camps throughout the State. Representative Bennett of Dodge County, after visiting the camps following this order, reported to the recently adjourned legislature that he found convicts "hung up by their thumbs for hours, or kept all night in torture-boxes, or forced to sit on nails." As a remedy he recommended a return to the lash. "I can hardly blame the wardens," he said, "for resorting to these other measures. . . . There is but one way to handle convicts and that is to put the lash on 'em." Fortunately the Constitutional Amendments Committee disagreed with Mr. Bennett and killed his bill by a vote of 9 to 4. We need in our prisons an entirely different type of mind that recognizes curative, not merely punitive, ends, and is willing to listen to the voice of modern psychology and psychiatry. There is little hope as long as the system prevails condemned in these words by a police court justice: "I think one of the worst evils grows out of the appointment of worn-out politicians as wardens and superintendents. Take ——— for example—the wardens and every guard are changed or practically so with each new State administration, and appointment is solely for political considerations."

WE are beginning to think that the Ku Klux Klan is a reasonably open, democratic sort of an organization. After all, any man owning five dollars who is able to prove that he is neither a Catholic nor a Jew nor a Negro stands a fair chance of admission. Compared, for instance, with the task of achieving citizenship in the United States, the customs of the Klan look positively free and easy. Of course there are Jews and Catholics in the United States who are allowed to vote, and even a few Negroes here and there, but the tests for admission to citizenship are subtler and less easily defined than those of the Klan. You may, for instance, be an orthodox evangelical blond Nordic named Smith and still be blackballed by some judge because you were a conscientious objector in the World War. And just recently a new barrier to citizenship has been erected by a judge in West Virginia. According to a letter from the president of District 16, United Mine Workers, a young miner named Dan Spolarich, an ex-soldier, was denied citizenship papers because he was a member of the union and on strike. Apparently we are establishing a new organization—the Exalted Order of Citizens of the United States, to which only those aliens may be admitted who fall in with the war policies of the Government and the labor policies of our leading coal operators.

"EXTRA" sessions of Congress are getting to be like "extra" and "special extra" and "special sporting extra" editions of our newspapers; they are becoming so frequent as to be no longer extra but regular aspects of our national legislative practice. An extra session of the new Congress, to be worth while, ought to have been called last spring, although it is a cruel if not an unusual punishment to compel a legislator to swelter through a summer in Washington which he had hoped to pass studying the financial situation in the Italian Alps or observing agricultural conditions on the beach at Deauville or Ostend. What is needed, as The Nation has pointed out before, is a change in our laws which will not leave a gap of more than a year between the election of a new Congress and its first legislative session.

“CIVIC Federation Takes up Economics”—thus a headline in the New York Times. We are gratified beyond all words by the news; the Civic Federation has needed just the touch of studious resolve hinted at in those few words. Long has the Civic Federation expounded economics, ranted economics, unblushingly revealed its innocence of economics. Never, as far as we know, has it “taken up” the subject. Let us not read below the headlines or we might begin to doubt the modest, scholarly implication of those words, for our eye catches familiar phrases: “Russian soviets,” “forcible overthrow of our government,” “worked out in Moscow with uncanny cleverness.” Might we discover, if we read with care, that the Civic Federation instead of “taking up” economics is only taking up on a larger scale its old sport of tossing up, and then with wild cries of alarm shooting down, its clay pigeons of revolution?

THE third world congress of Zionists is in session at Carlsbad. Issues of so momentous a character are before the congress that its decisions are likely to be of lasting influence upon the whole movement. The crisis that confronts Zionism is, the world being what it is, a financial one. The land must be bought, the colonists must be able to colonize; the chaluzim, pilgrims and pioneers at once, must be given work. Strictly Zionist resources cannot suffice. Hence it is the plan and purpose of Dr. Chaim Weizmann to throw the resonsibility for the rebuilding of the Homeland upon the whole of Jewry, and to dispense, in both donors and in a limited number of councillors, with adherence to the strict ideology of the Zionist cause. Opposition to this course and plan comes naturally both from sensitive idealists and from determined zealots. But friends both of the movement and of humanity will wish Dr. Weizmann's councils to prevail. A great and necessary work is to be done. Salvation is through a deed rather than through a thought. The new Zionist policy would at once render the work of the movement vastly more effective. It would temper bitterness; it would save lives. We hope that a speedy agreement will be reached.

THE San Francisco war memorial site has been leased for five years to the Standard Oil Company, and the first emblem of the great conflict will be a gasoline station. Certain members of the American Legion are protesting against this “desecration of holy ground,” but we agree with the Oakland World that the memorial is most appropriate and to convey a perfect lesson needs only an illuminated sign: “For such as this, American youth was conscripted, drilled, and killed.” We have it on no less an authority than that of Mr. Wilson himself that the causes of the European struggle were commercial rivalries; if oil was not the most potent cause of the last war to end war, it is likely to be the chief reason for the next war to end war. San Francisco has done well. Sometimes, quite accidentally, events have a habit of conforming to the eternal fitness of things.

MUSICIANS who contract to sing or play in Enid, Oklahoma, find a curious clause in their papers—“Subject to the approval of the K. K. K.” In this same Enid—whose chief boast is an annual export of $3,000,000 worth of poultry and eggs—is published the Fish Hook, organ of the Ku Klux Klan. The Fish Hook appears to disapprove of William Allen White; at least it refers to him as a “little self-styled cheese-smelling demagogue” who “likes a dollar so well that if a fly were to alight on a dollar of his money he would catch him and scrape his legs.” The sage of Emporia being in Colorado, the staff of his Gazette seized the occasion of the Fish Hook's outburst to comment: “The downtrodden and oppressed force on the Gazette that has to live with this old whangdoodle and listen to his preterbacious scandulations have felt for some time that this town ought to have the truth about him. . . . The culternacious old hypochloride certainly can't fire the whole force when he comes back, and so we are giving the people of this man's town the truth” (as seen in Enid, Oklahoma). They reprinted the Fish Hook's saw-edged remarks, and—if he didn't compose the accompaniment himself—William Allen must have roared when he read it. If Enid were capable of learning tolerance it might well ask William Allen White to compose correspondence lessons for its citizens. But perhaps correspondence courses, like music, would be “subject to the approval of the K. K. K.” in Enid.

“CIVILIZATION, or Man and Man's World” is a generous field, yet Frederic C. Howe dares announce it as the subject for the 1923 session of the Sconset School of Opinion. On the Continent, in England, and in the United States the happy habit of these summer forums, prolonged over a few weeks, is spreading. The Sconset “school,” only one year old, is particularly fortunate in its setting on the moors of Nantucket Island and in the intimate and informal spirit of its discussions. Candle-light in an old barn should loose any tongue and give it a sense of contact with the soil. Among the Sconset speakers this September are Carl Van Doren, Everett Dean Martin, James Harvey Robinson, Harry Dana, and Gutzon Borglum. May the example of this sublimated Chautauqua spread!

THE death of Joaquin Sorolla means the passing of a source of vivid splendor and beauty. Spanish painting seems to have been less affected by the modernist movements than that of any other country. Here, at least, there was no attempt to pass beyond the representation of objects. The idiom of the art itself was never withdrawn from the vision of the willing beholder. In the canvasses of Sorolla, moreover, this idiom was used with a force and an eloquence that no one could miss. Here sunshine came in a flood and the shade itself was brilliant. Here was the glow and flash of a Spain of artistic reality that answered all visions of a Spain of the imagination. And in this respect Sorolla, curiously enough, stood rather isolated among his compatriots. Zuloaga preferred the more somber aspects of his native landscape; Goya was concerned with heavy brocades and significant gestures; Sorolla took one back to the joyous colorists of an earlier and more lavish age.

The Collapse of the Unholy Alliance

"A FRANK espousal of the German cause" and "a positive disavowal of Great Britain's war allies"—that is the French official opinion, according to the Associated Press, of the British reply to the French and Belgian refusal jointly to consider Dr. Cuno's last reparations proposal and to revise the Ruhr policy. There is no meeting of the British arguments, no question whether, after all, Mr. Baldwin perhaps voices the cause of justice and humanity and of common sense, but just the application of that worst of epithets—pro-German. "This amazing document," says the anonymous official spokesman, "proposes to haul France and Belgium before a tribunal to answer for their efforts to make Germany carry out her treaty obligations." Well, why not, if those efforts threaten the very foundations of civilization, attempt the impossible, and are leading straight to that new war which everybody agrees will accomplish the downfall of Europe? What is there sacrosanct about France and Belgium to prevent their answering in the court of world opinion? Has their record been beyond criticism at all times in these last one hundred and fifty years? But "France and Belgium are not ready to answer such a summons, even from Great Britain," Paris informs us. Very well, then France and Belgium must answer to the judgment of world opinion, precisely as Germany was overwhelmed by the weight of an unfavorable world judgment when she entered Belgium. The moral laws do not apply to Germans alone. One cannot escape human judgments because one calls oneself the land of the French or of the Belgians.

So ends, let us hope, the unholy alliance of modern England with an imperialistic and militaristic France bent on dominating Europe and accomplishing what Napoleon failed to effect 110 years ago. We are, of course, still quite aware of the mixed motives which prompt the Baldwin Government. We do not blind our eyes to the fact that, as is usual with English cabinets, selfish reasons are well mixed with humanitarian. England feels deeply about the Ruhr primarily because it affects her pocket-nerve; we can only be thankful that in this case the British business magnates are on the side of those Englishmen who speak for reason and sanity as well as for justice and right. We are aware, too, that Mr. Baldwin's position is probably inconsistent with some taken by his predecessors and that it may change again. The French did have reason to believe that the English Government would sympathize with them. But if anybody can berate the British for inconsistency, it is not Poincaré. Speaking to a group of journalists in July, 1922, that gentleman said: "We are simply heading toward the permanent occupation of the Left Bank of the Rhine, and I feel very good about it. For my part, I should regret it if Germany should pay. Then we should have to evacuate the Rhineland. . . ." Speaking at Stenay on August 12, 1923, Poincaré assured his bamboozled auditors that "we would not annex a single foot of territory which is not ours." And then he proceeded once more to berate Germany for what he called her deliberate attempt to destroy her currency and to avoid the payment of reparations for which in his heart of hearts he is so grateful.

Above all, this one fact is patent: Mr. Baldwin's answer has hurt far more than the French dreamed it would. Hence the bitterness of their outcries and their invective and the open anger of their press. There is reason for them. Primarily, the English are now officially on record that the Ruhr invasion is contrary to the Treaty of Versailles and grossly illegal. Next, Mr. Baldwin challenges the French to submit that issue of legality to the new Hague tribunal for a decision. That France dares not do; she is well aware of the falsity of her pretext that this "sanction" is authorized, even by that impossible treaty which France violates at will, but for the slightest violation of which the Germans must be starved and throttled. It is not a pleasant thing for a nation which has made its injuries its stock in trade as if it were the only nation affected, to be rudely reminded by Lord Curzon that "sunk ships and cargoes rotting at the bottom of the sea may not shock the eye like the ruined villages of France and Belgium, but they are equally material damage caused by German aggression and represent equally heavy losses of national wealth." This is in reply to the Belgian suggestion that the reparations, which have not been collected, and which will never be collected if Germany is driven into communism and anarchy, should be devoted primarily to reconstruction of the devastated areas. To Belgium it will be an equal shock to find that England has now dropped the question of her future security because it is bound up with French security and France has "postponed to an unnamed date in the future" any discussion of that French security about which Poincaré has bleated so much, which has been made to serve at once as justification and apology for the Ruhr crime. But it is time that that bogey should be dropped. As a matter of fact every action of the French since Versailles has been as if calculated to make France insecure by inflaming every German heart against her.

The rest of the English program is familiar. The terrible thing about it is that it calls for time, time, and time for its working out. Time is the one element in the situation which is lacking. The fall of the Cuno Cabinet speaks for itself. It held office months longer than had been deemed possible, and held it as manfully as was possible for an avowedly weak compromise Government stumbling under the most terrific burdens and handicaps which any modern nation ever faced in time of peace. The Stresemann Government may repudiate some of the Cuno policies and will, it is to be hoped, make a genuine effort, which Dr. Cuno did not or could not, to solve the financial problem. But we do not believe that it can exist twenty-four hours if it surrenders in the matter of the Ruhr. And meanwhile the bloodshed reported from one German city after another, caused, in what was the most law-abiding country in the world, by sheer hunger and despair, shows how correct is the British statement that the occupation of the Ruhr "is already having directly and indirectly a grave effect on the economic and industrial outlook not only in Germany. . . ." That is the solemn truth. No blinking of facts can conceal it. If things continue as they are it will be patent to all the world within two months. All the rhodomontade and the fustian of a Poincaré will then be swept aside, and their sham and hypocrisy be exposed to the world. The better judgment of Europe and America will, we are certain, crystallize behind the British position, particularly if as now seems inevitable Germany rapidly falls into chaos.

Coal: The Public's Responsibility

A COAL shortage threatens, and there is talk of a strike on September 1. Some newspapers are suggesting a boycott of anthracite coal "to teach the industry a lesson" and others are urging the President to take drastic measures, to seize the mines, to prohibit a strike. The Federal Coal Commission at the eleventh hour is calling operators and miners into conference again, but there is little hope of more than a patched-up peace. The Commission has published a mild supplemental report on the anthracite industry, suggesting various admirable forms of tinkering but nothing more than tinkering; the Children's Bureau is circulating a report on child labor in the anthracite district; and a committee of public-spirited citizens, headed by Professor Zechariah Chafee, Jr., has issued a report exposing appalling conditions of feudalism in coal-mining areas, including leases by which the coal companies bind miners to permit no one but furniture-movers, doctors, and undertakers in their homes.

The public pretty much deserves the hard treatment it is getting from the anthracite industry. It has always refused to do any serious thinking about coal. Until it gets over its habit of seasonal scares followed by seasonal forgetfulness it cannot expect much improvement. For coal has become of such importance to everyone that the public, which complains bitterly when the supply runs short and prices go skyrocketing, must assume and accept a primary responsibility. When the Federal Coal Commission was appointed last autumn there seemed to be a possibility that public interest in coal, stirred by the long strike and consequent cold houses, would be sufficiently strong to force the Commission to suggest real, far-reaching, statesmanlike solutions. Instead, we have a series of minor suggestions obscured in the public mind by the major suggestion of Federal seizure of the mines.

To seize the mines would be about as footless as the French attempt to get coal by sending soldiers into the Ruhr. The Ruhr workmen refused to dig coal at the behest of soldiers, and unless the public ceases shouting and begins thinking we may see American soldiers attempting to force American miners to dig coal. That would be a national disgrace. The present problems of the coal industry would persist after seizure, and new problems would arise. What wages and what profits would the government pay? How would it deal with the miners in negotiating wages? Would it leave the same men in control who now rule the industry and with the industry the lives of the men who work in it? Seizure would be merely a magnificent gesture, emotionally satisfying, but settling nothing.

Nor would it help to prohibit a strike. The miners' leaders would probably yield to such a prohibition, but they would yield in anger. The miners have nothing to say about the administration of their industry, yet they have to bear the brunt of public anger when things go wrong. There is no democracy in the anthracite industry. The employers are the king and the parliament. When they refuse to grant the workers' demands the workers have but one remedy: to strike. It is a poor weapon, and dangerous, but it is their only weapon. The miners' attempt to educate the public to the fundamental problems of coal by publicity has not yet succeeded. To forbid them to use their one weapon without providing some equally effective means of redress would mean to make slaves of them.

And this indeed is the rock upon which employers and employees are at present splitting: the miners demand full recognition of the union, including the "check-off," and the owners refuse to grant it. The "check-off" is essentially a tax upon the miner; it is deducted with his wage; it goes to the union, which uses it primarily for the payment of check-weighmen and check docking-bosses—men who see that the miner is paid what he earns. It would be preposterous to drift into a strike upon such an issue; the anthracite miners are virtually 100 per cent organized, and the employers' refusal to grant the recognition and the "check-off" (which is in effect with more than 400,000 soft-coal miners) is plainly an endeavor to keep the union weak. Here, then, is the first problem which must be faced. Shall the employers deal with the men through the organizations and system of representation which the men have developed? Is it to the public interest, or not, to attempt to develop some measure of democracy, to work out a system of constitutional government within the industry?

To us it seems that the first step is to recognize the human value of the coal miners and the value of their good will in the industry, and to give them every possible recognition. But the private owners have made it plain that they will not do so of their own free will. How shall they be made to do so? The public's readiness to accept governmental intervention in the industry is obviously growing—the loose talk of "seizure of the mines" is evidence of that; it is clear that if we do not work out a coordinated plan of governmental control we shall drift into it helter-skelter.

There is no single, simple solution of this coal problem which can be applied overnight. The Nation believes that sooner or later, in one form or another, government ownership is inevitable. The Federal Coal Commission disagrees with us. All the more then it is its function to help us find ways out of the present disorganization of the industry. The Commission has pointed out that part of the difficulty is that the population which uses anthracite has increased more rapidly than has the supply of anthracite. It has not yet touched upon the possibilities of increasing the efficiency of the coal by transforming it into power at the mines, or helped focus public attention upon the possibilities of the super-power plans now being discussed. It has not dwelt upon the evils of the interlocking coal and railway ownership, which permits the railroads to charge 30 per cent higher freight rates upon the anthracite we use in our homes than upon the soft coal used in industry. It has not probed—publicly, at any rate—into the feudal conditions of life forced upon the miners, into the ownership of whole towns, the prostitution of State constabularies into private agents of the coal-owners (which Professor Chafee's committee has exposed and proved with documents); it has made no constructive suggestions which would avoid a return of the present crisis next year or two years hence.

Public attention is once more centering upon the coal industry. Will it last? Even a strike, if it meant that the public would honestly face and start to solve the problem of coal, would be preferable to more fitful forgetfulness followed by more fitful passion.

The Timid American

WHEN one of the foreign visitors who write books about us labeled America "The Land of Contrasts," he happened upon a formula that is capable of many applications. While at times there seems no one more self-confident than the American, he is also exceptionally prone to follow the crowd. This is a nation which has led the way in all kinds of bold experimentation, but where, in certain respects, public opinion insists upon a rigid conformity that would be resented by the people of almost any other country. It is not only aliens but native Americans that have to become assimilated. Just now, timidity is one of our most prominent national characteristics. Present-day America might almost be described by a schedule of her fears. She is afraid of active participation in European affairs, lest the statesmen of other countries should get the better of her own. She is afraid of immigration, lest this alien infusion corrupt—one can scarcely say the indigenous stock, but the stock of earlier arrivals. She is afraid of any criticism of her institutions, lest it prove to be dynamite for their upheaval. She is afraid especially of the bogey of Bolshevik propaganda, which she suspects as the real cause of labor troubles and social unrest for which, heaven knows, quite adequate and much simpler explanations can be found a great deal nearer home than Moscow.

This timorousness is realized most clearly by those of us who have an opportunity of observing the attitude taken by citizens of other countries to the discontented elements in their own population. The Villager—a paper which, despite its modest name, has a truly cosmopolitan outlook—has noted recently that many an American returning from abroad is led by his foreign experiences to the conclusion that his own country is a little off her balance on the subject of radicalism. He sees England a hundred years ahead on that road which he has always assumed is the very short road to revolution, yet he finds her busy, efficient, and not unduly perturbed. He hears a member of Parliament introduce a measure to make England over as a Socialist commonwealth and the next day he reads that the member has been invited to break bread with the king and queen. He is a guest at dinners where mine-owners sit down familiarly with agitators who are working for the nationalization of the mines, and his fellow-guests argue state socialism calmly, point by point, as a thing to be reasoned about. He discovers some appalling concessions to radicalism actually in operation—doles, insurances, workers' representation, and so on—yet nobody's flesh creeps. But as soon as he gets this side of the Statue of Liberty he hears one responsible citizen crying out that every radical should be deported, and finds another telling the Governor of New York that this is no time for repealing a law that restrains spinster school teachers from speaking their minds.

The explanation suggested is that the American is so scared because he is by no means as certain as he professes to be of the stability of the institutions of his own land. The Englishman maintains his equable poise because he feels that it will need more than a little flurry of revolution to upset the government. But the American, in his heart of hearts, is not really convinced that the political system of the United States is weatherproof. "Americans," the Villager reminds us, "have as yet scarcely made a government. This political institution of ours has no roots, no solidity; a wind which might not even flutter the leaves of the English oak conceivably could rip up our political institution and blow it over the plains of the world like a dry tumbleweed." This may not be the whole story, but it certainly goes a long way to account for the difference between the typical American and English demeanor in face of political conflicts and rumors of conflicts. The persecutor is always a latent skeptic. He has no profound conviction that his creed has within it the vital power to establish its supremacy in the world, so it must be supported by privilege for those who accept it and pains and penalties for the dissenter. This phenomenon, so familiar in the history of religion, is repeating itself nowadays in politics and economics. It is the man of little faith who is most violent against the heretic.

The noisy aggressiveness, then, of the hundred-per-cent American may have a lurking doubt as its secret spring. He would feel safer in his own mind if he could get everyone to shout at the top of his voice: "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." But if a sense, conscious or sub-conscious, of the instability of our institutions is the impelling force of the present outburst of intolerance, nothing will be gained by hitting on the head everyone who refuses to proclaim them as divinely inspired ideals. The remedy is clearly so to modify them in accordance with the needs and aspirations of the time that they will stand any storm. We have been so absorbed in the unparallelled development of our national economic resources, in the transformation of a wilderness into a manufacturing nation, that we have given little attention to the political structure which has hardly changed while the nation it controls has been transmuted. As someone has well said, we do not know very much about the laws of the Medes and Persians, but we do know that the refusal to alter them did not save the Medo-Persian Empire from crumbling into ruin.

Confession and Photography

EVERY now and then, in written and spoken criticism, one comes again upon the accusation addressed to all veracious art that it is photographic. It is clear that these critics and readers, whatever their acuteness and learning in other respects, have missed the experience of creation. They have, at least, not undergone that experience with any awareness of its true character. They have mistaken it for invention, which is almost the contradiction of it; they have mistaken it for detached observation in the scientific sense, a thing impossible in the life of art; they have forgotten that the most delicately made photograph gives the quantitative equivalent of that upon which the lens is turned. Neither the lens of the camera nor of the eye can omit some things and give the essence of others. That is what the creative imagination is forced to do.

It is forced to do so since it arises from pain and from the artist's strange need to identify himself with the source of his pain. It is easy and inexpensive to grow mystical on this point; it is safer to attribute the fact to laws and qualities of the mind that are yet unexplored. The fact remains and may be illustrated from a simple and popular instance. It is agreed by this time that Sinclair Lewis is something of a satirist and something of a moralist, that he dislikes the ways of many of his countrymen intensely and castigates them with something that often approaches a cold fury. Babbitt, to use the common phrase, is "on his nerves"; he has rebelled fiercely against Babbitt and Babbittry a hundred times. Yet all through the creative process, which, in the course of a longish novel, is an extensive one, Lewis identified himself with Babbitt, got a fierce and bitter joy out of that identification of his self with the self of his protagonist, lived in and with and through him as well as in and with and through his other characters, became each in turn without moral discrimination, and so liberated himself from the pain which they had made him suffer.

Art, in brief, even the most realistic in method, is confession and abbreviation. It is confession through the very nature of the creative process; it is abbreviation through the necessary space and time conditions that determine artistic processes. A controversy between two people that goes on in life for years must be set down in a few chapters or in a few scenes. Where in life millions of words were used a few thousand must suffice in art. And those few must be used in such a way as to give the essence of the innumerable ones, and yet not fade into the abstractness of symbolism, and yet retain the tang and semblance of the real. All art, in other words, is symbolic. Realistic art symbolizes by essences; romantic art, under whatever newer name, symbolizes by substituting analogous phenomena for those that had aroused the creative energy of the poet. But the former is no more photographic, no more a transcript of reality than the latter. Both seek, by different methods, to project an illusion of the ultimately real.

The ultimately real! Goethe and Turgeniev and many other great writers were accused, in their day, of slandering their friends and acquaintances by direct representation. Goethe had difficulty in calming the originals who sat for the story of Werther, Turgeniev was accused of having grossly betrayed the hospitality of the Russian squirearchy. It was the same old fallacy. The Goethes and Turgenievs by the creative imagination transform the superficially into the ultimately real, into the essential reality of art. The characters in their books transcend and essentialize the originals in nature to such an extent that interpretation has been wholly substituted for description and the writer ends by actually owing less to his angry friends and acquaintances than Shakespeare owed to the various sources of his plots. "The reality," a very great novelist writes, "which the artist uses for his purposes may be the world of his daily life, it may include his nearest and his dearest, it may cling closely to every given detail and use those details with what may seem an impassioned subservience to the stuff of life. Yet in the end there will be not only for the artists but also for the world an unbridgable chasm between reality and his creative structure—the difference in the very nature of the realm of reality and that of art. Thus it is well known that every true poet is to a certain extent identified with all his creatures. All the characters in a work, however hostile they may be to each other, are still emanations of the creative I, and Goethe is at the same time Antonio and Tasso just as Turgeniev is at the same time Basarov and Paul Petrovich. In brief, it is not invention that characterizes the poet; it is 'animation'—the putting of a soul into things."

The University and Marriage

THE evil effects of a university education upon the matrimonial prospects and desires of our college women have so often been set forth in the press that we have turned with interest to some exceedingly illuminating statistics compiled by the secretary of the class of 1893 of Harvard University to ascertain just what the American college man is doing to increase his tribe. The figures we find are serious enough to cast into deepest gloom the professional opponents of race suicide. This class, graduated thirty years ago from our premier university, enrolled from first to last 451 members, of whom 341 are still alive and active. Given their degrees before the recent considerable accession of Jewish students—of which it had but fifteen—this class is remarkably Anglo-Saxon in its composition. It contains not one Asiatic and not a single Negro. Some of the most familiar Back Bay names grace its pages; it has a considerable percentage of those well endowed with worldly goods and many whose struggles for a place in the sun have been hard and long. Its roll of names was even headed by a John Alden; it has members galore of the hereditary patriotic societies from those of the colonial wars down, and one of its members is of the sixth generation of his family to graduate from Harvard.

Taking them altogether ninety-seven are confirmed bachelors, or 21½ per cent. That is startling enough, but worse still is the fact that eighty-six of the married men are without children; that is, of 451 men 183, or more than 40 per cent, have left or will leave no progeny. When we add that of the other married men sixty-five have had but one child it is plainly lucky for Harvard '93 that Theodore Roosevelt is not alive to castigate these renegade sons of Cambridge. Sixty-five children among 248 possible fathers out of 451 is certainly a record to make the colonel turn in his grave. But he could take some comfort from the fact that 77 of this modest class have each two children, 57 three each, 38 four, and 19 five. Only five men, however, confess to six children apiece, but one to seven, and four to eight offspring. The banner member (from one point of view) boasts of ten children—the only "old-fashioned New England family" produced by the entire class. If this does not prove that the pioneer stock is dying out and that the doctrine of race suicide grows apace among the cultured and the prosperous group in our country, what could? There is only one redeeming fact: After thirty years the class secretary can record but thirty second marriages. Allowing for numerous deaths of first wives this fact does not bear out the prevailing theory that the world is divorcing itself.

Of the 717 children the record states that but 391 are males. In other words, if every son of these Harvard fathers enters Harvard the class will not even have replaced itself in the student body of the succeeding generation. True, some women's colleges may profit—indeed are profiting—by the 326 girls whose fathers were permanent or temporary members of the Harvard class in question. But that does not fill the bill. Let Vassar, Bryn Mawr, and Smith recruit where they may, the fact is that here is a worse menace to our future supply of cannon fodder and our Back Bay aristocracy than all the Negroes and Jews who have knocked at Harvard's doors. Who can doubt now that the Nordic race fails and pales?

Mistreating Our Ex-Service Men

Story of a Former Employee of the Veterans' Bureau

By SAMUEL DANZIGER

FOR the second time in two years a congressional investigation is under way of the manner in which the government's obligations to disabled ex-service men are being fulfilled. When the first investigation took place, in 1921, the care of these men was divided between three agencies, the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the Federal Board for Vocational Education, and the Public Health Service. The investigators failed to see that the first-named agency was negligent and inefficient, but made a report picking flaws in the really excellent work—under great difficulties—of the others. The functions of all three were combined in the United States Veterans' Bureau, a proper course, but unfortunately the new bureau was headed by the same man, Colonel Charles R. Forbes, under whom the War Risk Insurance Bureau had been mismanaged.

Colonel Forbes seems to have had difficulty in comprehending that ex-service men are no longer soldiers but civilians, and want to remain so. Almost the first act of his administration was the establishment at Camp Sherman in Chillicothe, Ohio, of a vocational training school in charge of former colonels, majors, and captains, and equipped with barracks and other leftovers of a war-time cantonment. It was not so well equipped with competent teachers and material needed in vocational training. In this school Colonel Forbes planned to concentrate men from hundreds of miles about, taking them from "placement" training in shops and factories near their homes. The men went but did not stay. Many took French leave, returning to the local offices from which they had been sent, with complaints about lack of accommodations and the plentiful supply of military air. To prevent the school from becoming an entire failure Colonel Forbes was compelled to replace the military instructors with civilians. Better equipment has also been installed, but Colonel Forbes got no further with his plan to create a chain of barracks as a substitute for home-town training.

Fulfilment as quickly as possible of the letter of the rehabilitation act and disregard of the spirit has been the policy of the Veterans' Bureau since its creation. While the Federal Board for Vocational Education was in control the policy was to consider no man rehabilitated until his ability to hold a job had been satisfactorily demonstrated. The policy of the Veterans' Bureau has been—and still is—to declare men rehabilitated, regardless of their vocational ability, as soon as a technical excuse can be found. This has been done by determining for each trade an arbitrary period within which a man in training is supposed to become proficient. Thirty days before expiration of that period the man must be given notice that he is soon to be thrown upon his own resources. He may appeal for more time and be awarded it, but as a rule this policy works so as to turn out "rehabilitated" men as helpless almost as when they entered training. In his last annual report Colonel Forbes stated that 22,000 had been turned out during the year. He was careful to avoid saying how many had been actually fitted for industry and for how many training had been merely discontinued, but the ordinary reader would erroneously infer from his statement that all had become self-supporting.

That many men have been in training a much longer time than appears necessary to a superficial observer seems to have troubled Colonel Forbes and to be troubling his successor, General Hines. This may be because both, being military men, look upon the men as machines who should all show the same results in a given time. They do not realize that, aside from ordinary casualties of war, military training itself has so molded the temperament of the men as to render them less fit for industry than civilians.

If every man, on entering vocational training, could be placed at once in the very occupation for which he is best fitted and kept steadily and intensively under competent instructors, the arbitrary periods fixed for each trade would probably suffice for rehabilitation. But this is seldom the case. The men at the head of the bureau are apparently unaware of what their subordinates in personal touch with the men in training well know, that ordinarily much time must be consumed in trying different occupations and in obtaining an opportunity in an industrial establishment (trade schools are not satisfactory substitutes) where proper instruction will be given.

Ignorance of this seems the only explanation of a recently reported utterance by General Hines that 10,000 men should be rehabilitated because they have been in training for three years or more. It is interference with local workers by inexperienced and uninformed superiors in Washington, eager to make a paper showing of results, which lies at the bottom of most of the justifiable complaints against the vocational section of the bureau. This would have been avoided had the plan of the Federal Board for Vocational Education been allowed to continue. Shortly before it was supplanted by the bureau it had instituted a system of local autonomy under which local offices could handle their own problems in their own way without red tape or interference from either the district offices or the central office. Unfortunately, Colonel Forbes saw fit to abolish this and General Hines has not seen fit to restore it.

More scandalous and outrageous is the red tape and neglect prevailing in the compensation section. The war risk insurance act allows a graded form of compensation to every man vocationally handicapped as a result of his military service. The government, having forcibly taken more or less unwilling men from their regular occupations and pushed them into camps and trenches, recognizes its responsibility for what has befallen them. To silence hairsplitters the act provides that, whatever the facts may be, any man must be held as in sound condition on induction into service who was so accepted without notation of his disabilities. Consequently any disability he may have had on his discharge must be held, without further discussion, to be due to service and entitle the man to compensation. There is a tale that in one place both draft board and camp physicians let a man slip through who had lost a leg in an accident two years before, that the man was rudely hushed when he tried to explain, and his condition was not realized until he got to France. There he was put at some clerical work and on his discharge allowed compensation for his ante-bellum injury technically "due to service." This tale, apparently well vouched for, may not be true, but it shows the intent of the compensation provisions of the act.

Nevertheless the hairsplitters are at work on cases far more deserving than this one-legged hero. He is a fortunate man who can have his compensation status properly straightened out within three months of the time that it is due. Many unfortunates must struggle along disabled and unemployed for much longer periods without results. Cases are numerous enough to fill every column of a whole year's issue of any magazine. One that goes under the file number of C—373314 is a gassed and shell-shocked unfortunate so badly disabled that the bureau's physicians have found training him not to be feasible, and, though he bears the signs of mustard gas on his body, he has been denied compensation. The reason given in a letter, in spite of the facts, is "You have no disability existing at this time by reason of alleged gas poisoning or chronic bronchitis." This decision was reached by bureaucrats who had not seen the man but judged his case by examining some papers.

C—262868 is an ex-navy man who was nearly killed as the result of a bungling operation on shipboard for gallstones. He was so badly injured that he was declared totally and permanently disabled. At first he was allowed $100 a month compensation. Later, having a laudable desire to become self-supporting, he applied for vocational training. This was granted and automatically stopped his compensation, men in training receiving subsistence allowances from a different fund. A short trial at very light work proved training to be non-feasible. It was accordingly stopped, automatically putting an end to his subsistence allowance, and should as automatically have restored his $100 a month compensation. Instead he was given a partial rating and has received but $67.50 a month since. Unable to work and with a wife and child to support, he must struggle along on this meager amount unless helped by charity. Before enlistment in the navy he was earning $30 a week. An additional scandal in this same case is that the man had been carrying a $5,000 government insurance policy which he allowed to lapse after his injury. He was apparently unaware that permanent and total disability entitles the holder to the benefits of his policy, for he did not apply for it. Later, still unaware of his rights, he applied for reinstatement. At that time he was rated on the bureau's records as "permanent and total," and his application should have brought the whole situation to the attention of proper officials. Instead, reinstatement was allowed and premiums were paid and received for eleven months thereafter. Then some official noticed the man's condition at time of reinstatement. Did he inform him of his rights under the policy? He did not. What happened was that a letter went out saying in substance: "Your policy is void since you were permanently and totally disabled at time of reinstatement." Here a clear provision of the law was ignored which makes policies incontestable after being six months in force. Through the intervention of the Red Cross the bureau finally acknowledged its error and the acting director at that time, Leon Fraser, promised that the man would be given his total disability benefits. Since then Mr. Fraser has resigned, the man's disability rating has been changed to "partial," his insurance benefits remain unpaid, and the bar against reinstatement remains.

C—217186 is a drafted man who had made his living as a violin player. He was discharged with some psychopathic disorder which has been so aggravated as to render him unable to follow his vocation. Nevertheless, compensation is withheld on the ground that his disability antedates service. The law shuts out such a contention but it takes a skilled lawmaker to circumvent hairsplitters. In this case they get around it by claiming that the man has no disability but has an "inability."

C—347902 is a volunteer who was gassed while fighting in the Argonne. Although suffering from throat and nervous troubles as a result, some one in Washington has concluded that "he is not suffering from any disability whatever connected with military service." That settles his case. Gassed while on the firing line is apparently not a result of military service.

Back of these and similar cases may be a laudable desire to avoid waste of public funds. General John F. O'Ryan, who has charge of the pending investigation, is said to be probing charges of extravagance. That is all very well, but there has probably been far greater wrong done through parsimony in some places than through extravagance in others. If the ruling powers, who were quite content that men be conscripted and slaughtered, would now evade payment of the bill, let that be made known.

To a Baby

By MAXWELL BODENHEIM

I

The blue beginning of your eyes
Condenses the sprawling and assured
Blue with which the sky retreats
From those confessions known as days.

II

Again, your battling mites of blue
Try to stop the revolving monster of life
And find the indelible persuasiveness
Of single forms with the circling blur.
Sundered bits of a soul,
They are not sure that they have still survived,
And plead for the conviction of sight.

III

But when they recollect
The hugely placid manners
Of their life, before the earthly exile
Made them small and fastened
To one pathetic puzzle,
Their blue reverts to swelling reveries
Whose outward circles spurn the curtained jail.

IV

Upon your softly incomplete
Face, where germs of devils stir in curves
That tremble into questioning symmetries,
A thrust of darkness sometimes interferes
With secret, virgin places underneath
Your eyes, and where your leaf-thin nostrils pause.
This darkness bends with helpless messages,
Like history admonishing a world
Personified in one composite face.

These United States—XXXVI*

ILLINOIS: First Province of the Middle Kingdom

By HOWARD VINCENT O'BRIEN

THE State of Illinois "in tres partes divisa est": (a) Chicago; (b) "down State"; (c) the circulation of the Chicago Tribune—a domain of resentful serfs who pay their tributary coppers even beyond the Mississippi. The distillation of such complexity into the compass of a few thousand words presents difficulties, because, though the three parts have a semblance of geographic and political identity, they are really in no way related. Chicago is a part of Illinois only as Rome was a part of the Italian peninsula; and the "World's Greatest Newspaper," as it modestly calls itself, belongs only to its owners.

If one write of Illinois, with subordinate consideration of Chicago and the County of Cook, the citizenry of the metropolis will rise as one man to point out that he has rather absurdly discussed the dog's tail, with only incidental mention of the dog. On the other hand, if he set forth Chicago, with Illinois as the side dish, he offers insult to half the population of a sovereign State. Nor can he straddle: to be neutral is to enjoy the unhappy ignominy of one in Dublin who is neither green nor orange. It is, indeed, a dilemma!

To personalize the situation, one may picture a farmer, white and native born, who can read and write, but doesn't—much—with a son who ran away and more or less accidentally got very rich. Relations between parent and offspring are a trifle strained, son being somewhat contemptuous of dad, and dad in a constant state of irritation with son, because the latter appears to think he's going to run the whole gosh-blamed farm. There were other children, of greater filial piety, some of whom went into manufacturing, and have done very well, such as Rockford and Moline and Joliet. There was also Peoria, a dubious source of pride, which took to distilling, and until the advent of a statesman of Scandinavian descent, from Minnesota, was one of the most prosperous of the family.

But to characterize Illinois as a farmer is only in part accurate. True, it ranks second in the production of corn and in the south is a land of dolce far niente, a low, hot region, with extraordinarily fertile soil, known, for various reasons, as "Egypt." One of the reasons is the name of its principal city, which is Cairo. It would be impolitic to specify the other reasons. But as one proceeds northward, though the semblance is beautiful to the agricultural eye, the beauty is quite literally "skin deep," for immediately below the green and smiling prairie lies a vast bed of bituminous coal, and the pick becomes almost as symbolical of the State as is the hoe.

Statistics are dreadful things. But they are as inseparable from a statement of Illinois as figures are from a bank. A European or a New Englander would consider Illinois as very sparsely populated. But the relative handful of people who inhabit it are extremely busy. With a population of six million odd, and a size less than the average of the Union—56,000 square miles—it ranks among the first three in manufacturing, savings-bank deposits, soft coal, pig iron, and corn. And in the value of its agricultural produce, as distinguished from mere quantity, it ranks first.

Contrary to Eastern notions of the Middle West, merely material distinctions are held of less moment than those which must be measured on finer scales. Illinois is proud of its rating in dollars and tonnage, but it is very much prouder of the fact that, although the density of its population is about three times that of the average of the country as a whole, its percentage of illiteracy is only 4.2 per cent, as opposed to 10.7 per cent in the country at large.

The farmers, the miners, the artisans, and the shopkeepers of Illinois share an obsession with education. Scratch the average citizen, and you find an individual who has, or has had, or is about to have, a son or daughter in the University of Illinois. Eastern eyebrows may elevate at mention of this provincial seat of learning, and Eastern lips may curl at sheepskins awarded for excellence in hippology and Ph.D.'s in animal husbandry, and Eastern skin may creep at the spectacle of uncouth youths roaming what should be cloistered solitudes in sweaters. But the citizen of Illinois is placid. He knows the opulence his university enjoys, as a consequence of the provisions for education in the establishment of the Western Reserve. Through his legislature he is ever ready to supplement that wealth. And when legal methods are too slow, he is quick to dig down into his blue-jeans for what may be needed. At the moment, it is a stadium—an enormous affair, costing millions, and every penny provided by private subscription.

In Winnetka, a suburb of Chicago, when the school problem became acute and the bonding capacity of the village was exhausted, the citizens, led by a lawyer who was serving as the head of the school board, stepped in and built a magnificent public school. The principal contributor was a wealthy Jewish clothing manufacturer: the others were Tom, Dick, and Harry.

The man of Illinois is a practical man, and he knows that money talks. It enables him to provide his university with better buildings and more of them than any seaboard seat of learning can boast, and it enables him to offer financial inducements to professorial skill that are beyond resisting. To an Eastern observer there is something appalling in the positive enormity of everything at the University of Illinois. After seeing the armory, an edifice large enough to house the old Yale campus, he is too numbed for comment when he hears that the student band alone is almost half the size of the entire Princeton undergraduate body. A bell rings, and from a huge building come a swarm of girls and boys, like ants from a burning log. Ten thousand students, he mutters, and when he is told that the bass drum, used by the aforementioned student band, is of such magnitude that it requires a special flat car for its transport, he shivers and flees from further Brobdingnagian data.

Illinois has a placid exterior. But there is turbulence within its bosom. It can run to extremes. It can, for instance, run a temperature as high as 107 degrees, and in a few weeks or hours—it is done by minutes in Chicago—drop to 24 below. This mercuric climate may, perhaps, be held accountable for Illinois's rather distinguished record for violence. Excluding minor lynchings, which, after all, are of importance chiefly to the individual concerned, Illinois has attained the front page of the yellower journals, and the editorial columns of the fireside press, several times of late years. There were, several years ago, the Springfield riots, of a racial character, with fire, murder, and rapine flourishing in the very shadow of the State Capitol. There was, later, the outburst in Chicago, in which black men were murdered somewhat more atrociously than white men usually murder white men, and during which, in the heart of the city where the Great Emancipator was nominated, it was unsafe for a man of color to show himself on the street. And, most recently, there was the Herrin "massacre," in which the ever-present emotional dynamite of the coal fields was bloodily detonated.

---

* Reproduction forbidden. Quotation limited to 300 words. Copyright, 1923, The Nation, Inc. All rights reserved.

The real feature of this last affair, in which murder was followed by mutilations worthy of Armenia, was the lineage of the malefactors. As in the great railway strike, the devilment was not the work of alien "reds," but of more or less direct descendants of Mayflower stock. Much editorial comment damned the atrocities at Herrin as "un-American," whereas, like the anarchy which ruled the streets of Chicago in the summer of 1894, it was as thoroughly American as the Declaration of Independence. The people of Herrin are singularly free from any consciousness of sin. They recently reelected to office, by an overwhelming majority, a local official admittedly involved in the affair. This gave great pain to Chicago, which, having forgotten the race riots of 1919, refers piously to the Herrin incident as a blot on the State's escutcheon.

Chicago is old enough to have forgotten a number of things. One of them is its origin. Everyone knows that Chicago is the greatest railway center in the world. But no one can really explain why. The fact is that Chicago is an accident. It did not begin, as most cities do, as an answer to the needs of commerce. Its nucleus was not a trading-post, but a military one—Fort Dearborn—situate (the military methods of the period apparently not differing from those now current) in a peculiarly disagreeable and unhealthful swamp, beside a wretched little river, the Indian name of which was Wild Onion.

One likes to picture the pioneers, those sparks from Plymouth Rock, as foreseeing the greatness of Chicago. But unfortunately some of them made the mistake of committing their views to paper. One, for instance, came to the little hamlet, tarried a while, and then, when he had satisfied himself, moved on to a village in the neighboring Fox River valley, where he settled. That village, he said, was destined to be the metropolis of the Western Reserve. The Fox River still flows, and the village is still there—no larger than when he found it! Another, owning a lot on what is today Michigan Avenue, Chicago's principal boulevard, allowed it to be sold for taxes, and moved his family to Milwaukee, a city which had a "future."

The Chicago city seal is graced by a somewhat portly female of Grecian origin, whose motto is "I will." The words are better than the picture. There is nothing feminine or Hellenic about Chicago. A better personalization of it would be the type so familiar in the recent era of high prices and labor scarcity—hands rough and a little soiled, wearing a silk shirt and diamonds, who ordered two pianos at a time, stripping bills from the "wad" extracted from his "pants," to pay for them.

It is, in short, a gross lout of a city, long on health and vigor and ruthlessness and imagination and money, and with less sign of sprouting what is known as "culture" than a cement sidewalk shows of sprouting grass. H. G. Wells called it a "lapse from civilization." An Oriental undoubtedly had it in mind when he spoke of America as being inhabited by the flattest-minded people on the globe. And for anyone whose interest in babies, prohibition, and the stock market is tepid, dining out is a weary business.

And yet—there is a population of some four hundred thousand Jews. Where there are Jews, the cultural spark is never quite extinguished. Under the glossy concrete shell of commercialism there is evidence of a warm lush soil in which good seed will one day flourish. There are pianos. The fathers bought them for decorative purposes: signs are not wanting that sons and daughters are learning to play them. The bluff scorn of the pioneers for effete things like opera has softened. Opera has had the accolade of "civic" accorded it, and the plain people are beginning to give it the respect they give the Cubs and the Stock Yards and the Municipal Pier. It has lost something of its mere social significance, and the gallery sells out before the boxes. The Symphony Orchestra—still referred to by ladies of the old school as the Thomas orchestra—and Ravinia, that extraordinary outdoor temple to the muse, on the North Shore—nothing like it this side of Germany—are known wherever music matters. Not long ago, a fountain by a famous sculptor was unveiled on a city thoroughfare. Every city, of course, has fountains by famous sculptors. But the significant thing about this one was the fact that it was paid for from a fund bequeathed by an utter unknown—a man of the people who had amassed riches out of lumber, a Maecenas of the democratic order. Near the river, on the West Side, is a grim pile of red brick—a monument to that refinement of modernism, the mail-order business. It is quintessential of merchandising and turnover and distribution and profit. And in the Art Institute, held worthy of place on walls with Corot and VanDyke, are canvases painted by the active head of that mail-order business. Nor is his case isolated. There is an active and not inconsiderable group of business men who paint pictures—many of the members being highly successful business men, who paint extremely well.

In Chicago hospitality has retained its small-town quality. Unlike the New Yorker, the Chicagoan does not dine his outlander friend at a restaurant and take him to a theater—he takes him home. That is one of the reasons why the visitor does not see the "night life" of Chicago. The other reason is that there isn't any. Nightfall sees the streets deserted, save on what the newspapers call the Rialto, ordinarily known as Randolph Street, where one may see some of the New York shows, acted by the kind of actor that doesn't mind traveling. There are also several places for circumspect dancing, after twelve. And at Huyler's, if you go early enough, you can secure excellent soda water.

The lake front is an evidence of the profound foresight the city's forefathers did not have. One wonders what was in their minds—or in their pockets—when they allowed the Illinois Central Railroad to lay its tracks in the municipal front yard, quite literally under their very noses. This civic Helgoland was, until recently, both in figure and in fact, nothing more than a dump. But as time passed it became evident that rubbish is objectionable only when there is not enough of it; for the dreadful litter of dirt and garbage and tin cans presently became a considerable area of new land. The water was driven back, and beyond the railroad tracks lies the broad expanse of Grant Park.

The only building ever raised on the lake side of Michigan Avenue was the Art Institute. But some years ago all the realtors of the city, as if moved by a common impulse, suddenly announced their intention of putting up new, large, incomparably magnificent edifices to flank the institute. There was great jubilation. "Boosting" attained the proportions of a delirium. The Avenue, which about this time became the Boulevard, or as B.L.T. dubbed it, the Boul Mich, was, in the familiar American hyperbole, to be the finest in the world. But into this iridescent dream stepped the unpleasant reality of one Montgomery Ward, another man who had made a success of the mail-order business. His weapons were law-suits and injunctions: his purpose to keep the far side of the Boulevard forever free of buildings. The litigation was endless, and to a cheated and outraged public the name of Ward became anathema. But the Watch Dog of the Lake Front never let go, and the city can still see the blue waters of the lake. And today there is a widespread contention that Grant Park ought to be Ward Park. The beautification of the land which this obstinate old man preserved for the people against their will continues steadily. The Illinois Central is to be put under ground and electrified. There are to be flowers, plashing fountains, gondolas on the silver bosom of a lake tamed into lagoons, a stadium, museums, and what not—all for the pleasure and edification of the common people.

The quality of paradox in the composition of Chicago reached its climax in the person of its erstwhile mayor, Mr. William Hale Thompson, who gained international fame for quite accurately, but with poor judgment, characterizing the place he governed as the "sixth German city of the world."

Chicago, like other American cities, has always enjoyed varying degrees of bad government. But several years ago the "better element" was roused to reform. It was time, they said, to take the city out of politics. So, very carefully, they picked a man with no political affiliations, of independent means, and of good, sound American stock, to raise the banner of civic virtue. Their candidate was duly elected. Whereupon he put a sombrero on his head and became "Big Bill"—prince of demagogues. Before the ink was dry on the felicitations of press and pulpit, Chicago was in the grip of a political machine that made the efforts of such men as Tweed seem bungling and experimental.

Thompson has now passed from the scene. But what may be called Thompsonism remains. It is a kind of bond between Chicago and Illinois, because it rules both. The governor of the State, Len Small, yields fealty to the "organization." Not long ago he was tried for the unromantic crime of embezzlement—and acquitted. Now, those who acquitted him are about to be tried. When members of the Chicago school board were under a similar indictment the case could not be brought to trial because the attorney general of the State lacked the funds necessary to prosecute it. And he lacked them because the governor had vetoed the necessary appropriations. No, this is not a scene from the "Mikado"—it is just Illinois politics.

Thompsonism has many friends and apologists. But their loyalty is for the most part negative—inspired by their dislike of the Tribune, which is bitterly hostile to Thompsonism. But why is it so hostile and so bitter? Well, dear children, that goes back to its feud with Senator Lorimer, who, not a little from its efforts, was chased out of the United States Senate. Mr. Lorimer was, in a way, the progenitor of Thompsonism, and a little verse which appeared in the "Line o' Type" summarizes the whole matter:

You may ventilate, fumigate, douche if you will,
But the odor of Lorimer will cling to you still!

The Tribune is vindictive, clever, and irreconcilable. It is rich beyond computation, and enormously powerful. It is as personal and unstable as a country weekly—which is natural, since its owners are also its active editors. It is less popular than prohibition. A great many people hate it violently. Those who have anything like affection for it are negligible. And yet one out of every five families, in five States, subscribes to it. The people of Illinois have no enthusiasm for Thompsonism, and less for the Tribune. But they vote for the one, and buy the other. They would shed no tears at the downfall of either. But the fact remains that the Tribune, if not the world's greatest newspaper, certainly is one of them, and Thompsonism does build roads and bridges and supply fetes, even if they cost more than they should.

Youthful and masculine is Chicago—generous, impulsive, and somewhat skeptical of "dog." It takes a person of great hardihood to stroll down the Boulevard carrying a cane. Though that skepticism is more for the stroll than the stick. One does not stroll in Chicago. Neither does one contemplate. One goes and one does—at the greatest possible speed. The Frenchman, sipping his sirop grenadine and discussing Balkan politics, and the German, with his beer, listening to Wagner, are alike beyond the comprehension of Chicago. The Chicagoan does not discuss politics—he takes sides; and he would rather dance to music than listen to it. And he regards his watch more highly than his imagination.

And yet, he has a boundless imagination. His dreams have magnitude, if not intensity, and he has the energy to bring great plans to fruition. His city is all compact of the yea and nay which is in him. It is tolerant of graft, and prudish about art. It is liberal as regards business ethics, and bigoted as regards social ethics. It is polyglot and conservative. It welcomes new people, and mistrusts new ideas. And though, unlike other great cities, it has no leisure class, and the sons of wealth are obliged by the pressure of public opinion to toil as sweatily as their grandfathers did, there is a certain unmistakable wistfulness for the things which set human life apart from the beasts of the field, and make of the human economy something more than a digestive tube.

Chicago has the feeling for Illinois that the dweller within gates has always had for the outlander; and Illinois fears and dislikes Chicago because it is "foreign." But under the surface of mutual distrust, of vainglorious pride, of crude commercialism on the one hand and smug ruralism on the other, lies a questioning and hopeful pessimism. It is like the coal beds under the fields of smiling corn—latent fire. Illinois, by the record, has done well in all the ways of the flesh. To the historian, if not the prophet, it is clear that she will presently flower into achievement in the things of the spirit.

The next article in the series These United States, to appear in The Nation of September 5, will be Nebraska: The End of the First Cycle, by Willa Sibert Cather.

Progress (and Poverty) in Porto Rico

By ARTHUR WARNER

IV. WHEN DO WE EAT?

THE crying economic question in Porto Rico is: "When do we eat?" A great majority of the people do not get enough food even in quantity; still fewer get an adequate variety. An occasional purchase of codfish provides about the only meat. The great national dish is rice and beans, which is nourishing though heavy. But all three of these foods are imported, and therefore cost money. So the native relies a good deal upon bananas and sweet potatoes which he can raise himself or buy at trifling cost. In periods of unemployment he falls back upon them almost entirely. His diet is always deficient in good fats, but the craving for them leads to an inordinate use of bad lard or vegetable oils in his cooking when he can afford them. Probably ninety-nine children in a hundred grow up virtually without milk after their nursing days.

Better subsistence for the masses is imperative if they are to develop the mental and physical energy necessary to improve the other conditions of their life. It is true that until the hookworm is eradicated the people will continue to be anemic and without endurance, no matter how good their food. The prevalence of the hookworm disease is the greatest obstacle to progress in the island. But the elimination of the hookworm is only a necessary condition for improving the standard of living. In itself it is not an improvement of that standard. Improvement must begin with more food; and for the present, at least, it must be produced by the island itself.

Porto Rico's food problem is due to the extraordinary and rapidly increasing density of the population. There are 378 persons to the square mile, an increase of 100 persons to the square mile since the beginning of American rule. The density of the population is about twice that in France and ten times the average for continental United States. To employ such a population—and thus to feed it—involves either large manufacturing development (an improbability) or more scientific and extensive agriculture. Unemployment is chronic. There are no comprehensive statistics, but in 1920, before the post-war industrial slump had fairly begun, the insular Bureau of Labor estimated that, except in San Juan, there were five men for every job not requiring technical knowledge.

The great export crops of Porto Rico are sugar-cane, tobacco, and coffee, with grapefruit making rapid headway in recent years. Both rice and beans—the staple foods of the people—are raised to some extent, but not in sufficient quantities to fill the home demand. Sweet potatoes and bananas are raised for domestic use only. It is thought that neither can be exported at a profit against present competition. In Spanish days coffee was Porto Rico's great crop. It has since become secondary to both sugar and tobacco.

Sugar now comprises about half of the entire agricultural wealth of the island and employs 40 per cent of all the farm labor. Unfortunately, it is a crop which calls for many workers through the harvest season from January to June, for fewer during the planting season of the next few months, and for a still smaller number during the growing season from October to the end of the year. Another objection to sugar-cane from the social standpoint is that in Porto Rico it is essentially a large-scale crop, ill adapted to small holdings or the poor man. The increasing emphasis on sugar-cane is probably responsible for the tendency toward larger and larger single holdings and the continual elimination of the small farmer, whereas the island obviously needs an agriculture that will increase rather than diminish the number of persons who are cultivators on their own account.

The absence of small farmers has always been one of the unfortunate aspects of Porto Rican life, but the census shows that the number of individual farms dropped from 58,371 in 1910 to 41,078 in 1920, a decline of almost one third. Likewise the number of farms of less than ten acres decreased in the same period from 31,959 to 15,981, a loss of one half. The census of 1910 included as farms a good many holdings that were excluded under the more exact classification of ten years later, but this can account only partially for the statistics indicating the astonishing decline of the small farmer, as there are other figures showing the increasing consolidation of the land in the hands of large owners. For instance, the area in farms of 1,000 or more acres increased by 16 per cent between 1910 and 1920, although the number of such holdings decreased from 207 to 167, indicating a grouping even of the large plantations into the hands of fewer persons. Fifty or more acres in Porto Rico may be regarded as a large farm. It is significant, therefore, that three-fourths of the farm land of the island is in holdings of more than that size.

Not only is the farm land predominantly and increasingly in the hands of a few owners, but it is passing more and more into the hands of alien or absentee landlords. Leopoldo Feliú, ex-Commissioner of Agriculture and Labor, estimates that three-fourths of the cane land is owned or leased by three big companies, the stock of which is owned chiefly in the United States, while about the same proportion of the tobacco land is controlled by the Porto Rican-American Tobacco Company, a subsidiary of the American Tobacco Company. The coffee plantations, according to Mr. Feliú, have been gradually passing into the hands of Spanish merchants who have obtained mortgages on them for goods supplied—and under the stress of hard times have been able to foreclose.

Probably the chief reason for the growing domination of the island by outsiders is the high cost of money, making it extremely precarious for anyone without ready capital to embark upon industry. The regular bank rate is 10 per cent on loans of $2,000 or less, 9 per cent on sums from $2,000 to $50,000, and 8 per cent on amounts above $50,000. But this is not all of the story. There are various extras in the way of commissions and the like, especially among the money lenders to whom the small borrower is largely compelled to resort, in consequence of which the actual interest rate commonly runs from 12 to 18 per cent, with cases where it has been 48 per cent!

Obviously it is impossible for industry to pay such interest rates and have anything left [illegible] wages for the workers who sustain it. No wonder that the island is bled white of its riches, that its industry, like its population, is anemic! It has been estimated that two-thirds of the wealth produced in Porto Rico goes abroad in the form of rents, commissions, or dividends. As C. Toro Labarthe, formerly Commissioner of Agriculture and Labor, has put it: "The island is well organized as a factory for production of profits, and it is worked by unhappy peons the fruit of whose toil goes to the enrichment of owners and stockholders most of whom are absentees."

V. EMIGRATION—OR WHAT?

From what has been said it should be clear that Porto Rican industry, as it exists, is inadequate to afford a decent or even a tolerable life to a population already oriental in its density and still rapidly increasing. Not a few students of conditions have thrown up their hands and counseled emigration as the only solution. Cuba and Santo Domingo, they have argued, need agricultural labor, not to speak of more distant points. But the Porto Rican cannot be forced to leave home, and he evinces no wish to do so voluntarily in any but insignificant numbers. Emigration is probably impractical and certainly deplorable as a remedy. There must be a better alternative. In the future some reliance may be placed on the development of light manufacturing, because although lacking in iron, coal, or water power, and remote from world markets, the island has an important asset in its abundant labor supply. The making of cigars and cigarettes from native tobacco is already an industry of importance, while Porto Rican hand-made lace and women's blouses command a ready market in the United States. The island ought to make all of its cotton clothing, instead of importing it, and probably its shoes.

But for the present the hope of better living conditions lies chiefly in a more extensive and diversified agriculture. Presumably the present landowners are cultivating all the acreage that their resources permit or their judgment dictates. Likewise they are raising the crops that they believe to be most profitable. Hope of more extensive and diversified agriculture lies not in them but in putting new men on the land as small cultivators on their own account. Such men would inevitably increase the number of acres under cultivation and, as small producers working fresh land of varying possibilities, would be likely to find profit in new crops, especially if encouraged by experimentation on the part of the government and assisted in marketing their products.

To put any substantial number of men on the land as cultivators on their own account will require a new taxation system, devised to make unprofitable the holding of idle land, together with a policy of land purchase by the government and redistribution in small holdings on leasehold. There is now a homestead law in Porto Rico, designed to utilize public lands as small farms, but as the government owns little property that is of any promise agriculturally, this effort does not go far enough.

Along with a policy of land enfranchisement for a new crop of small farmers must go a method of supplying them with working capital at lower interest than the exorbitant rates now current. A start in this direction was made by the extension to Porto Rico last autumn of the Federal Land Bank. This promises important relief to small farmers through money at 6 per cent, although its field is limited on account of the provision restricting any individual loan to $5,000 and making only a first mortgage on land acceptable as security. Additional credit is needed, supplied if necessary by insular bond issues, available in larger sums than $5,000 and obtainable on crops as well as on land.

To put the now landless and commonly jobless Porto Rican in the fields as an independent cultivator is, of course, encompassed by many difficulties and likely to result in numerous failures. Generations of virtual serfdom have unfitted him temperamentally for the work. But with the advice and assistance of a competent agricultural service the mountains in the way, though lofty, are not impassable.

VI. THE POLITICAL FUTURE

I have left until last a discussion of the island's political future. Last but not least? No, as I see it, last and least. That, of course, is contrary to the prevailing opinion in Porto Rico, where the future form of government is regarded as first and foremost and is above all else the subject of discussion and controversy.

And that is just the trouble. All over the world, to be sure, people are talking and thinking in the language of outworn political systems instead of in modern economic terms. But Porto Rico is in such desperate need of economic reconstitution that the subordination of this task to the puerilities and personalities that occupy the attention of the Unionists and the Republicans—the largest two parties—is especially tragic. Porto Rico is too poor to afford the luxury of much politics; it ought not to afford even the luxury of much graft. (Or is that a necessity?) Graft works greater hardship there than in the United States. For instance, when visiting Ponce, I remarked to a friend who was showing me about that the high-school building was much in need of a coat of paint. He agreed, adding sadly that money for such work had been appropriated a year or so previously but had leaked away before it got as far as the high-school walls. Now that illustrates a difference between Porto Rico and the United States. I do not know that there is more graft in one place than in the other, but the United States is a richer country and although, in most public work, a good deal of money trickles into wrong channels, there is usually something left for the original purpose. Out of a similar appropriation there might have been as much extracted in graft as in Porto Rico, but the total would have been sufficient so that the high-school would have got at least a cheap coat of paint.

In my judgment it does not matter a picayune whether the form of government in Porto Rico remains what it is, or whether the island is organized as a territory, admitted to the Union as a State, or constituted as some sort of free state. (No considerable group is any longer asking for independence.) Yet, as long as people are as they are, it seems advisable to seek some solution of Porto Rico's political future in order to remove the question from party politics and induce the island to occupy itself with more important subjects.

In any event the future form of government in Porto Rico is essentially an insular question, and should be so recognized in the United States. It is true that, if the island is admitted as a State to the Union, it will thereafter have its share in determining the national destiny, but its influence in that respect will be hardly large enough to be of either appreciable benefit or calculable harm. About the only novelty in the Federal government that has been suggested as likely to ensue from Porto Rico's admission to statehood would be the probability that the island would send some Negroes to sit in Congress.

Anyhow it is for Porto Rico, primarily, to determine its political future. Any attempt to fabricate a form of government in the United States and foist it upon the island would be resented, no matter how excellent the device. Congress must wait for some fairly general crystallization of opinion in Porto Rico before it can do anything. Until recently this has been lacking, but there is now a movement in the Unionist Party to abandon the demand for a free state and to unite with others in asking for a territorial government now, with statehood as a probable sequel.

At first sight there seems to be no virtue in a territorial government as an intermediate step. The Jones Act, of 1917, probably gives Porto Rico as much self-government already as it would have under territorial organization, unless the island be allowed—as Porto Ricans suggest—to elect its Governor. But in spite of first appearances to the contrary, there would be one great advantage in organizing Porto Rico as a territory. It would be a tacit promise on the part of Congress, and a virtual acceptance by the island, that statehood was the eventual goal, and agreement on that point would be invaluable in removing the question from insular politics.

Congress would be ill-advised to thrust statehood, or anything else, upon Porto Rico. But if determinable sentiment in the island should swing definitely toward incorporation in the Union, Congress could commemorate the completion of twenty-five years of American administration in no better way than by giving to Porto Rico the territorial organization which would be the token of statehood to come.

The Roots of the War—And of Peace*

By COUNT HARRY KESSLER

OF course, most of the problems of which the war and the present critical state of Europe are the outcome were not new in 1914; they date back far behind the war. At the root of all I think you will find, if you dig down, two fundamental facts: (1) An immense and unprecedented growth of population in almost all the European countries within the last century; (2) An awakening, still more unprecedented, of the masses, of the self-consciousness of the masses, due to popular education, to the popular press, and to all sorts of authorized and unauthorized propaganda. . . .

The growth of population beyond the sustaining capacity of its soil gave every European nation the millions of hungry workers necessary to start great industries, to start "big business" on an unprecedented scale. It gave each of these expanding nations not only the opportunity; it forced upon it also the necessity of creating and maintaining great industries; for it forced them to buy food and raw materials in great quantities in foreign markets; and forced them, therefore, to sell in foreign markets great quantities of their own products, in order to pay for what they urgently needed. The English people could not live more than two months in the year on the food produced in the British Isles; or, putting it another way, five-sixths of the people of Great Britain would have to starve if it lost the capacity of buying food in foreign markets. Germany, even before the war, had to import about one-third of its food stuffs and almost all its raw materials. Here you have the roots of modern industrial competition as between nations. . . .

No less urgent were the questions arising out of the awakening of the masses, and, first and foremost, nationalism and the growing will of nations to self-determination and unity. I believe it was Secretary Lansing who noted down in his diary at Paris that the idea of self-determination carried by President Wilson into the councils at Versailles would work like dynamite on Europe; well, that dynamite was always smoldering and sometimes violently exploding in most of the great empires of Europe during the greater part of the last century. Not only the Ottoman Empire, but also Austria, Germany, Great Britain were never in the course of the last hundred years safe from its effects. It made a burning problem of the reorganization of Europe on national lines, in so far as the wars and revolutions of the nineteenth century had not already brought about this reorganization by force.

Democracy itself did not lessen but increased these difficulties. I believe in democracy. I believe that true world democracy will in the future be the chief safeguard of peace and prosperity. But the separate democracies of the different competing nations before the war were the very objects, and must necessarily be the first victims, of defeat in economic competition. These separate and water-tight democracies were therefore ideal hunting grounds for the nationalist scaremonger. And besides, these democracies added force to the disrupting idea of national self-determination. To aid this scaremongering, an old tradition in all European states made it more or less constitutional to keep from democracy all real knowledge of international affairs. Under these circumstances, it therefore became increasingly urgent to organize cooperation between the different national democracies, through open diplomacy and other appropriate machinery, lest they should come to blows.

Last, but not least, class consciousness raised the whole question of the share of labor in the profits and dignity of production—a question which alone was sufficient to shake the social structure of Europe to its foundations.

On the other hand, the new constructive forces were no less in magnitude than these great problems. Allow me to mention some of these forces only: the increase in power of industry and transportation, the tightening web of world economy, the revolutionary onward rush of science, the moral and spiritual vigor of the awakened masses, ready to hand for any one to use for constructive, as well as for destructive, purposes.

But the trouble was the politicians did not care or did not know how to use these forces for constructive purposes and for the solution of the problems overhanging Europe. On the other hand, these problems and the dangers which they threatened, so long as they remained unsolved, were so patent that they resulted in an universal feeling of insecurity. Now here, in this universal feeling of insecurity, I think we have the immediate cause of the great tragedy. For this universal sense of insecurity forced the politicians to find, or at least to pretend to find, solutions and remedies; and the remedies they applied were armaments, imperialism and alliances. But it is an unfortunate fact that every one of those remedies added new formidable dangers to those already threatening, and far from making the different countries really safe, could not even make them feel safe. . . .

---

* From a lecture delivered before the Institute of Politics, Williamstown, Massachusetts, on July 30.

At any rate, when the catastrophe came, it struck Europe with all its great problems unsolved, and the devastation wrought by the great catastrophe added new problems to the old ones. This devastation was, of course, terrific. The committee constituted at Copenhagen to investigate the social effects of the war makes out a total of 35,000,000 lives lost in Europe:

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| In France | 1,400,000 | killed |
| | 1,500,000 | by the decrease of birth rate. |
| In Italy | 600,000 | killed |
| | 1,400,000 | by the decrease of birth rate. |
| In Russia | 9,829,000 | killed |
| | 20,000,000 | by the decrease of birth rate. |
| In England | 800,000 | killed |
| | 850,000 | by the decrease of birth rate. |
| In Germany | 2,000,000 | killed |
| | 3,600,000 | by the decrease of birth rate. |
| and added to them | 763,000 | killed by the blockade during the war and after. |

I call your special attention to these 763,000, because they were mostly women and children and old men and a large proportion were killed after the fighting was over. They total almost as many lives as England lost in all through the war.

The destruction of property was not less appalling. In France 285,000 houses were destroyed and 400,000 damaged; over 3,000,000 acres of French soil devastated; 2,400 kilometers of her main railway lines and 22,000 of her factories destroyed. Everybody who realizes this, and still more, those who have seen the devastated areas in France, must feel deeply with the French people; and also with Europe for the frightful injury inflicted, in part, as must be admitted, wantonly, on one of its richest provinces. But unfortunately these French ruins are not the only wound on the fair face of Europe. Few people, I believe, realize the devastation of Poland which the Russian armies inflicted on that unfortunate country in their retreat. I witnessed that retreat and that destruction, as they were in progress. Hundreds of miles of Russian front rolled back over the villages and cities, setting fire to each as it was evacuated, and leaving behind nothing but charred ruins. . . .

So much for the loss of life and property; but this almost pales before the worst devastation wrought by the war; the poisoning of the moral atmosphere. Atrocities there always have been and always will be in every war. War is not a clean or moral business. Certainly, where individual atrocities occur they should be denounced. I never hesitated to do so myself, when I had any suspicions against any of our own men. But on the whole, I think there were fewer atrocities on all sides than the world has been led to think. Human nature, after all, was not quite so black as it was painted. . . . But it is not the very right and natural outcry against individual atrocities that has created the atmosphere of hate; rather, this was studiously prepared by the denunciation of whole nations through well-organized propaganda. Immediately the war began, the war minister of one of the great powers involved told the journalists: "You shall be the sowers of hate." . . .

The lessons and forces which sprang from the great changes of the nineteenth century I have already at least mentioned: the immensely increased power of production and transportation, the gradual tightening of the web of world economy, the driving power of science, the moral and spiritual forces called into being by the awakening of the masses. What did the war add to all these? First of all, in the economic field, the lessons of a great experiment: the experiment of withdrawing the supreme control of production and distribution from private enterprise and from the mere pursuit of individual profit, and handing it over to a council representing, on the allied side, twenty-six states, with the purpose of adapting both production and distribution to the needs of the peoples. The Supreme Economic Council of the Allies, controlling industries and shipping, may have been defective and irksome; but it certainly demonstrated one thing: that the international control of foodstuffs and raw materials and the international adjustment of their distribution to the needs of the different nations are at any rate possible.

Hardly less important was the lesson given by the cooperation of organized labor with the governments, both in Germany and on the allied side. It proved that these great organized bodies of workers, that had been growing up in the various trades, had not only become a power which forced recognition, but also that invaluable use can be made of them for intensifying and quickening production.

What bearings these two lessons may have on the great problems of Europe we shall have to consider in a later lecture. But whatever we may find, these bearings and all economic and social solutions will depend, in the last resort, on the spirit of humanity. And it is therefore to the spirit we must look if we are to decide whether there are at present, or were when the war ceased, any serious hopes of a better world.

Now I think that nothing can strengthen these hopes more than the spirit of purest self-sacrifice with which hundreds of thousands on all sides went out to lay down their lives in what to them was a sacred cause. I wish to quote as a particularly moving document of that spirit, the book of a young Frenchman killed in the war: "Lettres d'un Soldat." I should like to add to these the memory of Rupert Brooke; and also the memory of one or two young prisoners with whom I had the privilege of speaking. Often, when I have been moved to indignation by some particularly poisonous product of the propaganda of hate, I have thought of these splendid young Frenchmen or Englishmen, and the feeling has died away. Against the propaganda of hate we have to set this magnificent triumph of the idea of service. I doubt whether at any other time this triumph could have been so complete.

For this same idea of service was living, also, in all countries; in those courageous men and women who resisted the war at the cost of their liberty and even of their lives; in the Quakers and conscientious objectors in England, or in strong individual characters such as Rosa Luxemburg and Theodore Liebknecht in Germany. Here was the idea of service, and also the promise of something new and great; of a moral revolt against the ancient law of blood, of an uncompromising stand for the rights of humanity. . . .

Easley to the Rescue

By HUBERT C. HERRING

The incident related below is an actual happening. The name of the institution is suppressed at the instance of the author, who writes: "My good friends at the University of ——— are having a very difficult time inducing any men of liberal tendencies to come down into their country."

THE Stars and Stripes still fly over The University. Thanks to Mr. Easley and his Civic Federation.

The National Student Forum, in its effort to promote friendship and understanding between European and American students, arranged a tour of the colleges by a select group of students. They came to The University. A brilliant young Englishman. A Czech filled with enthusiasm for the student Renaissance movement of his own country. And—tread gently—one of our late enemy, a brilliant lad of twenty-one years from the University of Heidelberg. They came to tell of the spiritual ideals of the youth of Europe. They came as harbingers of a new Europe, in which youth shall come to its own.

Thanks to Mr. Easley, their heresies did not foul the pure air of The University. The redoubtable Easley issued an encyclical. It told the dreadful truth. He waxed eloquent over the youth movement of Europe. He saw them leading in a concerted protest against war. They were, they must be . . . red . . . pacifists . . . socialists . . . anarchists. It was a delightful bit of literature. It fairly oozed with that unflinching, die-if-I-must-but-here-I-stand-so-help-me-God patriotism which has led friend Easley in his brave assault on windmills throughout his naive career. It reached The University. Faculty and students fairly lapped it up. They licked their chops over its fine phrases. They tightened their belts and cleaned their guns.

Enter the villains.

They were summoned into executive session. Faculty and students were represented. The cordial atmosphere of a juicy bit of beefsteak with twenty dogs looking it over.

The Inquisition was on.

They asked questions. "You would recommend that mere freshmen be lectured by Bolsheviks?" No answers were needed. It was not a trial—simply a conviction. It was made perfectly clear that The University would allow no foreigner to come over and tell us native Americans how to run our country. Not by a long shot.

The Inquisition continued.

A student approached the leader of the party, one of the officers of the Student Forum. He asked him about religion. It must be regretfully recorded that the answer indicated a shattered faith in Jonah, or something of the sort. This was enough. It was announced that these visitors not only refused to believe in the everlasting curse of war . . . but that they were heretics. The University may have faults . . . but it is firm for the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch . . . and the doctrine of the Trinity.

To aggravate the situation, one of the group remarked that a Negro college in Washington was equal to any white college which they had visited. We believe in keeping the Nigger in his place down our way.

Retribution was swift.

The University newspaper came out with emphatic headlines. "Parlor Bolshevism Fails To Impress Students." Naively it went on to say that "the four men's ideas did not meet with approval here." The four were reported as being "individualists, which is generally regarded here as synonymous with 'parlor Bolsheviks'."

Again they were summoned into solemn conclave.

They were firmly informed that the students were too young . . . that they were not prepared to hear such doctrines . . . and that, furthermore, the students did not wish to hear them.

Perfectly lucid.

The Y.M.C.A. secretary also made it clear that his organization was having difficulty getting on its feet . . . and that if it got the reputation of harboring Bolsheviks . . . it would suffer financially.

The spokesman concluded: "We are not telling you when to go . . . but we must tell you that there is danger that the students might get excited and throw you out." The spokesman for the students frankly answered: "This is a friendship tour. We have no other aim. If you do not wish to meet us on this basis, we gladly leave."

They left. In peace.

The University is at peace. No enemy breaks her tranquillity. She is free to believe in the divine sanction of war . . . and the eternity of confusion . . . and the Trinity . . . and the blood atonement. The president can peacefully continue his educational task of coaxing a few more unwilling dollars from a reluctant legislature.

But—where will the boys and girls get educated?

It whets my curiosity. What kind of two-headed calves are these dreadful students? I hear Antonin Palecek tell of the spiritual urge and intensity of the students of Czecho-Slovakia. Their vision of the new republic's mission. Their enthusiasm in intellectual pursuit. Their glowing idealism. I hear Joachim Friedrich pleading for a new age in which all of the beauty of life shall not be crushed out by the ponderous mechanism of modern industry. I hear him explain his own ambition—politics in his own country. "Each nation, after all, must clean house for itself." I hope it is true . . . that the youth of Europe . . . are looking to the stars.

But the Easley is undoubtedly right. It is dangerous doctrine . . . to talk about new worlds. So is Christianity dangerous. I suppose that is the reason it is not taught . . . very widely.

I am on the train. Four boys sit opposite me. Students from The University. One of them is reading the Outlook. I ask him: "Did you meet those foreign boys last week?"

"Huh, we kicked 'em out!"

"You don't stand for any new-fangled ideas down there, do you?"

"I should say not!"

Conversation lagged.

"Say," says he, "see that Nigger up there in this white coach?"

"Yes?"

"Well, we wouldn't stand for that in our State! Would kick him right out."

I wager that he believes in the inerrancy of the Scriptures . . . and the Ku Klux Klan. . . .

But where can he get an education?

In the Driftway

IT has often been remarked that we live in an age which has no time to waste. The telephone, the wireless, the railroad train, the automobile, the talking machine, the motion picture, all are time savers or labor savers. And fully in tune with these we have an outline of history, an outline of science, and now an outline of literature.

* * * * *

AS one contemplates these volumes it is all too evident that this business of outlining is only at its beginning. The Drifter is confident that all the main branches of human knowledge, all the great divisions into which thought can be marked off, will presently have their outlines. What worries him is that some of the side paths may be overlooked.

* * * * *

AS if in answer to this very point, the following letter was left on the Drifter's doorstep by his favorite and only postman: "Dear Sir:" it said, "I can furnish you with all information on cookery in every branch for every age, yet brief and to the point. Would you know how the great Roman Empire ate fish, or how long the Spartans boiled their spinach? Are you curious about the sandwiches eaten by Saint Augustine in the small hours after a day of fasting, and what do you suppose was in Martin Luther's inkwell when he tasted it and then threw it at the Devil? The seventeenth-century pastry, the eighteenth-century meat pudding, the nineteenth-century boiled potato, and the thoroughly modern strawberry shortcake are all described, analyzed, and prepared for digestion by you in my marvelous work, 'An Outline of the World's Cookery.' Buy Volume I today and you will never regret it."

* * * * *

THIS extraordinary document, which the Drifter would not vouch for in any court of law, set his mind completely at rest. Outlines of the more delectable things of life are evidently not to be lacking. He can imagine sitting down with joy to the perusal of an outline of costumes, with the inevitable fascinating pictures (all outlines have them); or of crime, where the pictures would probably crowd out the text; or of university presidents, whose pictures would not be so essential; or of sports, where beautiful Greek maidens playing ball would vie with beautiful California young men playing tennis. Quite irresistible would be an outline of leisure, with every different way of wasting time catalogued and diagrammed, with all the lazy boyhoods of great men set down, and all the priceless booksellers' lists, and the useless carpentry, and the ways of cleaning pipes and painting boats that really make life worth living.

* * * * *

THE Drifter has long been in favor of subsidies for indigent authors. He would doubly favor such aids in the case of a writer of outlines. Unfortunately he will never have time to compile one himself. In the first place he is too busy reading the outlines already written: and besides he is occupied with a greater work. When it is finished it will be worthy, he hopes, to stand by the best that has gone before. Seventeen volumes it will be, all bound in bright red cloth with a modest title in gold: "An Outline of the World's Outlines," by THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Letters to the Editor should ordinarily not exceed 400 words, and shorter communications are more likely to be printed. In any case the Editor reserves the right to abridge communications.

Oklahoma Talks Back

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The article on Oklahoma in the issue of The Nation for July 11 contains so many distortions of fact and errors of judgment that it should not be permitted to pass unnoticed and unchallenged.

"The theft by night of the State papers . . . by automobile bandits." The capital was changed from Guthrie to Oklahoma City in an election legally called and participated in by all qualified electors of the State. The seal of the State and archives were removed by C. N. Haskell, who was Governor of the State at that time. He has never before been referred to as an "automobile bandit." Neither did the Supreme Court of the State find anything nefarious in this act.

"The indictment of a governor," etc. The governor referred to appeared before a court of competent jurisdiction and the case was dismissed. Does The Nation reverse the ordinary process of American law and assume that the accused is always guilty until he establishes his innocence?

"There was coal to be mined near El Reno, Oklahoma City, and Guthrie." If Comrade Rascoe can point out the exact location of coal mines within fifty miles of any one of the aforementioned cities, he will be conferring a great favor upon those communities.

The statements of Comrade Rascoe in regard to the banking system of the State are correct in so far as he gives Oklahoma credit for good banking laws; his other assertions are childish and puerile. The depositors are made up of the same kind of people as those who make up the clientele of similar banks in other States. The bankers of Oklahoma make their living in the same way that the bankers of Yonkers or Albany eke out their livelihood.

"A State young and unpopulous"—We refer you to the United States Census for 1920: Nebraska, 1,296,372; New York, 10,385,227; Oklahoma, 2,028,283; Kansas, 1,769,257; Iowa, 2,404,021; Indiana, 2,930,390; Colorado, 939,629; Maine, 768,014; Michigan, 3,668,412; Minnesota, 2,387,125.

One gathers that all the bright young men are leaving the State. Witness the case of Comrade Rascoe. "The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away." We must bear up. Oklahoma does not have a larger percentage than any other State of Sunday-school superintendents who go wrong; its bootleggers are only as corrupt as those of other States.

I have been in, around, and on practically every Indian reservation in the State of Oklahoma. The Indians of this State were not inclosed in stockades in this State at any time for any purpose. If it had been necessary it would have been done. Your neighbor in Oklahoma may be an Indian. He may be a graduate of Carlisle. He may be very wealthy and he may even pass as of pure white blood. It is possible to travel hundreds of miles in Oklahoma and never see the Indian blanket. In that travel you will be safer than on Michigan Avenue in Chicago.

There is no essential difference between life in Oklahoma and life in Evanston, Kokomo, South Bend, except that life in Oklahoma is safer.

Norman, Oklahoma, July 18 JESSE LEE RADER

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is generally conceded that a country can safely be judged by its women; therefore, I state to you that Oklahoma is just under New York and California in its number of branches of the American Association of University Women. We have women poets, writers, artists, and musicians of national fame—not counting the finest womanhood in general that any State can boast of.

You evidently failed to observe that an Oklahoma girl—Nellie Marita Miller, of Oklahoma City—won the National Pianist Contest held in June by the National Federation of Music Clubs, Illinois and California following. Last year Mildred Davis, of Guthrie, Oklahoma, won second place in a similar contest, under a New York man of twenty-eight who had toured Europe in concert. Fine arts couldn't possibly be developed to this extent under conditions as reported in your article.

Our national resources compare most favorably with those of the best States in our United States of America. As a rose State we rank with any; and as for our classification in oil—ask the Standard, which is trying to gobble the State.

Your Rascoe must have gotten into an ex-Texan's or Arkansas farmer's shack and enjoyed so much the diet of "corn bread, salt pork, and sorghum molasses" that he refers to that he remained and went no further.

Chicago, July 16 SUSAN B. SCOTT

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Perhaps you would be interested in the following extract from a letter from my sister, Mrs. Florence Phin, now in Oklahoma:

> No doubt you read the article on Oklahoma in a recent issue of The Nation. You can scarcely imagine the furor it has created. Feeling ranges from furious rage through surprise and indignation to wounded hearts. You can't pick up a local paper without seeing some reference to it in the editorial column, correspondents' corner, or funny page. I venture to say that Mr. Burton Rascoe's name is on the black list of the Ku Klux Klan, and that in the future it would be safer for him to travel around Oklahoma than through it.
>
> The State Historian has written an open letter, characterizing the article in The Nation as a tissue of unmitigated lies and scandalous libel—so everything's all serene once more.

New York, July 31 SOLON DE LEON

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Overnight the name of Burton Rascoe has become as famous in Oklahoma as that of Henry Starr, the bank bandit. Rotarians, Lions, Civitans, Chambers of Commerce, Kiwanis, Elks, Oowahs, Laff-a-lots, Joy de Vies, Ku Kluxers—all across the State there has risen a mighty howl of rage from the regimented Babbitts over the publication in The Nation of Mr. Rascoe's recent article on the Sooner State. Speakers have been sent out from the Oklahoma City Chamber of Commerce to "blow up that Rascoe boy" and sell Oklahoma to its citizens. The most successful have been the press agent for the Bell telephone company and the local head of a mortgage-loan society. Summed up, the refutations of Mr. Rascoe's comment on the socio-economic condition of Oklahoma run as follows:

"Rascoe should be called Boscoe, the Barnum wild man."

"Oklahoma City has 21.6 telephones to every 100 citizens, which is more than there are in New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, or Passyak (sic), New Jersey."

"The investment of the Bell Telephone Company in Oklahoma City comes to $4,000,000. There are three exchanges in town and the company employs more than a thousand men and women."

"Rascoe must wear a black, flowing tie."

"Rascoe is afraid to come out here and live because he hasn't got the spirit of the pioneers that built up this glorious State of ours."

"Young girls in New York smoke cigarettes and two years ago there was a hold-up in the Hotel Astor in broad daylight."

When the speeches are concluded, a vote of thanks is invariably extended to Mr. Rascoe for giving the people of the State an opportunity to find out that they are living in the "best city in the best State in the Union."

Silent amid this indignant outburst are the men and women of the Farmer-Labor Reconstruction League, the progressive organization that elected Governor Walton last fall. They realize all too well the force of Mr. Rascoe's indictment. It was against the mortgage-loan societies, the oil interests, the landlords, the gamblers in wheat and real estate that the League campaigned. Today the League members are grimly watching the victorious return of their defeated foes of last autumn. Their newspaper, the Oklahoma Leader, is being driven to the wall by the withdrawal of advertising patronage, the bankruptcy of farmer subscribers, the successful tactics of the Open Shoppers. The Governor on whom they had pinned their faith is turning Farmer-Labor men out of office every day. He is parading around the State accompanied by a retinue of military men assuring the business men that his opinions of radicals are "unprintable." The Klan, which took to cover at Walton's election, is out again with public ceremonies attended by 30,000 people in Oklahoma City. Independent oil men are having their runs pro-rated by the Standard and their crude prices cut daily. Tenant-farmers, unable to keep body and soul together at the present price of wheat, are drifting aimlessly about in covered wagons. Coal miners are rapidly becoming vagrants.

But Rascoe's a liar, God's in His Heaven, and there are 21.6 telephone subscribers to every 100 citizens in Oklahoma City.

Oklahoma City, July 21 MCALISTER COLEMAN

The West Virginia Article

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Cain seems to have overlooked the State motto: "Montani semper liberi," which, I am told, is carved, with no attempt at humor, over the State penitentiary at Moundsville. The motto has an ironical sound also when one thinks of the situation in the embattled coal fields.

And though I take issue with the statement that "culture is at a standstill," I well remember hearing a governor say in an address that the "duties of a governor is ard-i-ous" while declaiming on the virtues of "this commonwealth of West Virginny."

Chicago, June 29 FRANCES KLEIN VINER

Leipzig's Need

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Leipzig Handels-Hochschule is founding a Weltwirtschafts-Institut. In view of the difficulty of supplying its library under the present exchange conditions, we hope that some of your readers will find it possible to send newspapers, magazines, books, pamphlets, and statistical publications to us.

We hope later to invite foreign economists to lecture. At present we can pay for such privileges only the trifling sum current in Germany. If American economists coming to Germany or their friends would inform us, we should be glad to have them speak under our auspices.

Leipzig, June 1 ERNST SCHULTZE, Rector

Contributors to This Issue

SAMUEL DANZIGER, recently connected with the Veterans' Bureau, has made a first-hand study of the problems of disabled ex-service men.

HOWARD VINCENT O'BRIEN is a native of Illinois. His most recent book is "Trodden Gold."

COUNT HARRY KESSLER, formerly German Minister to Poland, is a leader of the Democratic Party.

HUBERT C. HERRING is the pastor of the United Church of Wichita, Kansas.

Books

Damaged Souls

Damaged Souls. By Gamaliel Bradford. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

IT was characteristic of the editor of a popular magazine to suggest to Mr. Bradford that he should undertake a series of "iconoclastic portraits" in which he should go back through our national history and select prominent figures who have loomed overlarge in their own day and have shone with a false glory. "Of course," wrote the editor, "in dealing with such a gallery we should expect you to proceed ruthlessly and with scant deference to tradition." It was equally characteristic of Mr. Bradford that he should reply that the suggestion made "a fascinating appeal to the worst elements in his nature" and that he should make the counter-proposal of "a group of somewhat discredited figures" whom he would not attempt to rehabilitate or whitewash but whom he would so probe and examine as to bring out their real humanity and to show that they possessed something of the same strength and weakness as all of us. For, as Mr. Bradford justly remarks, in every character that he has portrayed his effort has been to find the good rather than the evil. It must be added that in some of those that are grouped together in his latest volume of portraits "the soul of goodness in things evil" lies far below the surface. The first five subjects of his inquiry are worthy of his deft sympathy; the last two—Phineas Taylor Barnum and Benjamin Franklin Butler—are hardly subjects for such nice treatment, for Barnum's was not the sort of soul that could sustain serious damage and Butler's was too much patched and mauled to make the effort of repair worth while. Of Barnum we learn that he hugely enjoyed life, and of Butler that his wife loved him. After reading these two studies in biography one is tempted to commend Mr. Horatio Bottomley to Mr. Bradford's attention.

But the portraitist's finest art has gone into the other studies. The gallantry and pathos of Benedict Arnold perhaps appeal to him most of all; but the unquenchable joie de vivre and the Casanova-like amours and romantic flittings of Aaron Burr afford material for picturesque narrative, while in both these cases the devoted love of noble women (unless women can be at once noble and blind) gives testimony to the hidden worth within these so discredited personalities. At all events there can be no question of the extent and seriousness of the damage to these two souls. When we come to Thomas Paine and John Randolph and John Brown we find an element of strength or of grandeur or at least (in the case of Paine) of positive and important achievement that renders the damage of comparatively little moment. I do not think that any of these three men can fairly be called "discredited."

It is of course absurd to say, as Mr. Mencken has said in an appreciation of Mr. Bradford which has been widely circulated by canny publishers, that Mr. Bradford "invented the formula of Lytton Strachey's" studies in biography. One need not enter into debate on the relative value of the American's and the Englishman's work; if Mr. Bradford is more mellow, Mr. Strachey is more witty, and years may supply him with the mellowness while, meantime, wit is a good thing. But of course neither writer "invented the formula." It is present in Sainte-Beuve's causeries. There are suggestions of it in the eighteenth-century theory of "the ruling passion." Clarendon practiced it. Indeed there is something of it in Plutarch. But there are qualities quite as excellent as originality; and few writers have applied this formula of careful inquiry into the hidden motives of the heart and of nice adjustment and balancing of evidence with more wisdom and more humaneness than has Mr. Gamaliel Bradford. SAMUEL C. CHEW

The Second Empire

Louis Napoleon and the Recovery of France. By F. A. Simpson. Longmans, Green and Company. $6.

OWING to the progress of research and the shift in perspective, contemporary history usually needs revising as soon as passions have cooled. A notable illustration is afforded by the career of Louis Napoleon, whom until a generation ago most historians either scornfully decried or praised unduly. It was only in the late nineties that moderate appreciations of the Second Empire began to appear. To be sure, Ollivier, while generally reliable, is frankly apologetic. La Gorce, on the contrary, occasionally does Napoleon III injustice, especially in considering relations with the church. Although Mr. Simpson stands for unbiased liberalism, his "Rise of Louis Napoleon" (1909) revealed him as entirely fair to the conspiring prince.

The present sequel, covering the period from 1848 to the Congress of Paris in 1856, exhibits similar impartiality, but is broader in scope. For in the light of documents hitherto unavailable, Louis Napoleon's struggles after 1848 emerge, not as the Utopian schemes for which on their morrow they were dismissed, but as events fraught with consequences of supreme importance to Europe. Without the aid of this crowned champion the unorthodox cause of nationalism could not have achieved its triumphs. Thus the enigmatic Napoleon III, even though neglected at home for his overshadowing uncle, well deserves the attention of foreign historians. Says Mr. Simpson: "No other ruler of France—none perhaps of any European country—was so cosmopolitan in his training and outlook. None certainly was less French. Essentially he was an international figure: too good a citizen of Europe to be the ultimately successful ruler of any one country in it."

True, owing to his precarious power under the regime of 1848, the Prince President's cosmopolitanism at first remained latent. According to his conviction, it was only as emperor that he could reopen the Treaty of Vienna and deliver the nationalities oppressed by Metternich and Nicholas. So "the man of December" must first consolidate his power by a revision of the constitution of 1848. But that masterpiece of stupidity, so framed by ideologists as to force upon France a republican form of government, made a revision impossible. Mr. Simpson affirms that no single cause has done so much to obscure the history of the Second Empire as the failure of historians to read this entangled document. After three years of vain attempts to unravel the entanglement, Louis, "still a liberal at heart," cut through it by a coup d'état.

Criminal as was this step, Mr. Simpson thinks it justifiable in principle, since France yearned for some means of averting the dreaded crisis due the next year. While naturally refusing to condone the indiscriminate fusillade upon non-combatants and the deportations, he asserts that English condemnation of the coup d'état was based on a very imperfect knowledge of the facts.

Firmly established in power, Napoleon III could tackle broad questions, domestic and foreign. His constructive decrees promoting agriculture, industry, and commerce brought France unprecedented prosperity. On the other hand, education and the intellectual life did not flourish. Nor had the Roman expedition satisfied either party, because the President wavered between a radical and a conservative policy. But the event revived Louis's dream of liberating Italy, a project delayed by the conflict with Russia.

Various accusations charging Napoleon III with responsibility for the Crimean War are disproved by Mr. Simpson. True, the apostle of nationalism was eager to protect the threatened principalities against Russia. But when England refused to fight on for Polish independence, he quickly accepted peace. Napoleon III apparently entered the conflict chiefly to cement the alliance with England. Yet no sooner had France emerged from it as the first continental Power than Albion began to fear her. Nor, English support lacking, were the Emperor's hopes regarding the nationalities realized at the Congress of Paris. To crown misfortune, his cosmopolitan aberrations on this occasion formed the ominous prelude to a series of services which in the next ten years he was spontaneously to render to the champions of new Italy and new Germany.

However, it was through diplomacy that Louis Napoleon had at first hoped to achieve his aims. Thus he is shown by Mr. Simpson to have been, in the first month of his presidency, the author of the most drastic proposal for the limitation of naval armaments ever put forward by the head of any nation. But England, needless to say, would not consider the suggestion. Equally futile was his appeal in 1849 for an international congress to deal with problems that threatened the peace of Europe.

All his life Louis Napoleon oscillated between semi-socialist inclinations and a cult of discipline, his one conviction being that liberty could not found, but only crown, the political edifice. Mr. Simpson characterizes him as a ruler by instinct generous to a fault, humane to the verge of weakness. "Former governments," the Emperor used to say, "tried to reign by the support of one million of the educated classes. I have tried to reach the other twenty-nine." But in bringing the other twenty and nine from the wilderness he lost the one million that really mattered. For that one outraged million embodied nearly all the political and diplomatic experience of France. As our historian says, it was the tragedy of the reign that the Emperor's illness allowed him just time enough to acquire the strongest hand in Europe, and then intervened to disable him from playing it even tolerably.

Evidently Mr. Simpson has challenged not a few current opinions regarding Louis Napoleon. He apparently believes that certain self-styled impartial historians have shielded the French republics and slandered the Second Empire. Frequently, however, his convictions are based on documents not hitherto utilized. If from the French point of view he judges too leniently the naive cosmopolitan of Napoleon III, this is probably because, after all, he wishes there had been other visionary champions of the oppressed nationalities. Be this as it may, for substance, lucidity, and felicity of epithet his "Louis Napoleon" is an unusual achievement. A penetrating analyst, a logical thinker, a dispassionate critic, Mr. Simpson brings to his subject the most convincing evidence yet presented.

WILLIAM H. SCHEIFLEY

Translations from the Danish and Swedish

A Book of Danish Verse. Translated by F. Foster Damon and Robert Hillyer. The American-Scandinavian Foundation. $2.
Selected Short Stories. By Per Hallström. Translated by F. J. Fielden. The American-Scandinavian Foundation. $2.

WHO reads translated poetry, particularly the lyrics of a bygone age, with large expectations is foreordained to some disappointment. It is like opening a jar of rose leaves culled long ago in forgotten gardens: the petals are crumpled, the color well-nigh lost and the fragrance faint. Danish verse is generally too fragile, too unmittelbar and naive to make a brave impression in other than native garb. Even the ruggedness of some of the lines, like those by Grundtvig, becomes mere verbal humpiness in the attempted English transmutation.

The implication is not that the translators have essayed a most difficult task in an indifferent manner. They have perhaps done as well as possible with an inherently unplastic material. The selections capably represent the best of Danish poetry from the early to modern times. Denmark has never been rich in poets and surely does not count many who can be acclaimed great. It may be said not disparagingly that most of the writers of Danish verse have been homey and comfy persons with an enduring and endearing if not always very discriminating love of the native heath, and no greater tinge of northern melancholy and seriousness than their deep and somber beechwoods that fringe smiling seas.

Per Hallström is at his best in the short story and ranks high. Why compare him with Maupassant or any other writer? Being a Swede, it is natural that most things he writes, and he has been prolific in novels, plays and poems as well as in stories, should be "touched by an all-pervading lyricism, for that belongs to the genius of the literature of his country." But he is more than a lyricist. Let him explain himself: "Here, as in the world of reality, the universe reechoes in the individual fate, hangs upon it by a thousand slender threads. The drama is not isolated upon a stage, it moves past like a stream, where wind and waves come from far and have farther yet to go."

Fortunately, the translator, in selecting the stories, has largely chosen tales with a Swedish setting that give one a breath from Hallström's wonderful surroundings in nature, for he conveys it in words with a masterhand. But he is at home in many fields; and in A Secret Idyll, a charmingly pathetic tale of the French Revolution, one recognizes the romantic countryman of Count Axel Fersen. The American-Scandinavian Foundation has put us under new obligations by making this verse and prose accessible to American readers.

JOHN KOREN

Wide-Awake Dreamers

The History of Utopian Thought. By Joyce Oramel Hertzler, Ph.D. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THAT Mr. Hertzler is a clever writer as well as an excellent historian is well proved by the fact that even while impressing his readers with his unquestionable knowledge of the subject under discussion he forestalls their naturally pugnacious barriers toward an authority by being open to argument. He is not afraid of the qualifying phrase, nor does he think that by admitting that a point at issue is largely a matter of opinion he thereby belittles his position. Taking the Utopians from their literary pigeonhole of impossible idealism he places them in their logical position in the evolution of sociological thought and civilized government.

He begins with Amos, about the middle of the eighth century B.C., and, briefly taking up five other Hebrew prophets, he comes down through the Apocalyptists to the Kingdom of God as seen by Jesus. Thus, instead of beginning with Plato, as another writer on Utopians might do, Mr. Hertzler starts with the foundations of idealistic social thought put down in writing. Then he comes to Plato (whom he calls the father of idealism in philosophy) and the early modern Utopians, such as More and Bacon, and so on to the Utopian Socialists of the last two centuries, mostly French, and including such remarkable pioneers as Morelly and Fourier. Finally, with the recent pseudo-Utopias, including such works as Bellamy's "Looking Backward" and H. G. Wells's "Modern Utopia," he finishes the first part of his book, which is actually about five-sixths of it.

But Mr. Hertzler does not simply repeat what the individual Utopians wrote, or show how they differed from each other; he gives a brief biographical sketch of each (and here it is interesting to note that most of them spent some part of their lives in prison and a number were put to death), he connects each one with the society of his time, shows the effect of his environment on his writings, and the probable effect of his writings upon future societies.

The second part of the book is an analysis and critique of social Utopias and Utopians. Mr. Hertzler makes these idealists live as real human beings (and surely they must have been alive in order to be put to death), instead of phantoms of a pleasant but impossible social nowhere. He shows their unquestionable importance in the history of social evolution and makes the materialistic masses look rather stupid, even from a practical point of view, for having lightly passed them up for so many centuries. He says of them: "The Utopians are only 'dreamers' in the sense that such is a popular description of any man who is wide awake and a hundred years or so ahead of his time."

And, having lifted the curse from their weary heads and wiped the patronizing smirk from our complacent countenances, he immediately and nimbly jumps to the other side and dims the idolatrous light that is beginning to kindle in our eyes by calling attention to their shortcomings. He logically points out that the inevitability of social change renders any static society, however perfect and desirable, practically impossible. So the Utopians swing down from their brief pedestal and come to a standstill in the half-idealistic and half-human but extremely important position where they belong in the history of social progress.

Unfortunately Mr. Hertzler's book will not, in all probability, be widely read. He has not stooped to patronize the public by talking baby-talk to them, he does not hide behind a sugar-coating of sentimental moralizings. It is not a book to lie in a hammock and read through in one lazy summer afternoon, but a book that might make a person think—and that is disastrous for its popularity. While it is an excellent piece of work from a literary standpoint, it is also, of course, historical and political. But, since it is literary, the politicians will have nothing to do with it, and, since it is political, the literati will have none of it, and since it is historical, few will even consider it.

KATHLEEN MILLAY

The Government and the Worker

The Government—Strikebreaker. By Jay Lovestone. The Workers Party of America. $1.

"FOUR years of American history through the eyes of a Marxist" would be a very fair title for this study of the class struggle in the United States. The book carries a real contribution, for it is a collection of facts by a radical author and publisher, selected and commented upon by those very persons against whom the full vigor of the Department of Justice is now being directed.

The author begins with a statement of the labor policy of the government during the war, and a summary of the promises that were made to the workers when the life of the republic seemed to be threatened. He then traces the position of the authorities in the textile, mine, and the railway-shop strikes to prove his contention that the government is America's strike-breaker-in-chief. Following two chapters on the use of the injunction in labor disputes there are a number of sections devoted to the army, employers' associations, and the press. The conclusion of the whole matter is that the so-called American democracy is in reality a capitalist dictatorship. There is nothing new in this conclusion. It is unusual, however, to have the issue so well presented by a radical writer.

Despite an unfortunate reliance on the Congressional Record, and a somewhat too frequent quotation from the Labor Herald, the study is a really noteworthy presentation of the social problem, with an astonishingly small amount of bias, and a very praiseworthy evidence of diligent research. Occasionally there is a relapse into the style of the soap-boxer, with such phrases as "truth yells for help" and "jail and the gallows for hundreds of strikers." Such slips are exceptional, however, and the student of current events will want to read very carefully this exposition of class rule in the United States.

Perhaps the book would have been stronger if the author had begun with the steel strike of 1919. Certainly he should have given credit to the workers in the needle trades, and particularly to the Amalgamated Clothing Workers for their spectacular stand against the union-smashing campaign of the bosses. Then, too, the case is a bit overstated. The government is not really the strike-breaker, but a combination police department, sanitary squad, and propaganda bureau for the vested interests. However, these are minor matters of opinion. The major fact is the diligent collection and clear presentation of a very large number of salient industrial and social facts in a low-priced, readable form. Dollar books are almost as rare nowadays as dollar dinners. Both the author and the publishers are to be congratulated upon their ability to talk English at popular prices.

SCOTT NEARING

On the Trail of Pickwick

Dickensian Inns and Taverns. By B. W. Matz. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

AT last the auto has been found worthy! Impossible, will protest the pauper pedestrian, whose eyes have become crossed and legs four-directioned in frantic attempts to escape the charging demons of the city streets. But his disclaimers must be overruled. The soft-footed god of the machine has saved the English coaching inn from extinction, extinction all but consummated by the unaesthetic railroad. Is it not worth the occasional fracture of a rib by a drunken taxicab driver to know that somewhere, even though the land be across the seas, Three Jolly Bachelors Inn signs again creak joyously in the spring wind, inns where one meal consisted of two little salmon trout, a sirloin steak, a brace of partridges, seven dishes of meats, five dishes of dessert led off by a bowl of peaches, and cake? Taverns where for turtle soup "turtles were kept alive in huge vats, and as many as two tons were seen swimming in the vat at one time." Who of a cafeteried generation, elbow-frayed from the iron-wood seats of the one-armed, can read without a sigh?

For glimpses such as these he who turns the pages of "Dickensian Inns and Taverns" is grateful. But the glimpses are too few. Moreover, humor is too much absent. Were Matz writing of Milton, Macaulay, or Kant Inns and Taverns, the pin-and-chart method he here employs might be appropriate. Dickens hostelries, however, antithesis of the scientific, demand the pen of a man who laughs heartily upon every slightest occasion; a man sitting in front of a chuckling fire, and smoking, preferably a fat man. With this volume ensues a feeling that the author is cold, tobaccoless, and thin. To the pilgrim who would go along Nicholas Nickleby highroads, or sleep in Davy Copperfield beds, the volume is invaluable. Infinite research is evident in the effort to identify in fact, where only the slightest fictional clue is given. But the writer has followed his Dickens with a mathematician and a square rule instead of some jovial village bumpkin and a mug of ale.

BEN LUCIEN BURMAN

Lytton Strachey's Encore

Landmarks in French Literature. By Lytton Strachey. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

IN the differences between the formats of the original Home University Library edition of this work, published in 1912 and then sold for 50 cents a copy, and the present handsome volume, one may measure the distance traversed by Lytton Strachey toward popular esteem. Lytton Strachey, critic, was obliged to wait for the almost turbulent receptions his biographical works received to make his name coin current on the critical exchange, although this book, published in 1912, foreshadowed every excellence of his later work, particularly that of impaling complex qualities on a phrase. The Who's Who (London) of 1920, the compilation of which proceeded long after the publication of "Landmarks in French Literature" and the brilliant essays that now form "Books and Characters," ignored Mr. Strachey, not counting even his baronial ancestry in his favor, but "Queen Victoria" and "Eminent Victorians," forcing lifted eyebrows everywhere, made precious every morsel concerning this rare student and writer.

This volume, as well as "Books and Characters," bears eloquent testimony to Mr. Strachey's profound absorption and delight in French letters, biography and history. His essays on Racine and Stendhal in "Books and Characters" are rated as the first truly appreciative studies, by a foreigner, of Frenchmen honored in their own country, yet not appraised at their true value across the Channel. He writes of those Frenchmen and every other in the critical chronology contained in the volume under notice with the intimacy and aplomb of a native guide, recalling Arthur Symons in the intensity of his interest in French life and letters. With Symons he shares the distinction of being so remarkably bilingual that he might be taken as easily for a Frenchman in a Paris salon as for the Englishman he is in his native country-side.

For one who loves English literature deeply and understands it with discernment uncommon to the mere amateur, this volume is a triumph. Here we find placed, in intelligible relationship with each other and with the times in which they created, the hosts of French poets, essayists, novelists, dramatists and even philosophers. One must know thoroughly to be able to summarize with the aptness which Strachey always employs. His phrases are delectable, but they are used, not to sweeten stale judgments, but to give force to iconoclast conclusions. "Montaigne was neither a great artist nor a great philosopher; he was not great at all"; his reflections were superficial and insignificant before "the tremendous introspection of Rousseau." Referring to Racine's medium, he writes that that poet soared in shackles; Hugo possessed "the powers of a great genius and the soul of an ordinary man"; Voltaire's style is "like a rapier —all point"; Flaubert is at once the heir of, and the antithesis to, Balzac, while Dumas, the beloved Dumas, is mentioned only as "among those present."

HARRY SALPETER

From the Soil

Stonecrop. By Cécile Tormay. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.

WITH the succession of generations that look upon cities as natural phenomena, books as well as people have grown away from the land. The cry "Back to Nature!" seems forced and artificially romantic. Nevertheless, to a public accustomed to novels that specialize in the consideration of human conduct and present only glimpses of nature such as may be seen from a car window, a story rooted in the soil is invigorating. A smothered but persistent instinct tells us that we are dependent on the soil, and any tale which makes us feel, even temporarily, the powerful influence it still exerts, stabilizes us—although only in imagination—and refreshes us.

The title of Cécile Tormay's new book symbolizes not only the story but the book itself: it is as if hewn from the Croatian mountains. Like a piece of sculpture it epitomizes them; it is molded of their substance and preserves their rugged outlines. The tragedy is stark and unadorned save by the appeal and strength of the heroine. Her life has no incidents; it is a period of purely instinctive existence broken by a few drastic changes. Her long lonely wanderings among the great forests that foster an inborn love for the overhanging wild mountains; the contempt bestowed upon her by the hamlet in which she lives; her distressed longing for her mother, and the horror at her death; her dull marriage to the elderly track-walker; her primitive, untamed, subversive passion that at last, inevitably, ends her unhappiness with death—these are the materials of the story.

To convey the inarticulate simplicity of the characters demands, not a like untutored mode of utterance on the part of the author, but a difficult technique severely used to remove all marks of sophistication and deliberately to imitate, but at the same time to shape, the original innocence of expression. Miss Tormay has perfected this technique; not only does she picture the force and vivid color of the mountains and of the girl who lives on them, but she endows them with a beauty that is entirely of her own creating. Her prose is restrained even in crises, dramatic even in descriptions; it reproduces crude majesties of nature and glorifies them by its mellowness; and whatever is tender in that harsh scenery, whatever is especially womanly in the beautiful child of the mountains, it turns into quiet and memorable lyrics.

EVA GOLDBECK

A Torch in the Dark

The Light Which Cannot Fail. By Winifred Holt. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.50.

LET a man close his eyes trying to imagine himself blind; and though he try never so hard he cannot even appreciate the reality. For the condition of blindness is without doubt far blacker and far brighter than what even I, though many years closely associated with blind people, can appreciate, since like most people I can by wishing open my eyes and see again with all that this means. However, I will hazard this generalization: the chief handicap of the blind is not their blindness but the attitude of the world toward them. This attitude varies all the way from that of David who refers to them as "the hated of my soul," to that of the extreme sentimentalist concerning whom Miss Holt writes under the caption Cupid Makes Havoc: "The first French blinded soldiers of the war were literally deluged with offers of marriage."

It is mainly to guide people to think and act sanely and therefore happily toward the blind that this "Keeper of the Light" has written her book. Any reader of it who approaches it sympathetically and with open mind must perceive that the author counsels wisely because she is herself wisely though deeply sympathetic. She tells many beautiful stories and she tells them well. The reader need not fear constant appeal to the emotions, but can rise from the book refreshed and invigorated, holding a new conception of what blindness may mean, and perhaps entertaining a desire to share in ameliorating it, surely in preventing it.

"The Light Which Cannot Fail" consists both of true tales and incidents, showing what and how the properly lighted torch can illumine and reveal unsuspected reserves in human strength under tragic circumstances, and of a handbook for the blind and their friends. There is also an appendix of memorable letters. A librarian might classify it all under Re-education of the Blinded; but it is more than that: it is, as already indicated, a message of hope and encouragement, having for its theme not only alleviation of the greatest burden of the blind but also what is fundamental, arousing interest in the prevention of blindness itself. It is beautifully printed. Read parts or all of it, and recommend it to your friends.

EDWARD E. ALLEN

The Originator of the Monroe Doctrine

The Personal Genesis of the Monroe Doctrine. By William A. MacCorkle, LL.D., D.C.L. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

EVER since Mr. Worthington C. Ford, in a paper read before the Massachusetts Historical Society in 1902, adduced evidence drawn from the papers of John Quincy Adams tending to show that Adams, and not Monroe, was the essential originator of the Monroe doctrine, historical students have been inclined to accept Mr. Ford's conclusions as final. It is true that the chain of evidence was not complete, since memoranda by Adams for the period from September 11 to November 7, 1823, just before Monroe's message was sent to Congress, were lacking, but what remained seemed at least to indicate a joint authorship of the doctrine, so far as Monroe's statement of it was concerned, in which Adams was to be credited with the larger share.

Mr. MacCorkle has come to the defense of Monroe in a book which, if no more conclusive than Mr. Ford's paper, is fairly to be accorded equal weight. Writing with no attempt to belittle either Adams or Mr. Ford, Mr. MacCorkle undertakes to clear Monroe of the charge of natural timidity which historians have been disposed to make, and of the further charge that his views, prior to the promulgation of the Monroe Doctrine, were not consonant with the vigorous phraseology of the doctrine itself. The imputation of timidity may be regarded as disposed of so far as argument drawn mainly from inference can serve. A man who, as Mr. MacCorkle points out, filled more important offices, in an ascending series, than have ever been held by any other American public man—member of the Virginia Assembly, of the Federal House of Representatives and of the Senate, and an officer in the army, twice governor of Virginia, minister to England, France, and Spain, member of the executive council of Virginia, of two State constitutional conventions, and president of the State convention of 1820, twice secretary of state, secretary of war, and in the War of 1812 practically secretary of the treasury, and twice president of the United States—is hardly entitled to be characterized as timid even if his record was not in any case one of great personal initiative or distinction.

The case for Monroe's attitude toward European relations with America, and his personal responsibility for the formulation of the doctrine which bears his name, turns upon the interpretation of scattered passages in his letters and messages. The evidence which Mr. MacCorkle adduces is too extensive and detailed to be examined here. The passages which he cites, however, go to show that Monroe was not at all unmindful of the danger to the United States of European encroachment, especially in South America, and that on several occasions prior to November, 1823, he expressed himself in no uncertain terms in opposition to European meddling. That his declarations at this point were hardly more than a reiteration of a policy whose origin goes back to the beginning of the republic may, indeed, be urged, but the argument applies with as much force to Adams as it does to Monroe. One puts down the book with a fairly clear impression that the famous message of 1823 stated in forcible language, at the psychological moment, an historical policy which neither Monroe nor Adams originated; that the formal statements of the message were a summary of views already expressed in Adams's communication to Rush, the American minister at London, which Monroe himself had revised, and in letters which had been exchanged between Monroe, Jefferson, and Madison, and that the credit for the formulation and announcement of the doctrine in the November message is, accordingly, an honor in which both Monroe and Adams are entitled to participate.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Treatise or Novel

After All. By George F. Hummel. Boni and Liveright. $2.

HAD the subject of this work been less vital and less absorbing Mr. Hummel would undoubtedly have achieved a better novel, for, as yet, he has not the power of H. G. Wells to make a pièce à thèse fascinating. His thesis is tremendously interesting; his writing astoundingly crude even for a first novel. Though there can be no question of the heartfelt sincerity with which he seeks to present the troubles of matrimony, there is grave doubt whether he realizes the difference between a novel and a Miltonian tractate.

After all, an author must decide whether he intends to write a treatise or a novel. He who has the courage to choose the latter bids farewell to commonplace incidents and insignificant arguments however large they may be writ in his diary; he recognizes, moreover, that a plot and not a brief is the foundation of his structure. On the other hand, a novel differs from an extended lyric poem in that it does not permit a complete katharsis.

One could more admire Mr. Hummel's indifference to these prohibitions of the novel form if its results were greater. But to represent a college debate on the advisability of building the Panama Canal as the field of battle where the presence of the object of an illicit puppy-love inspires our hero to victory, to repeat this motif with equal seriousness in a chess game, is treading with sublime unconsciousness on Max Beerbohm's preserves.

In the domain of sex, however, the author marks off his own province. Boldly and simply he narrates the erotic adventures that, in a modified quantity, fall to the lot of Everyman. "Seulement, la réserve n'était pas son fait." Or, as his wife puts it when she refuses a reconciliation, "I have never been able to convince you of how you handicap your usefulness by your impatience with any kind of reticence." In fact, though he improves much after the first part, Mr. Hummel has painstakingly overwritten his story by one hundred and fifty pages; the remaining two hundred pages are richly worth reading.

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

Books in Brief

The Bridal Wreath. By Sigrid Undset. Translated from the Norwegian by C. Archer and J. S. Scott. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Sigrid Undset is a capable writer. She knows how to tell a tale engagingly, and her present narrative of Viking life in old Norway is entertaining enough. Yet "The Bridal Wreath" is not unusual in substance or in form and its technique is time honored. It is the type of book which, once read, is put on the shelves for good or taken off only to make room for another novel. That the ripples created by it in the vast ocean of novels should reach the shores of America is amazing.

The Eternal Masquerade. By H. Dennis Bradley. Boni and Liveright. $2.

The theme of Mr. H. Dennis Bradley's book is simple to the point of absurdity. Having read somewhat in English history and delved more or less into intimate accounts of the manners and customs of the various periods, he goes about proving that the dress of an age always reflects its spirit. He holds strictly to the symbolism of clothes, and has cribbed the general idea of "Sartor Resartus," patched it up here and there with remnants of satire filched from Anatole France, and wrapped the much-used and abused philosophy of Nietzsche about him for greater protection. The result is history written with the air of a dancing-master.

The Dream and Other Poems. By John Masefield. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

A slight volume, containing nothing that will substantially increase the reputation of Mr. Masefield. Only three poems, The Dream of Daniel, The Rider at the Gate, and The Racer, are above his average. The first is a philosophical piece, rather rich in atmosphere but inconclusive and ill-rhymed. The second is a Roman ballad. The third is a vigorous and entirely characteristic sonnet.

A Book of Love. Translated by Witter Bynner from the French of Charles Vildrac. With an Introductory Note by Emile Verhaeren. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

A modest and competent rendering of an honest and beautiful book. Some of the dignity and therefore some of the poetry of the original has been lost, but the loss was scarcely avoidable in translation. Mr. Bynner now and then is more familiar than Vildrac, and more sentimental. The love here celebrated is a man's delicate love for the world and all things in it, without regard to sex or station. Verhaeren's introduction is a masterpiece of unaffected analysis. Vildrac, he points out, has made us love not only the world he moves in but himself and ourselves too. That is the whole matter.

The Handling of Words. By Vernon Lee. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

Penetrating, concrete studies in the psychology of literary effectiveness. Genuinely illuminating for both the reader and the writer.

Music

The Renaissance of English Music in England

IT seems a curious commentary upon our prejudices and discernment that a people can struggle into musical independence before we are apparently even aware of the struggle. Yet something like this has been happening in England. We have been so absorbed in the revolts of those countries on which we have always depended for leadership that we have failed to notice a much deeper and farther reaching movement nearby. The rebirth of a nation into its musical heritage has been overlooked, probably because we have so long denied the existence of that heritage; and its early cries have been more or less lost in the tonal unrest that has been sweeping the musical world, because the making of new idioms is usually a more obtrusive process than the making of new music.

Not that England has escaped this unrest. The exhaustion imposed by the war was too general and too profound for that; and the sustained intensity of those years of conflict left her, as her fellow combatants, bereft of emotional resources. But where her continental neighbors were, for the time being, bankrupt in those passional impulses so essential to their art, England, who had always depended more upon this art itself than upon its mainsprings, was merely deprived of a ready-made stimulus rather than of a fundamental need. Her native inspirational sources were still practically untouched; for her three hundred years of Puritanism and superimposed culture had left her past almost as fresh as her present. As long as that culture was guided by some living genius, she had allowed that culture to dominate her. She had, indeed, been too long crushed into disbelief in her own powers to resist any active creative force her neighbors might impose. Now, however, that the latter, in lieu of such a force, had resorted to artificial expedients and restoratives, she had found herself, for the first time in centuries, without the leadership of the Continent. Its cerebral concoctions could only scratch the surface of her mind, and their past, though fabulous in wealth, could only penetrate, not possess, her.

And so, while the rest of Europe was following these experiments, and dividing itself into musical camps, England was gradually throwing off all allegiances. Her composers no longer tried to write like Brahms or Wagner or Debussy, and, better still, her public no longer demanded it. Old favorites remained old favorites. But along with these foreign masterpieces could be heard another music peculiarly native to British ears: madrigals and motets, passacaglias and sarabandes, songs once sung to virginals and lutes and sonatas made for harpsichord and spinet, eighteenth-century satire and twentieth-century symbolism, and quartets and trios, symphonies and operas based on Celtic tales and Arthurian legend and the environs that gave them birth. It was a music that had no kinship with either German romanticism, Russian idealism, French impressionism or Italian melodrama, but had its roots in the rich lyricism of Tudor England, and in the mystic elements of folklore and of Nature.

To the former belong the works of Gustav Holst and Vaughan Williams; to the latter, those of Arnold Bax and John Ireland. From the Elizabethans, Holst drew largely of those virtues which make his symphony, "The Planets," a distinctly English work. And so great an admirer is he of their choral works that he not only built his own noble "Hymn of Jesus" upon their traditions, but, busy man that he is, takes one night a week to teach them to a club of working men and women. Vaughan Williams has also sought inspiration at the same wells, but has used his more preciously, perhaps, to weave the complexities of city and cockney life into a "London Symphony."

On the other hand, Bax and Ireland have turned to the phenomena of Nature for their strength. Bax, particularly, has drunk deeply of the magic that dwells in the Land of the Shee—that lovely strip of western coast so identified with the Irish literary movement. Here he spent the impressionable years of his youth in company with that group of young poets and intellectuals later known as "the Dublin crowd," and, Englishman though he is, the mysticism he imbibed in this atmosphere has left him touched ever since with its Celtic fire and melancholy. John Ireland, too, has gathered a certain rugged power from the soil, but he is still too inarticulate to express himself other than thickly.

Of these four men, Holst and Bax undoubtedly stand foremost. The other two of England's "Six," Eugene Goossens and Arthur Bliss, are more important for their value to the movement itself than for the intrinsic worth of their works, for Goossens is too facile in his instrumental writing, and Bliss indulges too much in trivialities and experiments to accomplish more than surface results. Neither, as yet, has developed a full and striking musical physiognomy. Both are generous, however, in making propaganda for their colleagues.

On the whole, the distinguishing features of this movement have been the musical independence of its individual members, and the ever-widening support which is being given to British music, both new and old. Where Schoenberg has his "school," Satie his five disciples, Stravinsky his followers and imitators, these men in England are neither sitting at anyone's feet, nor having anyone sitting at their own. As Goossens has so aptly put it, "Each man is a god, not to, but in himself." And with the British composer in his efforts are the British artist, the British publisher, the British public, and the British critic. We find Arnold Bax's publishers presenting his works in recital, and a large and distinguished audience paying to hear them performed by British artists. We find a famous organization like the Birmingham Repertory Theater devoting its highest artistry to a musical work of Celtic symbolism, Rutland Boughton's "The Immortal Hour," and enjoying an unprecedented run for such a venture. And we find, too, a cooperative organization, the British National Opera Company, taking a certain financial risk by producing a modern English opera, "The Perfect Fool," by Holst, and meeting with instantaneous success. At the same time, with this satire and symbolism of twentieth-century Britain, the Golden Age of the Elizabethans and the delicious lyricism of eighteenth-century England have been vying for favor in concert hall and theater, as though this florescence of everything English in sound must go back to the seeds from which it sprang. It seems, indeed, that England has remembered that she was once a great musical country, and, in the remembering, has discovered that she can be one again.

HENRIETTA STRAUS

PERSONAL STATIONERY DE LUXE

Monte Carlo Special. Your name and address or monogram in our relief engraving (without plate or die), any color ink. Sheet 5½ x 8, white or grey.

100 double sheets or 200 single sheets
(100 marked—100 plain)
100 envelopes

$2.00

For marking entire 200 single sheets add 50c.

PRINT plainly. Enclose check or money order. West of Miss. add. 20c.

We invite comparison. Samples gladly submitted.

DE LUXE STATIONERY CO. 505 Fifth Avenue, New York

THE HACK DRIVER

A new story by Sinclair Lewis

In next week's issue of

The Nation.

International Relations Section

Labor Disunion in Italy

THE left-wing union movement in Italy began after the collapse of the Labor Alliance last August, when the failure of the general strike broke up the effort at unity of the labor movement. Revolutionary leaders (left Socialists and Communists) and moderate leaders (General Federation of Labor officials) attacked each other violently, creating so much dissension that for a while the ranks of labor were thrown into confusion. The Fascist unions used this situation to increase their prestige and intensify their appeal to the spirit of nationalism, and the revolutionary elements lost ground. The left-wing-union movement represents the efforts of the Communists and Maximalists (left-wing Socialists) to gather up their scattered forces and put a straight class program before the workers. The "Labor Constituency" represents the moderate "unity" movement, and draws its inspiration from D'Annunzio, the mouthpiece of Italian Nationalists.

FOR A UNITED FRONT

In January the following manifesto, bearing on this situation, was addressed to the Italian workers by three groups, the Executive Committee of the Third International, the Executive Committee of the Red Trade Union International, and the Committee for Fusion between the Italian Socialist Party and the Italian Communist Party.

TO THE ITALIAN PROLETARIAT:

For two years the Italian working class has been forced to bend little by little under the violent pressure of the capitalist offensive. . . . All civil, syndical, and political liberties have been trampled under foot; the standard of living for the workers and peasants has been forced down lower and lower; Fascist Italy has swept away the economic and social gains made by the workers in nearly thirty years of struggle. . . .

Disappointed in its hopes of great gains at the close of the war, and incapable of following any other course, capitalism is preparing on the one hand for new wars, while on the other it is attempting to guarantee its profits by applying to the workers and peasants of Italy, as well as to those of other countries, the same ferocious exploitation it has adopted in dealing with colonial populations. The Italian workers are reduced to the rank of Chinese coolies and Egyptian fellahs.

Faced with the enormous annual deficit of several billions, which is plunging the balance of the Italian state into hopeless depths, the Fascist Government has been driven to adopt "economy" measures which, in the long run, will only result in increasing the hunger and unemployment of the workers, who have already been driven to the verge of desperation.

There is no ground for illusion, therefore, regarding any change in the situation of the working class which is not based on the reorganization of its capacity for resistance and struggle. For this to be possible it is necessary to examine coolly the mistakes and failures of the past, the dangers to be avoided and overcome, and to propose tasks and methods adequate for the common struggle. The withdrawal of the Italian Socialist Party from the Third International, and of the General Federation of Labor from the Red Trade Union International, occurred in the first months of 1921, just at the time when the legal and illegal capitalist offensive was developing, and through these withdrawals the Italian proletariat was plunged into the greatest confusion, being left a victim to the maneuvers of reformist opportunism. . . .

The class instinct of the masses brought the Socialist Party to a realization of the abyss it was headed for, and the Congress of Rome broke the bonds that had united it with the Social-Democrats. . . .

The essential condition for the recovery of the workers' movement is that the working class regain its direction and put its hope solely in its own forces. . . . The policy of the Federation during these last two years of uninterrupted defeats for the working class has been based entirely on the stubborn illusion of collaborationism and on sabotage of the class struggle.

The magnificent seizure of lands and factories in 1920 was crushed in order not to compromise the chance of participation in the ministry—the price which was hoped for from the bourgeoisie in exchange for having "prevented revolution," according to the cynical confession of D'Aragona. The development of the factory councils . . . was interfered with by the Federation officials, in tacit and complete understanding with the employers, and the provisions for "syndical control" were hailed as a victory, though it has become a terrible farce for the workers, who, unarmed, were left helpless under the blows of revenge hurled at them by the employers. . . .

Thus, when the Communists proposed the united front, the Federation officials tried to counteract it by proposing "industrial investigation" at the Council of Verona; thus their only response to the insistent demand for the revival of the class struggle, which was made also by the Maximalists at the National Council of Genoa (July, 1922), was to talk about "making use of parliamentary action"; and thus in the Labor Alliance the reformists, with the aid of the Masonic pseudo-revolutionists, passed over every opportunity for carrying on the struggle under favorable conditions, and, with an unscrupulousness amounting to the blackest betrayal, spread confusion in the ranks of the working class by dragging it into a movement [the general strike of August, 1922] for which it was utterly unprepared, for the sole purpose of using the situation to gain parliamentary influence after the fall of Prime Minister Facta, and obtain a so-called radical solution.

The revival of the labor movement must be aimed not only at reestablishing the material conditions necessary for the functioning of the unions, but also and above all at checking the Fascist attempt to eradicate all class character and internationalism from the unions—an attempt in which the complicity of the Federation leaders is becoming more and more evident.

Internationalism is not a purely "technical" need (for the protection of emigrants, etc.), as the Social-Democrats would have it appear, but it is connected with the whole development of the labor movement, with the true meaning of the proletarian revolution, and with the role of the proletariat. . . . The world is sorely in need of order and unity. Imperialism itself, according to the keen analysis of Comrade Trotzky, is nothing but "the necessary expression of this need for unity and control of the whole economic life of the globe"; . . . But capitalism, because of the contradictions which are a necessary part of its existence, is no longer in a position to develop the task which it has taken upon itself: this is the task of socialism. . . . To renounce the internationalism of the labor movement is to sabotage the only reconstruction which is possible—that which is brought about by the working class in all countries, by the producers of the whole world, for the international administration and control of the various national industries and their harmonious coordination for the common good. . . .

This brings up the problem of the relationship between the unions and political parties of the working class. The system of "alliance agreements" based on the ridiculous separation of the economic struggle from the political struggle . . . is now out of date and is being readily abandoned. But this is not a reason for giving way to the theory of "political neutrality for unions," which practically amounts to an attempt on the part of the reformists or the Fascisti to get control of the unions in order to use them for bourgeois and counter-revolutionary purposes. We, who stand for independence of the unions from control by any party . . . warn the proletariat against the proposals of the Federation leaders, who, allied with the old-style syndicalists, want to transform the whole trade-union structure into a collaborationist and meek labor party. . . . An organization which is actually free from any alliance with political parties should attract all workers who are pledged to struggle against capitalist exploitation. . . . In such an organization, each politically organized group of workers shall formulate its own interpretations and draw up its own program and methods.

But this process of selecting methods and forming an original and unprejudiced policy of syndical action is not possible unless the organized masses can participate more directly and more constantly in union affairs.

The system which has been adopted by the Federation officials, especially in recent times, of taking the initiative in questions of greatest importance without consulting the masses, is in open violation of the statutes and of the deliberations of the national conventions, and is the cause of much confusion and demoralization in the ranks. These "full powers" of the Federation bureaucracy must come to an end, especially at this time when the most vital interests of the labor movement are at stake. . . .

One of the most scandalous manifestations of usurpation by Federation organizers and officials of power that had not been conferred on them is the tactics which they have adopted toward the so-called Fascist unions. The General Federation of Labor, always ready to threaten with expulsion Communist minorities . . . has ignored the alliance signed by Giulietti [with the Fascisti]. The initiative for the "labor constituency" is being carried out with the participation of well-known Federation organizers, and no step has been taken to publicly repudiate them and denounce them as traitors of the working class. . . .

In dealing with problems of relationship with the Fascist unions it is impossible to ignore their coercive character. Knowing that the workers enlisted in these unions have not gone over to the other side of the barricade, but are just demoralized and terrorized, we do not consider possible a pure and simple "fusion" of these organizations with the General Federation of Labor, because they are not free to carry on activities of a syndical nature. The problem must be met in another way.

The work of union reorganization must be quickly resumed, and class organizations must be strengthened in the industrial centers where the Fascist unions have had little success because it was not possible for the Fascisti to keep up their reign of terror forever. . . . As this action develops, the implicit contradictions in the economic program and syndical action of the Fascisti are bound to become evident. When the workers in the Fascist unions return to the unified Federation, class organization and class consciousness . . . will triumph over all the transformations and adulterations that took place under the pressure of hunger and violence. We are therefore opposed to any fusion which is purely the product of an infamous alliance between reformist and Fascist leaders, for the purpose of checking the revival of class activity in the unions and to complete the work of destruction begun by the capitalist offensive.

In the face of the grave difficulties of the situation . . . it is necessary to store up all the reserve energy of the working class and mobilize it untiringly in the task of reorganization. . . . The need for the united front is self-evident. . . . To make over the unions—this is the first call of the united front. We must not tire of proposing it day after day, on every occasion and to all the workers, even the Social-Democrats, making them choose between class struggle and collaboration, so that we may work hand in hand with them or show them up in their true colors if they refuse. . . .

The united front cannot be brought about through propaganda and persuasion alone; it must be built up by daily action, in answer to the evident need of the whole trade-union structure. It must propose demands which represent the interests of all workers without distinction and which respond to the most urgent needs of working-class life, namely, (1) For collective agreements in industry and agriculture, and defense of the standard of living of the workers and the contract clauses dealing with the high cost of living; (2) for the eight-hour day, even in relation to the problem of unemployment; (3) against all forms of wage taxation; (4) against the policy of indirect taxation, which is a burden on consumers and increases the hardships of the working class; (5) for the maintenance of social insurance, its extension to the agricultural proletariat, and its adoption with new provisions for the aid of the unemployed and their families; (6) for a policy in defense of poor rent-payers; (7) against the transfer of government-owned industries to private control; (8) for the functioning of the shop-committees for the effective protection of the interests of the workers on the job.

Systematic daily action, using the united front to agitate for these immediate demands of the present situation, must culminate in general political action of the working class. The bitter experiences of these past years have shown us that each individual gain in the syndical and political fields soon becomes a vain illusion unless it is consolidated and made permanent through the conquest of political power by the class that will use it to defend the immediate gains in the interests of all producers and develop them into a new form of social organization. . . .

In the unified ranks of the united front the group of left-wing unions must continue its work of defending the class and international character of the unions. And if this means losing the chance to participate in the deliberative bodies of the government, we claim that such participation is not worth the sacrificing of the most elemental rights of the proletariat.

The pacifist and collaborationist theories and tactics of the Amsterdam group and its "reconstruction" policy must be fought with all possible publicity, because they are responsible for the weakness of the trade-union movement and are always standing in the way of mass action by disarming the masses at the very time when the capitalist offensive is spreading and growing more violent. The watchword "For Moscow, Against Amsterdam" expresses the class tactics which will give life to the unions and enable them to face the new situation. We, like the Communists in other countries, do not want to affiliate with the Red Trade Union International as a small fraction or even an appreciable part of the labor movement, but only after we have won over the majority so that we can assume on behalf of the whole working class the direct responsibility for the new tactics and the new policy. . . .

Day by day and hour by hour we must labor to unite the exploited workers in the bonds of organization, and utilize the unions to form contacts with the workers and peasants. We call upon all organized workers, the old militants as well as the young recruits, to aid us in this task. It must have for its starting-point the fields and factories, where the workers can be reached on their jobs and where their personal experience makes them strongly conscious of the need for this work. . . . This simple but essential program can best be carried out by a fusion of the two proletarian parties, Socialist and Communist, and of their respective trade-union committees. This is bound to result in an immediate renewal of all forms of labor activities. The working class has not resigned itself to slavery; it is chafing under bonds which it abhors and longing to free itself. But this cannot be done if the Fascisti, aided by the tactics of the reformists, get control of the unions, which would simply mean letting them fall into the hands of the employers.

Comrades, to work! . . . Fusion of the two parties is the dawn of a bitter but splendid struggle, through which the working class will regain its right to life and set out again on the road leading to its own emancipation from the political and economic slavery of the capitalist class.

MOSCOW'S FOURTEEN POINTS

This urgent plea for a "united front" on the basis of left-wing tactics was doomed to failure. The Italian Socialist Party has always indorsed the Third International but its reservations in regard to Moscow's famous "Twenty-one Conditions" for entrance have made it impossible for the Italian Socialists to join. In order to try to reach an agreement with Moscow the party sent a delegation to the Fourth Congress of the Third International. The delegates returned with fourteen new conditions which were submitted to a special party congress held at Rome in April. The conditions were as follows:

In consideration of the decision of the congress of the Italian Socialist Party at Rome (October, 1922), which expelled the reformists from the party and declared itself ready to adhere unreservedly to the Communist International, the Fourth World Congress of the Communist International decides:

1. The general situation in Italy, especially after the victory of Fascist reaction, urgently demands immediate union of all the revolutionary forces of the proletariat. . . .

2. The Communist International sends to the long-suffering proletariat of Italy its fraternal greetings. It is firmly convinced of the sincerity of the proletarian elements in the Italian Socialist Party, and decides to receive it into the Communist International.

3. The application of the Twenty-one Points is considered by the Fourth World Congress as beyond dispute. Therefore it instructs the executive committee of the Communist International to take charge of the application of these conditions, as well as any measures which they may involve.

4. After examining the speech made by Deputy Vella at the party congress in Rome, the Fourth Congress holds that Vella and those who support him shall not be included in the future unified Communist Party of Italy. The Fourth Congress calls upon the executive committee of the Italian Socialist Party to expel from the party all those who make reservations regarding the application of the twenty-one conditions.

5. Whereas according to the statutes of the Communist International there cannot be more than one section of the Communist International in a country, the Fourth World Congress decides that fusion between the Socialist and Communist parties of Italy must take place at once. The unified party shall be called Unified Communist Party of Italy (section of the Communist International).

6. For the practical realization of this fusion, the Fourth Congress will appoint a special organization committee composed of three members for each party, which shall be presided over by a member of the executive committee. From now on this committee shall determine the course to be followed for the fusion in Italy and supervise the process of this fusion. The executive committee of the Communist International shall have the final decision with regard to all the deliberations of this committee. The central committees of the two parties shall have charge of the affairs of their respective parties, but they shall be subordinate to the organization committee in all political matters except those relating to preparation for the fusion.

7. Organization committees shall be established in the various industries and in the large cities, and shall be composed of two members from the Communist Party and two from the Socialist Party; the president shall be chosen by the representative of the executive committee.

8. These organization committees shall not only prepare the way for actual fusion, but shall also supervise the common political activities of the two organizations.

9. A syndical committee shall be established at once, whose task it shall be to show up the treason of the Amsterdam men in the General Federation of Labor and obtain a majority for the Profintern. This committee also shall be composed of two representatives from each party, presided over by a comrade named by the executive committee of the Communist International and by the organization committee. The syndical committee shall be controlled by the organization committee.

10. In cities where there is a Communist paper and a Socialist paper, they must be merged not later than January 1, 1923. The editorial staff of the central organ shall be appointed by the executive committee of the Communist International for the coming year.

11. The congress for fusion shall take place not later than March 15, 1923. If before this congress it should be necessary to hold special congresses of the two parties for purposes of information or preparation, it shall rest with the executive committee of the Communist International to decide upon the date, the place, and the conditions of such congresses.

12. The congress shall instruct the central committee of five to formulate a particular plan of procedure.

13. The congress decides to issue a special manifesto on the question of fusion. This manifesto must be published immediately with the signatures of the president and the delegates of both parties to the Fourth Congress.

14. The congress reminds all the Italian comrades of the necessity for the strictest discipline. All comrades, without exception, are obliged to do their utmost to complete the fusion without further delay. Any breach of discipline in the present situation will be a crime against the Italian proletariat and against the Communist International.

The congress of the Communist International also sent a message to the Socialist Party congress urging unity on these terms. The Fourteen Points were debated at some length and the opposition formed itself into a Committee for Socialist Defense which fought with particular vigor against acceptance of the Moscow terms. They argued that these conditions involved "the dissolution of the Italian Socialist Party" and moved their rejection. The original motion in favor of union on the basis of the terms laid down by the Communist congress was decisively defeated. At present the labor front in Italy is still disunited and the Socialists, although they have rejected the Amsterdam International and have "purged" their own ranks of reformists and collaborationists, are outside the Third International.

Ahead of the Times

On August 12th the New York Times announced that the full text of the new Russian Constitution had just reached this country, and it printed a translation "made from a copy in German sent to the [New York] Volkszeitung by a high official of the Russian Soviet Government."

Part of that constitution had been printed in The Nation for January 31, 1923. The remaining part was printed in copies of The Nation on sale in New York on August 9th. The Nation translated it from the original Russian as printed in the official organ of the Soviet Government, the Moscow Izvestia.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 29, 1923 No. 3034

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .......... 205

EDITORIALS:

On Exalting the President: An Open Letter .......... 208
The Lion Pays a Price .......... 209
The Big and the Little at Sea .......... 209
Parents—Gods, Policemen, or Friends? .......... 210
THE HACK DRIVER. By Sinclair Lewis .......... 211
STINNES—AND STRESEMANN. By Jerome Lachenbruch .......... 213
THE GALLIC WAR IN RHODE ISLAND. By Robert C. Dexter .......... 215
SONG OVERHEARD ON THE HIGHWAY. By Ann Hamilton .......... 216
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter .......... 216
CORRESPONDENCE .......... 217

BOOKS:

Red Man or Mongrel White? By Elizabeth Shepley Sergeant .......... 218
A Poet in Prison. By Miriam Allen deFord .......... 219
Causeries du Dimanche. By Samuel C. Chew .......... 219
Russian Masters. By Herbert J. Seligmann .......... 220
War Production and Profiteers. By George Soule .......... 221
The Government of France. By L. S. G. .......... 221
State and Nation. By Phillips Bradley .......... 221
Books in Brief .......... 222

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

The Oil Situation Today. By Herman Silverman .......... 223

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
LEWIS S. GANNETT ERNEST H. GRUENING
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOHN MACY
MANAGING EDITOR LITERARY EDITOR
IRITA VAN DOREN, ADVERTISING MANAGER
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
JOHN A. HOBSON ANATOLE FRANCE H. L. MENCKEN
FRIEDRICH WILHELM FOERSTER ROBERT HERRICK
CARL VAN DOREN NORMAN THOMAS

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: Ernest Thurtle, 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N. W. 4, England.

FROM unimpeachable American sources come almost daily indictments of the French folly in the Ruhr. Here is General Henry T. Allen, lately commander of our army in Germany, declaring at Williamstown that changes impend in Europe "that may wreck our Western civilization"; that if the American people were "fully abreast of the horrors awaiting Europe and the irreparable injuries that must be ours by chaos on the Continent they would force action while there may yet be time." Then there comes Basil Miles, with a report to the International Chamber of Commerce which shows once more that the French occupation is netting them only one-third the coal and coke they obtained before they went into the Ruhr, and that all they get is from stocks on hand, which will be exhausted "in four or five months." "The idea," he says, "that the French can produce Ruhr coal, coke, and steel without the cooperation of German labor and management is fantastic." Irving T. Bush, lately president of the New York Chamber of Commerce, pleads upon his return from Europe: "Let me say very frankly that what France needs now is not to have us shout 'Vive la France,' not to kiss her on both cheeks and weep with her, but to push some sound business sense into her. Carried to its logical conclusion, the French policy . . . will bankrupt her, it will break her back, it will bring upon her certain destruction."

WHEN Northern newspapers make remarks about a Southern lynching it is not uncommon to find Southern newspapers suggesting by way of retort that outsiders "keep their hands off." Great Britain occasionally exhibited similar feeling in regard to American comments on the "purely domestic" issue of Ireland. We are all more or less given to resenting outside comment on our misdeeds, and to assuming that our resentment somehow answers and effectively disposes of any given bill of complaints. Yet when Ambassador Geddes tells us, in the form of a report to the British Foreign Secretary, that the accommodations for aliens at Ellis Island are wholly inadequate and the methods in use unsatisfactory, it will not do merely to reply that Sir Auckland Geddes is a Britisher. From reports by American investigators as well as from persons who have watched the insane turmoil created on the first of each month by the workings of the immigration law it is evident that conditions on the Island are thoroughly bad. Ambassador Geddes's concrete suggestions for improving the equipment and the methods sound reasonable and moderate; and proposals from other sources regarding the limitation of numbers either by the steamship companies or by American consuls should be considered. But even before such changes can be accomplished a miracle of improvement could be wrought by eliminating some of the heartbreaking regimentation that makes immigrants to the United States feel, no matter what the quality of their bedding and their food, that they are considered as little more than a herd of helpless driven cattle.

SO the President has chosen C. Bascom Slemp of Virginia as his private secretary. Lately Congressman from that State, he was caught red-handed in disposing postmasterships in return for cold cash. You drew a postoffice and then you got a letter, not from Mr. Slemp—oh, dear, no—but from his private secretary, explaining that the Congressman had worked very hard to put this over, and that party expenses were costly. These epistles wound up with "please remit," $60 or $200 or $250. Of course, when the exposure came Mr. Slemp was quite certain that his secretary and others who wrote these letters had acted entirely without his knowledge. But somehow this never quite satisfied Congress; it may have had some effect upon his constituents, for he is no longer in Congress, and we have yet to hear that anybody returned to anybody any of the sums so collected. So far as the President is concerned we are not surprised by the appointment. Our guess is that Mr. Coolidge will not be found to be lacking in knowledge of, or skill in, the political game, and that he will be an exceedingly astute candidate for the Presidential nomination next year unless his own mistakes and the trend of the times compel the leaders to seek a new "leader." Mr. Coolidge rose as a Massachusetts politician through the party machine. Anyone who has done that need never be accused of being a tenderfoot or an idealist in politics.

AMERICAN news agencies and newspapers cannot afford full-time correspondents at Manila, and the cabled news almost inevitably comes either from writers on papers closely attached to the governor-general's administration or from subordinate officials dependent upon his good will.

When General Wood denounces the native opposition we hear of it in full; but we find it difficult to discover the other side. In his latest blast upon the conduct of the Philippine National Bank we have to read between the Governor's own lines. When, however, we find his expert reporting against the continuation of the bank because he is opposed to government ownership, and the Governor condemning the bank because it "undermines private initiative" and is "contrary to the Government's policy of getting the Government out of business," we can make a pretty good guess. General Wood is acting in the interest of the American companies which want to make Philippine industry an economic province of Wall Street, and the Filipino leaders are trying to maintain a degree of economic independence. When you have analyzed the dispute into those terms you do not have to read much further. The question whether native mismanagement or the world sugar crisis—which also put out of business every private bank in Cuba which did not have outside support—was responsible for the difficulties of the Philippine National Bank does not need to be answered. Your conclusion depends upon whether you approve or dread the trend to put into the hands of a few financiers world-power beyond the dreams of Alexander, Napoleon, or any modern ruler.

CUBA too is having a hard time. First there was the lottery which she reestablished against General Crowder's advice. We cannot take that as a very serious crime. The Cubans will some day learn that a lottery is a poor way to make money, but, after all, they are Latins with Latin habits and might be allowed the privilege of deciding such matters for themselves. France, Italy, and Spain all have state lotteries; Anglo-Saxon Queensland has a lottery the proceeds of which go to child welfare work; and our own Louisiana lottery carried on long after the close of the Spanish-American War.

MORE difficult is the question of the Tarafa railroad bill. The Cuban Legislature has passed an act providing for consolidation of the Cuban railway system, and putting exceptionally high taxes on products exported over private railways through private ports unless the owners of these roads will come into the consolidation plan. There are, it seems, some forty-seven private ports owned by American sugar companies, through which about one-third of Cuba's sugar is exported. It is admitted that under the Tarafa plan railway schedules could be more efficiently maintained, exchange of rolling stock facilitated, and various economies of operation made possible. It is also admitted that the sugar companies controlling the private ports pay the officials supervising them, that violations of the Cuban customs laws constantly occur at them, and that Chinese are frequently smuggled from them into the United States. But the American property-owners of course protested loudly to Washington, and Washington, always responsive to the call of oppressed property, immediately asked the Cuban Government to hold up the bill, accompanying this diplomatic protest by a press barrage threatening intervention. Thereupon another group of American investors, interested in Cuban railroads, issued a counter-protest. We know very little of the merits of the Tarafa bill—it sounds like an honest attempt to end special privileges—but we should like to see it settled as a Cuban question, not by Washington acting as the agent of anybody else.

MEXICAN and American commissioners have signed the minutes of their meetings and reached agreement upon many of the issues at stake, but it is not yet certain that recognition will result nor is it clear precisely what has been agreed upon. All that is sure is that the American delegates have sought to force Mexico to agree to an American interpretation of American property rights in Mexico. The Mexican delegates have accepted the principle that the constitution of 1917 is not retroactive, thereby confirming American oil rights acquired prior to that date. The Mexican law, however, with its drastic provisions regarding subsoil rights, is recognized as henceforth valid. The cables are conflicting regarding the division of landed estates. Some local governments in Mexico have carried the policy of dividing up the large estates so far that every peasant now has his own land, and the landlords, even when they have plenty of land left to work, cannot find men to work for them. This is the crux of Mexico's new policy. It is important not because of the amount of territory involved—in the first two years of the Obregon Administration only 4,400 square miles was allotted, and the entire program affects only 16,000 square miles—but because in this policy of making Mexico a republic of landowners lies the hope of a free Mexico. If the Obregon Government surrenders on this—as some of the dispatches seem to indicate—it will pay far too high a price for recognition.

JUST what the Irish Free State will do with Eamonn De Valera now that it has him in jail is a problem. Presumably he will go on a hunger strike, and if he sticks it out they will have to release him as they did Mary MacSwiney, or make an eternal martyr of him as the British did of Terence MacSwiney. De Valera in prison is worth more to the Republican cause than De Valera free. The only possible defense of the Free State treaty is that it allows Ireland a greater measure of freedom than it would be possible to win except by prolonged and bloody civil war—if then; and when the Free State keeps ten thousand Irishmen in jail it strikes at the root of its own position. We have believed the Free State worth a trial; but the Free Staters make that faith difficult. The coming election was to have revealed the opinion of Ireland; but when the Government jails its chief political opponent the election can hardly be called free.

SECRETARY WORK'S latest defense of his action in ousting Arthur Powell Davis from the post of Director of the Reclamation Service will not satisfy the engineers who have been so vehemently protesting to him. The facts in the case are now a matter of record. Mr. Davis, an eminent engineer, had been in the service for thirty-five years and his work had been entirely satisfactory. Without warning Secretary Work called him into his office and asked for his resignation. When Mr. Davis gave it in a form which made plain that it had been requested Secretary Work asked him to rewrite it, concealing that pertinent fact. Mr. Davis refused. Dr. Work thereupon explained that the service required a business man rather than an engineer in the post and named an Idaho politician, Mr. D. W. Davis. This new Davis's record as a "business man" consisted in service as a grocery clerk, followed by a few years of unsuccessful banking (his bank failed) and a term as Republican governor of Idaho. The position of Director of the Reclamation Service was under the civil-service rules, and the new Mr. Davis possibly could not have passed the examinations required by law for the post. Dr. Work abolished the post of Director and created a new one, Commissioner of the Reclamation Service, which had the same functions but dispensed with civil-service requirements, enabling the new Mr. Davis to hold it. Dr. Work, by using his office for partisan ends, lessens the attractiveness of all government service to the kind of experts it needs.

MEN are still rotting in jail in these United States for having given utterance to opinions which those in control of our national and of some of our State governments believed dangerous to our established political and industrial institutions. They are in jail for opinion's sake —not for the commission of any act of crime. The time has gone when this violation of civil liberty can be excused on the ground of a national or world crisis; the outrage stands forth today stark and bare, an attempt to control the expression of opinion in this country. From time to time a few men have been released, perhaps with the hope of thus stifling agitation for freedom of speech but scores are still kept behind prison walls. Every prisoner for opinion's sake is a denial of the claim that this is a country of freemen. Small wonder that a statesman from the Orient looking at the cracked old Liberty Bell in Philadelphia asked "Is Liberty cracked too?" or that a Frenchman remarked, when passing the Statue of Liberty, that "In France, too, we build statues in honor of our dead heroes."

IS the United States Government acting as the agent of Mussolini's dictatorship? When Carlo Tresca claimed, several weeks ago, that it was the influence of Prince Caetani, the Italian Ambassador, which caused a July issue of his anti-fascist weekly, the Martello, to be barred from the American mails, the charge seemed incredible. It seemed beyond belief that our American post-office should so prostitute itself as to interfere with the freedom of the press here upon Italian instructions. The French Government before the war, bound up as it was with the Czar's financial regime, used to act as the agent of the Russian secret police, but one would hardly expect this republic to copy so detestable a policy. However, Carlo Tresca was arrested on August 14, charged with publishing obscene matter, because of an article which appeared in the issue of his paper for May 5. Copies of this paper had meanwhile traveled to Italy; and the article protested was one called "Down with the Monarchy." The so-called obscenity consisted of rather impudent references to the motives and circumstances which determine royal marriages.

WHEN Lloyd George went out of office last November it was a common prediction in this country—much more so than in England—that "he'll soon come back." Today the prospect of his return to power seems more remote than ever. The English people have little more use for him now than for Lord Rosebery or Horatio Bottomley. Critical as the international situation may be, nobody is calling for "the little Welsh wizard" to show the way out. Over the present House of Commons he casts no spell. He sits there no longer as a master of legions, but as the leader of a small group, whose members are one by one drifting away from him and transferring their allegiance to the Conservative Party. For many months before the fall of the Coalition, the question asked by many who would gladly have got rid of him was: "But who is there to take his place?" In the light of what has happened since, it seems almost incredible that such a problem could ever have been seriously posed. Neither Bonar Law nor Stanley Baldwin possesses the oratorical gifts of Lloyd George nor his skill in the rapid improvisation of policies, but these less brilliant men have qualities of character in which he is lamentably deficient, and in the long run character tells. His reputation, too, has steadily dwindled in proportion as the test of time has shown the flimsiness of his boasted statesmanship. The disappearance of the last scrap of his "Doomsday Book" has taken the halo from his career as a social reformer, while one has only to mention the Treaty of Versailles—to say nothing of the Treaty of Lausanne—to realize how shortsighted and pretentious were his achievements in the world of international affairs.

"ITS editors will be Mr. George Jean Nathan and Mr. H. L. Mencken"—that announcement is quite enough to assure an eager audience for a new American monthly review. "The point of view that it will seek to maintain will be that of the civilized minority"—that but repeats the announcement that Mencken and Nathan will edit the American Mercury. There is no team to compare with them in present-day letters. Find fault with them as one may—and it is not difficult to pick holes in their armor—no two men in America today are doing more to stir the youth in the colleges and out of them to independent, critical, creative thinking than Mencken and Nathan. The fact that Alfred A. Knopf will publish the new review gives the added assurance that its typography and make-up will be at once modern and distinguished. The monthlies are picking up. The recent announcement that Henry Goddard Leach has taken over the Forum means a new fair-mindedness and thoughtfulness, and a return to the fine old traditions of that veteran of American journalism.

WHEN the editor of The Nation was in college, it came about that a certain undergraduate secret society chose to initiate into its mysteries and fellowship a member of the Cabot family. Known for the public character of its rites and their power to take the sublimity out of any sophomore, the society took this particularly interesting candidate, placed him on what was then the most frequented corner in Boston, decorated him with a large pasteboard reading I AM A CABOT, and kept him there throughout the daylight hours. If we mistake not, this same Cabot is one of the members of his family who has just protested, in vain, to a Philadelphia judge who had before him the application of Harry and Myrtle Kabotchnik to change their name to Cabot. Now we should have thought that this indicated a most praiseworthy desire on the part of these Slavs, of a race which Charles Steinmetz has just declared will shortly rule the world and triumph upon the ruins of Anglo-Saxon civilization, to become 100 per cent Americans, and to stamp that Americanism with an authenticity beyond question—at least in the land of the cod. The judge apparently thought so, too, for he granted the petition, though he might have insisted upon their being Kabots and not Cabots. But the Cabots are outraged to their depths. Their name is their property and theirs alone. We suggest to them that they take a leaf out of the undergraduate book. Why should they not each wear a neat little badge, decorated with a codfish, and marked: "I am a real Cabot"?

On Exalting the President: An Open Letter

To Major J——— S———

DEAR SIR:

WE are in receipt of your letter saying you are "shocked" by reading in a recent issue of The Nation an "attack" upon the President of the United States and one upon Messrs. Hughes and Hoover. "At a time like the present," you declare, "every good citizen ought to do his utmost to uphold our new President." Anything else is, in your judgment, not only "bad taste" but "unpatriotic." Our editorial you are pleased to consider "an open and flagrant abuse of free speech."

This point of view of yours interests us not a little because it is so illustrative of a type of confused thinking that is all too prevalent at this juncture. What is there in the "present time" to make an editor surrender the right of criticism? Is there anything serious in a change of Presidents because of the death of the incumbent of the office? We have been through it six times without a jar even at the hour of Lincoln's assassination. We shall certainly never experience it again under more peaceful conditions than exist in these United States today. Then why should anybody be called upon "to his utmost" to "uphold" our new President? There is no crisis in existence or in sight; nobody menaces the government; we are waging at this moment no war to make the world safe for democracy, or to end war; Congress is not even in session. The country in fact, was never safer for the humbugging of politicians than today. Then why in the world must one refrain from criticizing the new President?

The truth is that men like yourself seem to think that the President of the United States is a king or a kaiser and so beyond criticism, not only when he succeeds to office but at all times. The President of the United States is nothing of the kind. He is a servant of the people, elected by their votes for a brief service and subject at all times to their criticism. If you knew anything about the traditions and history of your country you would know that nobody was subjected to more criticism than George Washington, even when the country was on the verge of war with France. It was the object of the founders to differentiate the Presidency in every way from the position held by the King of England, and to divest it of all attributes of majesty. Their ideal was that of a Cincinnatus leaving his plow for a period of public service and then returning to it. The founders, as the debates show, never dreamed of exalting their chief servant above criticism, if only because they knew that criticism is the greatest safeguard of the Republic; remove that, and the citizens are helpless against their own creatures in office. The fact that President Coolidge has reached his office by the accident of a widely-lamented death throws no veil of sanctity about him, establishes no close season for public criticism, and in no wise even raises a question whether such criticism is in good or in bad taste, or is patriotic or unpatriotic.

Indeed, there are several facts about Mr. Coolidge's rise to his high office by one of those myths we Americans love to build up about our public men, which make truth-telling at this time particularly necessary, for these myths constantly mislead the public and lead to frequent, disheartening, faith-destroying disillusionment. There is no more important duty, in our judgment, for an honest and truth-serving journalist than to set forth the truth about every public man. Certainly his duty is to the American people that they may be informed, and only very secondarily to the man who has just assumed office by the gift of the people and the intervention of fate. The time of Mr. Coolidge's accession to office was precisely the hour to make people aware of the facts as to the police strike. The editorial in The Nation to which you object contained, moreover, not editorial opinion of ours, but the statement of a responsible citizens' committee of Boston headed by the foremost banker in New England. If this was an "attack" upon the President, then the fault lies with the facts and not with us. It is needless to add that not only the New York Evening Post but numerous other journals throughout the country took this occasion to print the facts without thought that they thereby rendered themselves "unpatriotic." As for free speech, there is never any time when it can be "abused" unless it contravenes explicit statutes.

The fact is that all this undue exaltation of the office of President dates back to the day when we began our imperialistic career. It gained a tremendous currency during the World War. When setting out to destroy a kaiser we were, of course, bound to exalt our President and to clothe him with many of the panoplies and rites, such as a military guard around the White House, which were appurtenances of the Kaiser and had hitherto been deemed un-republican and un-American. As your letter proves, we are even now extending this doctrine of sanctity to Cabinet officers. You say it is wrong for The Nation to suggest that Messrs. Hughes and Hoover, having buncoed many thousands of their fellow-citizens into voting for President Harding on the ground that such was the surest way to get the United States into the League of Nations, ought to take the opportunity afforded by the change in the Administration and gracefully retire to private life. If your point of view controlled, it would surely be only a short time before a statute made it treasonable to criticize any Cabinet officer. We presume that you are today ablaze with rage because many newspapers have criticized Mr. Coolidge for choosing as his private secretary an office-broker and a spoils-monger.

Since men of your type of mind are impervious to the history of our own institutions and the spirit and tradition of American democracy, we can only hope that there will be elected a man of the type of Henry Ford (not that we favor Mr. Ford's candidacy). For if there should be chosen a person who would violate the traditions and the conventionalities which the modern imperialistic and big-business control of America is building up about our public officials, solely in the interest of increasing the power of authority and further buttressing the present rotting social order, we should see all this precious nonsense about the sanctity of a President go overboard in an hour. The very ones who, like yourself, are now shouting that office throws a mantle of holiness about any man who receives it would then be foremost in criticism and in denunciation, precisely as they now have no words to do reverence to a Magnus Johnson, a La Follette, or a Smith Brookhart. They would suddenly discover that it was the man in the Presidency that counted, not the office or its authority.

THE NATION

The Lion Pays a Price

WHAT greater irony could fate have in store for British statesmen than that five years after they went to war—under false pretenses, it is true—to aid France and Belgium, they find themselves apparently bound and delivered to their ancient cross-Channel enemy? That is their fix today. England protests against French wickedness and folly in the Ruhr. Today France thumbs her nose at the Lion. Conscious of an army nearly five times the size of Great Britain's; able to imitate Germany and let loose a fleet of submarines at any moment; provided with a force of 5,000 airplanes vastly superior to the British in numbers and in personnel, France is quite ready to go her own way, and is even at the point of threatening an economic war against her quondam ally. It is regrettable, of course, says Paris, to lose the ally to whom one was so grateful, and to whom one sang such paeans of praise from 1914 to 1918, and one must be polite always. But, if the parting must needs be, why, it is not England who holds the trump cards.

So the country which for centuries armed against France; which for eighty years has declined to permit an underchannel tunnel lest the French army pour through it at night—Cobden began his peace agitation in 1847 by defending France and again in 1852 he inveighed against the "vague terror" of his day; which for decades maintained a two-power naval standard at double the Gallic strength; which for generations has sung Britannia Rule the Waves, and periodically has roused her inhabitants to such a pitch of feverish fear of France as led to the great volunteer movement of mid-Victorian days, now finds herself checkmated and, from a militarist point of view, humiliated as never before. The British Lion for once cannot have his way by force. His growl no longer shakes the walls of Paris; the battlements of Calais no longer tremble when his hearts of oak and walls of steel pass slowly by on maneuvers bent. The new arts of war and the new instruments have placed the French on top. This time England fears in truth; this time the invasion of England is possible—through the air; today the dream of Bonaparte is nearer realization than ever before. In deciding to destroy her German commercial rival, Great Britain played into France's hands. She can no longer enact her old role of wielding a balance of power in Europe because the old Russia is gone, Germany is prostrate, and Austria is dismembered. France no longer dreads a British threat of war because she knows, and all the world knows, that London wants no more bombing; that the British people, struggling against a cruel business depression and against sickening and palsying unemployment, with their fleets of peace rusting at their anchors, have no more stomach and no more treasure for a fight. The Gallic cock may crow as never before.

Now from many points of view this is not a bad situation, if it means that, as the Germans have turned to passive resistance against which the French army has been as useless as a painted ship upon a painted ocean, the British statesmen will now have to try other means to bring France to her senses than the rattling of the sword and the mobilizing of fleets. We are heartily glad that England is impotent, precisely as we rejoice that no German scientist has invented a scientific way of destroying the French cities from an automatic airplane station in the suburbs of Berlin. Such a liberation would merely emphasize the rule of force. We want Germany treated in the spirit of the Good Samaritan and restored to her rightful place as a member of the human family, misled once, but on the road to democracy and humility and sanity today. We want France brought to a realization of the utterly detestable and unethical character of her conduct since the Treaty of Versailles. But we have only one prayer, and that is that these things may be brought about by the arts of peace, by sound and calm reasoning, by the marshaling of economic power, and by the pressure of world opinion.

So, we repeat, we cannot grieve that England cannot fight; that her statesmen are not in a position to threaten a war, or lightly and mistakenly to throw the fate of their people into another struggle, as they lightly and mistakenly threw it in 1914 by reason of secret agreements, lied about in the Commons and carefully concealed from the people themselves. It is humiliating, from the old-fashioned diplomatic point of view, for England to be bound and delivered to her ancient enemy, but the lesson is not to arm additionally, or to engage in another struggle which must result in the ruin of all concerned, but to turn to the weapons of the spirit reinforced by the possibility of isolating the erring French by international agreement and international cooperation. Militarily the British are today hopelessly inferior; yet they are, in the matter of the reconstruction of Europe, more powerful than ever before because they have never been more firmly intrenched in sanity, wisdom, humanity, and justice—nor more strongly fortified by economic truths.

The Big and the Little at Sea

DESPITE the fame of the Leviathan and the Majestic and all the rest of the ocean giants, the supremacy of the big ships is not complete, nor is their future domination unchallenged. We all know how in war time the tiny submarine drove the monster battleship into hiding. Today the largest liners are the most fashionable and for a period in each year the most profitable. Then, when the winter storms begin, they run at such a loss that only a shipping tyro, like Albert Lasker, suggests any more. He wants three more Leviathans built—apparently for advertising reasons. The German steamship-men who built these giant liners of which the American and British merchant marines are now so proud, declare openly that, if the trade were to be restored over-night to the favorable pre-war conditions, they would not think of building any more floating cities but would stick to the 20,000 to 25,000 ton steamers which they are now rapidly turning out. Certainly, if the world continues in its present slough of despond, the passenger line which would build a fifty thousand tonner would be considered to have gone mad.

If there must be fast ships we may see a leaf taken out of the books of the great navies which are now turning out scout cruisers of 100,000 horse-power and thirty-four or thirty-five knots speed. Such a ship could run across the Atlantic in the summer months in four days, charging extra fare like the limited trains to those to whom haste was essential, and then in winter time could voyage slowly under half its power in order to save expense. As it is, the Mauretanias eagerly seek engagements for winter Mediterranean cruises to cut the very heavy losses of the bad months on the Atlantic. Then the smaller, more economical, and cheaper ships come into their own. The glory of the monster vessel wanes, even in the society columns.

In still another marine field the small boat challenges the larger. The remarkable Bermuda yacht race, participated in by no less than twenty-two yachts of all rigs, varying in length from 37 to 81 feet, with their auxiliary engines sealed, resulted in eighteen of them crossing the finish line within sixteen hours after the winner's appearance. This was an amazing achievement for amateurs in small boats, who encountered very rough going in the Gulf Stream, and found navigation extremely difficult in rough seas under cloudy skies. Here again the smaller boats distinguished themselves. The editor of Yachting, Mr. Herbert L. Stone, who inspired the race and sailed in it, writes that aside from some better luck in the winds than the big fellows, the little ones carried sail longer than their larger competitors, their skippers feeling that they could shorten sail more easily in case of necessity, while the big fellows with their bulky canvas could not afford to wait until the bad weather set in. The best record was made by Malabar IV, which won the race on corrected time. She has but forty-seven feet of length. Yet her owner and designer boasts that she was comfortable and easily handled.

Ever since the war there has been a recrudescence of faith in the small ocean-going vessels; the yachting magazines constantly record the voyages of small schooners crossing the Atlantic and exploring the South Seas. It does not take the income of a million dollars to round the globe on such a noble little schooner as lay in Gloucester Harbor last summer fitting out for a three-year cruise with but one paid hand aboard. She was built as though for the North Pole, with timbers fit for any sea and any gale, safe inboard rigging, heavy spars, no topmasts, and a powerful engine—all the comforts of home for five men within her sixty feet—and what a life! Daring, adventure by day and by night; no pressure for time and no haste—just the challenge of the elements by a floating speck on the vasty deep, with all the chances as much in her favor as those of a 250-foot yacht or a 4,000-ton bark. If the fabric is sound, and the science is there, and courage as well, one may play Columbus at will and count upon his luck.

Parents—Gods, Policemen, or Friends?

HAVE you ever tried being friends with a small child? It is being attempted in these days in thousands of American homes and in a few American schools of the "experimental" variety. We are beginning to shrink from enforcing the various gestures of authority on the one hand and of respect and obedience on the other that ordinarily make up a large part of the relationship between parents and their children and between teachers and their pupils. We are making a brave effort to go along with our children on their educational adventurings and to try the experiment of friendship with them.

And in doing this we are setting ourselves a task as hard as that of stopping wars or establishing the cooperative commonwealth.

Every day of their lives children want to commit at least fifty acts that must somehow be prevented. They wish to consume candy and cake at wrong moments. They want to play while they eat their meals. They want to go in swimming right after lunch. They want to kill harmless insects. They want to play in the dim, damp twilight zone under the front porch. Left to themselves they will commit these acts and all be friends in misdoing. If they happen to remember stray phrases of adult reasoning or adult punishment, they may stop. Solemnly, one of them may remark: "It isn't nice to pick cats up around their middles." But the thought and the sentiment must needs come from without; there is no inner grace in the treatment of cats.

And every day children balk at doing a great number of things which somehow they must be cajoled or reasoned or forced into doing. They balk at cleansings and tooth-brushings; at eating porridge or spinach or whole-wheat bread; at taking naps; at picking up their playthings. There is no use in citing the rare child that does these things without being told. That child has only learned his lesson a little better; civilization, the adult world, has more quickly changed him and stamped him and made him her own.

Superiority wrecks friendliness; and, amiably or brutally, all adults are wielders of a fatal authority. Equality is the blood and bone of friendship, and none of us, whatever our I. Q.s may be, can be the joyous equals of our children—talk the juvenile language, ask and answer the endless questions, or laugh at the humor of the very young. Until a parent can fall into sincere mirth when his offspring repeats an endless string of senseless sounds, exhilarating to the infant ear; or spend a happy morning climbing in and out of empty packing boxes—until that time comes, let him give up hope of being the friend of his child. And when that time comes, alas, he must give up hope of his own mental competence.

Of course this states both sides of the matter too baldly. If we are honest in our desire for friendship we can occasionally approach the standards of childhood and for a few moments find ourselves let into the charmed circle of equality and companionship. But such a relationship is a fragile thing, easily shattered by the exercise of even a gentle authority or the assumption of adult wisdom. Every time we say "no" to a child, and, equally, every time we say "yes," we climb out of friendship and into a region of authority and force—however disguised. We sadly put the hope of complete friendship from us—forever; for by the time our children reach an age when they conform to adult standards without direction or compulsion they have behind them years of inequality which make any sort of true intimacy acutely difficult. They will be able to make friends more easily with strangers than with their own parents.

Ordinarily child-training is looked at from the child's point of view alone; few people have analyzed the ruinous effect on adult character of the Olympian role that is forced upon parents. Children and grown-ups alike need to get away from this role, and probably the only way they can ever hope to is by getting away from each other. Bernard Shaw has suggested some admirable schemes for accomplishing this end, but unfortunately they all involve the previous establishment of an economic Utopia. Short of that we can only compromise. We can treat our children's most painfully experimental moods with a certain respect. And when we must assume the character of gods or policemen we can do it with an air of humility and humor that may dispel some of the reasonable hostility with which the young view all attempts at their betterment.

The Hack Driver

By SINCLAIR LEWIS

I DARE say there's no man of large affairs, whether he is bank president or senator or dramatist, who hasn't a sneaking love for some old rum-hound in a frightful hat, living back in a shanty and making his living by ways you wouldn't care to examine too closely. (It was the Supreme Court justice speaking. I do not pretend to guarantee his theories or his story.) He may be a Maine guide, or the old garageman who used to keep the livery stable, or a perfectly useless innkeeper who sneaks off to shoot ducks when he ought to be sweeping the floors, but your pompous big-city man will contrive to get back and see him every year, and loaf with him, and secretly prefer him to all the highfalutin' leaders of the city.

There's that much truth, at least, to this Open Spaces stuff you read in advertisements of wild and woolly Western novels. I don't know the philosophy of it; perhaps it means that we retain a decent simplicity, no matter how much we are tied to Things, to houses and motors and expensive wives. Or again it may give away the whole game of civilization; may mean that the apparently civilized man is at heart nothing but a hobo who prefers flannel shirts and bristly cheeks and cussing and dirty tin plates to all the trim, hygienic, forward-looking life our womenfolks make us put on for them.

When I graduated from law school I suppose I was about as artificial and idiotic and ambitious as most youngsters. I wanted to climb, socially and financially. I wanted to be famous, and dine at large houses with men who shuddered at the Common People who don't dress for dinner. You see, I hadn't learned that the only thing duller than a polite dinner is the conversation afterward, when the victims are digesting the dinner and accumulating enough strength to be able to play bridge. Oh, I was a fine young calf! I even planned a rich marriage. Imagine then how I felt when, after taking honors and becoming fifteenth assistant clerk in the magnificent law firm of Hodgins, Hodgins, Berkman and Taupe, I was set not at preparing briefs but at serving summonses! Like a cheap private detective! Like a mangy sheriff's officer! They told me I had to begin that way and, holding my nose, I feebly went to work. I was kicked out of actresses' dressing-rooms, and from time to time I was righteously beaten by large and indignant litigants. I came to know, and still more to hate, every dirty and shadowy corner of the city. I thought of fleeing to my home town, where I could at once become a full-fledged attorney-at-law. I rejoiced one day when they sent me out forty miles or so to a town called New Mullion, to serve a summons on one Oliver Lutkins. This Lutkins had worked in the Northern woods, and he knew the facts about a certain timberland boundary agreement; we needed him as a witness, and he had dodged service.

When I got off the train at New Mullion, my sudden affection for sweet and simple villages was dashed by the look of the place, with its mud-gushing streets and its rows of shops either paintless or daubed with a sour brown. Though it must have numbered eight or nine thousand inhabitants, New Mullion was as littered as a mining camp. There was one agreeable-looking man at the station—the expressman. He was a person of perhaps forty, red-faced, cheerful, thick; he wore his overalls and denim jumper as though they belonged to him; he was quite dirty and very friendly, and you knew at once that he liked people and slapped them on the back out of pure easy affection.

"I want," I told him, "to find a fellow named Oliver Lutkins."

"Him? I saw him 'round here 'twa'n't an hour ago. Hard fellow to catch, though—always chasing around on some phony business or other. Probably trying to get up a poker game in the back of Fritz Beineke's harness-shop. I'll tell you, boy —— Any hurry about locating Lutkins?"

"Yes. I want to catch the afternoon train back." I was as impressively secret as a stage detective.

"I'll tell you. I've got a hack. I'll get out the old bone-shaker and we can drive around together and find Lutkins. I know most of the places he hangs out."

He was so frankly friendly, he so immediately took me into the circle of his affection, that I glowed with the warmth of it. I knew, of course, that he was drumming up business, but his kindness was real, and if I had to pay hack fare in order to find my man, I was glad that the money would go to this good fellow. I got him down to two dollars an hour; he brought from his cottage, a block away, an object like a black piano-box on wheels.

He didn't hold the door open, certainly he didn't say: "Ready, sir." I think he would have died before calling anybody "sir." When he gets to Heaven's gate he'll call St. Peter "Pete," and I imagine the good saint will like it. He remarked, "Well, young fellow, here's the handsome equipage," and his grin—well, it made me feel that I had always been his neighbor. They're so ready to help a stranger, those villagers. He had already made it his own task to find Oliver Lutkins for me.

He said, and almost shyly: "I don't want to butt in on your private business, young fellow, but my guess is that you want to collect some money from Lutkins—he never pays anybody a cent; he still owes me six bits on a poker game I was fool enough to get into. He ain't a bad sort of a Yahoo but he just naturally hates to loosen up on coin of the realm. So if you're trying to collect any money off him, we better kind of you might say creep up on him and surround him. If you go asking for him—anybody can tell you come from the city, with that trick Fedora of yours—he'll suspect something and take a sneak. If you want me to, I'll go into Fritz Beineke's and ask for him, and you can keep out of sight behind me."

I loved him for it. By myself I might never have found Lutkins. Now, I was an army with reserves. In a burst I told the hack driver that I wanted to serve a summons on Lutkins; that the fellow had viciously refused to testify in a suit where his knowledge of a certain conversation would clear up everything. The driver listened earnestly—and I was still young enough to be grateful at being taken seriously by any man of forty. At the end he pounded my shoulder (very painfully) and chuckled: "Well, we'll spring a little surprise on Br'er Lutkins."

"Let's start, driver."

"Most folks around here call me Bill. Or Magnuson. William Magnuson, fancy carting and hauling."

"All right, Bill. Shall we tackle this harness-shop—Beineke's?"

"Yes, jus' likely to be there as anywheres. Plays a lot of poker, and a great hand at bluffing—damn him!" Bill seemed to admire Mr. Lutkins's ability as a scoundrel; I fancied that if he had been sheriff he would have caught Lutkins with fervor and hanged him with affection.

At the somewhat gloomy harness-shop we descended and went in The room was odorous with the smell of dressed leather. A scanty sort of man, presumably Mr. Beineke, was selling a horse-collar to a farmer.

"Seen Nolly Lutkins around today? Friend of his looking for him," said Bill, with treacherous heartiness.

Beineke looked past him at my shrinking alien self; he hesitated, and owned: "Yuh, he was in here little while ago. Guess he's gone over to the Swede's to get a shave."

"Well, if he comes in, tell him I'm looking for him. Might get up a little game of poker. I've heard tell that Lutkins plays these here immoral games of chance."

"Yuh, I believe he's known to sit in on Authors," Beineke growled.

We sought the barber-shop of "the Swede." Bill was again good enough to take the lead, while I lurked at the door. He asked not only the Swede but two customers if they had seen Lutkins. The Swede decidedly had not; he raged: "I ain't seen him, and I don't want to, but if you find him you can just collect the dollar thirty-five he owes me!" One of the customers thought he had seen Lutkins "hiking down Main Street, this side of the hotel."

"Well then," Bill concluded, as we labored up into the hack, "his credit at the Swede's being ausgewent, he's probably getting a scrape at Heinie Gray's. He's too darn lazy to shave himself."

At Gray's barber-shop we missed Lutkins by only five minutes. He had just left—presumably for the poolroom. At the poolroom it appeared that he had merely bought a "pack" of cigarettes and gone on. Thus we pursued him, just behind him but never catching him, for an hour, till it was past one and I was hungry. Village born as I was and in the city often lonely for good coarse country wit, I was so delighted by Bill's cynical opinions on the barbers and clergymen and doctors and draymen of New Mullion that I scarcely cared whether I found Lutkins or not.

"How about something to eat?" I suggested. "Let's go to a restaurant and I'll buy you a lunch."

"Well, ought to go home to the old woman. And I don't care much for these restaurants—ain't but four of 'em and they're all rotten. Tell you what we'll do. Like nice scenery? There's an elegant view from Wade's Hill. We'll get the old woman to put us up a lunch—she won't charge you but half a dollar, and it'd cost you that for a greasy feed at the caif—and we'll go up there and have a Sunday-school picnic."

I knew that my friend Bill was not free from guile; I knew that his hospitality to the Young Fellow from the City was not altogether a matter of brotherly love. I was paying him for his time; in all I paid him for six hours (including the lunch hour!) at what was then a terrific price. But he was no more dishonest than I, who charged the whole thing up to the Firm, and it would have been worth paying him myself to have his presence. His country serenity, his natural wisdom, was a refreshing bath to the city-twitching youngster. As we sat on the hilltop, looking across orchards and a creek which slipped among the willows, he talked of New Mullion, gave a whole gallery of portraits. He was cynical yet tender. Nothing had escaped him, yet there was nothing, no matter how ironically he laughed at it, which was beyond his understanding and forgiveness. In ruddy color he painted the rector's wife who when she was most in debt most loudly gave the responses at what he called the "Episcopalopian church." He commented on the boys who came home from college in "ice-cream pants," and on the lawyer who, after years of torrential argument with his wife, would put on either a linen collar or a necktie, but never both. He made them live. In that day I came to know New Mullion better than I did the city, and to love it better.

If Bill was ignorant of universities and of urban ways, yet much had he traveled in the realm of jobs. He had worked on railroad section gangs, in harvest fields and contractors' camps, and from his adventures he had brought back a philosophy of simplicity and laughter. He strengthened me. Nowadays, thinking of Bill, I know what people mean (though I abominate the simpering phrase) when they yearn over "real he-men."

We left that placid place of orchards and resumed the search for Oliver Lutkins. We could not find him. At last Bill cornered a friend of Lutkins and made him admit that "he guessed Oliver'd gone out to his ma's farm, three miles north."

We drove out there, mighty with strategy.

"I know Oliver's ma. She's a terror. She's a cyclone," Bill sighed. "I took a trunk out for her once, and she pretty near took my hide off because I didn't treat it like it was a crate of eggs. She's somewheres about nine feet tall and four feet thick and quick's a cat, and she sure manhandles the Queen's English. I'll bet Oliver has heard that somebody's on his trail, and he's sneaked out there to hide behind ma's skirts. Well, we'll try bawling her out. But you better let me do it, boy. You may be great at Latin and geography, but you ain't educated in cussing." We drove into a poor farmyard; we were faced by an enormous and cheerful old woman. My guardian stockily stood before her and snarled, "Remember me? I'm Bill Magnuson, the expressman. I want to find your son Oliver. Friend of mine here from the city got a present for him."

"I don't know anything about Oliver and I don't want to," she bellowed.

"Now you look here. We've stood for just about enough plenty nonsense. This young man is the attorney general's provost, and we got legal right to search any and all premises for the person of one Oliver Lutkins."

Bill made it sound terrific, and the Amazon seemed impressed. She retired into the kitchen and we followed. From the low old range, turned by years of heat into a dark silvery gray, she snatched a sad iron, and she marched on us, clamoring, "You just search all you want to—providin' you don't mind getting burnt to a cinder?" She bellowed, she swelled, she laughed at our nervous retreat.

"Let's get out of this. She'll murder us," Bill groaned and, outside: "Did you see her grin? She was making fun of us. Can you beat that for nerve?"

I agreed that it was lèse majesté.

We did, however, make adequate search. The cottage had but one story. Bill went round it, peeking in at all the windows. We explored the barn and the stable; we were reasonably certain that Lutkins was not there. It was nearly time for me to catch the afternoon train, and Bill drove me to the station. On the way to the city I worried very little over my failure to find Lutkins. I was too absorbed in the thought of Bill Magnuson. Really, I considered returning to New Mullion to practice law. If I had found Bill so deeply and richly human, might I not come to love the yet uncharted Fritz Beineke and the Swede barber and a hundred other slow-spoken, simple, wise neighbors? I saw a candid and happy life beyond the neat learnings of universities and law firms. I was excited, as one who has found a treasure.

But if I did not think much about Lutkins, the office did. I found them in a state, next morning; the suit was ready to come to trial; they had to have Lutkins; I was a disgrace and a fool. That morning my eminent legal career almost came to an end. The Chief did everything but commit mayhem; he somewhat more than hinted that I would do well at ditch-digging. I was ordered back to New Mullion, and with me they sent an ex-lumber-camp clerk who knew Lutkins. I was rather sorry, because it would prevent my loafing again in the gorgeous indolence of Bill Magnuson.

When the train drew in at New Mullion, Bill was on the station platform, near his dray. What was curious was that the old dragon, Lutkins's mother, was there talking to him, and they were not quarreling but laughing.

From the car steps I pointed Bill out to the lumber-camp clerk, and in young hero-worship I murmured: "There's a fine fellow, a real man."

"Meet him here yesterday?" asked the clerk.

"I spent the day with him."

"He help you hunt for Oliver Lutkins?"

"Yes, he helped me a lot."

"He must have! He's Lutkins himself!"

But what really hurt was that when I served the summons Lutkins and his mother laughed at me as though I were a bright boy of seven, and with loving solicitude they begged me to go to a neighbor's house and take a cup of coffee.

"I told 'em about you, and they're dying to have a look at you," said Lutkins joyfully. "They're about the only folks in town that missed seeing you yesterday."

Stinnes—and Stresemann

By JEROME LACHENBRUCH

Berlin, July

"YOU must always remember that Mr. Stinnes is a modern business man"—that was the reply of one of his "factory scouts" with whom I once shared a railroad compartment, when I asked if Hugo Stinnes was a patriot.

Hugo Stinnes is said to have more power in shaping the policies of his country than had the former Kaiser. His interests include a large steamship company, mines, oil-wells, innumerable factories, hotels, newspapers, and banks. Yet he remains a riddle.

Now "a modern business man" may act to the mutual profit of himself and his countrymen, or he may act to their disadvantage and his own personal gain. Evidence is accumulating that Hugo Stinnes's power is a menace to the welfare of the German people. As the largest individual representative of the industrial interests of Germany, a member of the Reichstag, and a newspaper owner, Stinnes is constantly consulted in the formulation of government plans. Even during the war, his ideas were influential enough with the war leaders to result in the prolonging of the war after many leaders, the Kaiser and the Crown Prince included, had become convinced that a definite Germany victory was no longer possible. His annexation policy, his desire that Germany retain Belgium and the mines in Northern France, had much to do with side-tracking peace by negotiation in 1917.

When the German army collapsed in 1918, the mark grew weaker. Many industrialists in Germany found themselves financially embarrassed. Stinnes, always forehanded, disposed of some of his properties in Lorraine, and with his confederates began a buying campaign in Germany, purchasing factories, mines, landed estates, wooded tracts, and other properties. The constantly decreasing value of the mark has made it possible for Hugo Stinnes to continue his purchasing, for he buys at one real value and pays later in depreciated currency. The number of marks paid is the agreed price, but the value of the marks paid has depreciated between the date of purchase and that of payment.

After the Spa conference in 1920 failed to bring French and German big industry together the two nations worried along grumblingly until an attempt was made by Mr. Stinnes to appease the French industrialists through the compact known as the Stinnes-Lubersac agreement. Under the terms of this agreement, the German government was to deliver raw materials to the French through a Stinnes concern, the Hoch und Tiefbau Gesellschaft, for reconstruction in northern France. The Hoch und Tiefbau Gesellschaft acted as purchasing and forwarding agents and received a 6 per cent commission on millions of dollars worth of materials delivered across the border. But Germany's ability to deliver was waning, and this agreement proved to have come too late to save Germany from a direct seizure of properties within her borders.

Mr. Stinnes had nothing to lose but his commissions. So, in his propaganda he supported the passive-resistance groups and advocated, not too loudly, opposition by the Ruhr workingmen to the French invasion. The Stinnes press helped stiffen the resistance. It has been estimated that he controls 90 per cent of the newspapers and periodicals of the country, though this estimate is perhaps exaggerated. If his control extends to 40 per cent he still controls a tremendous body of public opinion. Consequently, every proposal of the Government must take Stinnes's power into consideration. His opposition can devitalize the best intentions of the Government. On the other hand, his inside information of the Government's plans gives him an advantage over smaller industrialists.

Recently, within the ranks of Stinnes's party, the Deutsche Volkspartei, the political expression of big business, a difference of opinion as to how the Ruhr conflict should be met has arisen. The official leader of the party, Stresemann, believes that the Ruhr question should be settled immediately, and that whatever terms or forms that settlement takes should be carried out at once. Stinnes, as a patrioteer, is all for continuing the passive resistance. It is the same policy as he advocated in regard to Belgium.

Stresemann represents the middle-sized industries of Saxony; and the owners of these smaller industries realize that, with a continued absence of cheap coal and other raw materials, they cannot continue to hold out much longer. Their properties must eventually be sold. There are two groups of interests strong enough to absorb them. One is represented by Stinnes; the other is headed by the German General Electric Company, the Hamburg-American Line, and Otto Wolff. Both are buying up German industries. Their foreign holdings and connections give them a solid foundation that enables them to command the use of stable foreign moneys. In the present situation in the Ruhr, Stinnes's political position is not unlike that of the monarchist, or German Nationalist party, but for different reasons. "Don't give up the Ruhr," is their motto. It is a patriotic slogan and looks well in print. Furthermore, as long as the Government subsidizes the Ruhr industrialists so that their workingmen may be paid a nominal wage, a wage that is far below any known standard minimum wage, the owners of the Ruhr properties can afford to wait.

A recent business deal in Upper Silesia sheds light upon Mr. Stinnes's business acumen. Most of Upper Silesia, after the plebiscite which resulted in a German majority, was given to Poland. Poland has become a foster-child of France, and consequently German industrial interests are not as safe there today as a few years ago. Recently two large Stinnes enterprises in Upper Silesia were taken over by the Deutsch-Oesterreich Alpine-Montagne Gesellschaft, an Austrian organization, and new stock was issued. This stock has been placed in the hands of a syndicate which includes the large French industrialist, Schneider-Creusot, and it is not now likely that the Stinnes holding in Polish Silesia will be disturbed. They have the protection of the French industrialists with the French army behind them.

That Hugo Stinnes, as well as all large industrialists, has profited by the decline of the mark, is beyond question. The government has made it impossible for them not to profit. A year ago, the mark stood at about 300 to the dollar. It now stands at 3,000,000 to the dollar. Taxes are paid yearly, and in depreciated paper marks, not in the equivalent of gold values. The tax on profits earned, let us say, in June, 1922, when the mark was quoted at 300, is paid in 1923 with marks that are worth about one ten-thousandth of what they were at the time the profits were earned. Toward the end of 1922, the mark had already gone up into the thousands; and so, for this period, a larger percentage of taxes was obtained by the Government than for the earlier months of 1922. Still, the actual gold value of the money the Government has collected for the year 1922 is infinitesimal compared to what it would have been had the Government devised some method of computing taxes on business profits based on the gold value of the profits, at the time these profits were earned. Now, when the German treasury is practically empty, conferences are being held to see what can be done about revising the taxation laws so that big industry will pay its share.

A large-factory owner in Berlin told me that his tax bill for 1922 amounted to about 1 per cent of his net profits. Besides this, the Government collects a tax on the year's turn-over, amounting to 2 per cent of the total business of all enterprises. But as all business taxes are collected at the end of the year, and paid in deflated currency, it is evident that big business does not have to worry about paying enormous taxes. The workingmen, however, pay 10 per cent of their monthly wages every month to the Government. They do not profit by the decline of the mark.

In the pursuit of new properties, it is to the purchaser's interest for the mark to continue on the toboggan. The charge has been made that Stinnes and his business confederates have accelerated this decline in direct defiance of the Government's attempt to stabilize the currency.

The Government succeeded last spring in keeping the mark stationary for about six weeks at the rate of 20,000 per dollar. Confidence began to return to the people. Then, suddenly, the mark took another tumble. The Government could not afford to throw any more of its gold reserves into the market, and the inevitable happened. The mark declined to 30,000, to 40,000, and has kept sliding downward. A new law was passed prohibiting purchase of foreign exchange, save on the Exchange, and also hedging speculation with a great many minor ordinances. The panic that resulted from the somersaulting of the mark led the Government to investigate the cause of the decline. It seemed a clear case of speculative frenzy, and Stinnes was called to tell what he knew about it. The evidence presented showed that the Stinnes firm, on April 12, bid for 93,000 pounds after the close of the Exchange. This bid was advertised in banking circles and resulted in the weakening of the market on the Exchange. The Stinnes firm was able to obtain 60,000 pounds of the 93,000 it needed. Mr. Kalveram, its financial director, declared that, during the months when the Government was attempting to stabilize the mark, all the purchases of foreign exchange made by Stinnes were contracted for in the open market, not on the Exchange. On the Exchange, it was possible for the Reichsbank to meet the demands for foreign money when no other sellers appeared, and so satisfy demands at prevailing rates. In the open market, after Exchange hours, the Reichsbank could have no supporting influence. Hence the Stinnes action effectively sabotaged the Reichsbank's supports of the mark. In March Stinnes had written to the Minister of Finance, Dr. Hermes: "I have such strong doubts as to the efficacy of this type of foreign exchange politics that you may expect extreme measures from me, if I do not directly oppose them."

With the tremendous power at his command, a power that many German journalists have already characterized as playing ducks and drakes with the best intentions of the Government, Hugo Stinnes is gradually earning the reputation of a menace to the German people. The workingmen have long hated him because of his demand for a longer working day. Not many months ago Stinnes announced that reparations could be paid only if the workingmen worked harder and longer. The workingmen were to pay the reparations out of their starvation wages.

In highly skilled industries in America, where wages are high and the percentage relation between labor cost and total production cost is higher than in Germany, it has been found poor business to work more than eight hours because fatigue reduces productivity. In Germany, however, wages are so pitifully low that, even with a fatigue period entering after eight hours, the employer would still reap a rich profit from the labor of his employees. Mr. Stinnes's propaganda department advertises to all Germany and to the rest of the world that he works from fourteen to sixteen hours a day. Mr. Stinnes at least knows what he gets out of his work; but what the workingmen in big industry in Germany get "is something else again, Mawruss," as Montague Glass has told us again and again.

The Gallic War in Rhode Island

By ROBERT C. DEXTER

WITH the adjournment of the Rhode Island Legislature in June the second chapter in a battle centering around the question of language in the schools was brought to a close. For forty years Rhode Island has had on her statute books legislation making compulsory the teaching of the English language in all the schools of the State, public and private. For an even longer time she has had pouring into her manufacturing centers thousands of foreign mill operatives. The largest element among them has been the French-Canadians, who constitute today over one-sixth of the population of the State. These French-Canadians have struggled to keep themselves a separate group, untouched by any assimilative tendency. The present conflict had its origin in the report of a Commission on Public School Finance and Administration made to the Assembly in 1922. The particular clause which was objectionable to the French element was the following:

> The State Board of Education shall approve a private school only when it appears that the period of attendance of the pupils in such schools is substantially equal to that required by law in the public schools, that the instruction in such schools, except foreign languages and any studies not taught in the public schools, is in the English language, that such instruction is thorough and efficient.*

The italicized statement had been embodied in previous laws, but the crux of the situation was that control was now placed with the State Board, instead of being left to local school committees as hitherto. This provision, together with most of the other recommendations of the commission, came before the Assembly on motion of Representative Peck, and the resulting legislation is known as the Peck bill. The English-language requirement and the transfer of approval to the State Board were bitterly fought in the lower house. Representative Toupin, Democrat, now Lieutenant-Governor, moved an immediate amendment to strike out the English requirement; Representative Miette (now judge of the District Court of Woonsocket) moved to strike out the section giving the right of approval to the State Board.

In 1922 the Rhode Island House was Republican, and since the opponents of the bill, Toupin, Miette, and Flynn (now Governor of the State), were Democrats, it became a party measure and passed the lower house with a party majority. In the Senate in 1922 it met practically no opposition.

The Peck bill, with this provision for the compulsory teaching of English and State supervision, was then sent to Governor Sans Souci, a Republican of French extraction. Governor Sans Souci was in a predicament. All sorts of influences were brought to bear on him to veto the bill, but it was a strictly party measure sponsored by his own party. The State law holds that a governor approves a bill ipso facto if he does not veto it within ten days after the legislature adjourns. Governor Sans Souci waited twelve days and then vetoed the Peck bill, holding that there were two Sundays in the interval and that he was thus within his rights in so doing. The Board of Education, through its assistant commissioner, Dr. Charles Carroll, took the matter to the Supreme Court of the State, and obtained a decision that the veto was unconstitutional. The Peck bill thus went into effect on May 1, 1922.

One suggestive feature of this period of the conflict is that Monsignor Blessing, the representative of the Roman Catholic Bishop of Rhode Island, was in consultation with the members of the commission that was framing the bill, and expressed his approval. Furthermore, Dr. Carroll is a member of the Catholic communion. It could not thus be considered that the opposition to the bill was strictly or even mainly on religious grounds, although its opponents attempt to place it thereon.

The opponents of the English language were not beaten. "Le Bill Peck" was made a feature of the campaign of November, 1922, and the fires of race hatred and race ambition were stirred to the depths. As a result of this and other political factors, the normal Republican majority in Rhode Island was overturned by a sweeping Democratic victory, and the French vote was an essential element in the outcome.

This election made Mr. Flynn, an opponent of the bill, Governor, and Mr. Toupin, the leader of the opposition, Lieutenant-Governor, and it also gave the French element and their friends a large majority in the lower house. The Senate kept a very small Republican majority.

As soon as the new House assembled, Representatives Lamarre, of Pawtucket, and Belhumeur, of Woonsocket, introduced House Bill 699, nullifying the provisions of the Peck act so far as State supervision of private schools is concerned, and removing the mandatory teaching of the English language in such schools. School committees were authorized to approve private schools when the "period of attendance of the pupils or the teaching of the English language and of any studies in such schools is substantially equal to that required of a pupil attending a public school." The particular difficulty there is with the conjunction "or." The placing of approval with the local school committees, however, in many cases largely or entirely French in composition, would nullify the whole purpose of the Peck act. The original bill was later modified, to the extent of providing for the teaching of "reading, writing, geography, arithmetic, the history of the United States, the history of Rhode Island, and the principles of the American government" in English. The revised bill, however, definitely stated that other subjects than those mentioned might be taught in any language other than English, and insured to private schools the absolute right to teach languages other than English. In this form, the bill passed the lower house by a large majority.

Meanwhile, considerable opposition to the Lamarre-Belhumeur bill had developed in the community and an aggressive campaign led by the Providence Journal and the Providence Tribune, the League of Women Voters, and the Board of Education was waged against its passage. Such organizations as the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Council of Women, the Ladies of the Grand Army, the Unitarian Lay-men's League, the Federation of Women's Clubs of the State, and the American Legion all passed resolutions condemning the weakening of the State's educational and Americanization policy, which the passage of this bill involved. The French societies and the French clergy were equally active on the other side. The Peck act was depicted as a Ku Klux measure, and the assistant secretary of the St. Jean Baptiste Society, the strongest Canadian fraternal order in America, was retained as legislative counsel for the proponents of the new bill.

---

*The Rhode Island law requires all children between six and fifteen years of age either to attend a public school or to receive approved private instruction.

In the Senate the bill was sent to the Judiciary Committee for action. This committee decided that it would not report the bill to the Senate as a whole. The French-Canadian interests then brought pressure to bear on the Senate, and a motion was made to discharge the committee. This motion was lost by only two votes. However, it was lost, and when the Assembly adjourned the bill had not been presented to the Senate, and thus did not become law.

The French group are by no means through, however, They are sharpening their weapons for the next conflict, which will come during the ensuing elections and at the next session of the Assembly. They state that they will not remain satisfied until the provisions of the Peck act, providing for teaching in English and particularly for the enforcement of that provision by the State Board, are repealed. It is the possible enforcement which worries them most. They admit that they do not fear that the present board has any intention of interfering with their institutions, but they are fearful of the future. They intend to see to it that their young people remain French-Americans. They not only do not fear the hyphen; they glory in it, and are using every effort to preserve it. The Canadian leaders of Rhode Island have apparently taken to heart the advice of Ferdinand Gagnon, who, in addressing a group of American citizens, advised them to "Be loyal, but remain French-Canadians; loyal (to America), yes; French, always."

Such is the problem which the citizens of Rhode Island, the most densely populated and the most thoroughly foreign State in the Union, are facing.

Song Overheard on the Highway

By ANN HAMILTON

If I had only a hod
To carry up the road
I would be praising God
For such a light load;

Or if I had to lift
Only a pack of stone
I would welcome the gift
Of work to be done.

Oh there's no lusty lad
But can bear stone's weight,
And every man be glad
If a hod be his fate;

So wonder at my breaking—
For how are you to see
There is no leave-taking
Of the heart in me?

In the Driftway

THE Drifter confesses to being almost as liberal-minded as his colleagues the editors of The Nation. Particularly in regard to the rights and privileges of woman is he ready to admit that the conventions of the past should no longer be binding. He is willing that the creatures should wear as short skirts and as sleeveless dresses as they desire. He submits, with some compunctions, to bobbed hair and the concomitant shaved necks, and he is willing that women office-workers should come to their offices without hats. He is mildly interested in that change in public taste which permits the most reputable Sunday pictorial supplements to portray our young women bathing marvels in one-piece suits which, when he was a boy, were pictured only in the columns of the Police Gazette, hoping that thereby healthful athletic pursuits are being encouraged and that the morbid and prurient curiosity aroused in his sex by undue concealment of the female figure will be eliminated. He has long since abandoned all opposition to the growing use of cosmetics, realizing that they are as old as humanity and as inevitable. Has he not read somewhere that Americans spend yearly more money on cosmetics and chewing gum than on the education of their children?

* * * * *

ALL of which leads up to the observation that there is one place where the Drifter's inborn conservatism makes him draw the line, and that is at the public application of rouge and powder. The original theory of cosmetics was that they should be used so skilfully as to deceive the male animal. If that element of deceit made the use of cosmetics unethical, if not immoral, there was interjected at least an element of art and of skill. You put on your false color so admirably that your innocent type of lover or courtier never suspected it. Of course the French courts in the time of the Louis's and the license of the court of Charles the Second changed all that. Powder came into the open. You authenticated and legitimized it in the white wig; you laid it on thick to make greater the contrast with the obvious rouge, and called attention to both by your beauty spots—originally used to hide defects.

* * * * *

IN more modern times, however, milady has not been supposed to use cosmetics at all. She frequently did, of course, but always in the sanctity of her boudoir or her bedchamber. All that has gone with the arrival of the modern bathing suit whose frank revelations led one young girl to defend the custom of concealing her ears with her hair by explaining that she did it in order to have at least one surprise in reserve for her future husband. Your modern young woman draws out her powder-puff, rouge-box, and lipstick in the subway as readily as in a railway train, a motor, a hotel-lobby, or in her seat in the theater, wishing, apparently, to be as frank as truth, and to let the truth prevail. But not even that defensible policy can placate the Drifter, or make him feel happy when, as the commuter-train draws in to the Grand Central, he sees young and old of the fair sex about him pull out their mirrors and their puffs. For, as they dab, he is invariably beset by the horrible suspicion that the puff has taken the place of soap with many of these young persons, and that it is used to conceal a multitude of lapses just before train-time. The very motions of this swabbing suggest nothing so much as those of a cat in the process of cleansing herself—a lick, a pat, a circular stroke, a promise, a lick again.

* * * * *

At this point the Drifter's office mate looked over his shoulder: "Well, they are cats, the hussies!" "Not all of them," replied THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Letters to the Editor should ordinarily not exceed 400 words, and shorter communications are more likely to be printed. In any case the Editor reserves the right to abridge communications.

The I.W.W. to Warren G. Harding

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The enclosed I wrote last evening. My husband, a Wobbly, said: "Send it to The Nation, where it will reach people who need to understand the Wob." I did not change it. It may be a little too strong for you to use. But it's good.

Enemy, you have gone. We do you no wrong to call you "enemy." Indeed, we do you honor. For we are the hated I.W.W.

We were the poles of Society, you and we. You the great reactionary negative; we the revolutionary positive. Nowhere in Science, in History, nor in a horse-shoe magnet have we ever met.

Joe Eads went as quickly. You never knew Joe—he was just an I.W.W. A saw mill got him. Zzz! and out went Joe. . . . You and he may meet out there in the Great Gray Fog. And perhaps you two will argue—Joe loved an argument. You were of about the same age; you will look much alike out there, two gray wraiths—arguing.

You did much to further the revolutionary cause—Warren G. Harding. More than Joe, although Joe was a good traveling delegate.

History moves stately, unhurried, and with a pitiless inevitability. You had a part in the great drama and you played it well. You had good support—Taft, Hughes, Hoover, Daugherty. Your part was to pull—back. And you did. That "pardon" you gave our boys in Leavenworth, how true to form it was!

Why should anyone be personal? You laid a wreath on the graves of the boys who fell in the battle of Centralia, on your side of the Class War. Perhaps some day you will creep back from the Great Gray Fog and lay a wreath of everlastings on the grave of Wesley Everett. I've always thought that folks go on, Out There.

You loved your dog Laddie. We, too, have loved a dog. I knew a Wobbly once who owned a dog, and when this Wobbly fellow would hop a freight this dog would hide from the railroad "bulls" and then sneak along under the cars to where his master, riding the rods, would reach down and gather him up. Perhaps you and Joe will have a dog apiece out there, for I've always thought that dogs go where men go. You and Joe; it makes me smile to think how much you'll look alike out in the Fog; just gray wraiths you'll be—Out There.

Fate cuts her capers. That you should go in California and so close to San Quentin that shelters so many rebels—was it irony?

Well, Warren G. Harding, you've gone. The nation will do you honor. Rockefeller and Gompers and all the rest will send you flowers. What shall we send, we lumber-jacks, mule-skinners, harvest hands, sailors, workers in dirt—I.W.W.? We were never personal about this business. War is War. Events are Events. And Men are Pawns. You were a man who loved his dog. So what shall we send you—something that you may take with you out into the Great Gray Fog? Warren G. Harding—Our Pardon.

Seattle, Washington, August 4 CATHERINE HOUGHTELING

Mr. Townley and Magnus Johnson

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am writing you briefly to say that your article on "Minnesota, the Nonpartisan League, and the Future" contains at least one big mistake. In the article it is stated: "Mr. Townley seems to have thrown such influence as was left to him in Minnesota against Magnus Johnson." Now this is certainly entirely wrong, for Mr. Townley was for me in the campaign; in fact I might say that he was one of the men who was most anxious for me to file. The Nonpartisan League is still the active organization among the farmers, and it is only proper to say that had it not been for the Nonpartisan League we could have won no victory on July 16.

I am sorry that your otherwise splendid magazine should have published this erroneous statement. It has given people a very wrong idea as to the situation in the State.

Minneapolis, August 15 MAGNUS JOHNSON,
United States Senator

Cutting Gasoline Prices

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The action taken by the Governor of South Dakota to force down the price of gasoline will temporarily benefit the consumer, but in the final analysis the Standard Oil group will emerge from the fray stronger than ever. A drop in the price of crude oil will most certainly follow so drastic a cut in the price of the refined product. Such a drop will place in financial straits many small producers who are just hanging on by their eyebrows, and the Standard will come to their "rescue" indirectly, and purchase their holdings at the Standard's own figure.

The Standard "courts competition"—for public consumption, but in reality there is no competition in either the crude or refined oil industry. As an illustration: Some two years ago Kentucky crude had a ready market at around $5 a barrel, and drilling became very active, which resulted in the discovery of a number of valuable oil pools by independent companies. Operators in general were happy and growing prosperous. Suddenly the price of crude hit the toboggan and slid down to about a dollar a barrel. When the smoke cleared away, the discovery was made that the Standard group had gathered into its net such properties as it desired, and at its own figure. The price then began to advance, is now around $3.00 a barrel, and will probably keep advancing locally until venturesome spirits open up other new fields for the Standard to acquire by again dropping the price of crude.

The Governor of South Dakota will momentarily be hailed by flivver owners and the uninitiated as a great benefactor of the human race. But where is the Governor going to get gasoline to keep the price down? Surely not from the Standard Oil Company or any of its affiliated companies. If not there, where then? Independents cannot supply the demand if they would, and there is no independent who is avariciously inclined that dares to buck the Standard. The Standard has taught these so-called independents many a lesson that they know to be vital to their continuous and prosperous existence. They take their cue from the market quotations of the crude and refined product, and all operators and refiners know whence these emanate.

A disregard of these quotations often spells disorder to those who are so foolhardy as to violate them. In Los Angeles some ten years ago ten or twelve independent refiners of crude oil undertook to buck the Standard. The Standard met the independent cut until the wholesale price of gasoline to filling stations dropped to 9 cents a gallon. The independents then got together and formed a price-boosting association. This bright idea was submitted to the Standard's local manager and approved. On a certain Monday morning the price was to be boosted one cent a gallon, and similar boosts were to follow at reasonable intervals until the price had reached "all the traffic would stand." The independents had their filling-station bulletins reprinted for the great event, and advised their customers to "fill up" prior to the coming price boost. You can imagine the consternation in the camp of the independents when they awoke on this eventful Monday morning and found the old price cut half a cent a gallon at all Standard filling stations. The Standard's local manager "explained" that he had received orders from San Francisco to make the cut too late to notify the independents, some of which went to the wall, while the lesson it taught the others will never be forgotten.

Well, what are we going to do about it? Nothing whatsoever so long as we permit ourselves to be governed by a clique of plutocrats and nonproducers.

New York City, August 14 F. H. ALLEN

Mill on Marriage

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will you permit an admiring reader of both Mr. Mill and Mr. Lewisohn to point out an extremely misleading statement in Mr. Lewisohn's review of Mill's "Essay on Liberty," which he evidently read more enthusiastically than accurately. In Mr. Lewisohn's review (The Democrat's Handbook, The Nation, July 4) the reviewer says of Mill:

> Regarding "all restraint qua restraint as evil" he pleads for the right of man to break all engagements that have become devoid of inner meaning and survive as mere forms, and hence asserts that "the most important of these engagements, marriage, having the peculiarity that its objects are frustrated unless the feelings of both parties are in harmony with it, should require nothing more than the declared will of either party to dissolve it."

If you will consult the text of Mill's "On Liberty," Chapter V, you will find that this statement is quoted by Mill from Baron Wilhelm von Humboldt, and that so far from sharing Von Humboldt's view Mill proceeds to refute it by the following argument:

> When a person, either by express promise or by conduct, has encouraged another to rely upon his continuing to act in a certain way—to build expectations and calculations, and stake any part of his life upon that supposition—a new series of moral obligations arises on his part toward that person, which may possibly be overruled, but cannot be ignored. And again, if the relation between two contracting parties has been followed by consequences to others; if it has placed third parties in any peculiar position, or, as in the case of marriage, has even called third parties into existence, obligations arise on the part of both the contracting parties toward those third persons, the fulfilment of which, or at all events the mode of fulfilment, must be greatly affected by the continuance or disruption of the relation between the original parties to the contract . . . A person is bound to take all these circumstances into account before resolving on a step which may affect such important interests of others; and if he does not allow proper weight to those interests, he is morally responsible for the wrong.

Mill's rationalization of fidelity to the marriage vow is especially interesting to readers of his "Autobiography," who will remember that for over twenty years before his marriage to Mrs. Taylor, with whose advice and inspiration he wrote the "Essay On Liberty," he had loved her "in a relation of strong affection and confidential intimacy only. For though we did not consider the ordinances of society binding on a subject so entirely personal, we did feel bound that our conduct should be such as in no degree to bring discredit on her husband, nor therefore on herself." (Autobiography, Chapter VII.)

I trust that The Democrat's Handbook will be no less safe for democracy because of this evidence that its author belongs among the virtuous Victorians.

Mills College, California, July 6 LUCY LOCKWOOD HAZARD

Books

Red Man or Mongrel White?

Old Indian Trails. By Walter McClintock. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

The Red Man in the United States. Made under the direction of G. E. E. Lindquist. George H. Doran Company. $3.50.

"WE are not moving; we are just standing still. The buffalo are all gone, the antelope and the rest of the game also. The white men continue to drive us toward the setting sun; but now the Rocky Mountains face us like a wall and we can go no farther. I do not care for myself; I shall soon go to the Great Spirit. But I am anxious for our little children; I know not what will become of them." So spoke Mad Wolf to his people, at the end of a great Sun Dance, some twenty-five years ago. Those who have seen his descendants, war-dancing at hotels in Glacier Park and swearing in the ready tourist as blood brother, should read this beautiful and Arcadian story by a genuine white son of the tribe, adopted before the free life in the nomadic hunting lodge had quite passed away. Mr. McClintock, we understand, is now a State historian, but the quality of his record of Blackfoot customs, ceremonies, folk tales is anything but dry as dust. An instinctive kinship with the Indian world surely led him to Mad Wolf's tipi. Somehow he helps us to see, as in a crystal, a race of beings of another substance than our own, allied to trees and streams and animals, and, as animals and forests, nourished generically by some primordial life-stream very different from the highly distilled fluid that runs in white man's veins. If New York were enveloped and destroyed by an alien army, many individual New Yorkers would survive and recreate a new personal life. Looking into McClintock's crystal, I see that when the Blackfoot were surrounded, it was as if the lumbermen had taken possession of a mountain side; the great trees fell, the pristine sap flowed away, and there remained only a scarified surface and a scrub growth which could never again aspire to be virgin forest.

With scrub growth the Indian historian of the twentieth century has largely to deal, and "The Red Man in the United States" may inaugurate an era in which the present hybrid social and economic life of our wards will receive more attention than their legendary past. This survey is not a work of science. It is written with a definite bias and propagandist aim —the Protestant Christianization of all Indians. But it does contain a formidable array of facts. Let us look at the Blackfoot. He lives today on a reservation in northwestern Montana, with certain Piegans and Bloods of the same confederacy, 3,007 in all, of whom 220 are citizens. A large proportion of the land has been allotted, but most of the irrigable tracts are leased to white men (450 on the reservation) at low rentals, and are in any case "of very little use to the Indians, on account of the expense involved in irrigation, and the distance to be traveled." Loan sharks are also obtaining much land by foreclosure; oil prospecting is going on. The tribal herd of cattle is diminishing, rations have been issued for two years, "poverty is almost universal." In the generous days of the tipi, it seems that chiefs had several wives to aid in the dispensing of hospitality. Now "marriage laws are generally observed." But housing conditions are "unsatisfactory." Ten per cent of the population have tuberculosis, and 25 per cent trachoma. "By way of amusement" five dance-halls, two movie-houses, three pool-rooms, and Indian dances, held twice a month, help to "keep alive the old superstitions" and maintain 25 per cent of the Indians "under the influence of the old religion." Crime is increasing, gambling is common, alcohol and prostitution prevail in Browning (the white town). But "school facilities are ample" and there are Presbyterian, Methodist, and Catholic missions.

Such facts, says Mr. Lindquist, tell their own story. We only wish we agreed with him. The interpretation of the editor of the survey, fully in accord with the Indian Bureau, is that, whatever our past failures, we are now, governmentally, on the right track in Indian policy. Absorption is the solution. A little more white-manization, accompanied by complete depaganization, and the trick is turned. But other groups of Indian experts and altruists hold views diametrically opposed. Compare the "conclusions" of the missionary group with a tentative program of Indian policy recently drawn up by five societies—including two scientific societies—concerned with Indian welfare. "The Red Man" postulates eleven points of needed reform. Seven have to do with Christian propaganda; the other four are gradual advance to full citizenship, suppression of disease, emancipation from harmful practices, notably from peyote and Indian dances, and adequate educational facilities, with enrolment in public schools as ultimate goal. The welfare group also stress the need for an effective health program, but their seven remaining requirements deal with education, industry, land tenure, irrigation, religion, autonomy, and administration along the lines of the development, not the destruction, of Indian race pride. Call into service group and communal loyalties instead of suppressing them, utilize native arts and industries commercially, retain Indian land and water rights in tribal hands, protect native dances, customs, and religious freedom, increase Indian autonomy, create a new attitude toward Indian culture on the part of the Indian's friends and guardians—this is, in substance, their Magna Carta.

What would the Indians themselves say if the programs were put to a vote? We know many who are asking the right to pursue life, liberty, and happiness as their own communal needs and race consciousness demand. Granted that we have, in the case of many Indian tribes, a fairly degenerate stock; even a scrub pine may take a noble height, if the slash is cleared away, and the roots strike deep into native earth.

Elizabeth Shepley Sergeant

A Poet in Prison

Bars and Shadows: Revised Edition. By Ralph Chaplin. Nellie Seeds Nearing. $1.

WHAT must be regarded as a more or less chance mercy has freed the body of Ralph Chaplin from Leavenworth Penitentiary, where he served five years of his twenty-year sentence for having anticipated the conclusions of Woodrow Wilson concerning the economic purpose of the late war. The nine new lyrics in this 1923 edition of his prison poems add to the testimony of the twenty-eight retained from the 1922 edition, that Chaplin's soul continues to walk in the black shadows of those bars. Ralph Chaplin, the rebel, is still in Leavenworth, which did so incomparably much, and so inadvertently, for Ralph Chaplin, the poet.

The growth of this man's poetic gift through the anguish of those five years is startling to those who remember his earlier work, flaming but still unformed. Nearly all the pure propaganda and rhetoric have been burnt out of his writing; he is no longer a revolutionist who writes poetry, but a poet who is inspired by revolution.

The tragic Mourn Not the Dead, the ardent Warrior Wind, have company now in the dreary Rain on the Roofs and the heart-breaking Some Day a Silent Guard. The Villanelle, charming as it is, has no place here; Salaam and one or two others, for all their fine defiance, retain a little of youthful stridency. But most of these thirty-six poems challenge the world of literature as surely as they have already challenged the world of radicalism. The stirring introduction by Scott Nearing to the first edition is retained in the second, and the little volume carries an interesting cover-paper designed by Hugo Gellert, and a symbolic title-page drawing by the poet himself.

Many of the older poems have been reprinted widely, Mourn Not the Dead most of all. One which has not received the publicity its beauty and spirit deserve is To Freedom, which with several others displays Chaplin's use of the sonnet form:

Up on the "lookout" in the wind and sleet,
Out in the woods of fir and spruce and pine,
Down in the hot stopes of the dripping mine,
We dreamed of you and Oh the dream was sweet!
And now you bless the felon food we eat
And make each iron cell a sacred shrine;
For when your love thrills in the blood like wine,
The very stones grow holy to our feet.

We shall be faithful though we march with Death
And singing storm the battlements of Wrong,
For life is such a little thing to give.
So we shall fight as long as we have breath—
Love in our hearts and on our lips a song—
Without you it were better not to live!

Miriam Allen deFord

Causeries du Dimanche

More Books on the Table. By Edmund Gosse. Charles Scribners Sons. $2.50.

THE characteristics of Mr. Gosse's essays in criticism are so well known that this latest series of critical kit-cats (reprinted thriftily from the columns of the Sunday Times) offers small opportunity for novel comment on the part of the reviewer. The suaviter in modo is, as usual, more apparent than the fortiter in re; but the gentility and elegance of manner is not a covering for an entire absence of substance. True, the criticism is not very profound or original, but it is founded upon wide culture, discriminating taste, and a scholarship which though not impeccable is carried without effort or self-consciousness. All these causeries have to do with recently published books, and the subject is dictated by the chance of the publishers' "offering" during the current week. Mr. Gosse's mind flits up and down the centuries, and the range of his interests is so broad as to cast doubt in some cases upon the value and authority of his opinions. One cannot receive in an equally unquestioning spirit pronouncements from a "secular pulpit" upon such widely contrasting themes as "Beowulf" and "Earlham," Rostand and Philostratus. At times Mr. Gosse seems to be feeling his way, delicately and gingerly; at others he chats charmingly in arm-chair fire-side ease.

The passage of years has not a whit dampened his enthusiasm for literature, and he bestows generous yet wisely qualified praise upon the work of "the younger men"; even Proust is not beyond his sympathetic ken. But he is most happy when the weekly book upon his table offers an excuse for an excursion into some half-forgotten corner of the literature of former times. If his remarks are often apt and acute when weighing the merits of, say, Mr. Lytton Strachey or Mr. Percy Lubbock, he is nevertheless more at ease when he writes of Charles Cotton and seventeenth-century burlesque, of Mark Akenside, or of that curious publication "The Oxford Sausage" (for my introduction to which I am grateful to Mr. Gosse). His personal experiences with the English and continental literary world of half a century enable him to draw upon a vast fund of anecdote and ana, and in sentences and paragraphs scattered through many of the essays he offers choice bits of reminiscence. He is, of course, at his best when considering a writer with whom he is thoroughly in sympathy (as in the essay on Ste. Beuve), or when attempting the difficult task of appraising the merits of a writer concerning whom the critics have arrived at no final estimate (as in the essay on Leigh Hunt, perhaps the best in this volume).

Mr. Gosse's remarks upon Lamartine's indebtedness to English literature are somewhat thin, and he gives no evidence of acquaintance with Estève's admirable studies in this field of inquiry. And, like so many English critics, his knowledge of American contributions to literary criticism stands in need of enrichment. Thus, he writes of Browning in France with no apparent awareness of the fact that the same subject has been already treated more authoritatively and with far more documentation in an admirable paper by Professor W. L. Phelps. He says roundly that "no imposing contribution to Browning literature has been produced" during the last twenty years, revealing by the assertion the fact that he does not know the magnificent photographic facsimile of "The Old Yellow Book" issued by the Carnegie Institute. His essay on the Wrenn library is not without value; but to speak of Austin, Texas, as "a small town on the Mexican border" is as though an American should describe the Hebrides as a group of islands situated in the suburbs of London. Mr. Gosse will be interested to learn that it takes twenty hours by train to reach the border from Austin.

With all his urbanity this critic has always been a master of genteel, discreet malice. A method often employed to train kittens not to scratch is to squeeze their paws as soon as they give evidence of that obnoxious habit. Mr. Gosse's paws were manipulated in that fashion at an early age; and through his velvet pads the claws are hardly perceptible. But they are there and are felt on occasion. There is a quiet controlled irony in his review of Mrs. Watts-Dunton's absurd book "The Home Life of Swinburne" that is more dangerous than loud denunciation or raucous laughter. The claws are again unsheathed, barely unsheathed, in the essay on Lord Rosebery. But most of the time they are quite withdrawn, and Mr. Gosse purrs contentedly.

SAMUEL C. CHEW

Russian Masters

Talks with Tolstoy. By A. B. Goldenveizer.

Tolstoy's Love Letters; with a Study of the Autobiographical Elements in Tolstoy's Work. By Paul Biryukov. Both translated by S. S. Koteliansky and Virginia Woolf. The Hogarth Press. Each 5s.

Dostoievsky: Letters and Reminiscences. Translated by S. S. Koteliansky and J. Middleton Murry. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

". . . remember that art is not everything. . . . In your relations with people it is necessary to try to give them as much as possible and to take from them as little as possible." So the pianist, A. B. Goldenveizer, reports Tolstoi spoke to him. M. Goldenveizer noted many fragments of conversation at Yasnaya Polyana, many brief episodes displaying Tolstoi's superb bodily and mental vigor, his horsemanship, his peasant-like shrewdness applied to a vast reading, the primitive Christian asceticism that made the memory of his youthful excesses a torture. No words than these, however, more closely approach one of the central problems of Tolstoi's life. He was artist in the early Caucasus and Sebastopol works as in the later panorama of "War and Peace" and "Anna Karenina." He was artist even in his exposition of the two aspects of social horror, corrupt luxury and wretched poverty, and his impotence in face of it, contained in "What Is to Be Done?" He was not artist only. Feeling that art cannot truly exist in a corrupt society divorced entirely from the toiling masses, he was reformer too. He foresaw that the Russian upper class, resting dizzily and in sterile self-indulgence upon the backs of the peasantry, indulging themselves in Western European culture that had no derivation from the common people, must eventually be destroyed. Searching for the humanity of the heart and shrewd earthy wisdom, he found it among the peasants to whom his temper and character were in many ways kin. His own position, infected in youth by upper class vices as he felt himself, was an impossible one. Even the homely life and work among peasants he chose at Yasnaya Polyana, he knew to be makeshift only. Did not his family, surrounding him, misunderstand his aims and repudiate his actions? "I live in the wrong way," Goldenveizer quotes him as saying, "and know it is the wrong way, but I have always wanted and tried to live better, only I could not . . ." He foresaw the implications of a freer, saner way of life, without hermetic partition of rich from poor, and imagined the ingenuousness that would be possible for men of letters truly expressing a people's life: "It seems to me that in time works of art will cease to be invented. It will be a shame to invent a story about a fictitious Ivan Ivanovich or Marie Petrovna. Writers, if such there be, will not invent, but will only describe the significant or interesting things which they have happened to observe in life." For most fiction, as M. Biryukov's parallels between Tolstoi's memoirs and novels illustrate, is only the truth slightly displaced.

The theme of simplicity, directness and search for truth runs through Tolstoi's letters to the young girl to whom he was betrothed in his 28th year. The frivolous society to which she was addicted meant death to Tolstoi's struggle: and to that struggle he adhered.

Dostoievski brought to literature much of the human document for which Tolstoi was contending. Dostoievski's poverty and illness, the imprisonment for four years among common criminals, his own weaknesses of gambling and impulsiveness, with the displacement conventional to fiction found expression in his novels. He lacked Turguenev's Poe-like elegance of imagination that came of detachment from existence. Dostoievski was sometimes hasty, and wrote in desperate need to obtain money. Yet the life he knew, had lived and had seen being lived in Russia, flowed unceasingly from his pen. The title of his first book, significant of all his work, was "Poor People."

Dostoievski's letters to Maikov, partly translated before this, and his wife's reminiscences newly englished, recall the human being, appealing in exile for money advances from his publishers, providing for an unworthy stepson even while with wife and infant child he freezes and well-nigh starves in Geneva. The letters develop his credo that culminated in the address on Pushkin delivered in Moscow the year before he died. The address drew together the threads of his faith and of aspects of Tolstoi's faith. Dostoievski, too, saw in the common people the salvation of art and of life. He turned from Western Europe whose collapse he predicted with uncanny prescience in 1880. He was the "queer fellow" whose dream he wrote, imagining gentleness, humanity and lovely people reigning on earth. He denounced the intellectuals who had deplored the institution of serfdom while continuing to live in Paris on the income from their serfs, diverting themselves by publishing radical leaflets. A simple faith and spirit of sacrifice informing the individual life, not intellectual formulas borrowed from without, Dostoievski felt to be the creator and sustainer of a nation. It was to the Russia of Pushkin's Tatiana, the Russia of the common people, and to their Gospel faith that he turned. The address on Pushkin earned for Dostoievski the title of reactionary. Even Tolstoi later remarked to Gorki that Dostoievski had coquetted and gone in for politics. It may be true, moreover, that Dostoievski in the letters to his wife on that occasion, included in the present volume, exaggerated Turguenev's opposition, had an eye to fame and income from the sale of his books. Yet he was contending for a profound truth, one of especial importance to America where the soulless tyranny of business and the machine-sodden mob threaten to reign supreme. He was affirming the primacy of human gentleness, of the faith to be found among the Russian people, as a soil from which all literature might spring, not as an adornment to drawing rooms but as an expression of the people's soul, the only thing that makes a nation.

The present volumes are to be regarded rather as footnotes than contributions of first importance in the record of these lives.

HERBERT J. SELIGMANN

War Production and Profiteers

Industrial America in the World War. By Grosvenor B. Clarkson. Houghton Mifflin Company. $6.

THE king of France, with twenty thousand men, marched up a hill, and then marched down again. The Council of National Defense, and its offspring, the War Industries Board, were formed to rope what Mr. Clarkson rightly calls "the wild horses of American economic and political tradition and habit" and to tie them "into a mechanism of purposeful control." When the proposal was first made to General Wood he is reported to have exclaimed, "Three cheers; this is exactly what we need." And so the dollar-a-year men came to Washington. Requirements of the many government bureaus were studied, coordinated, and recoordinated. Sources of supplies were charted. Priorities were issued. Prices were set. The tangle of industrial planlessness was cleared enough so that we could get out the mountains of necessary products with the best fifth of our working population in the army. Billions of profits were made. A slight beginning was marked in the reduction of economic waste. "It was found that almost all industries were encumbered with an unbelievable amount of unexamined tradition, that resulted in duplication of effort, waste of material, and unnecessary expenditure of energy." An example of economy was the partial standardization of coffins, which alone saved at the yearly rate of 35 per cent of labor, 6,000 tons of steel, 285 tons of tin plate, 275,000 pounds of copper, 90,000 pounds of brass, 74,000 pounds of bronze, 70,000 pounds of pig tin, 17,000 pounds of nickel, 2,200 tons of coal, and 212,000 yards of wool fabrics. At length the war was won. It was felt, with the resumption of private and retail death, that a propensity for greater variety in coffins must be encouraged. The wild horses were champing at their bits. So we gave up any attempt at purposeful control, and went back to the wilderness of peace. And the General Woods again said, in effect, "Three cheers; this is exactly what we need."

One would require both the pen of Thomas Hardy and the dictaphone of Bernard Shaw to picture the farce-tragedy of industrial America in the World War. This equipment Mr. Clarkson has not, but his book will arouse many suggestive reminiscences among those who saw intimately what he is pleased to call the "mechanism of purposeful control." The farce consisted in the stubborn stupidity of bureaucrats who would not sing the words of cooperation to the tune of coordination, the efforts to exercise control without authority and authority without control, the appeals to the patriotism of profiteers to set their own prices low enough so that the nation would not break under the strain, the final semi-mastery of the situation by a shrewd and imaginative millionaire speculator. The tragedy lay in the great and heroic attempt to improvise a real national economy through drawing up and executing a plan for production and consumption, followed by the scramble to abandon any plan as soon as the business of living was substituted for the business of killing.

There were substantial reasons why the war-industries machine could not be immediately converted to the uses of peace. One was loss of the purchasing power from the government to thousands of private agencies. Another was the lack of a social state of mind on the part of those business and financial executives whose good-will was, barring a revolution, essential. But in the war experience social scientists will in the course of time find many fruitful hints for an ordered world. Mr. Clarkson is sorry the machine was scrapped, since he wanted to use it to carry on the commercial conflict for foreign trade. Some time enough people may desire to build a similar agency for the welfare of all the citizens so that the idea of planning will be revived. The significance of the experiment is not yet understood, even in a small degree. Anyone reading this book with imagination may understand it a little better.

George Soule

The Government of France

French Parties and Politics. By Roger H. Soltau. Oxford University Press. 85 cents.

ROGER SOLTAU has done well in seventy-eight pages what others have done blurredly in thick volumes. He has given a succinct sketch of the primary questions which agitate French politics, an illuminating résumé of the history of political parties in the Third Republic, and an estimate of the status of those parties today. In no great country are political lines as confused as in France; Mr. Soltau, unlike some recent American writers who came into post-war France with only an ample stock of war-time prejudices, went to school in France and has a background; unlike M. Poincaré, whose "How France is Governed," intended for French school children, has puzzled many English adults, he has an Anglo-Saxon outlook. His study of the origin of present-day politics in the conflicts of the Dreyfus period and of the persistent importance of the religious issue in French politics is particularly satisfying. He is generally free from partisan prejudice, although he handles the persecution of Caillaux and Malvy with a reserve which seems to be born of fear of offending prejudice. One might wish, in a record which is so contemporaneous, for some hint of the politics behind the neglect of General Sarrail and the succession of Joffre, Nivelle, and Pétain, and one might look for more understanding of post-war syndicalism than Mr. Soltau shows—but these are slight blemishes on a difficult task well done.

L. S. G.

State and Nation

Our Changing Constitution. By Charles W. Pierson. Doubleday, Page and Company. $1.50.

THIS modest volume might well have been submitted as a brief for Rhode Island in the National Prohibition cases. It is written "to point out the change" which has been going on for half a century and more, no less significant in the theory than in the practice of our government. "The idea which constituted its most distinctive feature, and in the belief of many represents America's most valuable contribution to the science of government, is being forgotten. Formed to be 'an indestructible Union composed of indestructible States,' our dual system is losing its duality. The States are fading out of the picture."

The phenomenon has lost much of its novelty, but none of its juristic perplexities or historical anomalies. Witness the legal talent which has supported an anciently respectable theory of our political structure against the onslaughts of modern short-cut politicians who pass such constitutional iniquities as the Sheppard-Towner Act and the Child Labor Act. Or the divergence of opinion which so frequently crops out among the final interpreters of our constitutional theory in the Supreme Court when faced by State laws on the borderline of States' rights.

Mr. Pierson has collected a number of points in an argument against the logical outcome in theory of the growth of national unity since the Civil War. He does it, not blindly or passionately, but quietly, almost regretfully. It is a forensic suitable to the atmosphere of the courtroom; it would hardly catch the ear of the political multitudes. Why argue the constitutionality of the Federal corporation tax (and there are some rather nice points involved, perhaps) when its working is so obviously little more than another failure of a theory of corporation control by government?

The author's discussion of the taxation of State and municipal bonds is a fair index of his viewpoint on all questions close to that line which Mr. Justice Holmes has so aptly said must be "pricked out" by decisions on its opposite sides. "The immunity enjoyed by State bond issues is coming to be regarded less as a safeguard of State rights than as a means whereby the rich escape Federal income surtaxes. One is tempted to predict that the next formal amendment of the Constitution will deal with this subject. If so, another inroad will have been made by the general government on the failing powers of the States."

The philosophy of Taney found its practical answer in a new formula of nationalism; "the fear of Federal encroachment, so strong in the minds of the makers of our Constitution" has indeed "become little more than a tradition"—among the people. But it shows no signs of legal decrepitude or forensic sterility. And it is still the refuge of our most far-seeing and open-minded jurists against an increasing flood of laws from our forty-nine sovereign legislatures which in the conflict between expediency and orthodoxy are given "a coating of constitutionality," as Mr. Justice Holmes has well defined it. If it were possible to get even an approximate agreement as to the meaning and content of the doctrine of States' rights among the nine members of the Supreme Court, it would doubtless do as well as any other "legal litmus paper" to test the coating. But like so many other formulas it has as many interpretations as there are interpreters, among whom Mr. Pierson may be numbered well to the Right. He has given us a conservative view of a conservative theory.

PHILLIPS BRADLEY

Books in Brief

The Peterborough Anthology. Being a Selection from the Work of the Poets who have been Members of the MacDowell Colony. Compiled and with an Introduction by Jean Wright Gorman and Herbert S. Gorman. Theater Arts, Inc. $2.

This volume, which contains nearly as much first-rate poetry as can be read in any contemporary anthology, is a profound testimonial to the doctrine that art flourishes in quietude. The "long, cool days among deep green trees" at Peterborough have been and will continue to be responsible for many extraordinary poems, novels, essays, paintings, sculptures, and musical compositions of a sort that cannot be happily produced in cities. At the same time, a few pieces included here are reminders that quiet alone does not create a poet.

Stories, Dreams and Allegories. By Olive Schreiner. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $1.75.

Nothing that Olive Schreiner wrote is negligible. From this point of view Mr. Cronwright-Schreiner was quite justified in collecting the author's posthumous papers into a book. One feels the woman in her creations. And when all is said and done that is where justification for her work must finally reside. Her naturalism, displayed in a story like "Eighteen-Ninety-Nine," is not of sufficient strength to stand the corrosion of years. Her dreams are mystical to be sure, but without that tremendous volcanic poetry which is the only thing worth while in mysticism. And her allegories—well, these posthumous allegories at any rate—simply do not get across. Nevertheless, a truly emancipated woman years before her time wrote these papers. One feels that in reading her work, and it is sufficient.

American Addresses. By Chaim Weizmann. Preface by Samuel Untermyer. Palestine Foundation Fund.

Both the appalling magnitude of the Zionist task and the inspiring efforts made by Jews the world over in its accomplishment are vividly presented in these concise statements of the material and spiritual problems of Palestine which the president of the World Zionist Organization made to his American constituents. Brief though they are, the speeches are charged with a current of energetic idealism which flashes to the soul of the reader as readily as it communicated itself to the audiences that responded with magnificent enthusiasm.

A Sheaf from Lermontov. Translated from J. J. Robins. Lieber and Lewis. $1.50.

Welcome but exceedingly unskilful versions of some of the most brilliant poems ever written in Europe.

Health Building and Life Extension. By Eugene Lyman Fisk. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

For ten years the Life Extension Institute has been investigating the causes of ill-health, trying to discover how the factory employee can be so fortified against disease that he can work 304 days a year instead of 300. It has long been known that many diseases were preventable, but only in recent years have there been systematic attempts to study the data available. The present book shows the poor physical state of civilized man and indicates how his life span may be increased. From the physical standpoint it is very good, but there is little about the mental causes of ill-health. One chapter purports to deal with psychic trauma and another with psychic apathy, but they are very incomplete. The National Committee for Mental Hygiene should be asked to furnish a section for future editions of this book.

The JEFFERSON SCHOOL
23 West 87th Street, At Central Park West
For Boys and Girls, 3 to 12 Years

The School will open Sept. 27th in a new building equipped with every modern facility for the best Elementary and Kindergarten Education.

The course of study provides the child with experiences which result in definite values—health, skill, knowledge, habits and attitudes. The methods employed are approved by the foremost educators. The teaching staff is carefully chosen for experience and training in these methods. All day activities; hot lunches served. French, Industrial Arts, Nature Study, Music and Rhythms are featured. Pupils now being enrolled. For catalog and appointments, address

SYLVIA J. MARKS, Director

Until Sept. 1st, at 1 West 92d St. Telephone Riverside 2501.

PLEXO
"TOILET LANOLINE"

—the year-round skin treatment

This wonderful emollient is used with great success by noted skin specialists for pimples, blotches, facial eruptions, roughness, abrasions and chapped lips and hands. It protects the delicate skin surfaces against trying weather conditions and by supplying nourishment to the facial nerves and skin cells, effaces wrinkles and restores the bloom of youthful health. "Toilet Lanoline" is especially recommended for cuts and burns and for relief of pain after exposure. "Toilet Lanoline" is a remarkable skin softener and preserver. A delicately scented preparation that is safe for SMALL CHILDREN.

PREPARED BY

PLEXO PREPARATIONS, Inc.
NEW YORK

Sole Agents and Distributors

General Drug Co., N. Y., 94 N. Moore Street

International Relations Section

The Oil Situation Today

By Herman Silverman

I. Geographic Distribution

WITH the exception of water, petroleum enjoys a wider distribution than any of the other natural resources. Even a hurried reading of the world's oil map is sufficient to convince us of the lavishness with which nature has given off herself. The entire world is practically covered by a series of circular or rectangular color areas, in red, yellow, black, and blue, that not only denote the presence of this precious liquid, but also indicate the relative importance of each territory.

According to the most trustworthy authorities, petroleum is found in Alaska, Canada, the United States, Mexico, Central America, Venezuela, Trinidad, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Chile, and Argentina. It is hoped that future discoveries will show the presence of oil in Brazil and in Uruguay. All these are in the Western Hemisphere. Europe is not blessed with such great riches. Her principal fields are in Galicia and in Rumania; and oil in smaller quantities is also found in Hanover, Alsace, Italy, Ukraine, and possibly in Hungary. The world must look to Asia for its future oil supply. That continent possesses some of the world's greatest fields: Persia, Mesopotamia, the Caucasus Region, the Dutch East Indies, Mosul, and Burma. There are others, less known, in Siam, China, Japan, and Formosa. Egypt has been the only African contributor. The rest of the continent has remained unexplored and is still a closed book. It has recently been stated in the press that French and British experts are "active" in Northern Africa, but no progress has been reported thus far. Investigations are being conducted in other sections of the Dark Continent. A news item in the Philadelphia Public Ledger informs us that "The search for oil in the Angola district of Portuguese Africa is about to start under the direction of the Sinclair Consolidated Oil Corporation, which is to have charge of the development work in behalf of a Belgo-American syndicate. A well or two have already been driven, but the work is to be more energetically carried on in the near future.[1] . . ."

II. World Production

The United States is the world's greatest producer of crude petroleum. Before the war, Russia ranked second, but she has since lost ground. Mexico has taken her place, and is now producing twice as much as Russia when the latter was in her prime. The United States supplies two-thirds of the world's oil; Mexico, one-fourth. Out of a total of 688 million barrels—the world's production for 1920—443 million came from the United States, and 160 million from Mexico. In twenty years, the petroleum production of the United States has increased sixfold; 69.4 million barrels for 1901; 210 million barrels for 1910; 281 million barrels for 1915; and 443 million barrels for 1920. Mexico's first million was produced in 1907. Since then the growth in her output has risen at a phenomenal rate. In 1915 Mexico produced 32.9 million barrels, and in 1920 the output jumped to 160 million barrels.

There was a time when Russia threatened the oil supremacy of the United States. That was twenty and some years ago when the Baku oil boom was still in full swing. After 1901, however, production began to decline. Labor trouble invaded the Baku district. Then came the Russo-Japanese War followed by the revolutionary days of 1905. In that year scores of wells were destroyed by the excited mob. The years that followed brought no stability to the oil region. Work was constantly interfered with and production suffered as a consequence. Another war came and brought in its wake a series of revolutions that shook Russia to her very foundation. Oil production figures of these eventful years show clearly what has happened to the industry. From 72.8 million barrels produced in 1916, the output fell to 40.5 million barrels in 1918. The next year was the lowest on record since 1900. Only 25.5 million barrels were produced. Figures for 1920, however, showed a slight improvement.

Two fields are now coming into prominence: Persia and the Dutch East Indies. Persia is but a recent contributor, and production is first recorded for 1917. She made her debut with 6.86 million barrels, and has shown no improvement ever since. The Dutch East Indies, on the other hand, are veterans. Progress is slow but steady. In twenty years they have quadrupled their output, which in 1920 amounted to 16 million barrels.

India has been a steady contributor, but has made little progress in the last few years. Modern machinery and better technique must be introduced before a substantial increase in the yield can be expected. Two more veterans remain: Galicia and Rumania. In the antebellum days these fields supplied a considerable amount of oil. No increase, however, is to be expected. Both territories are well known to the experts, and these do not predict any too brilliant a future. The Rumanian fields had suffered a severe blow during the German invasion. In order to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy, the wells were destroyed under the direction of Col. Norton Griffith, of the British Army, sent there for that very purpose.

The figures for the world's production show a remarkable increase in the output of petroleum. In 1901 the total amounted to 167 million barrels; in 1905 production rose to 215 million barrels; in 1910 to 328 million barrels; in 1915 one hundred million barrels were added to the previous figure, making a total of 428 million barrels; and in 1920 the recorded yield amounted to 688 million barrels.

III. Future Productivity

This tremendous increase has hardly kept pace with the forever increasing demand. The development of the automotive industry, of the oil-burning merchant marine and railroad locomotive, of oil-using navies, and of a dozen other indexes of modern progress—the development of all these has created a situation that makes it more difficult as time goes on for the supply to keep up with the demand. The entire world has taken to oil as naturally as a fish takes to the water, without any consideration for the future. And already a note of warning has been sounded by one of our ablest writers on this question.

---

[1] Special to the Business Section, Public Ledger, June 25, 1923.

The advantages of fuel oil for ocean transportation and naval operations have undoubtedly played an important part in determining the policy of Great Britain in acquiring foreign reserves of petroleum, while these factors had also influenced the activities of the United States. The suggestion has been advanced that the growing social consciousness of the coal miners in Great Britain has been an added incentive for an active development of a petroleum supply. At any rate the significance of oil in the maritime field is a sufficient explanation of the world-wide interest that has been taken in oil. The question therefore arises as to whether the world's supply of petroleum is sufficiently great to sustain automotive transportation on land, lubricate the wheels of industry and commerce, and support the revolution in ocean shipping to an oil-burning basis. It is by no means a forgone conclusion that the merchant marine of the world can count upon a supply of oil sufficiently cheap to sustain its operations for more than a relatively brief period of years.

There are approximately 55 million tons of shipping in this world, and, roughly speaking, its entire conversion to an oil-fire basis would require an annual consumption of over 500 million barrels of oil, or nearly the total quantity of petroleum produced today. The universal adoption of Diesel engines would, of course, reduce the unit consumption; but at best the oil consumption would still be of outstanding size.[2]

A preliminary estimate of the petroleum resources of the world had been made by Eugene Stebenger, of the U. S. Geological Survey, the results of which are presented to the reader:

| Regions | Approximate Quantity in Millions of Barrels |
|---|---|
| The United States and Alaska | 7,000 |
| Canada | 995 |
| Mexico | 4,525 |
| Northern South America, including Peru | 5,730 |
| Southern South America, including Bolivia | 3,550 |
| Algeria and Egypt | 925 |
| S. E. Russia, S. W. Siberia, and the Caucasus | 5,820 |
| Rumania, Galicia, and Western Europe | 1,135 |
| Northern Russia and Saghalien | 925 |
| Japan and Formosa | 1,235 |
| China | 1,375 |
| India | 995 |
| East Indies | 3,015 |
| Total | 43,055 |

Mr. David White, reviewing the above estimate in the Annals of the American Academy of May, 1920, concludes that "these forecasts, or geological guesses, formulated conservatively with the probability that deficiencies will be much more than compensated by excesses, lead one to conclude that there are probably 20 billion barrels of oil available in the world in addition to the 43 billion barrels contained in regions covered by Mr. Stebinger's estimates—or as much in round numbers as 60 billions of barrels in all."

IV. OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL

The present ownership or control of the world's oil fields is divided between the United States and Great Britain. The first is strongly intrenched in the Western Hemisphere; the second in the Eastern Hemisphere. America is now producing two-thirds of the world's oil, and American interests are practically supreme in the United States, Canada,[3] Mexico, and Peru. According to a table drawn up by J. D. Northrop, only four per cent of the American supply was under foreign control; while nationals of this country control 65 per cent of the Mexican, 70 per cent of the Peruvian, and the entire Canadian output. In addition, American interests are holding substantial blocks in Trinidad, Venezuela, the Central American Republics, and Colombia.

Great Britain easily controls the Eastern Hemisphere. Her position today is not so strong as that of the United States, but the future promises to reverse the situation. The trend of Empire—in so far as oil is concerned—is moving eastward. Through the Royal Dutch Shell, which "represents purely British interests to at least 40 per cent, and whose general policy is as much English as Dutch," England has been able to get a control in "the Dutch East Indies, South Russia, Rumania, Venezuela, Trinidad, Curacao, Egypt, Canada, the United States, Mexico, and the British West Indies." British nationals have made inroads into "French West Africa, South Africa, Algeria, Australia, British West Indies, Canada, Cuba, Cyprus, East Indies, Ecuador, Egypt, Rumania, Trinidad, Turkey, Galicia, India, Italy, Madagascar, Mexico, Morocco, New Guinea, Peru, Syria, Tunis, the United States, Venezuela, and the Russian Empire."[4]

France, Germany, and Japan are entirely eclipsed by the two Anglo-Saxon countries. Germany once controlled the Galician and the Alsatian oil fields. She also held a substantial block in Turkey. Alsace has since gone to France, and Galicia to Poland. In France, oil and gas belong to the state, and no concessions in either are granted unless the majority control is in French hands. Recent news from Poland has thrown no light on the Galician oil situation. The situation in Turkey is no less confusing, for Turkey is now the center of the world's oil conflict. Rumors have it that the control of the former German concessions in Turkey has been transferred to a Swiss syndicate (secretly controlled by them); but who really knows?

Japan has invested mainly in her own territories; that is, in Japan proper and Formosa. The Japanese Government, however, is fully alive to the situation, and no one can predict future Japanese investments in China, Russia, and Mexico. In the latter country, Japanese activity has made itself felt in the provinces of Lower California and Sonora. Japan has also started negotiations with the Soviet Government, and, in spite of hostility from certain quarters, Japanese statesmanship is now drifting toward a recognition of the Soviet regime. But Russia will have to pay for this favor with some concession, the basis of which, I dare say, will be oil.

---

[2] Pogue: "Economics of Petroleum," 317.

[3] Americans control the refining end of the industry.

[4] From a Congressional Report made by Dr. Van Manning.

Contributors to This Issue

SINCLAIR LEWIS is the author of "Main Street" and "Babbitt."

JEROME LACHENBRUCH is an American journalist who has been living in Germany for the past two years.

ROBERT C. DEXTER recently resigned from the department of political and social science of Clark University and will be at Skidmore College next year.

ANN HAMILTON is a poet familiar to Nation readers.

HERMAN SILVERMAN is a graduate of the Wharton School of Economics of the University of Pennsylvania.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1923 No. 3035

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .......... 225
EDITORIALS:
  Should the United States Occupy France? .......... 228
  A Naked Challenge .......... 229
  "The Men of the Trees" .......... 229
  Literature Flourishes .......... 230
THE CRUELTY OF THE RUSSIAN. By Maxim Gorki .......... 231
WASHINGTON: A CAPITAL WITHOUT A THUNDERER. By Oswald Garrison Villard .......... 232
THESE UNITED STATES—XXXVII. NEBRASKA: THE END OF THE FIRST CYCLE. By Willa Sibert Cather .......... 236
WHEN THE TROOPS TOOK TULSA. By McAlister Coleman .......... 239
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter .......... 240
CORRESPONDENCE .......... 241
BOOKS:
  The American Short Story. By Johan J. Smertenko .......... 243
  Gandhi and India. By Blanche Watson .......... 243
  Van Vechten's New York. By Ernest Boyd .......... 244
  American State Government. By William MacDonald .......... 245
  The Dry Rot of Organized Charity. By Henry Raymond Mussey .......... 245
  A Heroic Statesman. By Emil Lengyel .......... 246
  The Sacred Shades. By Clement Wood .......... 246
  The Partition of Africa. By Hubert Harrison .......... 247
  Books in Brief .......... 247
MUSIC:
  Battistini. By Pitts Sanborn .......... 248
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
  Japan's Untouchables. By Gertrude Haessler .......... 249
  "Dangerous Thoughts" in Japan .......... 251

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT ERNEST H. GRUENING
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY, Managing Editor
JOHN MACY, Literary Editor
IRITA VAN DOREN, Advertising Manager
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON ANATOLE FRANCE H. L. MENCKEN
FRIEDRICH WILHELM FOERSTER ROBERT HERRICK
CARL VAN DOREN NORMAN THOMAS

Subscription Rates—Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: Ernest Thurtle, 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N. W. 4, England.

ARBITRATION is a fine-sounding word. The difficulty with arbitration as a solution of industrial disputes is that there is no accepted code or common understanding of what "justice" means. In practice arbitration settles down to reference of a dispute to some supposedly neutral individual or group of individuals, and the settlement is in fact a precipitation of his prejudices. Almost inevitably, as things are today, such individuals—supposed to represent "the public"—are men who have arrived, men of wealth and position whose sympathies, associations, and prejudices class them with the employers rather than with workers. A "minimum standard of living" is a mere text-book phrase to them, not a vivid daily agony. Then, too, such arbitrators are not unmoved by political considerations. In 1920 Secretary William B. Wilson acted as arbitrator in the coal industry. His economic expert recommended an increase in wages of 27 per cent; overnight, apparently for political reasons, someone reduced the figure to 17 per cent. That memory still colors the miners' picture of "arbitration." To them the word means not impartial settlement, but a political club.

GOVERNOR PINCHOT'S intervention puts a new face on the situation. This issue of The Nation must go to press before the question: Strike or no strike, is settled, but a new optimism already seems justified. Gifford Pinchot's personality and record are very different from those of Calvin Coolidge, and therein lies the hope. Naturally the miners distrusted arbitration if the arbitrators were to be appointed by an open-shopper who boasts of strike-breaking even if the claim be a myth. (It has been amusing to watch this Massachusetts "strong man" flinch in the face of his first serious problem.) Governor Pinchot is another type of man; he is not afraid to tackle a hard job, and he is not primarily a politician.

APACE grows the new American crime of lese majeste. Now Lord Birkenhead has transgressed because he, a Britisher, has dared to cross the seas and beard us in our den with some criticisms of Woodrow Wilson—for which he is solemnly taken to task by a former Wilsonian office-holder and charged with unblushing "impudence." Now, for Lord Birkenhead we have no use whatever. He has always been a mischief-brewer and trouble-maker. He was one of those who stirred up Ulster the year before the war with the express purpose of warring on his own government if need be. As to whether his remarks before the Institute of Politics at Williamstown were true or untrue, tactful or unwise, there will be great differences of opinion. But has it really come to such a pass that a distinguished—or, if you please, notorious—foreigner may not come to this country and express his honest judgment about an historical figure who already, historically speaking, belongs to the past? It is bad enough to have President Coolidge and his Cabinet exalted as beyond criticism merely because Mr. Harding died in office. But, thin-skinned as we Americans are, we shall surely make fools of ourselves if we stir up an international rumpus over the words of a British politician. His criticisms of Woodrow Wilson are the same that have been voiced by millions of Americans. They will stand or fall by their truth. If they are unfounded they will soon find their way to oblivion.

SHOOTING Klansmen is no way to combat intolerance and bigotry. However sinister the influence of the white-robed fraternity, its own methods must not be used against it. Klansmen have a right to hate Jews, Catholics, and Negroes; they even have a right to parade, to make speeches, and to hold meetings in the hope of spreading their disagreeable doctrines—even though it is absurd to hear these lynchers and floggers claiming civil rights for themselves. Liberals who detest the race-hatred propaganda of the Klan will do well not to forget that free speech is meaningless unless it applies to those with whom we most violently disagree. Mob violence is a bestial thing even when its victims are Klansmen. It is possible to force the Klan into daylight—there is no reason why men who wish to parade should not be made to show their faces, or why the identity of Klansmen who get into trouble should be concealed. The authorities of Carnegie, Pennsylvania, are reported refusing information as to the identity of the Klansmen injured in the riot there. "Well known men are reported to be among them." If Klansmen believe in the Klan they should court publicity rather than thus play the coward. Klansmen carrying arms should be arrested and disarmed and their names should be made public, as would be done with common criminals. The Klan is a disgrace to America; but the disgrace would be deeper still were its own methods adopted to combat it.

WE are heartily in accord with the proposal of the American Legion Weekly that there be called at once an international conference to limit the military use of aircraft, and we are the happier to say so in view of the fact that we so rarely agree with the Legion's policies. Like the Legion Weekly, we want nothing more than the ending of international competition for military supremacy in the air, for, as we have repeatedly pointed out, if this senseless race continues another war is as inevitable as the World War was after the naval competition between England and Germany got under way. The one success of the Harding Administration was the Washington Conference for the Limitation of Armaments. President Coolidge's opposition to the Legion's project is hard to understand. One might expect the Republican leaders to jump at the chance to take another spectacular step forward just before the Presidential campaign, and we sincerely trust that the Legion Weekly and all its cohorts will use their great influence to move him in that direction. But with one of the doctrines of the Weekly we must heartily disagree. It declares that if no such step is taken the United States must enter the aircraft race. That is absurd. It recalls Woodrow Wilson's saying that if we did not join the League of Nations we must have the largest navy on earth. There was a way out of that and there are several alternatives to the United States squandering treasure and engaging on so senseless a policy as rivaling England and France in the air. Meanwhile, to the crusade of the American Legion Weekly, all possible success!

THE formal ratification on August 17 of the two important treaties negotiated at the Washington Conference ought in itself to suggest to Secretary Hughes and President Coolidge the desirability of acting on the proposal of the Legion Weekly. While we were and are very doubtful of the Four-Power Pacific Treaty, we cannot but feel that the other marks a distinct step forward. In this we are aware that we differ from other liberal editors who have, from the beginning, taken the stand that it was not worth the paper it was written on. We are aware, of course, that the battleships which are to be scrapped were obsolete anyhow, and we are not unaware that a most dangerous naval competition is now going on in scout cruisers, aircraft carriers, submarines, destroyers, and other light ships. Yet the ending of the battleship competition between England, Japan and the United States is a great step forward. It is half a loaf, if you please, but in these days when all the great nations are acting like senseless, drunken cowboys and some of them are doing their best to bring on another general shooting-up of the world, it is certainly a cause for gratitude that the international rivalry in battleships, constantly fanned by the press, has come to an end. No one can deny that the talk of war between the United States and Japan has all but faded out since the Conference was held. As for our relations with England, one of the most important causes of friction we dwelt upon in 1921 in our series of articles entitled No War With England, the competition in battleships, has been removed, and another, the war in Ireland, has been mitigated. Again, for this much progress, all gratitude.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE'S interview with the Washington correspondents on amnesty was surprisingly open-minded. He stated that he did not believe that any man should be kept in jail for mere opinion, although men guilty of overt acts of hostility against the government should be punished. If he will hold to that ground the I.W.W.s still in jail will be released. Despite the ignorant resolutions of Legion posts and rotary clubs the record shows that these men are in jail for "crimes" of opinion and nothing more. Senator Pepper's careful study of their cases has brought him, a thorough conservative but fair-minded, to that conclusion—he even goes so far as to urge that unconditional pardons be granted them. May the President keep his pledge even though it carries him further than he expects!

GREAT BRITAIN is now approaching, with anxious concern, a fourth winter of serious unemployment. The numbers on the unemployed registers had steadily declined from 1,823,700 in January, 1922, to 1,185,000 at the time of the Parliamentary debate of August 1, 1923. A recent cablegram, however, reports a turn in the wrong direction, bringing the present total up to 1,212,000. It is generally recognized that the official figures understate the gravity of the situation, for many out-of-works, disappointed at the failure of the labor exchanges to do anything for them, have taken their names off the books. The statistics, moreover, do not take into account the growing army of workers who have been placed on short time. What makes things worse is the progressive exhaustion and demoralization of those who have been victims of the trade depression for a long period. The plans contemplated by the Government do not profess to provide work for more than 200,000 persons directly and 100,000 indirectly, so by the time they are in operation they will probably leave a million or so out in the cold. There are to be extensions of the existing Exports Credits scheme and the Trade Facilities Act, and further grants are to be made to local authorities to encourage them to start work on useful enterprises, the subvention being more generous when the work provided is not revenue-producing. In complaining of these proposals as hopelessly inadequate the Labor Party is supported by the influential body of employers known as the House of Commons Industrial Group. Both alike have put forward constructive suggestions of their own on a much larger scale. But not even the boldest plans can be more than palliatives as long as, to use the Prime Minister's metaphor, the Ruhr knife-blade remains thrust in the watch of international trade and prevents its wheels from revolving.

CHAOS is a mild word for it. What the collapse of the mark does to German daily life cannot be realized in the comfortable normalcy of America. Take the daily newspapers as an example. The German dailies long ago renounced annual subscriptions; the price had to be changed each month. On July 24 the Association of German Newspaper Publishers increased the daily rates and announced monthly subscription prices for August. On July 27, the mark having meanwhile plunged again, it made the extraordinary announcement that the newspapers could no longer accept monthly subscriptions. The price would have to remain open, subject to change from day to day. The Post Office took the same step, refusing to fix rates ahead. The cost of a single copy of the Berliner Tageblatt, raised to 2,500 marks on July 24, jumped to 5,000 marks on July 29, to 6,000 on August 1, to 10,000 on August 5, and to 30,000 on August 12! Amid such chaos the normal economic life of the nation simply disintegrates.

FROM the Crisis, of which Dr. DuBois is the brilliant editor, we take the following delightful and truthful analysis of the state of mind of the Southern press concerning the Negro exodus from that section of the country:

> We have carefully read a sheaf of white Southern papers and gleaned the following facts concerning the continued migration of Negroes:
>
> 1. No Negroes are leaving the South save a few of the ne'er-do-well floaters.
>
> Negroes are leaving daily by the tens of thousands.
>
> 2. The South is glad to see them go.
>
> The South is going to stop their going.
>
> 3. Cotton and Southern agriculture are threatened with ruin.
>
> The migration is the best thing for the South.
>
> 4. The Negro loves the South.
>
> The South has lynched 4,000 Negroes and will lynch others when it pleases.
>
> We are certainly glad to get this clear outline of fact on which to base our own conclusions.

PRIZE fighting is brutal, says the Methodist Episcopal Church, which is trying to create a public sentiment for its suppression, "especially in the army and navy." Well, such a public sentiment existed once. Ten years ago it was legally impossible to arrange a prize fight in the United States in any except a few States popularly regarded as renegades. That was in the day when there was also a strong public sentiment against another form of fighting for prizes, known as war. When the United States entered the European massacre the churches, for the most part, put into cold storage their doctrine against human slaughter, and it was natural that they should do likewise with a peccadillo like prize fighting. Indeed, the Young Men's Christian Association and other religious bodies did their best to foster pugilism among our service men. Springing from that time, there has been a great reversal in public sentiment, and prize fighting (now usually sweetened under the term professional boxing) has become more than respectable; it has become fashionable. The Methodist Episcopal Church may find that it is harder to put up the bars than to let them down. Certainly the last place where the suppression of the sport should be demanded is the army and navy. If it is legitimate to support and train a force of man-killers, surely it is reasonable to let the individuals knock each other about a bit to relieve their boredom while waiting for the final coup from poison gas, bayonet point, or high-explosive shell.

MAXIM GORKI'S bitter arraignment of his own people, printed elsewhere in this issue of The Nation, will come as a shock to many. To others it will bring a flash of revelation. We have been so drenched in sugar-coated romanticism about the "Slav soul" and the "simple mujik" that we have lost our bearings. Outbreaks of cruelty in Russia have been treated as new phenomena and laid to immediate causes—whereas the history of Russia is a long story of sinister cruelty. The war, of course, and the consequent breakdown of government, gave an outlet to brutal passions that had been repressed and hidden in the soil. That new village literature of which Gorki speaks may, perhaps, be compared with the new literature of our own Middle West. The post-war period has brought disillusioned truth-telling in every country. Some of Sherwood Anderson's stories reveal depths of repressed animalism where we had been taught to see only the pioneer virtues of the frontier, and a new world literature supplants the glowing color of post-war chronicles with a dull gray.

AT the mature age of three and a half years "Baby Peggy" of Los Angeles is beginning what will probably be the most important—and possibly the only—work of her life. Her parents have signed a contract according to which, instead of playing with dolls and sucking her thumb, "Baby Peggy" will spend the next three years posing for the movies at a salary—so the newspapers report—of $1,500,000 annually and a bonus of $500,000. Infant prodigies in all ages have made handsome earnings, but never before was there anything so infantile and so prodigious as this. Most persons count themselves lucky if they can retire at sixty on a few thousand dollars. "Baby Peggy" will be able to retire at six with five million! Possibly the salary has been inflated by the press agents, but, supposing it were only a tenth of what has been reported, she would still have enough to keep her in dresses, automobiles, lipsticks, and other necessities, with something left over for the luxury of a Paris divorce, if needed. It is a splendid vista —for Baby Peggy's parents. As for the little "film star" herself, probably it doesn't matter now, but fifty years hence she may wish she had spent the time playing with dolls and sucking her thumb.

KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN will be remembered affectionately by thousands of readers, and undoubtedly her books will be read by thousands more who are yet unborn. Her modestly distinguished place in literature is secure. Before she was a writer she was a kindergarten teacher, and she organized the first free kindergarten for poor children on the Pacific coast—she was more proud of that and of her books on education than she was of her fiction. From her experiences with children, in school and out, she drew her adorable youngsters, Timothy, Patsy, Rebecca, and the rest. She portrayed the happiness of childhood, with its touch of pathos, but she was too sane and honest to descend to pollyanna gladness. Her grown people, who appear as the mothers, fathers, and aunts of her heroes and heroines, are shrewdly observed, and she had a keen knowledge of the New England folk among whom she lived. But she seldom touched the deeper motives of which adult fiction is made. When her friends advised her to write a novel, she said: "I don't know how; I can just write my kind of stories." Her kind is quite her own, original and charming. The first of her books, "The Birds' Christmas Carol," has a touch of Dickens, but only because Dickens had preempted Christmas as his private holiday. For thirty years the head of the American family has been sure that Mrs. Wiggins's next book was one that the children must have so that he could read it himself. Within her quiet limits her work is admirable; it is natural and amusing in substance and written in sound simple English. Wholesome is the right word for her if we cure it of its moralistic connotation, as she did, with the salt of humor.

Should the United States Occupy France?

THE logic of M. Poincaré's reply to the British Government is that the United States and Great Britain should at once proceed to a joint occupation of Bordeaux, le Havre, and Cherbourg, in order to make France pay her debts to them. It would not matter whether France could pay—the debt was legally contracted; while France has on occasion repeated her promise to pay she has given no evidence of any serious effort to make good her promise; she has not suggested methods of payment; and it would therefore be our right to seize the ports and collect what we could, even though all France and ourselves were ruined in the process. That France and other nations might think the process illegal would matter no whit more, for the debt is a sacred debt, consecrated by the blood of our sons who died in France, and we could not submit such a debt to arbitration or adjudication.

This sounds wild, but it comes very close to being a paraphrase of the latest Poincaré note. It is even somewhat more moderately phrased. The note abounds in flat contradictions of Lord Curzon's statements. "We have never been vague," retorts Poincaré to Lord Curzon's inquiry as to the meaning of a vague phrase. He seems to think it a sufficient reply to a reasoned argument to say that the English statement is "entirely inexact"—which is a strong word in French. When Lord Curzon says that French statements "can only be interpreted as an intention to remain in occupation of the Ruhr for a number of years which . . . may be extended indefinitely, if not in perpetuity," and, quoting the language of the League Covenant, adds that he "cannot believe that the French and Belgian governments will be able to reconcile the opinion of the world to indefinite maintenance of so perilous a situation," M. Poincaré replies: "We protest once more indignantly against the hypothesis that France desires to annex the Ruhr or remain there. The British Government threatens us with an appeal to the League of Nations as if there were danger or even the possibility of war. We cannot for one moment allow such discussion of our actions." This is the language of a peevish small boy; it is the diplomatic equivalent of "You lie" and "Shut up." This is mere invective and oratory—especially when in the same note he asserts his "resolution not to renounce the pledge we hold (the Ruhr) until reparations are paid in full" and admits that "the capacity for payment of Germany today is equal to zero."

If the British press finds in such a note a "conciliatory spirit" and hope for future agreement it can only be because the British Government has requested it not to disturb negotiations by too frank comment. There is no conciliation in Poincaré's 12,000 words, and the only hope for agreement which he holds out is based upon surrender to the French point of view. It must indeed be gall and wormwood to Lord Curzon and Mr. Stanley Baldwin, but M. Poincaré's reply says in substance "I don't care what you think, for I hold the Ruhr and can get along without you," and their decision to return to the method of secret diplomatic conference can mean only a desire to camouflage defeat. Cuno is out of office; unemployed or underpaid mobs are rushing through German streets; the mark has dropped out of sight; and France hopes to profit by the ruin she has wrought.

In the mazes of these incredibly long notes which France and England have been exchanging it is easy to lose the thread and to forget with what the negotiations are concerned. It is well to look back. The discussion really centers about the German offer, in their note of June 7, to accept the Hughes proposal of referring the question of Germany's capacity to pay to a commission of neutral experts. Germany offered unequivocally to accept the findings of such a commission. England attempted to win France and Belgium to an interest in the offer. They refused even to reply to it, and rejected, even as a basis for discussion, the British draft of a proposed joint note. On August 11 Lord Curzon replied in the long note arraigning France which was immediately made public. It is to this long note that Poincaré has just replied in a still longer message.

Lord Curzon began by what would seem to be the axiomatic remark: "There can be no use in demanding from Germany more than she is capable of paying." M. Poincaré replies reiterating "our resolution, a hundred times expressed, not to renounce one centime of our reparations claim." Lord Curzon complained of the method hitherto followed in assessing Germany's capacity to pay. The Reparation Commission, he said, "has become in practice an instrument of Franco-Belgian policy alone," and he preferred a neutral commission on which would sit experts representing not only the Allied countries but also the United States, the neutrals, and even Germany. To question of Germany's good faith in accepting the report of such a commission he replied in these significant words, which condemn past British policy as violently as France's:

> An undertaking freely entered into because acknowledged to be just and reasonable stands in practice on a different footing and offers better prospects of faithful execution than an engagement subscribed to under compulsion of an ultimatum and protested against at the very moment of signature as beyond the signatory's capacity to make good.

Those are true words, and while they hit the record of Lloyd George as much as or more even than that of Poincaré they cut to the very root of Poincaré's complaint that the Germans have not kept their word in the past.

"What Germany's maximum capacity for payment may be is a matter which should be determined by impartial inquiry into the facts," said Lord Curzon. "To ask for more than Germany's maximum capacity cannot assist in the actual recovery of reparations; it can only destroy assets which Germany can offer to the Allies." And to this the French Premier replied in words which contradict his own past: "We did not go into the Ruhr to find immediate money for reparations but above all to create in the German Government a wish to pay and to seize guaranties." In that, surely, he has most lamentably failed. Germany was never less disposed to pay. And meanwhile, in Poincaré's own words, Germany's "capacity for payment is provisionally reduced to zero." He thinks it impossible to evaluate today Germany's potential capacity. But how else can the world get on? France is demanding that Germany once more pledge the impossible and says she will not let go her stranglehold on the Ruhr until Germany has paid it. She will not allow discussion of her right to hold the Ruhr, she will not permit impartial assessment of Germany's capacity to pay, she will not reply to Germany's note, she will not pay her own debts or discuss payment of them. Could a mad dog be madder?

There is a sentence in Poincaré's note which is both hypocritical and revealing. "France has never repudiated her debts and will not repudiate them," he says in a note which virtually repudiates them, "but she is convinced that no British Government will ever bring to bear upon an allied country the pressure which the British Cabinet does not think it possible to bring to bear today against the former enemies of England and France." It sounds like a threat not to pay. We hope that England and the United States never will use such pressure against France as France is today using against Germany, but in that sentence M. Poincaré admits that his own logic would justify us in occupying France to force her to pay.

A Naked Challenge

"THE audience realized, with appropriate gasps, a few moments after the curtain had risen, that the girls of the ensemble were entirely unclothed from the waist up"; "they saw one young woman wearing nothing except a slender piece of chiffon draped rather carelessly about her hips, and twenty-five other young women with nothing on above the waist except a still more slender bit of chiffon." These are descriptions of the latest Shubert revue in New York from the pens of the critics of the Times and Herald, respectively. It is universally agreed that for daring this show surpasses anything ever produced on the American stage; that what was deemed possible only in Paris, Berlin, or Bucharest has come to pass in New York.

We submit that this is a direct challenge to the censors and to the authorities. Especially is it a test of the sincerity of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, which, under the leadership of Mr. John S. Sumner, has made itself particularly obnoxious by proceeding against various publishers of works of art and literature. Will these gentlemen concern themselves with this play and inquire what the authorities propose to do about it? If this show is permissible, and so responsible a press critic as Heywood Broun says it is, we can hardly justify rigid lines against serious literature. Moreover, it will not have escaped the vigilant Mr. Sumner that Mr. Broun reports that not in his entire career as a theatrical critic has he seen so long a queue of ticket-purchasers as that before the Shubert theater.

We are the more moved to inquire why this show is unchallenged because we are still indignant at the conviction of the manager and the actors in Sholom Asch's "God of Vengeance" for the production of what was from the point of view of conventional ethics one of the most effective of moral plays. Despite a blemish or two in the acting, the "lesson" of the piece was such that it merited the hearty approval not only of the vice suppressors but of every Sunday-school teacher and of every John Roach Straton. It was the story of a father who kept a house of prostitution, upon whom descended the vengeance of the gods, in the form of the prostitution, under his own roof, of his cherished and carefully protected daughter. Yet for some reason or other it was determined to make an example of this company. They were convicted on the testimony of two ordinary policemen, all expert opinions being excluded, and received severe though suspended sentences. Among the theatrical men who gave interviews to the New York World when the conviction took place were the Shuberts. Here are their words: "No salacious play should be presented on the American stage. Anything that tends to lower the standard of public morals should never be produced." Yet these sanctimonious moralizers are now coining untold dollars out of the openly displayed nudity of twenty-six women. From the scribes and the Pharisees, good Lord, deliver us!

The "God of Vengeance" case was the more remarkable because during the previous winter there appeared at a New York theater a play called the "Demi-Virgin" as to whose unfitness for production the police were quite agreed. They made many gestures and threatened every sort of thing, the least being the closing of the show. But the play continued to the end of its run and is now appearing in our provinces; the police pretended that they had no statute which exactly covered such a play. This raises the question in our minds whether the power and influence of the producer have not something to do with the case. "The God of Vengeance" was not put on by influential members of what is known as the theatrical trust, but by little known people who were, it might be said, amateurs in the business. Upon them the might of the law, voiced by an unlettered police private, fell heavily. "As far as could be learned," says the Herald of the Shubert production, "no police officials saw the production." The Shuberts are rich and powerful; they are of the mightiest on the New York Rialto. Does their position place them above the law? Is their play a proper exhibition? Or is all the talk of censorship but another bit of our inborn, but none the less disgusting, Anglo-Saxon hypocrisy and sanctimoniousness, combined with a toadying to the rich and powerful? We eagerly await the answer to this question by the Sumners, the district attorney, and the police commissioner.

"The Men of the Trees"

BOY Scouts have become common sights along the highways of America. We see them everywhere in straggling, dusty little bands, carrying packs and luncheons, with handkerchiefs around their necks. They swarm on outgoing ferryboats and commuters' trains on Sunday mornings. They wig-wag from hilltops and camps along the dusty edges of the towns. Whatever may be the aims of the Boy Scout organization or its power for good or evil, it has added a recognizable feature to the American landscape—a feature as common as signboards along a railway line or radio aerials on the housetops.

And so, although we know the movement is not indigenous nor limited to the United States or even to the civilized world, we read with a certain incredulity about the rapid growth of the Watu Wa Miti—the Boy Scouts of Kenya in the dark interior of East Africa. A special correspondent of the London Times reports the development of this organization with a certain prosaic solemnity, oppressed apparently by no sense of the humor or the romance of his story. The Scouts (the literal translation of Watu Wa Miti is "Men of the Trees") were first organized by officers of the forestry department to help in reforesting areas which had been stripped by the natives in the process of clearing the land for cultivation. Each member swears to the high God, N'gai, that he will plant ten trees a year and take care of all trees. He wears the green and white emblem of the organization on a leather strap attached to his wrist—a custom strongly suggestive of the style in which loyal members of American college fraternities are said to wear their pins while in the bath tub. The green of the emblem represents the forest; the white, a pure heart. Like their khaki-clad American brothers, each member is pledged to do one kind act a day, but, if he positively cannot think of any, he may plant several trees instead. "This act was allowed to count as a good deed, although at the same time the natives were told that it was not necessarily the best kind of good deed, and they must search their own hearts to find other things to do."

"Although the movement has been organized on Scout lines," continues the Times correspondent, "it does not interfere with tribal customs; rather it makes use of the best of them for furthering the aims of the organization. At the native dances, songs descriptive of tree-planting and tree-lore have been substituted for the old meaningless chants." Shades of Batouala! What will Nordic enterprise not attempt? Do the Scoutmasters teach these dark children of the forest how to start a campfire with a single match? Do they give instruction in the language of signal fires—those immemorial symbols of warning or invitation or appeal? Perhaps they tell the Kenya Scouts about the ways of wild animals and impart bits of woodland lore. Or, perhaps, the forestry officials may only be using the natives' love of ritual and association—common, it seems, to men of all races and degrees of education—to help preserve the forests of the Kenya colony. This strictly practical purpose may excuse a certain amount of absurdity. And if they can induce their dark-skinned subjects to sing songs about trees instead of their "meaningless" chants, the proprieties, at least, may be better preserved at African dances than we have been led to expect. The movement may be admirable, intelligent, serious. And yet it is hard not to smile at the strange vision of a noisy, pushing American schoolboy in his Scout uniform and his blue handkerchief, and beside him a stripped, black-skinned African with a green-and-white badge on his bare wrist—both earnestly seeking to perform one kind deed before the sun sets.

Literature Flourishes

THE word masterpiece when not used by reviewers in their intellectual teens is uttered with bated breath and is accompanied by the mental image of a drama or epic in verse, of great length and of considerable antiquity. That image is by no means as inept as the militantly unacademic would have us think, for the greater number of the authentic and ultimately tested masterpieces of literature are indeed of the character described. But care must be taken not to let this undoubted fact overshadow the present or blur the future. It does seem more and more that Matthew Arnold was right when he declared that imaginative prose was destined to be the characteristic art of the modern world. Once this is granted the picture changes. The academic tradition permits few even among practiced and thoughtful readers to be aware of the glories amid which they live. But to say of a book: "It's only a novel," is saying nothing at all. So is "Tom Jones"; so, after all, is the Odyssey.

Strip the word masterpiece of preconceptions; grant our period its characteristic mode of expression. At once it begins to glow. For it opens with Butler's "The Way of All Flesh," a work that literally made an epoch. We are all the disciples and imitators of that extraordinary sage and creator who wrote: "Someone should do for morals what that old Pecksniff Bacon has obtained the credit of having done for science." That is what every modern novelist who is worth his salt is trying, consciously or unconsciously, to do; that is the sum and substance of the great dealings of Bertrand Russell—another mighty name—with the art and science of human life. But let the philosophy go if you can—though all great literature is philosophical at core and by necessity—and still "The Way of All Flesh" remains one of the major stories in our speech.

We are a little doubtful of "Old Wives' Tale." "Clayhanger" on rereading seemed both a little thin and a little gritty after the opening chapters. We are not at all doubtful of that astonishing and still neglected masterpiece—yes, masterpiece—called "Of Human Bondage." Somerset Maugham has written many clever and some brilliant things. His plays, novels, sketches, will be remembered because he wrote "Of Human Bondage." It is a very long book and we wish it longer. It is a bare, unadorned record of life. It is quiet, sad, rich—quiet as the earth, sad as the very core of mortality, rich as the lives and fates of men. You lose yourself in it; you are rapt by it from your personal world and fate; yet you are in the end brought more profoundly home by it to both and to the whole of man and nature and human life.

Does "The Forsyte Saga" rank below "Of Human Bondage"? The question is not a fruitful one and will be answered according to mood and temperament. It suffices that "The Forsyte Saga" too is great—great in its suaver, subtler, and less naked manner, great in breadth and richness of delineation, in wisdom and insight and unforced beauty of speech. And we should like to ruffle the inveterate praisers of time past by saying that for these three books we should gladly give up the whole of Balzac. And yet these are but three books published within a quarter of a century in a single language and of a single kind. We could go to the Continent and add the sovereign lucidity and depth of Thomas Mann, the valiant creative speech of Romain Roland, the exquisite, glowing patterns of Ricarda Huch. We could go to the drama and to lyric verse. But in the latter especially there would be obscuration and doubt.

America has produced no masterpiece that equals any of the three mentioned. It would be foolish not to admit that. But if some Charles Lamb of the future were to gather, not specimens from Elizabethan dramatists but specimens from the American novelists of our period, those specimens would have to run to many volumes and would outshine in every quality that makes great literature except the management of verse any conceivable selection from the Elizabethan or Jacobean playwrights. Beside the "Death of Hurstwood" the most poignant scenes by John Ford would lose edge and pathos; the mighty quarrel between Lee and Fanny from "Cytherea" would equal in energy and vitality and truth any comparable writing of former times; Mr. Babbitt's address before the Zenith Real Estate Board would leap for comparison beyond the age of Shakespeare to that of Swift. Yet these are but three examples where we might have cited thirty. The world seems to be disintegrating politically and economically. Literature flourishes. We are not, at least, living in an inarticulate age. There is comfort in that.

The Cruelty of the Russian

By MAXIM GORKI

CRUELTY is something which I have never in all my life been able to understand and which has always disturbed me. Where are the roots of human cruelty? That is a problem upon which I have meditated a long time but which I have never understood. Some time ago I read a book which bore the suggestive title: "The Progress and Evolution of Cruelty." The author, after carefully choosing facts to prove his thesis, tried to show that as the human race progressed men tortured each other physically, spiritually, and still more sensually. I read this book with disgust; I did not want to believe the things it told me, and I hastened to refute its paradoxes. But now, after the terrible madness of the European war and the bloody episodes of the Revolution, these bitter paradoxes have more than once returned to my memory.

Yet it seems to me that there is no evolution in Russian cruelty. Its forms do not seem to change. A chronicler reports in the beginning of the seventeenth century that in his days they practiced in Russia tortures such as these: they put powder in a victim's mouth and then set it afire; they pierced women's throats, inserted ropes in the wounds, and so hung them. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries they did the same things in the territories of the Don and the Ural; they inserted dynamite cartridges into the victim's body and then made them explode.

In Russian cruelty one feels a diabolic ingenuity, as if it were a question of something exquisite and delicate. One cannot explain it by the words "psychic abnormality" and "sadism," which really explain nothing at all. I sometimes wonder if it is not a product of excessive alcoholism, but I tell myself that the Russian people are not more poisoned by alcohol than the other peoples of Europe, although it is possible that the mind of the ill-nourished Russian peasant is more poisoned than in other countries where men have more food and more varied food. It may be, too, that the favorite pastime of those who are not illiterate in the villages—reading the lives of the martyrs—has an influence upon the origins of the ingenious Russian cruelty.

If cruelty were only a psychological perversion of the individual I might refrain from speaking of it for it would be a subject rather for the psychiatrist than for the historian. But I see before me whole groups of men enjoying human torture. In Siberia soldiers of the Red Army taken prisoner were put head first into trenches dug in the earth. The legs were left free, and the trenches were filled little by little, while the spectators watched the convulsions of the legs to see which victim had most resistance and would be last to die of suffocation. In the Government of Tambov Communists were nailed to trees, a yard above the ground, by the hands and the left foot, and the torments of these miserable creatures thus irregularly crucified excited surprise and curiosity. . . . [Incidents too horrible for translation are omitted.] I could recall many more such horrors, but they are so terrible that I think it wise not to mention them. Which is more cruel, the Reds or the Whites? Probably one is as bad as the other, for both are Russian.

I believe that in no other country of the world are women treated as pitilessly and terribly as in the Russian villages; perhaps no other country boasts such popular wisdom as is expressed in the following proverbs: "Beat your wife with the butt of your gun; then lean over and listen—if she still breathes she is joking and needs more blows." "A woman is twice beloved: the day of her marriage and the day of her death." "There is no law for women and beasts. The more you beat your wife the better your soup will taste."

Hundreds of such aphorisms containing the fine flower of centuries of popular wisdom are current in Russian villages. Young girls are brought up on them; these proverbs are their school. And the young girls, too, are beaten with equal ardor. I once studied the records of the Moscow courts for the decade 1901-1910; I was struck by the enormous number of outrages upon young girls and of all sorts of other crimes with minors. Beating is a favorite pastime in Russia and it matters little whom one beats.

I have asked persons who took an active part in our civil war if they were not disturbed by mutual massacre. No, not at all. "He has a gun, I have a gun, we are equal. It makes no difference. We will kill off a few and then there will be more room on the earth."

I once had a very curious reply from a soldier who had taken part in the European War and who is now in command of a considerable body in the Red Army: "Civil war," he said, "is nothing. It is international war, fighting strangers, that hurts the soul. I tell you frankly, comrade, it is easier to kill Russians. We have so many of them and our property means so little. You set a village on fire; what then? One day or another it would burn of itself and, after all, that is our business, like military maneuvers. But when I put my feet on Prussian soil at the beginning of the war, God! how I pitied that people! What villages, what cities, what farms! What magnificent things we destroyed without even knowing why! It was really shameful; I was almost happy when I was wounded. I had suffered so much because of the abominable vandalism. Later, they sent me down to the Caucasus in Judenich's army. There we fought Turks and other black-skinned people. Fine men, very poor, always smiling without any apparent reason. And we fought them when they smiled. One could not help pitying them. They all had their tasks, their families . . ." He who told me these things was humane after his fashion. He treats his soldiers well and they seem to respect him. He likes his military profession. I tried to give him some idea of Russia and of its importance in the world. He listened to me for a moment pensively, smoking a cigarette, then seemed bored, and said with a sigh: "It is true. Russia was an exceptional force, an extraordinary force, but now, in my opinion, it has become a country of fools!"

A scientific expedition which worked in the Ural region in 1921 reports that a peasant made the following simple request to its members: "You who are educated people, tell me what I ought to do. A Bashkir killed one of my cows. Naturally I killed the Bashkir, and I stole a cow which belonged to his family. Will I still be punished for stealing it?" When they told him he should rather fear being punished for killing a human being, he replied: "That is nothing. Men are cheap today." Both of these incidents show that homicide has become a simple and banal affair, the result of civil war and brigandage.

It seems to me that the war has made many men like him and that the leaders of innumerable bands unconsciously have the same psychology.

It is hard to deny the character of the pogroms. The fact that the anti-Jewish pogroms were permitted by the evil idiots who represented public authority justifies nothing and nobody. In permitting pillage and massacre of Jews, these idiots certainly did not recommend that hundreds of the pogrom-makers should cut the breasts of Jewish women, kill children, or drive nails into Jewish skulls. These bloody atrocities were due to the initiative of the masses.

Where, then, is that good and meditative Russian peasant, devoted to truth and justice, of whom nineteenth-century Russian literature gave the world so beautiful and so convincing a portrait? I sought and sought for such a man in the Russian villages when I was young, but I did not find him. On the contrary, I found an opportunist Russian, rather shrewd, who, when he had got what he wanted, could play the part of a simple-minded soul magnificently. He was not born stupid and knows it very well. He has composed melancholy songs, and cruel and vulgar stories, and invented thousands of proverbs which contain the experience of his harsh life. He knows that the mujik is not stupid, but that the community is stupid. He says that one should fear men rather than devils. He has not too high an idea of truth: "Truth doesn't fill your stomach." "The honest man is as dangerous as an imbecile."

He has thousands of such sayings and knows how to use them. He has heard them repeated since babyhood, and from infancy the conviction has been establishing itself in him that in them are revealed many austere and bitter truths, that they have much irony for him and much point for others. He does not think that other people, particularly the city people who meddle in his affairs, have anything to do with his soil, which is literally soaked with his sweat and his blood. He loves that soil with a mystic love. He firmly believes that in it is something of his own flesh. Although made of his blood, that soil has been stolen from him by a ruse.

The mujik has been idealized in Russian literature by the populist school because that literature used him for political propaganda. But toward the end of the nineteenth century the literary point of view toward the village and the peasant clearly showed a change. It became less compassionate and more honest. Anton Chekhov was the first to mark this change with his "In the Ravine" and "The Mujiks."

At the beginning of the twentieth century appeared a series of novels by Ivan Bunin, the best of contemporary Russian writers. His "Conversation in the Night," his story called "The Village," magnificent for its stylistic beauty and its rude sincerity, have built up a new, critical conception of the Russian peasant. They say in Russia that Bunin, because he is of noble birth, gives a prejudiced and hostile picture of the mujik. That is not true. Bunin is an excellent artist, nothing more. But we find in contemporary Russian literature even more serious and more impressive documents upon the coarse obscurantism of the village. There is, for example, "Youth," a novel by an intelligent peasant from the Province of Orel, Ivan Volny. There are the stories by the Moscow peasant, Semen Podiachev, those of the Siberian peasant, Vsevolod Ivanov, an extremely promising young writer. One cannot suspect them of preconceived hostility for the group to which they are related by blood and from which they are not yet detached. The fact is that they know and understand, better than others, the life of the peasant, the vulgar sorrows and joys of the village, its intellectual blindness, and its psychic cruelty.

Washington: A Capital Without a Thunderer

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

WASHINGTON is beyond doubt a difficult newspaper field. Unlike the other great capitals, it has been merely the seat of the national government and not until comparatively recently has it even taken on the outward aspects of an impressive residential city. A dozen years ago its fashionables never shopped except in New York or Baltimore; today its shopping district impresses. Only within the last twenty years has it been discovered as a delightful winter resort for retired civilians or the idle rich who are beginning to play such a part in its social life. It is wholly without the great industrial plants usually to be found at a seat of government. The war gave it, of course, a tremendous impulse in every direction, and, despite the extra homes built in the war years, it is still building new apartments at an amazing rate. But aside from governmental activities, Washington yet bears many aspects of the small town; it is surely the only capital of a great nation which does not have its own orchestra or support a permanent theater or even an attractive resort where one may dine and hear fine music of an evening.

Under these circumstances the press of Washington has naturally been extremely provincial; it has not represented the national interests centered in the District of Columbia, but has mostly busied itself with the local small-town gossip and happenings. Its intellectual level has, over a long period of time, been that of the bulk of its poorly salaried constituency. Even to get a survey of all the national news originating in Washington, one has had to buy a New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore daily.

Situated at the very fountain-head of our national government, the Washington press has thus been without a national stamp. It has not even reflected adequately the cosmopolitan character of the District's population, which comes not only from every State, but, one might say, from every county in the Union. In a city full of diplomats, the editorial writers have, until recently at least, always been abysmally ignorant of foreign affairs. In the whole history of the District no single editor has made his mark through a local newspaper, so there has been nothing to draw especial attention to the Washington dailies. The journalistic prizes within the District have been held by outsiders—or men originally outsiders—who were sent to Washington to represent the rich, the virile, and the influential journals of the country. The Washington correspondents, not the local newspaper men, are the journalists who have influenced the political life of the capital. They are the ones whom the politicians read eagerly, of whom they stand in awe, especially those whose duty it is to keep the folks back home informed as to what Congressman X and Senator Y are doing.

The influence of the District upon its own press has been doubly and trebly unfortunate. It is bad enough that the army of office-holders is a dull and deadening clientele; the fact that there is such a preponderance of politicians or political appointees has made the papers politically timid despite the absence of local elections and candidacies. The thought has been never to offend the powers that be. Their patronage was needed and you never could tell whether an Administration would succeed itself or not, or be succeeded by one of its own kind. Sometimes one could in the past read a Washington paper for months, yes years, and not be able to guess its politics.

Still another reason for the timidity of the Washington press lies in the District's form of government. It is ruled in the last analysis by Congressional committees composed of Representatives and Senators temporarily in public life and drawn from all over the country. Their interest in the District is of the slightest, but from them come the appropriations and upon the appropriations depends the development of the city. Now the real-estate business is the chief industry of the District. In real-estate progress, therefore, the newspapers have a large stake. Hence they are slow, indeed, to criticize or oppose anybody in Congress who is or may be a member of the District Committee. The papers are also likely to be quite legitimately interested in civic developments whose fate rests upon their editors being on good terms with the men upon whose favor a given enterprise wholly depends. This is one of the most interesting examples we have of indirect control of a press, not by any open or avowed action, but by fear lest it say something which would prevent it from obtaining a perfectly legitimate and aboveboard revenue.

If the influence of big business is far less potent in Washington than elsewhere, the pressure to conform according to Main Street is just as great, if not greater, not only by reason of the overweening influence of the Federal Government, but because the bureaucrats do not like attacks upon the government which furnishes them their existence, and because there is no such hide-bound conservative in all the world as your retired civil official or retired army or navy officer. I have often wondered if the World War was not more welcome to the long-established Washington papers than to anybody else in the profession, for they could then at last afford themselves the luxury of being partisans, of being really outspoken—about the Germans—without hurting advertising or circulation, while at the same time standing in more than ordinarily with the Government. What a relief it must have been to them to let loose some of the pent-up feelings of decades!

Again the difficulties of the Washington newspaper publisher have been immensely increased by the early delivery in his territory of Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York papers. There is no absolute necessity for subscribing to the Washington Post or Evening Star when one can have the admirably newsy Baltimore Sun or Evening Sun, with their far greater recognition of the fact that there is a world outside the District of Columbia, unless one is determined to have the little local news items of the capital. The government clerks rightly feel that they cannot be without the Star because of the departmental news it contains, the obituaries of local worthies, the notices of entertainments and lectures. But it is not only the clerks who read it; there are many streets in which the Star is subscribed for at practically every house. It has built its great success by being the house-organ for the District. To be such a local mouthpiece is a legitimate and useful function; it is, of course, incompatible with the exercise of other than a local influence.

The Star has been singularly fortunate in having as its editor Mr. Theodore W. Noyes, whose tastes and interests have happily coincided with what was the line of least resistance for the newspaper to follow. A fine character, a high type of gentleman, profoundly interested in all local enterprises, no one in the District is more beloved by the older set than Mr. Noyes. It is in the popular mouth that, if you can get your case before Mr. Noyes, justice will be done you. He is believed to be kindly and fair, so kindly that the editorial page suffers from it as well as from other editorial influences which make it intellectually without distinction and politically worthless. If it goes into political matters it does so with a careful balancing of both sides, the familiar "on-the-one-hand" and "on-the-other-hand" type of editorial, which impresses the thoughtless, hurts nobody's feelings, advances no cause an inch, and does not even add to the gaiety of nations. An issue in the beginning of April, 1923, is characteristic in its editorial page headings: "Another Judge Needed"; "The Silver Spring Tornado"; "Flowers Blooming"; "Facilitating Traffic"; "Sugar Profiteers"; "Art Lights"; and "The Tight-Wad." One must go far, far into the rural regions to some country weekly to find editorial writings of a more kindergarten nature than these; they lack only expression in words of one syllable to be really classic. As an example, here is the philosophy of that tornado;

> The tornado which struck Silver Spring is the first nearby phenomenon of this kind to happen in the Washington area in many years, and it is hoped that we may be spared another visitation for an indefinite time. The longer the time the better. That this short but severe windstorm did not do more damage is a matter to be thankful for. Some persons were injured, but none was killed, and reports indicate that the injured will get well. Most winds of this kind play strange pranks. In the news of nearly all cyclones we get narratives of one house blown to splinters and of another within a few yards escaping undamaged, not because one house was stronger than the other, but because the wind did not strike it. A big tree, survivor of a century, will be uprooted and a nearby tree will not have a twig disturbed. It is not uncommon to read that while a house was smashed its occupants escaped. Some details of a similar nature are to be read in the account of the Silver Spring storm. The people of the village and the closely settled neighborhood about it have much to be thankful for. Though it was thrilling enough to satisfy an exacting taste for thrills, it might have been a great disaster.

Fortunately Washington survived not only the tornado but this editorial. That on the vital question of the price of sugar is a restatement of the news, winding up thus sapiently: "The public has no means of ascertaining the facts, but it believes that the government has such means. Senator Smoot says he hopes that the investigation of the increase in the price of sugar will be vigorously prosecuted by the government and the blame placed where it belongs. So say all of us." These are not unfairly chosen nor un-characteristic examples of an editorial policy intended to arouse no antagonism, but to make much money comfortably with a minimum of trouble, exertion, and ruffling of other people's feathers.

On questions bearing on the government of the District the Star can at times become almost excited and carry on laudable campaigns by daily articles. Mr. Theodore Noyes is entitled to the highest praise for his services on behalf of the public library, of the development of fine arts, and of civic affairs generally. The colored people trust him as they do no one else in the District's public life. In fact, the Star is really an institution, and in its care of its employees is beyond praise. It not only provides the usual, or rather the unusual, sick benefit and pension funds, but also maintains a dental clinic, an Evening Star Club for its employees, and other useful associations for the advancement of its men and women workers. The management's annual banquets to its employees are attended by the President, the Cabinet members who happen to be in town, and half of the Senate and the House; yet there are no speeches and only professional entertainment, with the exception of a few jokes. It is accepted by the newspaper fraternity in Washington that a job on the Star is equivalent to a government pension, since nobody is ever dismissed from this daily. Idyllic as this seems, it does not add to the efficiency of the Star, which is reputed to carry not merely dead wood, but employees of the type who lack energy and ambition and are content merely to hold their respective jobs. This condition is intensified by the fact that there are a number of proprietors represented in the active management. Five sons of these owners have recently been introduced into the business, which fact not only discourages the other employees but necessarily gives rise to the charge of nepotism and of putting men in places of responsibility who cannot be held accountable in accordance with the ordinary rules of the game. Besides Mr. Noyes, his brother Frank B. Noyes, the president of the Associated Press, represents the Noyes family interest in the direction of the Star. No other American newspaper of which I know has so much direct proprietary control or so much hereditary management.

That means, however, that the pressure upon the paper to earn money for them all is very great. For years, however, extraordinary financial results have been achieved; gossip puts the annual profit at considerably more than $1,000,000—some say $2,000,000. Indeed, it is believed to stand among the ten best newspaper money-makers in the United States. It is, however, beyond direct control by its advertisers. If news is omitted, if things are overlooked, if unpopular causes are ignored, if the aspirations of the masses outside of the local governmental field are neither understood nor interpreted, the fault lies with the limitations of the owners, their conception of the function of their newspaper, and their lack of intellectual courage. They are handicapped, too, by their social surroundings. Being personally popular and attractive, they are much invited into the social life of the capital, and every newspaper man knows how difficult it is to criticize or to appear to criticize those by whom one is invited and those whom one meets in the houses of one's friends or at the club billiard tables.

The pressure to make money and be up-to-date now shows itself in the appearance of the Star. Long one of the most beautifully printed of American newspapers, with dignified type, excellent make-up, fine paper, worthy and tasteful headlines, it has become a typographical hodgepodge, without its old beauty and distinction. It will spend much money for news and features and special correspondence—it subscribes to the excellent foreign cable service of the Chicago Daily News—and it is giving more attention to national political happenings than ever before. But newspaper men are careful to turn to its last page as well as its first, for the most important political news-story of the day is quite likely to be buried in the back of the paper.

The Star for all its intellectual vacuity has had dignity and worth. One could hardly have said this a couple of years ago of the rest of the District press. The Washington Post, founded in 1877, after a long and undistinguished career has come into the hands of Edward B. McLean, son of John R. McLean, widely known as owner of the Cincinnati Enquirer, the most powerful Democratic daily in Ohio. The large role played by Edward McLean as a friend to the Harding Administration was one of the inexplicable things in connection with that regime. Mr. McLean, who is usually credited with a past, but not so often with a future, was appointed chairman of the committee which was to have conducted the Harding inaugural ball. The ball was soon dropped, ostensibly for reasons of economy, but there is widespread belief that the choice of the chairman to guide it also had much to do with the abandonment of this function. Mr. McLean, despite his great wealth, is not and never will be popular in Washington, which cannot get over its wonder that any President could be on terms of intimacy with him. Certainly it cannot have been with any desire to propitiate the owner of the Washington Post. Just as the Enquirer owes nothing to Edward B. McLean for its long-established influence and reputation as one of the most remarkable news-gathering dailies of the country, so the Washington Post has gained nothing in moral character from its present owner. It must be admitted that a change has come over it, that it has waked up, that it did play a powerful role during the fight against the Treaty of Versailles and the League of Nations, not merely by its editorials, but also by the tremendous propaganda carried on through its news columns. It demonstrated then that a cause ably served by a daily could make a real impression upon the District public.

Indeed, it cannot be denied, that, as already stated, the news columns—not the editorials—of the Washington Post do influence the Congressional mind. Lord Northcliffe once remarked that of all the American newspapers he would prefer to own the Washington Post because it reaches the breakfast tables of the members of the Congress. Frequently the better and more honest reports of some of the New York dailies do not offset the impressions conveyed by the first page of the Post. The McLean management has played upon this advantage very skilfully, placing upon its first page the signed articles of certain writers, obviously propagandists, who are, some of them, without the respect or trust of the members of their own profession. Indeed, of no other newspaper have I heard the Washington correspondents speak so unfavorably. They despise, dislike and distrust it; to them it is not only a poison sheet—it is also a contemptible one and they question its moral integrity. To such occurrences as its sledge-hammer attacks upon the French occupation of the Ruhr they paid little attention while the public wondered whether great significance should not be attached to them, owing to the McLean comradeship with President Harding. Incidentally, its recent publication of a long list of the prominent clients of a recently arrested Washington bootlegger has been severely criticized. In the crowd in which Edward McLean moves this is regarded as distinctly unclubable behavior.

At present the Washington Post is in full cry after the general pack of newspapers, indulging in all the current newspaper fads, such as a pink sporting supplement, "humorous" pages, comic supplements, picture pages, etc. Like all the Washington papers it specializes in society news, and nowhere else is personal gossip so eagerly read, because of the official character of the city and its constant entertaining. In the advertising field the Post finds that its chief rival is the Evening Star rather than its morning competitor; on Sundays when the Star, Post, and Herald all appear the competition is very keen. After attempting to be his own managing editor for a while, Mr. McLean has now called to this place Mr. John J. Spurgeon, the able newspaper man made free by his release from the editorship of the Philadelphia Public Ledger. It is too early as yet to tell what he will be able to accomplish, but if certain improvements are already noticeable it is somehow impossible to conceive of his having a free hand or being able to accomplish anything lasting under the present erratic ownership. One point of interest remains. Unlike the Star, the Post has never sought to cultivate intensively the local field. Will it do so now, or will it try to increase its influence in the national sphere?

There remain in the Washington field the two Hearst newspapers, the Herald in the morning and the Times in the evening. They are typical Hearst newspapers, peas out of the same pod, typographically ugly and messy, with all the usual Hearst standardized features. The Herald is too new a Hearst purchase to make it possible to judge what its flair and its influence are going to be. So far neither of this pair is exerting any political power, but the Times has shown a steady growth without affecting the circulation of the Star, which in its slow but steady progress reached 95,492 in March, 1923, for the daily, and 98,242 for the Sunday. The Times has climbed to 62,555 and is supposed to be showing a comfortable balance sheet. What I have already said about the Hearst papers in other cities* applies to these two of the tribe. Their influence in no wise corresponds to the noise they make nor to the readers they draw.

Finally we come to the tabloid News, also an evening publication and one of the latest creations of the Scripps-McRae, or Scripps-Howard League as it is now called. It, too, has the characteristics of its group, although it has not been able to devote itself so much to labor questions as have its sisters of the Scripps family because of the absence in the District of any large group of factory workers. As usual, Mr. Scripps is stooping to conquer; his motto is that one must first have a paper before it can be toned up, so he stoops to the trivial and sometimes to the vulgar. The appeal of the News to the masses has been so successful that it now has a readership of some forty thousand. One may pick it up of an evening and find that it has given its whole front page to the marbles championship of the District, and then one may find on the inside extremely valuable and important information not to be obtained elsewhere.

Whatever the defects of the Scripps syndicate its papers are at least forward-looking; they are often on the side of the under-dog and they know what liberalism means. They are usually an oasis in a desert, and for all its defects, and its trivialities, for all its stooping for circulation, the News under the editorship of William B. Colver, chairman of the Federal Trade Board under Woodrow Wilson, is the one hopeful note in the Washington situation. Observers feel that the News is already influencing the other papers in certain directions as, for instance, when it printed its exposure of Attorney General Daugherty. Nothing on earth would have made the Star undertake anything like that, but it had to take notice when the News blazed the way. It is the only paper in Washington which has really a sincere and consistent understanding of what the whole fight in America is about, as contrasted with the momentary glimpses (so often dimmed by the owner's personal ambitions and insincerities) which mark the Hearst press.

Finally we come to the question whether it would ever be possible to have in Washington a really national newspaper. I am often asked whether a great daily giving a most careful survey of the government's activities as well as the news of the world would not have nation-wide influence. I cannot say that such an experiment would be successful. There is needed a weekly journal which could give to the large mass of officeholders throughout the country, postmasters, lighthouse-keepers, army and navy officers, members of territorial governments, consuls and ministers abroad, interesting, well-written factual accounts of the progress of the government. That weekly would necessarily have to be in the nature of a trade journal and would have to be fairly inexpensive because your distant officeholder is not a rich man. Certainly he could not usually afford to pay the $12 required for a year's subscription to a first-class daily newspaper.

To attempt to create in Washington a great daily with complete abstracts of the doings of Congress and news of the government's departments as well as the news of the District and the news of the world would require an enormous sum of money. A Rockefeller or a Ford could do it, but few if any others. There is, however, always the possibility of the appearance of a genuine newspaper personality, a man with something to say and the ability to say it that marked Godkin and Dana and the senior Samuel Bowles. Should such a man appear, his personality and ability could, of course, lift his paper into the front ranks of American dailies, make it respected, admired, and feared by the politicians, and gradually extend its influence far beyond the confines of the District. But such a newspaper ought to be in a position to make enemies. If it should have to consider local advertisers and District influences, it could not fulfil its task. It must be independent and it must, above all else, have something to champion.

Meanwhile, a foreign visitor, coming to Washington to study the institutions of our great country, may take up the capital's three evening papers, only to find the first page of one devoted exclusively to the championship in marbles, and that of another to the fact that a young widow has shot a wealthy man who jilted her. Turning to the third he may be regaled by reading the editorial announcement that the government has the means of getting at the sugar facts and that the flowers that bloom in the spring, tra, la, are happily at their task of beautifying the capital. What matters it, at the seat of the nation, that the world is in a turmoil and that civilization totters in Europe?

---

* See The Nation of March 28, 1923, William Randolph Hearst and His Moral Press.

These United States—XXXVII[*]

NEBRASKA: The End of the First Cycle

By WILLA SIBERT CATHER

THE State of Nebraska is part of the great plain which stretches west of the Missouri River, gradually rising until it reaches the Rocky Mountains. The character of all this country between the river and the mountains is essentially the same throughout its extent: a rolling, alluvial plain, growing gradually more sandy toward the west, until it breaks into the white sand-hills of western Nebraska and Kansas and eastern Colorado. From east to west this plain measures something over five hundred miles; in appearance it resembles the wheat lands of Russia, which fed the continent of Europe for so many years. Like Little Russia it is watered by slow-flowing, muddy rivers, which run full in the spring, often cutting into the farm lands along their banks; but by midsummer they lie low and shrunken, their current split by glistening white sand-bars half overgrown with scrub willows.

The climate, with its extremes of temperature, gives to this plateau the variety which, to the casual eye at least, it lacks. There we have short, bitter winters; windy, flower-laden springs; long, hot summers; triumphant autumns that last until Christmas—a season of perpetual sunlight, blazing blue skies, and frosty nights. In this newest part of the New World autumn is the season of beauty and sentiment, as spring is in the Old World.

Nebraska is a newer State than Kansas. It was a State before there were people in it. Its social history falls easily within a period of sixty years, and the first stable settlements of white men were made within the memory of old folk now living. The earliest of these settlements—Bellevue, Omaha, Brownville, Nebraska City—were founded along the Missouri River, which was at that time a pathway for small steamers. In 1855-60 these four towns were straggling groups of log houses, hidden away along the wooded river banks.

Before 1860 civilization did no more than nibble at the eastern edge of the State, along the river bluffs. Lincoln, the present capital, was open prairie; and the whole of the great plain to the westward was still a sunny wilderness, where the tall red grass and the buffalo and the Indian hunter were undisturbed. Fremont, with Kit Carson, the famous scout, had gone across Nebraska in 1842, exploring the valley of the Platte. In the days of the Mormon persecution fifteen thousand Mormons camped for two years, 1845-46, six miles north of Omaha, while their exploring parties went farther west, searching for fertile land outside of government jurisdiction. In 1847 the entire Mormon sect, under the leadership of Brigham Young, went with their wagons through Nebraska and on to that desert beside the salty sea which they have made so fruitful.

In forty-nine and the early fifties, gold hunters, bound for California, crossed the State in thousands, always following the old Indian trail along the Platte valley. The State was a highway for dreamers and adventurers; men who were in quest of gold or grace, freedom or romance. With all these people the road led out, but never back again.

While Nebraska was a camping-ground for seekers outward bound, the wooden settlements along the Missouri were growing into something permanent. The settlers broke the ground and began to plant the fine orchards which have ever since been the pride of Otoe and Nemaha counties. It was at Brownville that the first telegraph wire was brought across the Missouri River. When I was a child I heard ex-Governor Furness relate how he stood with other pioneers in the log cabin where the Morse instrument had been installed, and how, when it began to click, the men took off their hats as if they were in church. The first message flashed across the river into Nebraska was not a market report, but a line of poetry: "Westward the course of empire takes its way." The Old West was like that.

The first back-and-forth travel through the State was by way of the Overland Mail, a monthly passenger-and-mail-stage service across the plains from Independence to the newly founded colony at Salt Lake—a distance of twelve hundred miles.

When silver ore was discovered in the mountains of Colorado near Cherry Creek—afterward Camp Denver and later the city of Denver—a picturesque form of commerce developed across the great plain of Nebraska: the transporting of food and merchandise from the Missouri to the Colorado mining camps, and on to the Mormon settlement at Salt Lake. One of the largest freighting companies, operating out of Nebraska City, in the six summer months of 1860 carried nearly three million pounds of freight across Nebraska, employing 515 wagons, 5,687 oxen, and 600 drivers.

The freighting began in the early spring, usually about the middle of April, and continued all summer and through the long, warm autumns. The oxen made from ten to twenty miles a day. I have heard the old freighters say that, after embarking on their six-hundred mile trail, they lost count of the days of the week and the days of the month. While they were out in that sea of waving grass, one day was like another; and, if one can trust the memory of these old men, all the days were glorious. The buffalo trails still ran north and south then; deep, dusty paths the bison wore when, single file, they came north in the spring for the summer grass, and went south again in the autumn. Along these trails were the buffalo "wallows"—shallow depressions where the rain water gathered when it ran off the tough prairie sod. These wallows the big beasts wore deeper and packed hard when they rolled about and bathed in the pools, so that they held water like a cement bottom. The freighters lived on game and shot the buffalo for their hides. The grass was full of quail and prairie chickens, and flocks of wild ducks swam about on the lagoons. These lagoons have long since disappeared, but they were beautiful things in their time; long stretches where the rain water gathered and lay clear on a grassy bottom without mud. From the lagoons the first settlers hauled water to their homesteads, before they had dug their wells. The freighters could recognize the lagoons from afar by the clouds of golden coreopsis which grew up out of the water and waved delicately above its surface. Among the pioneers the coreopsis was known simply as "the lagoon flower."

---

[*] Reproduction forbidden. Quotation limited to 300 words. Copyright, 1923. The Nation, Inc. All rights reserved.

As the railroads came in, the freighting business died out. Many a freight-driver settled down upon some spot he had come to like on his journeys to and fro, homesteaded it, and wandered no more. The Union Pacific, the first transcontinental railroad, was completed in 1869. The Burlington entered Nebraska in the same year, at Platsmouth, and began construction westward. It finally reached Denver by an indirect route, and went on extending and ramifying through the State. With the railroads came the home-seeking people from overseas.

When the first courageous settlers came straggling out through the waste with their oxen and covered wagons, they found open range all the way from Lincoln to Denver; a continuous, undulating plateau, covered with long, red, shaggy grass. The prairie was green only where it had been burned off in the spring by the new settlers or by the Indians, and toward autumn even the new grass became a coppery brown. This sod, which had never been broken by the plow, was so tough and strong with the knotted grass roots of many years, that the home-seekers were able to peel it off the earth like peat, cut it up into bricks, and make of it warm, comfortable, durable houses. Some of these sod houses lingered on until the open range was gone and the grass was gone, and the whole face of the country had been changed.

Even as late as 1885 the central part of the State, and everything to the westward, was, in the main, raw prairie. The cultivated fields and broken land seemed mere scratches in the brown, running steppe that never stopped until it broke against the foothills of the Rockies. The dugouts and sod farm-houses were three or four miles apart, and the only means of communication was the heavy farm wagon, drawn by heavy work horses. The early population of Nebraska was largely transatlantic. The county in which I grew up, in the south-central part of the State, was typical. On Sunday we could drive to a Norwegian church and listen to a sermon in that language, or to a Danish or a Swedish church. We could go to the French Catholic settlement in the next county and hear a sermon in French, or into the Bohemian township and hear one in Czech, or we could go to church with the German Lutherans. There were, of course, American congregations also.

There is a Prague in Nebraska as well as in Bohemia. Many of our Czech immigrants were people of a very superior type. The political emigration resulting from the revolutionary disturbances of 1848 was distinctly different from the emigration resulting from economic causes, and brought to the United States brilliant young men both from Germany and Bohemia. In Nebraska our Czech settlements were large and very prosperous. I have walked about the streets of Wilber, the county seat of Saline County, for a whole day without hearing a word of English spoken. In Wilber, in the old days, behind the big, friendly brick saloon —it was not a "saloon," properly speaking, but a beer garden, where the farmers ate their lunch when they came to town—there was a pleasant little theater where the boys and girls were trained to give the masterpieces of Czech drama in the Czech language. "Americanization" has doubtless done away with all this. Our lawmakers have a rooted conviction that a boy can be a better American if he speaks only one language than if he speaks two. I could name a dozen Bohemian towns in Nebraska where one used to be able to go into a bakery and buy better pastry than is to be had anywhere except in the best pastry shops of Prague or Vienna. The American lard pie never corrupted the Czech.

Cultivated, restless young men from Europe made incongruous figures among the hard-handed breakers of the soil. Frederick Amiel's nephew lived for many years and finally died among the Nebraska farmers. Amiel's letters to his kinsman were published in the Atlantic Monthly of March, 1921, under the title "Amiel in Nebraska." Camille Saint-Saëns's cousin lived just over the line, in Kansas. Knut Hamsun, the Norwegian writer who was awarded the Nobel Prize for 1920, was a "hired hand" on a Dakota farm to the north of us. Colonies of European people, Slavonic, Germanic, Scandinavian, Latin, spread across our bronze prairies like the daubs of color on a painter's palette. They brought with them something that this neutral new world needed even more than the immigrants needed land.

Unfortunately, their American neighbors were seldom open-minded enough to understand the Europeans, or to profit by their older traditions. Our settlers from New England, cautious and convinced of their own superiority, kept themselves insulated as much as possible from foreign influences. The incomers from the South—from Missouri, Kentucky, the two Virginias—were provincial and utterly without curiosity. They were kind neighbors—lent a hand to help a Swede when he was sick or in trouble. But I am quite sure that Knut Hamsun might have worked a year for any one of our Southern farmers, and his employer would never have discovered that there was anything unusual about the Norwegian. A New England settler might have noticed that his chore-boy had a kind of intelligence, but he would have distrusted and stonily disregarded it. If the daughter of a shiftless West Virginia mountaineer married the nephew of a professor at the University of Upsala, the native family felt disgraced by such an alliance.

Nevertheless, the thrift and intelligence of its preponderant European population have been potent factors in bringing about the present prosperity of the State. The census of 1910 showed that there were then 228,648 foreign-born and native-born Germans living in Nebraska; 103,503 Scandinavians; 50,680 Czechs. The total foreign population of the State was then 900,571, while the entire population was 1,192,214. That is, in round numbers, there were about nine hundred thousand foreign Americans in the State, to three hundred thousand native stock. With such a majority of foreign stock, nine to three, it would be absurd to say that the influence of the European does not cross the boundary of his own acres, and has had nothing to do with shaping the social ideals of the commonwealth.

When I stop at one of the graveyards in my own county, and see on the headstones the names of fine old men I used to know: "Eric Ericson, born Bergen, Norway . . . died Nebraska," "Anton Pucelik, born Prague, Bohemia . . . died Nebraska," I have always the hope that something went into the ground with those pioneers that will one day come out again. Something that will come out not only in sturdy traits of character, but in elasticity of mind, in an honest attitude toward the realities of life, in certain qualities of feeling and imagination. Some years ago a professor at the University of Nebraska happened to tell me about a boy in one of his Greek classes who had a very unusual taste for the classics—intuitions and perceptions in literature. This puzzled him, he said, as the boy's parents had no interest in such things. I knew what the professor did not: that, though this boy had an American name, his grandfather was a Norwegian, a musician of high attainment, a fellow-student and life-long friend of Edvard Grieg. It is in that great cosmopolitan country known as the Middle West that we may hope to see the hard molds of American provincialism broken up; that we may hope to find young talent which will challenge the pale proprieties, the insincere, conventional optimism of our art and thought.

The rapid industrial development of Nebraska, which began in the latter eighties, was arrested in the years 1893-97 by a succession of crop failures and by the financial depression which spread over the whole country at that time—the depression which produced the People's Party and the Free Silver agitation. These years of trial, as everyone now realizes, had a salutary effect upon the new State. They winnowed out the settlers with a purpose from the drifting malcontents who are ever seeking a land where man does not live by the sweat of his brow. The slack farmer moved on. Superfluous banks failed, and money lenders who drove hard bargains with desperate men came to grief. The strongest stock survived, and within ten years those who had weathered the storm came into their reward. What that reward is, you can see for yourself if you motor through the State from Omaha to the Colorado line. The country has no secrets; it is as open as an honest human face.

The old, isolated farms have come together. They rub shoulders. The whole State is a farm. Now it is the pasture lands that look little and lonely, crowded in among so much wheat and corn. It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that every farmer owns an automobile. I believe the last estimate showed that there is one motor car for every six inhabitants in Nebraska. The great grain fields are plowed by tractors. The old farm houses are rapidly being replaced by more cheerful dwellings, with bathrooms and hardwood floors, heated by furnaces or hot-water plants. Many of them are lighted by electricity, and every farm house has its telephone. The country towns are clean and well kept. On Saturday night the main street is a long black line of parked motor cars; the farmers have brought their families to town to see the moving-picture show. When the school bell rings on Monday morning, crowds of happy looking children, well nourished—for the most part well mannered, too, —flock along the shady streets. They wear cheerful, modern clothes, and the girls, like the boys, are elastic and vigorous in their movements. These thousands and thousands of children—in the little towns and in the country schools—these, of course, ten years from now, will be the State.

In this time of prosperity any farmer boy who wishes to study at the State University can do so. A New York lawyer who went out to Lincoln to assist in training the university students for military service in war time exclaimed when he came back: "What splendid young men! I would not have believed that any school in the world could get together so many boys physically fit, and so few unfit."

Of course, there is the other side of the medal, stamped with the ugly crest of materialism, which has set its seal upon all of our most productive commonwealths. Too much prosperity, too many moving-picture shows, too much gaudy fiction have colored the taste and manners of so many of these Nebraskans of the future. There, as elsewhere, one finds the frenzy to be showy; farmer boys who wish to be spenders before they are earners, girls who try to look like the heroines of the cinema screen; a coming generation which tries to cheat its aesthetic sense by buying things instead of making anything. There is even danger that that fine institution, the University of Nebraska, may become a gigantic trade school. The men who control its destiny, the regents and the lawmakers, wish their sons and daughters to study machines, mercantile processes, "the principles of business"; everything that has to do with the game of getting on in the world—and nothing else. The classics, the humanities, are having their dark hour. They are in eclipse. Studies that develop taste and enrich personality are not encouraged. But the "Classics" have a way of revenging themselves. One may venture to hope that the children, or the grandchildren, of a generation that goes to a university to select only the most utilitarian subjects in the course of study—among them, salesmanship and dressmaking—will revolt against all the heaped-up, machine-made materialism about them. They will go back to the old sources of culture and wisdom—not as a duty, but with burning desire.

In Nebraska, as in so many other States, we must face the fact that the splendid story of the pioneers is finished, and that no new story worthy to take its place has yet begun. The generation that subdued the wild land and broke up the virgin prairie is passing, but it is still there, a group of rugged figures in the background which inspire respect, compel admiration. With these old men and women the attainment of material prosperity was a moral victory, because it was wrung from hard conditions, was the result of a struggle that tested character. They can look out over those broad stretches of fertility and say: "We made this, with our backs and hands." The sons, the generation now in middle life, were reared amid hardships, and it is perhaps natural that they should be very much interested in material comfort, in buying whatever is expensive and ugly. Their fathers came into a wilderness and had to make everything, had to be as ingenious as shipwrecked sailors. The generation now in the driver's seat hates to make anything, wants to live and die in an automobile, scudding past those acres where the old men used to follow the long corn-rows up and down. They want to buy everything ready-made: clothes, food, education, music, pleasure. Will the third generation—the full-blooded, joyous one just coming over the hill—will it be fooled? Will it believe that to live easily is to live happily?

The wave of generous idealism, of noble seriousness, which swept over the State of Nebraska in 1917 and 1918, demonstrated how fluid and flexible is any living, growing, expanding society. If such "conversions" do not last, they at least show of what men and women are capable. Surely the materialism and showy extravagance of this hour are a passing phase! They will mean no more in half a century from now than will the "hard times" of twenty-five years ago—which are already forgotten. The population is as clean and full of vigor as the soil; there are no old grudges, no heritages of disease or hate. The belief that snug success and easy money are the real aims of human life has settled down over our prairies, but it has not yet hardened into molds and crusts. The people are warm, mercurial, impressionable, restless, over-fond of novelty and change. These are not the qualities which make the dull chapters of history.

The next article in the series These United States, to appear in The Nation of September 19, will be Montana: Land of the Copper Collar, by Arthur Fisher.

When the Troops Took Tulsa

By McALISTER COLEMAN

FROM behind a tree on quiet Boston Street in Tulsa, Oklahoma, steps a steel-helmeted militiaman. His bayonet gleams in the arc light. A belated clubman, owner of many millions invested in producing oil wells, halts disgustedly at the soldier's challenge.

"You gotter be off the streets by eleven-thirty," announces the militiaman, "and you got just three minutes to make it."

Before he goes to bed the oil man composes a letter to the Tulsa Tribune that fairly sizzles with rage. "This clown in the governor's office"—"the outrage committed on our city"—"attempts to hold Tulsa up to shame before the world"—are some of the milder phrases.

Tulsa, with her pride not yet healed from the wounds of the shameful race riots of 1921, writhes again under the affront of martial law. For the second time in two years the citizens of one of the wealthiest towns in the Southwest, "Tulsa, the oil center of the universe," are being told by youngsters in khaki when to go to bed and when to get up. It hurts, and Tulsa cries aloud in angry pain.

News that Governor Walton had ordered Adjutant General Markham to march his troops into the city of smart residences and towering office buildings, 200 miles to the north of Oklahoma's capital, was as much a surprise to Tulsa and the rest of the State as it was to the country at large. To be sure, the Governor had shown no hesitancy in proclaiming martial law in Okmulgee back in June when it looked as though whipping mobs were having things their own way, but you don't mention Okmulgee and Tulsa in the same breath in the Sooner State. There are just two cities in Oklahoma that Eastern visitors hear much about. One is Oklahoma City and the other Tulsa. For years there has been the customary twin-city rivalry between the two with great swapping of statistics at banquets of chambers of commerce and Rotarians. Today the "respectable elements" of Oklahoma City make common cause with the commercial bodies of Tulsa in denouncing the calling out of the troops as unwarranted and hurling anathemas at Governor "Jack."

There is this to be said for the Governor; he is unexpected. You see him deliberately turn his back on the Farmer-Labor groups who worked so valiantly for his election. You watch him first appoint and then, a few weeks later, discharge the farmers' choice for the head of the State agricultural college. You hear him denounced by every progressive organ as a "Judas" and worse. You are told that the oil interests of Tulsa have bought him up, and that the price was an automobile, a new house, and an opportunity to play golf with Oklahoma society. And then you come on him sending troops to patrol the very homes of those who are supposed to have him in their pockets. An opportunist, perhaps, this people's Governor, the Walton of the Great Barbecue, the "hickory-shirt" Jack who now wears knickers and golf stockings; but certainly an inconsistent opportunist judging by his present conduct. In July it was the Oklahoma Leader, the official mouthpiece of the Farmer-Labor Reconstruction League, that alone of all the papers in the State hissed Walton through every editorial column. In August the Tulsa Tribune and World outdid even the hated Leader in their deep damnation of the Governor. The suggestion runs counter to all the hero-villain psychology of newspaperdom, but isn't it barely possible that Walton has in him much the same potentialities for good and evil that are contained in the majority of the citizens of his State? The only possible political motive that would animate the sending of troops to Tulsa would be suicide. It is too late—Walton knows it is too late—for the Governor to recapture the old loyalty of the farmers and workers. He is making lasting enemies of the business interests to whom he is supposed to have sold out. Lacking any other evidence, the most skeptical observer must admit, no matter how reluctantly, that, in the case of Tulsa, the Governor has acted with laudable courage.

A dastardly outrage is committed on the main streets of Tulsa, the culmination of a long series of mob outbreaks. No attempt is made to arrest any members of the mob. There is strong evidence of police connivance. The victim appeals to the Governor, and mirabile dictu! the militia are sent—not to "protect property" and arrest striking workers—but to take into custody the highly respectable mobbists. Naturally the Rotarians tear their expensive shirts and the Optimists seek the wailing-wall.

Walton was at Sulphur, a summer resort seventy miles from the capital, when a machine drove into Oklahoma City with a badly crippled man in the back seat. This was Nate Hantaman, a Tulsa rooming-house keeper. Hantaman limped into the office of Aldrich Blake, the Governor's secretary, and, soon after he had told his story, troops were mobilizing to move on Tulsa, following telephonic orders from the Governor.

According to Hantaman, he was told to report at Tulsa Police Headquarters and was there questioned concerning selling drugs in his house. He answered the questions to the apparent satisfaction of the police and was allowed to leave. A short distance away on one of Tulsa's principal streets within plain view of headquarters Hantaman was thrown into an automobile by a number of unmasked men. He cried out to passers-by but no attention was paid to his appeals. He was gagged after persistent shouting, and taken through town and out onto a country road, where he was stripped naked, beaten, and thrown into a ditch. From his waist down Hantaman was a raw mass of welts and bruises made by the black-snake whip. Witnesses in corroborating his story added that a police car had followed the machine in which Hantaman was abducted and that the police could at any time have prevented the outrage.

Several arrests have been made by the militia in the course of their investigation, but in all instances the arrested men have been freed by the civil authorities to whom they had been turned over. Mayor Newblock of Tulsa at first refused to direct the Tulsa police to take orders from the militia but changed his mind after a talk with Attorney-General Short. The scope of the military investigation was enlarged, soon after the arrival of the troops, to take in other floggings that have occurred in and about Tulsa for several years past.

Ku Klux? No definite proof has yet been produced connecting the Klan with the whipping of Hantaman. Klansmen point out that the rooming-house keeper's abductors were unmasked, and insist that the Knights of the Invisible Empire in Oklahoma have never been convicted of an illegal act. Before the Klan existed, in Oklahoma there were whippings and mobbings. Did not a mob take a cowering white boy from the top floor of the Tulsa jail four years ago and march him through the streets (while the police directed traffic) to the tree where he was hanged? Did not all Tulsa join in the running fight that terminated in the wiping out by rifle and torch of the negro section of the town on a tragic day in June, 1921? Have not "white" laborers recently driven out Mexicans brought in to work on the Spavinaw dam project near Tulsa? Why blame the Klan for another display of Tulsa's periodic lawlessness?

There is no evidence, perhaps, of actual Klan participation in the Hantaman case—no evidence, at any rate, that will stand before a jury chosen from the body of a Klan-infested county. But the few—the very few—citizens of Tulsa who are not joining in the clamor over the troops, who are honestly ashamed of their city's long record of violence, are wondering if the hatreds loosed by the formation of the Klan in the Southwest might not somehow be moving in the background of all these lawless acts. Soon after the militia marched down the streets of Tulsa, fiery crosses burned on all the hills of Oklahoma. Klan spokesmen said that the demonstration was a memorial for President Harding. The other night in Oklahoma City I heard 30,000 persons cheer the sight of an aeroplane, with a crimson cross outlined on its wings, wheeling above a Klan initiation at the city's amusement park. Since the occupation of Tulsa the Governor has received warning letters signed K. K. K.

Perhaps the men who flogged Hantaman so cruelly that he will be crippled for life were not Klansmen. Many organizations, masked and unmasked, have been formed recently in Oklahoma with the same peculiar notions of law and order as the Klan. But no one can escape the fact that as soon as the Kleagles got to work in the Southwest rioting became organized on a grand and most businesslike scale. Secretary Blake is sponsor for the statement that since the inauguration of the Governor last January at least one whipping a day has been reported at the State House.

There is a sure contagion about the Klan idea of beating up a neighbor suspected of moral, economic, or religious heterodoxy. How far Governor Walton will go in isolating the germ remains to be seen. In all events it may be said of the Governor of Oklahoma that he has taken refreshingly vigorous action.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has read again a book of which he is uncommonly fond. "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft," by George Gissing, he avers, contains more sound wisdom, more unpretentious and delightful learning, and a quicker eye for beauty than most books of twice its length. Henry Ryecroft is moved more than ordinary mortals with a love of England. English writers are good to him, and English faults; English landscapes he praises, and English beef. "The very coloring of a round, how rich it is, yet how delicate, and how subtly varied! . . . Hot of course with carrots, it is a dish for a king; but cold it is nobler. Oh, the thin broad slice, with just its fringe of consistent fat!" Even the English boiled potato put into the saucepan with a sprig of mint—"This is genius. Not otherwise could the flavor of the vegetable be so perfectly, yet so delicately, emphasized."

* * * * *

THE English country was to Ryecroft—and doubtless also to Gissing—a continual source of delight.

> This is the valley of the Blythe. The stream ripples and glances over its brown bed warmed with sunbeams; by its bank the green flags wave and rustle, and, all about, the meadows shine in pure gold of buttercups. The hawthorn hedges are a mass of gleaming blossom, which scents the breeze. . . . I ramble through a village in Gloucestershire, a village which seems forsaken in this drowsy warmth of the afternoon. The houses of gray stone are old and beautiful . . . the gardens glow with flowers. . . . At the village end, I come into a lane, which winds upward between grassy slopes to turf and bracken and woods of noble beech. Here I am upon a spur of the Cotswolds, and before me spreads the wide vale of Evesham, with its ripening crops, its fruiting orchards, watered by Sacred Avon. Beyond, softly blue, the hills of Malvern. . . . I see the low church tower, with the little graveyard about it. Meanwhile, high in heaven, a lark is singing. It drops to its nest and I could dream that half the happiness of his exultant song was love of England. . . .

* * * * *

VERY touching and profound are the sentences which tell of Ryecroft's gratitude for the peace and security brought him, after fifty years of grinding poverty, by the bequest of a modest living of 300 pounds a year. His small house, the ability to buy books and the leisure to read them, above all the quiet of a well-kept household in the country, are mentioned with delight on nearly every page. And in his solitude he could still think of others who lacked it.

> It is a pleasant thing enough to be able to spend a little money without fear when the desire for some indulgence is strong upon one; but how much pleasanter the ability to give money away! Greatly as I relish the comforts of my wonderful new life, no joy it has brought me equals that of coming in aid to another's necessity. . . . Today I sent S—— a check for fifty pounds; it will come as a very boon of heaven, and assuredly blesseth him that gives as much as him that takes. A poor fifty pounds, which the wealthy fool throws away upon some idle or base fantasy, and never thinks of it; yet to S—— it will mean life and light. And I, to whom this power of benefaction is such a new thing, sign the check with a hand trembling, so glad and proud am I.

* * * * *

A gentle and lucid book, and not a little tragic, for the man who wrote of Ryecroft's peace was never to have that experience. But he could write eloquently of the peace he wished to have, and for that no one is more in his debt than THE DRIFTER

Contributors to This Issue

WILLA CATHER was recently awarded the Pulitzer prize for the best American novel of 1922 on account of her story "One of Ours."

MAXIM GORKI is a Russian novelist whose writing has long been familiar to Americans in translation.

MCALISTER COLEMAN was close to the events of which he writes through his connection with the Oklahoma Leader, a farmer-labor daily newspaper.

Correspondence

Letters to the Editor should ordinarily not exceed 500 words, and shorter communications are more likely to be printed. In any case the Editor reserves the right to abridge communications.

Questions for the Woman's Party

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Since in your issue of August 8 you publish the text of the Woman's Party's new proposal for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, will you not offer the Woman's Party space in your columns to answer the following questions concerning it?

1. How are the words "Women shall have equal rights" to be interpreted? Is the Woman's Party inviting colored women voters in New York to support this amendment which appears to mean that, upon its ratification, colored women will occupy boxes and orchestra seats in the Metropolitan Opera House as freely as white women now occupy them? And that colored women will attend the University of South Carolina, and travel in Pullman sleeping cars in Texas, Georgia, and Florida? If it does not mean this, should not the amendment read: "White women shall have equal rights in the United States and in every place subject to its jurisdiction?"

2. Do the words "Men and women shall have equal rights throughout the United States" mean that they shall have equal rights, as heretofore, to differ? For instance, men are now compelled to support their wives and children. Failure to do so is, in many States, a valid ground for divorce and in others for various penalties. Would the completed ratification of the amendment usher in the nationwide release of husbands and fathers from this obligation?

3. Finally, would wage-earning women be compelled to wait for the short working day, established by statute, until wage-earning men achieve the same limit of hours for themselves? If so, is not this a new subjection of women wage-earners to men? Should not the amendment, then, be altered to read: "White men and women who are not wage-earners shall have equal rights throughout the United States and all places subject to its jurisdiction"?

Will not the Woman's Party categorically reply to these questions?

New York, August 21 Florence Kelley

The Cause of Austria's Fall and Rise

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: With all respect to the Chief Magistrate of my country, I must protest against the reflection upon my fairness in his letter printed in The Nation for June 20. Neither President Hainisch nor Professor Brockhausen attempts to deny any of the facts cited in my article A Country Without a Statesman in your issue of March 14. I have never denied the services of the Prime Minister, Mr. Seipel. Summarizing the situation in February, 1923, I naturally did not emphasize the difficulties overcome by Mr. Seipel in obtaining the help of the League of Nations for Austria. These difficulties, however, did not lie, as Professor Brockhausen suggests, in the League of Nations, but in Austria herself, in the propaganda carried on for the annexation of Austria to the German Empire. This propaganda was in open opposition to the fundamental Article 88 of the Treaty of St. Germain, which requires the maintenance of the independence of the Austrian Republic. While the Austrians were directing their entire energy to the destruction of the peace treaty, the League naturally could not obtain credits for them. Furthermore, in the hope of forcing a change in this article, all the Austrian parties were seeking to prove that Austria must collapse unless she were annexed to Germany. The International Conference naturally drew the conclusion that Austria would not be a good creditor.

The situation improved as soon as the perverse theory of the imminent collapse of Austria was given up. Dr. Wilhelm Rosenberg, the financial adviser of the Schober Ministry, was responsible for this change before Mr. Seipel took office, and when, on October 4, 1922, Mr. Seipel solemnly repledged the republic to maintain Article 88 of the Treaty of St. Germain, the way was cleared for rehabilitation.

With a few friends I attempted to effect this change in policy long before Dr. Rosenberg or Dr. Seipel, and among others we sought the support of President Hainisch and Professor Brockhausen. We found them, like many others, either actively or passively opposed. So I understand the difficulties which Dr. Seipel had to overcome from my own painful experience and can only rejoice that they lie so far behind us that President Hainisch and his letter-writing friend seem to have forgotten them entirely.

Vienna, Austria, June 30 Heinrich Kanner

A Voice from Jerusalem

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Week by week The Nation comes to me with the American mail, as truly a personal message as the longed-for letters, and brings into a rich, full, cosmopolitan life, lived at one of the cross-roads of the world, a breath of the wider world, of the spirit of freedom that bridges the gulf between East and West. And as with all your faithful friends, I do not allow your copies to go to waste; I pass them on to the next American.

Sometimes my experience here strikes a sharp note of contrast with statements made in your paper. For example, in the trenchant article of Mr. Smertenko on What America Has Done for the Jew, I find this: "Basic in all the significant changes of Jewish character . . . is the spirit of democracy which is America's greatest contribution to modern Jewish life." Yet I find here, in Palestine, where only an insignificant minority of the Jews have ever seen America, a spirit of democracy among the Jews which makes me feel at home, and a chance for democratic expression in the forms of social life for which I longed vainly in America. This despite the fact that there is not yet self-government in the accepted political sense. The Jewish community is organized internally, and the workingmen's party is by far the strongest, with the result that its voice is heard in all councils, even the government's; that its organization is the largest employer of labor, taking contracts successfully for the government as well as for private individuals; that it runs a bank, a cooperative store, and a large number of cooperative labor camps and agricultural groups. To say nothing of the spirit of democracy in daily life. I am often reminded of Justice Brandeis's saying that the thing which brought him to Zionism was work with Jewish labor unions, for that convinced him that the Jew had a peculiar gift for democracy which he ought to be allowed to express in a land of his own.

Jerusalem, June 3 Jessie E. Sampter

The "Prurient Prude"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Would not the following delightful bit from Charles Reade's "Round Table," dated October, 1866, exactly express the sort of people responsible for some recent attacks on good literature? "There is a kind of hypocrite that has never been effectually exposed for want of an expressive name. I beg to supply that defect in our language and introduce to mankind the 'Prurient Prude.'" In these days of slogans and apt phrases "Prurient Prude" is worth reviving.

New Canaan, Connecticut, July 25 Grace Isabel Colbron

BURLINGAME PUBLIC

White Terror in the West Indies

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir:

Give me the good old tropics,
And a "shot" of Haitian booze,
Down where there are no commandments,
And you live and do as you choose.

Give me a scrap in the jungle,
Or a raid on a gambling-joint,
Where you pull out the glistening bayonet,
And say, "Do you see the point?"

Give me the mellow moonlight,
That shines on the Caribbean!
If I cannot be a millionaire,
Let me be a marine!

Being adventurous, I enlisted in the United States Marine Corps in 1916. After training at Port Royal, S. C., I embarked on the collier Neptune for Santo Domingo with a lot of other rookies. When I arrived at Sanchez I saw people dressed in suits of gunny-sack, and a mountain whose trees leaned back as if ready to spring at something.

I had not been in Sanchez many days before an earthquake took place. It was midnight and the shock knocked more than one marine from his bunk, the water tanks were running over, the earth was opening up, swallowing houses with their occupants, pyramids of fire were darting from Samana Bay and the Caribbean Sea. Hardly had the tumult subsided when the call to arms was sounded. A detachment of marines at San Francisco de Macoris was surrounded, outnumbered, and in danger of annihilation by General Emil King's army. We killed and wounded 169 people at La Saba, and suffered one casualty among ourselves: a private was shot through his right arm. We pushed him along on a hand-car until we came to Barbara. There, when we secured some drinking water, we found that most of it had been poisoned; so many of us went thirsty.

Then began an orgy of looting. In one house we discovered a large table with a veritable banquet laid out on it, but, when we sat down to eat, a corporal came and knocked the table over; he then proved to us that the food was poisoned. One of our officers shot an old native who was kneeling in prayer, while Captain Hughes threatened to burn the entire town on our return, if any of our supplies in one of the wrecked freight cars had been molested.

Suddenly a rebel army of about 500 hove into sight on a long train of passenger cars. There were only thirty-nine of us, but we had Benet Mercier machine-guns, and mounted them upon logs. Had Captain Hughes let us pour our death-dealing missiles into the approaching locomotive, we could have blown it up and destroyed a number of the enemy but, instead, he let the enemy run into the jungles, making it possible for them to snipe at us for the rest of our long and tedious journey. There is nothing more harrowing than fighting an invisible enemy. All that day we had but one egg sandwich apiece.

Dominican cavalry appeared on the track. We pumped lead into them, and many a beautiful horse plunged over a bridge or a precipice. We could see them lying far below us writhing in agony. The more merciful among us, although it was against orders to waste ammunition, took aim with our Springfields and put a few of them out of their misery. We captured a cavalryman who was loaded down with rum, and several of us became intoxicated. The best thing to do when in battle is to chew tobacco and drink liquor so as to steady the nerves and deaden the senses. All of us who were drunk became heroes. I was always a hero while in the West Indies because I was never sober.

Edward J. Irvine,
Ex-private, 32nd Co., 4th Reg., Sanchez, D. R.

Washington, D. C., June 8

How "Wobbly" Originated

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your editorial (July 18) upon the stand taken by eleven of the political prisoners in Leavenworth, in refusing a commutation of sentence that would entail a life-time parole, prompts me to send an extract from a letter from Mortimer Downing, one of the Sacramento men:

> Probably few on the outside can estimate what a simple and earnest deed it was to choose imprisonment rather than liberty; and in one case it means the serving of a twenty-year sentence (James Rowan). The essential principle of our whole industrial movement is solidarity. The world has outgrown individualism and all its train of violence and inhumanity. We call ourselves International Workers of the World to emphasize just this basic fact of essential human brotherhood. . . . We are sentries on guard; our stations are fixed until such time as we may be honorably relieved of our responsibility. We can surrender nothing of the principles for which we stand. . . . Never before has material power been so clearly arrayed against the power of the human spirit. How can any honest soul palter with such issues as these, or cringe and compromise before their challenge?

Incidentally, at the close of his letter, he gives the origin of the term "Wobbly," so often applied to members of the I.W.W.:

> Up in Vancouver, in 1911, we had a number of Chinese members, and one restaurant keeper would trust any member for meals. He could not pronounce the letter "w," but called it "wobble," and would ask: "You I. Wobble Wobble?" and when the card was shown credit was unlimited. Thereafter the laughing term among us was "I. Wobbly Wobbly," and when Herman Suhr, during the Wheatland strike, wired for all foot-loose "Wobblies" to hurry there, of course the prosecution made a mountain of mystery out of it, and the term has stuck to us ever since. Considering its origin, I rather like the nickname. It hints of a fine, practical internationalism, a human brotherhood based on a community of interests and of understanding.

New York, July 23 Richard W. Hogue

Einstein and the League Again

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Was it The Nation which recently quoted what Einstein had said about the League of Nations? If so, I hope you will quote the inclosed.

Geneva, Switzerland, August 12 Manley O. Hudson

[The inclosure is a clipping from a German newspaper stating that at a meeting of peace societies in Berlin on July 29, Professor Einstein stated: "You know that I myself had a disagreement with the League of Nations and turned my back upon it in disgust because of what I had seen of it. But I believe that I acted mistakenly, for, however bad the League of Nations may be in respect to what it has accomplished, it is tremendously important in respect to the possibilities which lie concealed within it. Even if it had managed matters even worse than it has done we would have to admit that under present-day conditions it is the only organization which offers the possibility of establishing relations between nations. Germany should therefore not let the year pass without utilizing this means of communication. The majority of the League is today still composed of people who lack the qualities necessary to make it a valuable institution, but I have convinced myself that there are in the League many valuable elements which are really earnestly striving to improve international relations."]

More North Carolina Journalism

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Stuart Chase's epitome of the contents of the Charlotte (North Carolina) Observer furnished a number of laughs. You may get at least a smile when I inform you that another North Carolina paper recently spoke disparagingly in its headlines of "immigrants from Asiatic and other undesirable countries."

San Francisco, July 25 Harold Coy

Books

The American Short Story

The Development of the American Short Story. By Fred Lewis Pattee. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

The Advance of the American Short Story. By Edward J. O'Brien. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.

Representative American Short Stories. Edited by Alexander Jessup. Allyn and Bacon. $4.

MORE and more we succumb to the delusion of the man in the street that, since his automobile, locomotive, and airship move ten times as rapidly as the chariots of ancient Greece, Judea, and Rome, he has improved proportionately all other functions of civilization. And yet it is sufficiently obvious that in things of the spirit the graph of progress does not mount in accord with the chronological table. Certainly the trend of the American short story in the century of its life has been—to borrow an analogy from another art—from colonial mansion to the two-family flat rather than from log-cabin to skyscraper. This fact Messrs. Pattee and O'Brien both recognize although their titles seem to cater to the popular fallacy, unless one interprets "development" and "advance" to mean simply movement, not improvement.

For, in so far as Dr. Pattee has permitted himself to pronounce judgment, he agrees with Mr. O'Brien that the contemporary short story has developed high mechanical efficiency at the expense of the thought, the truth to life, and the urge for self-expression which are necessary to a work of art. He, too, criticizes the handbooks and the university laboratories which teach the new trade "with laws as arbitrary and as multitudinous as those governing bridge whist." He would concur in Mr. O'Brien's opinion that "short-story writing, which is only justified when it is an art, infrequently rises nowadays to the lower dignity of a profession, and is for the most part a clever form of trading, in which deceptive tricks are at a high premium," and that an author's technique no longer means anything more than "a generic term for labor-saving devices to alleviate his own fatigue and that of his readers."

But, on the whole, Professor Pattee has sought to evade the responsibility of general criticism; he holds that "it is not the province of the literary historian to discuss or even to venture an opinion" on the value of the short-story medium or on the relative excellence of the successive stages in its evolution. When in the course of his survey of "the one literary form that America has evolved and presented to the world" he discusses individual writers, Mr. Pattee does not hesitate to condemn harshly and discriminately the idols of patriotic pedagogues. Instead of lighting another smoky incense-burner at the national shrine, he rubs our literary fetishes vigorously enough to show that some of their glitter is but tinsel. Though this book is full of trenchant and important matter, the author's manner is tediously pedantic: "For the short story as we know it today Irving performed perhaps nine distinctive services." Follows 1, 2, 3, 4. . . . Likewise, the contributions, phases, characteristics, periods, and influences are enumerated in this classroom fashion.

Mr. O'Brien, on the other hand, permits little of academic classification, or academic calm for that matter, to mar the interest of his work. Reading this book is an adventure. Its author is concerned with the American short story because he is concerned with American civilization, of which literature is the expression as well as the interpretation. And, though his criticisms of both will present nothing startling to the readers of Mr. Mencken's jeremiads, they illumine the subject by the brilliancy of his parables and analogies.

Taking as his thesis this quotation from Samuel Butler: "America will have her geniuses, as every other country has. In fact she has already had one in Walt Whitman, but I do not think America is a good place in which to be a genius. A genius can never expect to have a good time anywhere, if he is a genuine article, but America is about the last place in which life will be endurable at all for an inspired writer of any kind," Mr. O'Brien exhibits our short-story writers as proof that pioneer America was and is a bad place for the true artist. In Irving and Hawthorne, Melville and Poe, Henry James, Mark Twain, and the more modern authors he finds either revolt or romantic escape from the sordid reality, the engulfing tide of materialism, of these United States. The evidence seems to me a bit forced, just as the other note, disillusionment for accepted literary men and suffering for the unsuccessful, is a bit strained.

As for the short story, it was inevitable that this medium should suffer from the standardization of American life. With the exception of the work of Sherwood Anderson and Waldo Frank, in which Mr. O'Brien places his hopes for the future, and an occasional solitary work of art, the contemporary short story is "the product of one or more of four heresies"—type, local color, plot, and surprise ending—which, operating like a soulless machine with a clever mind, suggest more and more "that the secret of perpetual motion is being fatally discovered."

One might easily take issue with Mr. O'Brien, yet he is much closer to the truth than Mr. Jessup, who, though he accepts the former's critical standards, comes to the usual textbook compiler's telltale conclusions, namely: "In the short story America, ever since Poe, has led the world," "his [Bret Harte's] work gives a better representation of American life than either [Hawthorne or Poe]." Though shallow in its prefatory criticism, this book is probably the best anthology of American short stories yet published. Mr. Jessup has fortunately set himself the task of selecting "the best at all periods of development, even though the best of one decade fall far below the best of another." This he has performed intelligently and to the indisputable vindication of Messrs. Pattee and O'Brien.

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

Gandhi and India

Gandhi, the Apostle. By Haridas T. Muzumdar. Universal Publishing Company. $1.50.

IT is plain that Haridas Muzumdar feels that "it is laid upon him" to speak, and equally plain that the power to do this has been vouchsafed to him. A burning desire to set his country in its proper light before the world, combined with a grasp of the subject and unusual powers of expression, have helped to make a book worth the attention of anyone who would know the facts in connection with Mahatma Gandhi and the politico-spiritual movement which has swept over India.

The book has that illusive but real thing we call charm. The second part is preceded by a panorama of Indian history, notable for its content and the beauty of its English. "In sketching this panorama," says the author, "my purpose has been, not to advocate but to record. . . . India's is a struggle for world freedom, for the world cannot indeed be free as long as one-fifth of the human race are denied freedom. . . . A free India will be eminently fitted to preach the gospel of universal brotherhood, peace on earth, good-will among men, and, God willing, she shall carry forward the great purpose."

The two chapters entitled Indian Society and Contribution to Civilization will be most revealing even to those who think they know India; and in India a Nation is to be found material rarely met with in the so-called information gathered for western consumption. Here is shown the beginning of Indian nationalism, which was coincident with the disillusionment that followed Queen Victoria's Proclamation of 1858—the expression of which, says the author, remains a "pious hope" to this day. Here too is a telling description of the bureaucratic misrule which sowed the seeds of racial antagonism, creating "an atmosphere of inferiority . . . in which the tallest [had to] bend," and stunting the race by means of "the dish of opium" prepared by the grace of the alien government. But irresponsible tyranny welded together the peoples of the far-flung provinces; the resulting poverty and chronic hunger impregnated the masses with discontent; and stupid and cruel autocracy on the part of men like Dalhousie, Lytton, and Curzon furnished the reason for revolt. Mr. Muzumdar pays his tribute of praise to Indians whose self-sacrificing efforts paved the way for the Mahatma, and he gives due appreciation to men of the type of Wedderburn and Sir Henry Cotton—public-spirited leaders thoroughly imbued with the British tradition of freedom and liberty—and particularly to Mr. A. O. Hume, to whom he credits the success of the Indian National Congress. It was this organization which grew slowly but surely from an instrument of social reform to the vehicle of national revolt, and which passed under the control of Gandhi in 1920, standing unanimously, in December of that year, for peaceful non-cooperation with the government, to the end that the country might reconstruct its own native institutions and thereby achieve Swaraj—self-government.

The life story of Gandhi is a spirited bit of writing and an absorbingly interesting narrative. "Following the Great War," says the impressive introductory chapter, "which raised high hopes among Indians, came the disappointing Versailles Treaty . . . a jumble of falsehood and idiocy; then the cruelly repressive "Black" Rowlatt Acts of 1919, which set the inchoate mass ablaze with indignation. To make their feelings articulate was needed a man, a hero—their man. . . . The worst would have happened, but Gandhi, the personification of Peace, came on the scene, as if to say, 'Behold, I give you a new gospel and a new commandment. Non-violent resistance is the true way of freedom and self-realization.'"

The author presents his country's "Great Soul," Gandhi, in a sympathetic, picturesque, and withal restrained manner, and always with strict regard for the truth. The high spot in the picture comes after the arrest of the Mahatma, in the description of the spontaneous act of the whole court in rising when the prisoner, a frail, serene, indomitable figure, clad in a coarse, scanty loin-cloth, entered the court-room for his trial. Then follows Gandhi's remarkable defense, which will go into the annals with the great human documents of all time.

For her deplorable situation today, Mr. Muzumdar asserts that India must blame herself as well as England. "Non-cooperation in politics," he says, "rests on the fundamental political maxim that sovereignty rests with the masses. The price of liberty is eternal vigilance; the price of prosperity and justice is Ahimsa—the law of Love. . . ." India, as this writer sees it, exercised neither vigilance nor Ahimsa. The only way open to her now, he believes, is to continue non-cooperation with the evil of a wrong-headed government, following wholeheartedly the program that Gandhi has laid down—a program which admits of no national antagonism and is "irretrievably harnessed to truth." This program, he admits, is at the present writing being "lazily" worked out. But in the short space of three years to have raised the Indian people from the abysmal depth to which submission to a foreign domination had degraded them to a sense of fearlessness and self-respect, and at the same time to have "dragged the moral prestige" of that dominating power "in the dust" is a deserving achievement and a prospect and promise of ultimate success. "Lord Chelmsford," says the author, "may fairly be accused of treating Gravity with levity when, . . . he alleged that Non-cooperation would collapse by weight of its own intrinsic inanity." The real revolution, he insists, is in the new spirit which has come upon the people. "The technique of the revolutionists may change, but the revolution whose torch has been lit will never die. Not with bomb-shells but with thought-shells, not at the point of the bayonet but at the point of the spindle, not with hatred but with love, will India win her freedom and the freedom of mankind."

BLANCHE WATSON

Van Vechten's New York

The Blind Bow-Boy. By Carl Van Vechten. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

As an alien admirer of this fascinating New York whose chronicler Mr. Van Vechten is, I am somewhat troubled by the attitude of those of his compatriots who have so far commented upon "The Blind Bow-Boy." Younger intellectuals have denounced what they regard as the unbecoming frivolity of his venerable years in transcribing this ultra-modern love story, but they have so disconcertingly misapprehended the particular milieu described that one can hardly take such indignation seriously. More baffling is the appreciation of Mr. Van Vechten's novel in terms comparable to those employed by Charles Lamb in defense of the English Restoration dramatists. "The Blind Bow-Boy," in a word, is praised as a charmingly irresponsible picture of an unreal and fantastic world. No wonder the subway announcements invite New Yorkers to get to know their wonderful city! To one suckled, like myself, in a creed more outworn but not perhaps less pagan, the realism of "The Blind Bow-Boy" is its outstanding quality. If the criticism of American fiction were my regular métier I should at once salute this book as the great realistic novel of contemporary New York life.

Such praise, however, is apparently reserved for remorseless—and usually inarticulate—studies of sex awakening in the Middle West, and sordid matrimonial squabbles in Greenwich Village. The modern American novel shall have none other themes but these. Here, however, is a veracious chronicle which is as realistic in its notation of contemporary manners as James Joyce's "Ulysses," whose monumental accuracy of detail has been overlooked by those unacquainted with the Dublin of Stephen Dedalus. Mr. Van Vechten's canvas is as large as Joyce's but it is not so crowded. Instead of seven hundred and thirty-two closely printed quarto pages, he gives us less than three hundred pages octavo, with ample white spaces and a symbolically perverse frontispiece. He has modestly refrained from undertaking that grand masterpiece for which Mr. Mencken is calling, wherein shall be preserved for posterity the gaudy and irresistible figure of this modern Babylon before the fall of a civilization which is culminating in New York. Like Joyce, he has taken a segment of life, but he portrays it with the fine, deft, bizarre strokes of a Beardsley. He does not accumulate detail like Zola, yet one turns from "The Blind Bow-Boy" with as definite an impression of New York in 1922 as one gets of Paris under the Second Empire from the endless tomes of the Rougon Macquart series.

Since omission and selection there must be, I am not grieved by the absence from Mr. Van Vechten's narrative of the elements which admirers of Mr. Upton Sinclair will demand, and I rejoice that, in the handling of many highly delicate and scabreux situations, he has not relapsed into that feeble imitation of Joyce which now seems to be the substitute for the crudities of red-blooded realism, and which merely indicates that the author's manner is as undeveloped as his mind. "The Blind Bow-Boy" is far above mere eccentricities of syntax, yet it has frequently to cope with thoughts and gestures for whose capture nothing short of an explosion of unpunctuated nouns and verbs and suspension dots would seem possible to a less alert technician. Mr. Van Vechten's theme might be summarized as "Up from Boobery," for the situation around which the story revolves is that of a youth whose father is determined that his son shall have none of the disadvantages of education, and all the advantages of sophistication, which he himself would like to have enjoyed. I might almost say that this is a plea for the higher education of young men in America. The author is acutely conscious of the fundamental defect which lies back of most of the phenomena that arouse the ire and despair of serious students of American life. Consequently, he postulates a father whose son is intrusted to a tutor who must make of him an urbane and civilized fellow. To this end certain qualifications are required of the tutor: he must be "of good character but no moral sense. Must know three languages and possess a sense of humor. Autodidact preferred, one whose experience has led him to whatever books he has read. It is absolutely essential that he should have been the central figure in some public scandal. Age, not above thirty."

Equipped with unlimited funds, a tutor answering to these requirements, and an English valet of unusual talents, even in so talented a class, Harold Prewett is launched forth upon the gently swelling seas of New York life, whose waves are so beautifully navigated by Campaspe Lorillard, Paul Moody, the essential tutor, Zimbule O'Grady, Coney Island snake-charmer, the Duke of Middlebottom, and other representative citizens of this New York world. A stray shot from the bow of the Blind Bow-Boy pierces the heart of Harold at the outset, thereby seriously interfering with the progress of his education but heightening the effect of the narrative, for Harold's inability to respond to the various stimuli offered by this very stimulating group of people is not the least charm of the story. He serves as a foil for the virtuosity of his friends, whose activities provide Mr. Van Vechten with his pictures of present-day New York. What those activities are, it would be both dangerous and unfair to divulge, unless one has the insinuating charm of the author in conveying delicate facts. As well might one attempt to outline the story of the "Satyricon." The inhibitions which are supposed to trouble the American soul do not exist for the society to which "The Blind Bow-Boy" is a guide, and neither the Seventh Commandment nor the Eighteenth Amendment cast even a shadow over its pages. After so many volumes of morbid introspection or of adolescent revolt, it is a relief to be assured that there are people in this country so happily unaware of the alleged disadvantages of being an American, who are not overpowered by a sense of their own identity. Van Vechten's New York is as entertaining as Petronius's Cumae, and the company that assembled at Trimalchio's banquet was not more diverting than that which gathered about Campaspe Lorillard in Gramercy Park and furnished material for this modern "Satyricon." ERNEST BOYD

American State Government

Government in Illinois. By Walter F. Dodd and Sue Hutchison Dodd. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. $3.

TO the average intelligent American the government of England, if perchance he sets himself to study it, appears to be a labyrinth, while the governments of Continental countries may be likened to a forest from whose depths one emerges more by accident than by design. But what is to be said of the government of an American State, with its entangling subdivisions and its contacts and overlappings with the Federal system? Take this book of the Dodds, for example. It is a first-rate account, detailed, comprehensive, and up to date, of the elaborate and complicated political machinery that Illinois has installed. The book is intended, apparently, for a textbook, although the authors intimate that it may also be read. We venture to think, however, that the boy or the girl, the young man or the maid, who really mastered the huge bulk of detail within these covers ought to receive a Carnegie medal for heroism. The practical state of the voter, on the other hand, is worse than that of the embryo citizen in the schools. The general ballot used by Chicago voters at the election of November 2, 1920, measured twenty-nine and one-half by thirty-six inches and contained some 345 separate names. All but four of the 345 candidates belonged to one or another of seven different parties, four other parties being represented by one candidate each. One knows only too well what happens to the sacred right of suffrage when offices and names, Federal, State, and local, are piled in solid columns sixty high. The average voter either votes a straight ticket from sheer ignorance or fatigue, which pleases the boss, or marks a few names here and there of persons he knows or has heard of, which salves his conscience, or stays away from the polls, which helps nothing. We recommend this book to Illinoians as a convincing picture of the political quagmire from which they, in common with their fellows in many another State, need to be extricated.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

The Dry Rot of Organized Charity

The Neighborhood in Nation-Building. By Robert A. Woods. Boston. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

Social Work in the Light of History. By Stuart Alfred Queen. Philadelphia. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.

Education and Training for Social Work. By James H. Tufts. New York. Russell Sage Foundation.

FROM the day when charity ceased to be the expression of personal friendliness and became organized and scientific, an incurable dry rot seems to have attacked most of its professional practitioners. The whole history of modern philanthropy may be regarded, from one point of view, as an effort to escape the ravages of this fell disease, but the germ has not yet been isolated, nor has any specific been hit upon. Charity societies today are uneasily making themselves over into family welfare agencies, and the national organization has become the National Conference of Social Work. Amid much patter about prevention, which has long been the current cant of the craft, there is slowly emerging a conception that if the social worker (accursed term!) is to be anything more than a shuffler of "cases" (s)he must concern h(er)imself with the task of helping build a better social order. But he is a rare performer whose work does not sooner or later eventuate in dust and ashes.

The settlement movement, which most of those outside it are likely to regard as already of chiefly historical interest, was an interesting and valuable revolt against laissez-faire charity. In "The Neighborhood in Nation-Building," one of our settlement veterans gathers together sundry papers written at various times during the past thirty years, representing, on the whole, a safe and sane settlement point of view. Nothing startling and subversive, and nothing hard-boiled or reactionary, mars the placid flow of these pages. Nor have they the throb of life of "Twenty Years at Hull House" or "The House on Henry Street." This book, like the settlement out of whose life it grew, is hospitable, rather than militant or disturbing. Mr. Woods believes that the young sap flows vigorously up the trunk of the settlement tree. Perhaps so.

Professor Queen's book is an attempt to put social work into proper historical perspective. It contains the material of the usual university course on the history of charity, but, in presenting that material, the author first describes the existing situation, and then, resolutely facing forward, takes four successive leaps backward to the medieval manor, running forward a few steps after each backward jump. This concession to modern methods of writing history leaves some old-fashioned readers with a feeling as though they had been playing leapfrog blindfold. But such readers should have been dead long since.

Professor Tufts' thoughtful study of schools for the teacher of social workers is more than its name implies. It is a sober and restrained plea for a throwing off of the shackles laid on the social worker by his "charitable" origin, and for a bold conception of his function in terms of social engineering, not ambulance work. It examines the conditions that must be met if social work is to become a real and worthy profession, makes clear the difference between "training" for a routine job and "education" for genuine serviceableness in large tasks of social construction, points out the dangerous tendency of existing schools to conceive their task in the former terms, and rightly indicates that the latter should be their real aim. The work is an informing study and criticism of existing educational machinery and methods in a special field, and is full of sound and valuable suggestions, by which teachers in that field will profit; for they have not yet attained, let us hope, to that perfection of arrogant and pedantic rigidity which characterizes most of us in everyday college and university education.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

A Heroic Statesman

Financial Policy of Czechoslovakia during the First Years of its History. By Dr. Alois Rasin. Publication of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Oxford University Press: American Branch. $2.50.

THE characteristics of the book of Alois Rasin, former Minister of Finance for Czechoslovakia, can be summarized in the paradoxical phrase, an exciting economical treatise by a financial hero. To describe an economical book as exciting is at least as strange as to call a minister of finance a hero. However, if there be need for the justification of this queer conjunction of words it is already furnished by the lamentable death of the great finance minister. Alois Rasin died a few months ago in consequence of a fatal wound he had received from the hand of a former employee of the Czechoslovak state whose job fell victim to the radical currency-curing campaign that Dr. Rasin had initiated and carried on until his assassination.

Rasin knew that he challenged death itself with the cold figures that he gives us in his book and which he had submitted to the Prague Parliament to prove that there was only one means to avoid a catastrophe similar to that which had befallen the neighboring states of Czechoslovakia and that this was the adoption of the money-deflating method advocated by him. But Alois Rasin defied the threats of death, nay, death itself, and so he gave an illuminating example that there is such a thing as "financial heroism." Rasin saw his way clear, he had an unbounded confidence in his figures, and he achieved what he wanted. The consequence is that today Czechoslovakia is a country—the only country in Central and Eastern Europe—which has a sound currency.

The summary which the martyred finance minister of Czechoslovakia gives us of his struggles for the economical rehabilitation of the Czechoslovak Republic is, when least is said, exciting. Not that Rasin wanted to be dramatical. Directly he is not concerned with anything else but figures, statistical data, and other cold material, which, under ordinary circumstances, are least likely to appeal to the imagination. But under these figures misery and prosperity are struggling, capital and labor are crossing their sabres. If the inflation, on an Austrian scale, wins in Czechoslovakia, general misery will follow in its trail, but if deflation has the supremacy, although intermittent crises may follow, prosperity is due to come in the long run. In most of the Central and Eastern European countries capital found a faithful servant in inflation. It is still considered the most valuable help to beat foreign competition. As Rasin explains it, in the hey-day of inflation wages cannot keep pace with the devaluation of currency, whereas the export prices are kept on the level of the world market. Deflation, on the other hand, means in Czechoslovakia that the prices decrease while the wages follow only slowly the general trend of the money market. All her neighbor countries are menaced in their existence by the onrushing waves of the devastating flood of inflation, while Czechoslovakia sits already on a safe island, still gasping, weak and uncertain about the future, but, at all events, saved.

There is no sorcery in the method Rasin employed to achieve this end. He describes it with simple words which only a man can find who is very sure of what he did. He relates how he had ordered the stamping of the paper money on the territory of the Czechoslovak Republic in order to isolate it from the doomed currency of the Austro-Hungarian Bank. He emphasizes the beneficial effect of the 50 per cent forced loan levied, simultaneously with the stamping, on the fortune of everybody residing within the boundaries of the republic, with the exception of the poorest wage earners. Then came, as auxiliaries in the work of reconstruction, an international currency loan and popular subscription to the gold reserve. By this means Czechoslovakia succeeded, as the first and, so far, the only state among the continental ex-belligerent nations, in stopping her money printing press. This meant, at the same time, that a halt was called to the further devaluation of the Czechoslovak currency. A substantial property tax, a foreign loan, partial cessation of the state victualling, and dismissal of the superfluous state employees did the rest.

EMIL LENGYEL

The Sacred Shades

The World's Great Religious Poetry. Compiled by Caroline Miles Hill. The Macmillan Co. $5.00.

RELIGION may be defined as sight and service to superhuman power deemed entitled to them. There are vast extrahuman powers, which have always claimed more sight and more service: love, battle, truth, even tongue-tied Nature. These have had from the first their share of singing. Religion was a later child: animals throb to these four, before they hypothecate religious explanations. Religion had to come, as weak man's invocation of imagined strength to aid his veritable weakness; as the fumbling brain's answer to the simple puzzles of what are death and the things moving in darkness, and the vaster problems of what is a bud and why is a leaf. The fog lifts slowly, the sun is too dazzling for weak eyes; hence gods were raised, like umbrellas, to shade the glare of truth. All that man knew or thought he sung: for he has a singing heart; and thus poetry opened its lips to sing of Jah and Bel, of Thor and Sin and Thoth.

What would religion be without the poets? For religion is the crystallization of some poet's vision and fantasy. Much of the Old Testament is named poetry; and what of the rest is of the superhuman grew in a poet's brooding. There was poetry burning in the carpenter of Nazareth, in Gotama, in all man-gods who have walked the way of dust. Zeus and his Olympian cabinet were engendered, and brought to birth and a wild maturity, by Homer, Hesiod, the odists, the great tragic trio. Jah and El were altered, combined, and smoothed into a genial universal god by golden-tongued David and the thunder-throated Hebrew prophets; the Vedic bards, the singers of the Niebelungenlied, the austere chanters of sagas, great lonely men like Dante, Milton, Nietzsche, have dropped or reared man's deities. And fearful later verse, treading the broad valley road instead of the harsh unbroken slopes toward the summit, has elaborated and diluted these early gods; has made them drag many a rickety cart and cause.

All of this appears in this comprehensive and excellent anthology. Its authority is assured through its editorship by one Ph.D., and its foreword by another. Here is the authentic song of the soul still on the valley road—The Hound of Heaven, The Falconer of God, Saul, Passage to India, The Donkey, In No Strange Land; here are sardonic side-blows at the easy lore—Caliban Upon Setebos, The Sons of Martha, To a Contemporary Bunkshooter; here is some essay at the harsher steeps. There is a comforting choir of remembered hymns, good to read again. There is enough information about the next stages of the journey to make this book a road-guide to Paradise, if only the topographers ever agreed upon a single landmark or skymark. But they do not. Babel crumbled once, and may again.

Much of the material is soggy; but that was to have been expected. There is enough with wings to let the volume hover, if not soar. In its immense catholicity most things of value have managed to creep in. Here is the culm pile: pick out your own glistering dark coal.

Those whose concern stops with religion may not reflect that they feed and are watered of the long crystallization of man's ancient ideals. If they would have, not the ideals of men dead, but of man living, let them read the poetry of today. Some of it is here. This assumes that man's vision has not waned with Israel and dulled with Greece; and this we hold. If the reverse is true, then religion is all sufficing. For it is the city below the clouds, wavering across the level desert; and the sight of dead eyes is all that is needed by men already dead.

CLEMENT WOOD

The Partition of Africa

The Partition and Colonization of Africa. By Charles Lucas. The Oxford University Press, American Branch. $4.20.

IN this age of rapidly increasing knowledge brief summaries of extensive areas of information are in great demand; and this little book of Sir Charles Lucas will be found to be a valuable compendium of useful information on the subject of the European penetration of Africa. It sketches the history of racial contacts from classical times to the present period of mandates, and presents briefly every one of the problems to which these contacts have given rise.

The slave trade and its attendant horrors, and the mitigation of these by the efforts of good men in England and elsewhere; the abolition of the traffic in slaves and the rise of colonial exploitation of African peoples in their homelands which immediately took its place; the international scramble for choice sections of African territory; the wars, diplomatic and military, which the nations of Europe waged with each other in consequence; the horrors of the Congo, and the various campaigns in Africa from the times of Henry the Navigator to those of General Smuts—all these are set forth in admirable compression.

But the story is told exclusively from one side—the side of the European who administers Africa for the African's good. One misses the broad humanitarianism of Morel, Olivier, and De Brazza or the warm Christian kindliness of Harris and Patton. But such temperings of the spirit may well be out of place in a simple summary prepared by a British administrator to make clear to casual readers the problem of the white man's rule in Africa. Within its limits this book is a correct and competent piece of work, easy to read and easy to remember.

HUBERT HARRISON

Books in Brief

Der Spiegel von der East Side. By Jacob Magidoff. Illustrated by S. Raskin. Published by the Author.

An epitome of these sketches is to be found in Mr. Raskin's accompanying portraits. They are treated intelligently and with some care but there is lacking the talent and divination for revealing emphasis or the courage and humor for caricature. The artist succeeds best with Abraham Cahan; Mr. Magidoff rises above his dull average in the study of Joseph Barondess.

The Woman of the Horizon. By Gilbert Frankau. The Century Company. $2.

If the author had been frank enough to let this novel stand simply as a gay narrative of light amours, smartly and cynically disclosed after the manner of Schnitzler, it could be set down as an adroit and well-modulated performance. With the moral sugar-coating and the quest-of-the-perfect-woman business dragged in, it leaves rather a bad taste. Sometimes an ounce of sincerity is worth a pound of Puritanism.

Little Tom. By V. Tille. Illustrated by O. Stáfl. Prague: B. Kočí. Agents for the United States: The Writers' Publishing Company, New York. $3.

You may turn a skeptical eye, when you are older, on purported photographs of "little folk." But if you are eight or thereabouts you may follow with sympathy the thrilling vicissitudes of Little Tom, literary descendant of sixteenth-century Tom Thumb, as he is thrown first among mortals and then among the ants, rose-bugs, and lady-birds. If the reader misses in this thin volume the imaginative power and charm of Grimm and Andersen, it is doubtless because he has grown too old or because in his day fairy stories turned out "happily ever after." Tom's inability to cope with his environment is too distressingly like the failure of human beings today. The colored illustrations by Mr. Stáfl are fascinating. The half dozen drawings of seed-catalog stolidity are forgotten among a successful majority that for play of imagination, sweep of line, and humor cannot fail to please children of every age. The great number of typographical errors may be due to a dearth of English proofreaders in Czecho-Slovakia.

The Shining Pyramid. By Arthur Machen. Edited by Vincent Starrett. Covici-McGee.

This is a collection of Mr. Machen's earlier tales and sketches and essays which appeared in miscellaneous journals some years ago and are now brought together between book covers for the first time. Being an ardent "Macheniac," Mr. Vincent Starrett feels in duty bound to see to it that nothing Mr. Machen has ever written shall perish. Such stories as The Shining Pyramid and The Lost Club, however, could very well afford to be forgotten. The Priest and the Barber, on the other hand, is a delightful bit of delving into occult bibliography, quite as good as anything Mr. Machen has ever set hand to.

The Hawkeye. By Herbert Quick. Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.

Like most excursions into the field of historical romance with an American background, Mr. Quick's novel lacks the tang of the soil. When it is heroic, it is too heroic, and when it is commonplace, it has the unrelieved flatness of prairie. When the manly young Iowan wishes to resent the implication that his marrying impulse is nothing but "puppy love," he strikes an attitude and exclaims: "Sir, I cannot permit even you [the girl's father!] to use such an expression when referring to the supreme passion of my life, and to that which, in spite of my unworthiness, this lady has bestowed upon me!" To be sure, the novelist hastens to label this a "high-falutin' speech," but even that doesn't take the curse off.

The Celestial Omnibus. By E. M. Forster. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

If there is any antidote for the sluggish poisons of materialism, it is to be found in such writing as this. The possessor of an alert intelligence and an unerring sense of beauty, Mr. Forster is interested in literature for its quickening values; his work has gaiety and philosophic charm—qualities which give him a kinship with James Stephens. The stories in this volume are away from the pattern of conventional fiction; they tread the pathways of fantasy but always within hail of the highway of truth.

The Scudders. By Irving Bacheller. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

Novels which pretend to deal relentlessly with the acrobatic propensities of the modern young girl, juggling a cigarette, a cocktail, a lipstick, and a spicy story all at one and the same time, are beginning to be an opiate on the market. The thing has been done so often, and to so little purpose, that it no longer has any meaning—save possibly to the lady proprietors of circulating libraries at summer resorts. Doubtless they will find a niche for "The Scudders" on their competitive shelves.

Whose Body? By Dorothy L. Sayers. Boni and Liveright. $2.

Here is quite the maddest, jolliest crime story of recent memory. Seldom has a murder been made so delightfully mysterious, and rarely has the gentleman detective been cast in quite so attractive a guise as that of Lord Peter Wimsey, to whom books in first folios and bodies in bathtubs are of equal interest. An absorbing story and a well-written book.

Music

Battistini

I DID not hear Mattia Battistini until last September. He has steadily refused engagements in the United States, and until September, 1922, I never happened to be in a city of Europe on a day when he was singing there. But, in heaven's good time, my turn did come. One day in Munich, last August, I noticed Battistini's name posted for a concert at the Deutsches Theater the night of the 11th of September.

The audience that gathered the night of that September 11 in the big Deutsches Theater in Munich not only packed the house, but was quite the "smartest" audience that I saw in Munich. Battistini had for many years been a cherished "guest" performer at the Munich Opera in "Rigoletto," "Pagliacci," "La Traviata," and doubtless other operas of his repertory. There could be no doubt of the admiration in which the Münchener held him. Almost from his first number on, insistent voices began clamoring loudly for "Rigoletto" and "Prolog." Eventually he did sing the "Pagliacci" prologue, in the course of a concert whose "encores" drew out a generous program to triple length. He did not, however, "oblige" with either of the jester's monologues from "Rigoletto."

Battistini is an Italian opera singer. His selection of airs and songs, though not exclusively Italian, was true to type. Now, there are people who will have naught of that sort of thing. Those who are more liberal in their musical outlook, and especially those who, in an adverse age, still harbor a taste for bel canto, are bound to be worshipers at the shrine of Battistini. The program that evening in Munich was hardly what one might have selected for the hearing of Battistini. There were two opera airs by that very dull composer Franchetti; then the "Nemico della patria" from "Andrea Chenier," which is little suited to concert performance; Iago's "Credo" from "Otello," which loses a great deal of its force when as accompaniment a piano supplants the orchestra; and the lukewarm musings of the doubting hero from "Eugene Onegin," who is a more interesting figure on the opera stage than on the concert platform. The three remaining pieces served far better, for, despite their distinctly operatic texture, they bear hardily the transplanting to the concert field, being the wine song from "Zampa," the Toreador's song from "Carmen," and Figaro's "Largo al factotum" from "The Barber of Seville."

This was the official program; the "encores" (even without "Rigoletto"!) made a second program. They included the famous air of Scindia from "Le Roi de Lahore," Figaro's "Non piu andrai" from "Figaro's Wedding" (the Mozart barber to cap the Rossini), the "Pagliacci" prologue (this as a sop to the shouting), the "Quand' ero paggio al Duca di Norfolk" from "Falstaff," the Don's serenade from "Don Giovanni," Rossini's fleet, quaint tarantella, "Già la luna," and several minor ditties in Italian or in Spanish that I did not identify. Merely as an amateur of singing (quite apart from purely musical considerations), I should have preferred to hear Battistini in more of the bel canto airs of the nineteenth-century Italians and in classic airs of earlier centuries—at a concert that he gave recently in London, airs from "William Tell," "La Forza del Destino," and "La Favorita" were on his program, and also the "O, del mio dolce ardor" from Gluck's "Paris and Helen" and Carissimi's "Vittoria, vittoria!"

But Battistini is Battistini, and of the feast that he elected to set before me I partook with the voracity of the famished. Fortunately Battistini's voice has been recorded, and well recorded. Thus, for the generations that will not have heard him in the flesh he possesses an immeasurable advantage over the Linds, the Albonis, the Rubinis, whose voices and vocal manners we perforce must reconstruct to our minds' ears from the pages of chroniclers like Chorley. Still, even a perfect reproduction offers no substitute for the continual slight jeopardy that perfection itself must brook in life, imparting to the perfect its fine and final edge.

The supreme impression of Battistini's voice is its purity. I have heard notes as pure from several voices—Caruso's, Tetrazzini's, Melba's, Bonci's. But with Battistini there are no other notes. I have heard "bigger" baritone voices (as well as burlier); the purity of the Battistini tone would carry it in power to illimitable distances. And in freshness the voice of this old man is as of a youth of twenty. Officially the Battistini voice is a baritone; I have heard it described as a "short tenor." The fact is, the typical Italian baritone of the last seventy-five years is a mezzo-tenore, just as the typical German baritone is a bass singing high. The "ancienne voix de baryton" (old Jean Noté, who died the other day, had two and one-half octaves at his command!) seems to survive best in France. But Battistini's mezzo-tenore is no stunted tenor, possessed of a remarkable upper octave and nothing below that. It has a real baritone scale, every note secure and sounding.

Of course the Battistini phenomenon would not be possible without the basis of an uncommon physical endowment—the same thing is axiomatic for Patti, Sembrich, Lehmann, Melba, Calvé, Tetrazzini, Caruso, Bonci, Schumann-Heink, and all the other extraordinary and enduring voices. But to that indispensable ground-work must be added a "correct vocal method" (as the pedagogues would say, though never do twain of them agree as to just what may be the C.V.M.!) and an habitual abstention from forcing or otherwise abusing the delicate mechanism of the voice. Anyone who is at all an amateur of singing could not but have been impressed at this Munich concert by Battistini's absolute control of an amazingly long breath. Every note in his extensive scale was perfectly posed and firm, there was no thought of effort, no hint of throat. Every atom of his breath issued as voice; no fog to obscure tone, no jigging saw-teeth to roughen it. On this foundation of controlled breath, as on a sustaining and exactly responsive ocean, floated all the rest. His unerring, flawless attack of a note; his flowing, jointless legato; phrasing that was like live sculpture in its grace and fineness; an ease in the execution of florid ornaments that a Melba or a Tetrazzini has not surpassed; an endless variety of vocal color; all were there, and in an effortlessness that persuaded you for the time that any other manner of singing was inconceivable; that every vocalist, through the mastery of his means, must so place the listener in the unhindered presence of the music itself.

Though the age of the living be an odious subject, it is sometimes of an unavoidable pertinence. When the voices of singers outlast the onslaught of the years to a degree that seems phenomenal, as with Patti, Lehmann, and Battistini, the exact date of the singer's birth becomes of an indisputable importance to science. Now, nothing else is quite so untrustworthy as the official birth dates of musical biography. If one were to settle Battistini's by an appeal to authority of that sort, one would have only to look him up in Baker and learn that he was born November 27, 1857. According to a man whom I met in Paris and who professed to have gone to school with Battistini, the date should be set two or three years earlier still. Another man, who comes from Rome and who knows Battistini personally, told me in Munich at the time of this September concert that his real age was then seventy-four. The testimony of the eye that night in the Deutches Theater was not helpful. A big, imposing fellow, Battistini looked anywhere from a thoroughly ripened fifty-five to a well-preserved seventy-five. To the evidence so far offered, and meager enough, I have only one detail to add: On the register of the Munich hotel where he put up (a Munich hotel exacts from its patrons secrets that as a rule are kept inviolable between oneself and one's Maker), Battistini wrote himself down as born on the fifth day of the eighth month of the year of grace 1874. At any rate, he preserved the seventy-four of his Roman friend's allegation.

PITTS SANBORN

International Relations Section

Japan's Untouchables

By GERTRUDE HAESSLER

"THERE are no classes in Japan." This assertion is made continually by those people whose interest it is to defend the present social and economic system of their country. And yet one may find references any day in the newspapers of Japan to the Eta Class, the Special Class, the Special Community, the Untouchables—all of which terms are used to designate the outcast class of Japan. There may be an obscure item relative to the plans of the Ministry of Home Affairs for the improvement and relief of this large group of people (estimated at 3,000,000), or perhaps a short account of a riot caused at the Y.M.C.A. by a speaker's indiscreet and contemptuous reference to them. But during the last two weeks of March of this year the entire country was stirred by vivid front-page accounts of civil war which had broken out in various parts of the country. The outcasts, touched by the current of universal unrest, had organized, and simultaneously with their growing militant solidarity there developed an equally militant opposition to them.

The Eta (this term is translated as "dirty" or "filthy") were forbidden by law up to the time of Emperor Meiji's liberalizing influence to mingle in any way with the rest of the Japanese people, whether in work, play, marriage, or worship. The law discriminating against them was repealed in 1871, but the prejudice continues. There has been little fundamental improvement in their social condition, and except for isolated charitable and missionary attention they are completely shunned.

Some of the more important discriminations which the former law imposed upon them are given below. Owing to prejudice, these restrictions with a few exceptions are virtually, though not legally, in effect at the present time.

1. Occupation. The trades to which the Eta are restricted and which are restricted to them, are as follows: Slaughterers, Tanners, Cobblers, Actors, Executioners. Should a restaurant employ an Eta as a cook, the place might as well close unless it intends catering to Eta people only. The Eta business man, although he may be cultured, intelligent, and well educated, cannot carry on operations outside his own class. Acting has become a respectable profession now, even for women, but the clowns, the acrobats, and what would correspond to the American vaudeville class generally belong to the Eta.

2. Community activities. In spite of the fact that the Eta are forced to pay taxes and to submit to conscription for military training and service, they are completely barred from taking part in any community activities. In October, 1922, plans were made in the village of Misho, Osatogun, Saitama Prefecture, to welcome the soldiers returning from service in Siberia. The village officials refused to allow two Eta soldiers to receive this welcome.

3. Residence. Although the Eta are no longer obliged to live in houses that have no windows or doors facing the street, they are still restricted to living in isolated communities, due to the fact that house-owners will not rent houses to them except in purely Eta villages or in special districts within large cities. The solidarity that has grown out of this community life in Tokio has come to be regarded as a "definite menace" by the police authorities, particularly since the municipal guardians of the law are afraid to enter these districts. In fact, a systematic campaign has been instituted to scatter the people and prevent them from again coming together. Fires are frequent in any large city of Japan—a fire of from forty to eighty houses is reported in the papers as a "small" fire—and whenever an Eta section, or part of it, burns in Tokio the people are not allowed to return to it when it is rebuilt.

4. Marriage. In a few isolated cases where it has occurred a person marrying an Eta, whether man or woman, descended to the social level of the Eta. In the spring of 1922 in a small village in western Japan an Eta expressed his desire to marry a non-Eta woman. He was stoned nearly to death by the other inhabitants, forbidden to return, and the woman was frightened into refusing to have anything more to do with him.

5. Religion. Only one of the Buddhist sects, the Shinshu, will admit the Eta for worship.

6. Freedom of Movement. The Eta are prevented from entering certain districts, especially the vicinities of royal palaces or the residences of the nobility. While the restriction was legally still in force, an Eta found trespassing on a forbidden area was immediately put to death.

7. Costume. Today it is impossible to distinguish an Eta from the rest of the population by any outward signs. Before the law was repealed, the Eta marked their social caste on their clothing, the women were not allowed to wear the obi (sash), and the men were forced to tie their hair with two strings instead of with one.

Also in the daily routine of the lives of the Eta flagrant cases of prejudice arise. In Nara Prefecture they are industrially well organized and have won reasonable working hours. As a result, they are through with work before the unorganized non-Eta are and can get into the bath-houses for their daily baths before the others. In August, 1922, in a small village in Nara, the unorganized workers demanded that they be allowed to bathe and fully vacate the bath-houses before their social inferiors be permitted to enter. Some of the bath-house owners attempted to carry out this discrimination, and it was only after the Eta instituted a rigorous system of boycott against those bath-houses, resulting in financial loss to the owners, that the original system was restored. There is nothing to prevent the non-Eta from frequenting the bath-houses while the Eta are using them (in Japan all ages and sexes bathe together) except the ancient social prejudice.

The Imperial Government is trying to improve the condition of these people, but the Eta resent anything smacking of charity or paternalism, and insist on a fundamental change of attitude toward themselves. This hostile feeling was deepened after the stamping out of the rice riots of 1918. When the trouble died down, the Government, thoroughly alarmed at the strength of this mass demonstration, appropriated ten thousand yen (about $5,000) for building schools among the Eta to teach them sanitation, etc. They refused to attend the classes. They had been so utterly ignored in the past that only a basic change in their status would satisfy them. Since that year, larger and larger sums have been appropriated for the relief and improvement of the Eta Class, and the 1922 budget contained a grant of over a million yen to the Department of Home Affairs for this purpose. The reason for these ever-increasing appropriations is the menace of the growing solidarity of these people, who have finally united themselves into a strong, nation-wide organization.

As a first step in organization a national convention of the Eta was held in Kioto on March 3, 1922. At that time the declaration given below, addressed to all the Eta people, was formulated by the 2,500 delegates present:

DECLARATION

People of the Special Communities throughout the country, unite!

Brothers and sisters, who have long been oppressed, you know that the failure of all the reformative undertakings attempted by many men for the last half century should be taken as due punishment for the defilement of humanity by us and others, and that all the philanthropic movements hitherto undertaken among us have further degraded us. Then, it is but natural that there should appear an organized movement which endeavors to emancipate us by our own deeds of self-respect.

Brethren, our ancestors were believers in liberty and equality. They were the victims of a class rule. They were the exploited of an industrial system. They were skinned in recompense for their work of skinning animals; their hearts were ripped out as a fee for their work in the slaughter houses; and then they were spat at and were laughed at. Yet, even through this long cold night of cursed dreams, the fine human blood has kept its flow, and now we, who have been born of this blood, have come to live in an age when men may turn into gods. The time has come when the oppressor shall be vanquished, and the victim with the crown of thorns shall be blessed.

The time has come when we may be proud of being the Eta!

We must not, therefore, insult our forefathers or defile humanity any longer by our cowardly deeds or words; but we, who know well enough how cold the world is and how useless charity is, should now aspire for the real light and heat of life.

The Suihei-sha has come to exist thus.

Let there be heat and light!

Translated, the name of their organization, Suihei-sha, is Water Level Association, but it is also called Leveling-Up Association or Leveling-Down Association. Historic old Kioto was made their headquarters—the place where the bourgeois revolution of 1868, which swept Meiji into power, was inaugurated. Comprehensive plans for organizing were laid, the date set for the second convention one year later, and the following program adopted:

PROGRAM

1. The Special Community people shall achieve their liberation through their own acts.
2. We, the people of the Special Community, demand full liberty to choose occupations as well as complete economic freedom, and are determined to obtain them.
3. We, who now understand the laws of life, shall march to the final goal of human perfection.

All during the year intervening between the two conventions organizers conducted a strenuous campaign for members, and the movement grew quickly and spontaneously. The leaders of the association, unable to organize the movement without experienced help, appealed to outsiders to assist them. It is significant that they did not go to the missionary or charitable institutions which had previously attempted social-welfare work among them; they turned in all trust to the radicals of the country—particularly the communists and the anarchists—who make no distinction between Eta and others. This accounts for the strong revolutionary trend of their appeal, which was sent out shortly before the second convention.

APPEAL

Comrades:

Proletarians of the whole world, oppressed and exploited by the capitalists of Europe, of America, and of Japan, all the oppressed nationalities under the yoke of capitalistic imperialism, we appeal to you!

We, the Eta people in the Far Eastern corner of the earth, who have been oppressed and insulted for a thousand years past, appeal to you, who are fighting valiantly the final class war with bloodthirsty capitalism!

We, the Eta, are the Jews of Japan, and if there is any difference in social position between the real Jew and us, ours is in all probability worse. We are the remnants of the ancient slave system in Japan. We have been totally deprived of the liberty to choose occupations, but are forced to slaughter animals, to tan skins, to mend clogs, and no more. We have had no human rights. What we have received from society in general is but mockery. Thus our forefathers lived in dark resignation with unquenchable curses. No wonder, then, that when many attempts to save us failed, these age-long curses and desperation crystallized into our vehement revolutionary movement of today. The rise of the Suihei-sha, through which we intend to liberate ourselves by our own efforts, is the outcome.

The Suihei-sha, standing amid three millions of the so-called Special Community people, issued the following declaration and program at its first convention held March 3, 1922.

[Here appeared the declaration and program given above.]

During the ten months following our first convention our movement has spread throughout the country with amazing rapidity, and everywhere men and women, young and old, of the Special Communities have been joining us with great enthusiasm.

We are determined to fight all obstacles in the way of our emancipation. Our movement depends upon the blood of the oppressed, who have survived under the heavy trampling of the ruling classes. It is a fight to take back the human rights of which we have been robbed. And we go into the thickest of the battle willingly, for we know our emancipation is near.

Comrades and friends, you must know what an important part we, the Eta, played in the rice riots of 1918. With the power of organization, which we have now, we want to march on side by side with you in our common battlefront of the World Revolution. We want to hear from you in time for our second national convention, which will take place on the coming 3d of March. A word from you will certainly add fire and force to our movement.

Remember, comrades, that there are three million of us in Japan who are fighting today the same battle that you are, and who are wishing you with true comradely feeling a glorious victory!

CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF THE SUIHEI-SHA LEAGUE
CHAIRMAN OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE

The second convention was held March 2 and 3, 1923, at Kioto, the attendance being variously estimated between 4,000 and 10,000. The following fifteen demands are typical and of most importance:

1. Non-discrimination in schools.
2. Non-discrimination in the army.
3. Non-acceptance of charity funds, including government funds.
4. Direct action until laws are made and enforced to prevent discrimination.
5. Training fighters for direct action.
6. Organization of unions in industry.
7. Organization of farmers' unions.
8. Complete freedom within Honganji, the temple of the Shinshu.
9. Refusal to support the Honganji.

10. Kokui-domei (Black Robe Union), a movement to democratize Honganji. (The color of a priest's robe denotes his rank, the black representing the lowest. The Eta want only the black.)
11. Provisions for propaganda and organizing of the Suihei-sha.
12. Organization of a national woman's section of the Suihei-sha.
13. Organization of a national youth's section of the Suihei-sha.
14. Establishment of a library—Kioto as headquarters.
15. Weekly and monthly organs. (At the time of writing a monthly was already in existence.)

The situation arising from the new power of the Eta and their use of direct action have brought the issue continually before the public. High officials have declared that discrimination against them must cease. Heads of departments, who up to this time have ignored appeals and petitions from the Eta, have issued similar orders. One Prefectural Governor has even gone so far as to announce that the civil service in his territory is to be thrown open to the Eta. The Diet has discussed the problem, not from the angle of relief and improvement, but of non-discrimination and justice.

Within the past year the Eta movement has rapidly changed from a blind, unorganized, negative struggle against all the other Japanese people to a well-directed, positive, constructive movement for equality of opportunity, justice, and freedom. It is significant to note that this change in the fundamental character of the struggle resulted in the withdrawal of the support of most of the rich and socially powerful among the Eta, and new leaders, more in accord with modern economic thought and practice, are now shaping the policies.

"Dangerous Thoughts" in Japan

THE plot which was at first reported in some papers, and possibly suspected by the police, to include in its program nothing less than the assassination of the ministers of state and other leading officials and the establishment of a ——— (presumably communist) government on a certain important occasion in the coming autumn (the only important occasions known being the Imperial wedding and the army maneuvers), seems to have resolved itself into a suspicion of the existence of a secret society on communist lines, according to the Japan Weekly Chronicle of June 14. It is said that the police authorities have to thank the Juo Club, a reactionary society of Waseda students, for a clue to the "crime." In the course of the recent trouble between the militarist and anti-militarist groups of students in Waseda University [described in The Nation in its issue of July 11] the members of the said club dragged into the club building the anti-militarist leaders, from whom they extorted, by what means we do not know, a confession as to the particulars of the (anti-militarist) Culture League, their opponents, and also the doings of Professor Sano and three other Waseda professors.

A noteworthy feature in the present scare is that the press, far from taking sides with the police, rather deprecates the action taken by the authorities. And instead of regarding persons accused as convicted criminals and mentioning their names with "Mr's," as usual, their names are mentioned—in some papers at least—with Kun (which is a more friendly prefix than "Mr.").

Commenting on the affair, the Yomiuri (a liberal organ) says:

> It is not yet known on what data and from what motives the extensive arrest of socialists of the 5th instant was undertaken. It is supposed in some quarters that the action was taken by way of a diversion against the intended Russo-Japanese negotiations, while in other quarters it is believed to indicate preparations for resuscitating the Dangerous Thoughts Control Bill. Another guess will have it that it is an act of revenge on the part of the military clique for the failure of the Military Affairs Study Corps in Waseda University. Be that as it may, it is certain that, despite the great fuss made by the Metropolitan Police and the Procurators' Office, the affair is a case of a mouse being born of the mountain in travail. It is one of those comedies which are often played by cowards who are apt to take a miscarthus for a ghost and to be frightened by the noise made by waterfowl taking wing as if it was the sound of a large army of men and horse advancing to attack. It would be rather amusing in its way if it were not for the trouble in which their victims are involved. There is nothing to prevent those responsible for criminal searches and prosecution from summoning or proceeding to search the dwellings of persons suspected, even though there is no indisputable proof of guilt against them. But there ought to be some remedy for the damage sustained by them when on investigation it is ascertained that the suspicions are entirely unfounded. Otherwise the authorities will be easily tempted to arrest persons and retain them in confinement on suspicion, but really in the interest of so-called high politics.

POLICE AFRAID OF BULLIES

The Kokumin (a liberal-imperialist organ) thinks that the arrest of socialists on the present occasion is an aftermath of the recent fracas concerning the Military Affairs Study Corps at Waseda University. They seem to have inquisitioned, it says, those who disturbed the inauguration ceremony of the corps and discovered some fact that is calculated to incriminate them (and their friends) in some way or other. In connection with the same trouble in Waseda, however, violence was committed by some people. There are also other people who trade in violence at large. But none of them has been arrested. The fact is that the police cannot touch those who possess brute force. It is only those whose only resource is speech that they arrest. They presumably believe that brute force is not dangerous but speech is. The [Japanese] army attempted to crush socialist Russia, but in vain. Does the Government mean to press down upon the socialists at home to console itself for its failure in Russia, now that it is going to enter into negotiations with Russia? Whatever may be said against socialism, which is of many kinds, it is certain that it is worth studying. But at present, socialism seems to be tabooed, even in its study. There is no longer anything like freedom of speech. It is safer to shut one's mouth and join the gangs of bullies.

ALARMING CHANGES

The Tokio Asahi (an independent organ) says:

> That social unrest is much pronounced in modern Japan is a fact that must be admitted even by persons who boast of the peculiar beauties of the national constitution and those who lay much stress on the good manners and customs by which the people are characterized and on the paternal benevolence of Japanese capitalists. It is undeniable that, thanks to the artifices of the bureaucratic Maiji Government, the young students have lost their interest in politics, so that social problems rather than politics have become the center of their discussions. It is further a fact that in the army there has been a considerable change in morale since the expedition to Siberia. It is also a fact that the labor associations are now represented by people inclined to the Left so that the majority of industrial workers cannot go with them owing to the pressure imposed by the authorities, and the organized labor movement is superficially on the decline. Agricultural labor has been awakened to fighting, in consequence of a series of tenant farmers' troubles. The "water-level movement" has grown in the course of one short year to be the most determined of Japan's social movements. In Formosa and Korea, there are apparent and hidden movements going on. The country has stirring times ahead. Now, the students, the army, and labor are too numerous a body for police control. According to the present method of control, it would be necessary to shut up the whole of society in a metal cage under police surveillance, but such a method is not preventive but must produce results opposite to those which it is intended to bring about.

People Who Have No Voice

Nor should it be forgotten that in this country there are many people who cannot lawfully give expression to their political views. The Business Men's Association is canvassing to have representatives elected who are to represent commercial and industrial interests. The landowners under the usurped name of "farmers" are also trying to have representatives of their own. While the existing parties claim that they represent the interests of farmers, merchants, and manufacturers, they really do not represent more than the capitalist classes. And while the suffrage is limited to people who pay a certain amount of direct national tax, a large number of citizens are denied the right to have themselves represented, though they bear a considerable burden of indirect national taxes, and shed blood and sweat in the military service and industry. They have, in short, no political voice, and if they set forth their views in writing lest measures of government should be decided by the bargainings among sections of the propertied class, there are the Publication Law and Press Law to check them, while there is the Peace Police Law to control them if they want to discuss the matter verbally in meetings and associations. In these circumstances, mere police control will be of little effect in relieving the dangerous tension of the public mind. The subjugation of the socialists may be necessary, but it should be set about on rational lines. But what is more important still is to extend the suffrage and adopt urgent measures without further delay in order to sweep away the popular impression that the government is being run in the interests of a limited group.

MONTE CARLO STATIONERY
200 Sheets $2.00
100 Envelopes

Name and address or monogram. Relief engraving, any color. Sheet 5½ x 8, white, grey, cafe, blue.
100 double sheets or 200 single sheets (100 marked—100 plain). For marking entire 200 single sheets add 50c.
PRINT plainly. Enclose check or money order. West of Mississippi add 20c.

Comparison urged. Samples submitted.

DE LUXE STATIONERY CO., 505 Fifth Ave., New York

What other books of the year will be read as long as these

THE DANCE OF LIFE
Havelock Ellis

"One of the few great books of the century."—Benjamin De Casseres.

"A prose poem wherein what is to me the most interesting mind in England distills the essence of his vast and studious speculations on life."—Burton Rascoe (New York Tribune.)

"One of the great books of our time. I place the reading of 'The Dance of Life' in the first rank of intellectual and aesthetic experiences."—Ben Ray Redman. (The Spur). $4.00

DAMAGED SOULS
Gamaliel Bradford

"Extraordinarily vivid psychological portraits."—H. L. Mencken (New York Post).

"A tremendous and arresting book. . . . Nothing short of a triumph."—Frederick Van de Water (New York Tribune). $3.50

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.

The JEFFERSON SCHOOL
23 West 87th Street, At Central Park West
For Boys and Girls, 3 to 12 Years

The School will open Sept. 27th in a new building equipped with every modern facility for the best Elementary and Kindergarten Education.

The course of study provides the child with experiences which result in definite values—health, skill, knowledge, habits and attitudes. The methods employed are approved by the foremost educators. The teaching staff is carefully chosen for experience and training in these methods. All day activities; hot lunches served. French, Industrial Arts, Nature Study, Music and Rhythms are featured. Pupils now being enrolled. For catalog and appointments, address

SYLVIA J. MARKS, Director
Until Sept. 1st, at 1 West 92d St. Telephone Riverside 2501.

PH. D. STUDENT in the social sciences desires part time work, preferably with a liberal organization or tutoring. BOX II, care Nation.

THE RUSSIAN INN
[illegible] West 37th St., nr. 5th Ave., New York
Table d'Hote Luncheon and Dinner
also A la Carte. Open till 1 A. M.
Music by the Russian Inn Trio

$1 Personal Writing Paper
200 sheets (6x7) and 100 envelopes to match with name and address elegantly printed in dark blue ink on Celebrated U.S. Bond paper, mailed in 3 days on receipt of $1; west of Mississippi River and Canada, add 15c postage; socially correct stationery; four attractive styles of type to select from; samples sent on request.
CALL PRINTING CO., 390 Sixth Ave., New York

"BELL SYSTEM"
AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
One Policy, One System, Universal Service, and all directed toward Better Service

OPEN UNTIL DECEMBER
A BEAUTIFUL PLACE IN THE BERKSHIRE HILLS FOR a WEEK-END or an EXTENDED VISIT

Among our guests such persons as Mr. Louis Untermeyer, E. E. Robinson, F. Luis Mora, Dr. Ludwig Lewisohn, Mme. Helen Teschner Tas, Sara Teasdale, Jessie B. Rittenhouse, B. W. Huebsch, C. Bertram Hartman, Suzanne La Follette, William and Marguerite Zorach and Mary Ellis have found this mountain farm an ideal spot for a week-end or an extended visit. Rates $7 a day and $35 a week. Address E. G. Ohmer, Western View Farm, New Milford, Conn, 2½ hours from New York. Telephone Connection.

SCHOOL of OPINION, SIASCONSET MASS.

SEPTEMBER 1st to 25th

"Civilization, or Man and Man's World"

The 'Sconset Moors

Lecturers: Harlow Shapley, Harvard; E. G. Spaulding, Princeton; James Harvey Robinson, New York; Everett Dean Martin, Otto Glaser, Amherst; Irwin Edman, Columbia; Carl Van Doren, Columbia; Robert Benchley, of "Life"; H. W. L. Dana, New School Social Research; H. A. Overstreet, Horace M. Kallen, New School Social Research; J. E. Spingarn, Jas. G. MacDonald, Gutzon Borglum and others. For complete programme address: Frederic C. Howe, Director, Siasconset, Mass.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVII | NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1923 | No. 3036

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .... 253
EDITORIALS:
  The League of Nations Faces the Test .... 256
  Mussolini and Hughes .... 257
  On Rereading .... 257
  Labor's Newspapers .... 258
THE GREATEST JEWISH CITY IN THE WORLD. By Konrad Bercovici .... 259
THE WOMAN. By Henri Barbusse .... 262
THE NEW EMANCIPATION OF THE NEGRO. By Bertha Wallerstein. 263
LONDON'S DOCKLAND. By An Onlooker .... 265
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter .... 266
CORRESPONDENCE .... 267
BOOKS:
  The Press and Its Problems. By Oswald Garrison Villard .... 269
  The Dance of Life. By L. L. .... 270
  Faust Again. By Mark Van Doren .... 271
  Shakespeare. By William Allan Neilson .... 271
  American Government. By Phillips Bradley .... 272
  Orphans. By Florence Kelley .... 272
  Books in Brief .... 273
DRAMA:
  Outburst. By Ludwig Lewisohn .... 273
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
  The New Constitution of Rumania .... 274
  South Africa of Tomorrow .... 279

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT  ERNEST H. GRUENING
ARTHUR WARNER  LUDWIG LEWISOHN

FREDA KIRCHWEY, Managing Editor
JOHN MACY, Literary Editor

IRITA VAN DOREN, Advertising Manager

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON  ANATOLE FRANCE  H. L. MENCKEN
FRIEDRICH WILHELM FOERSTER  ROBERT HERRICK
CARL VAN DOREN  NORMAN THOMAS

Subscription Rates—Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: Ernest Thurtle, 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N. W. 4, England.

THE apparently unparalleled calamity to Japan must move every American heart and should open every American purse. Emotionally exhausted as we are by all the horrors this unhappy world has passed through since 1914, the magnitude of the Japanese disaster and the frightful combination of fire, tidal-wave, flood, and earthquake, must nevertheless stir and shock everyone who has a spark of love for humanity within him or the slightest feeling of compassion. In Tokio and Yokohama has happened what the first dispatches from San Francisco portrayed as the fate of that unhappy city. Even if early reports should again prove exaggerations, the catastrophe remains appalling. But it affords an opportunity which cannot be overestimated to cement the friendly relations between Japan and America. This frightful disaster may easily be turned into an occasion for the display of such good-will and generosity as to allay all the suspicion and distrust which exists between certain jingo groups in the two countries. We have recently built several battleships to protect us from a possible Japanese war. They cost now about $27,000,000 apiece. If Congress were in session we should urge it to vote the price of two such monsters of destruction in aid of Japan. Since it does not meet for three months the American public must act. We have no doubt that it will, for it is the true glory of America that it never fails to respond to such appeals and that it is justly called the most generous of countries. Surely it will live up to its reputation.

WHETHER Governor Pinchot will in the end be able to bring the anthracite miners and operators into agreement is uncertain as The Nation goes to press, but of one thing there is no doubt: no terms of the sort proposed can bring anything but a temporary halt in the struggle. The public, always opportunist in such matters, would doubtless be satisfied with such a truce. It has been satisfied that way in the past. But isn't the public getting a little weary of these recurring crises? Isn't it about time that we went deeper? So long as the miners are appeased with slightly higher wages and the operators with advanced prices—all passed on to the consumer—just so long is the public going to suffer from strikes and lack of coal. The vital point is that coal is a natural monopoly and the mining industry is overgrown with privilege and medievalism. There is, and can be, no true competition in production. So long as the struggle is allowed to continue as one of wages and hours the public can hope for no relief. The solution lies in frankly recognizing that the nation must take over the coal mines and arrange for fuel production upon a just and efficient basis. This is the problem, airily dismissed by our latest Coal Commission, which ought to have received the major part of its attention. Instead the commission asserted that in case of a strike the government should seize the mines—a step likely to be futile because of lack of any prearranged labor policy satisfactory to the miners.

MOST of the dispatches from abroad, as also the editorial comment in this country, treat the Irish election as a victory for the Free State. In a sense it is that, but it is much less conclusive than such a verdict should be and would have meant more if the Government had not silenced the voices of many Republicans by duress and imprisonment. Of 153 seats in the Dail Eireann the Government has won 63, while 44 have gone to the Republicans, 16 to the Independents, 15 to the Farmers, and 15 to Labor. This gives the Government a plurality but not a majority. However, all the groups except the Republicans are in favor of the existence of the Free State, giving the Government 73 per cent of the Parliament on that issue; and the Dublin correspondent of the New York Herald says that, although the Republicans made a gain, they did it at the expense of Labor, not of the Government. With a three-fourths majority behind the Free State, the New York World observes that the Government cannot regard its existence as in serious danger and should now liberate the numerous political prisoners whose continuance in jail "will be a constant source of danger and a fresh point for radical indignation." All the more so as the prison conditions are so shocking as to impugn the humanity and decency of the Free State Government.

WITH assurances of good-will on both sides and the announcement that neither party was forced to sacrifice its principles, the full recognition of Mexico by the United States has been accorded and proclaimed. The Nation is thankful that an end has been made to the long period of suspicion which has kept two neighboring nations in a state of wary tension. But we cannot accept without some misgivings an agreement which so patently satisfies the State Department regarding the sanctity of private oil wells. The Mexican Government has saved its face—and perhaps its life—by securing recognition before making any formal concessions or sacrifices. But it is likely that in the end the economic results will be the same. We did not recognize Mexico for nothing. Two decrees by President Obregon published at the time of the announcement of recognition indicate that the Mexican Government is loosening its hold over the subsoil wealth of the country by allowing interests to develop properties owned or leased by them without renouncing their rights of ownership to the oil underneath and securing a special concession from the Government. Every step away from the social control of its natural resources is a step backward for Mexico and for the world at large; and even harmony and prosperity are dear at the price.

"I HAVE said to my relative, the king, that I cannot see why this murderous war in Africa should go on. We did so well during the World War and profited so legitimately by it and now we are losing all we gained and our boys are going to their deaths. The king replied that our national honor compelled it. There is probably something wrong with me, but I cannot understand just what kind of honor that is." These striking words, uttered by a member of the Spanish royal family last summer, are recalled to us by the news from Spanish Africa—news that is new yet utterly stale, for exactly the same dispatches have come out of Africa about every third or fourth year for a generation. The Spanish hold a series of outposts in a most difficult country; they communicate with each other only with danger, are often cut off for weeks, and are then relieved with a heavy loss of life. Not unnaturally some Spanish regiments mutinied at Malaga when about to embark for Melilla; why should they go to be half-starved, under the leadership of political generals, and then slaughtered by men fighting for their country against whom the Spanish boy has no grudge whatsoever? We are glad that these poor victims of a senseless and stupid militarism, hiding behind a false conception of national honor, revolted. We wish the whole army had risen and declined to fight, and that if men must die in this horrible imbroglio all the generals could be the ones to perish instead of the innocent sons of pitiful peasant mothers. Sooner or later Spain will have to surrender her African possessions as she did her American and Asiatic. She should do it gracefully while she may.

IN England, a house that cost £1,000 to build two and a half years ago can now be put up for £400. In other words, you can today build two and a half houses for the previous cost of one. More than that; these two and a half are now being built in the same time that it formerly took for one. This cheerful comparison was recently made by Sir Charles Ruthin, the Director-General of Housing, who explained the improvement as due partly to an enormous increase in the output of the operatives in the building industry and partly to a fall in the cost of materials. He announced further that, since September of last year, 32,000 houses have been built or begun by private enterprise, which has recovered "to an amazing extent." But Sir Charles's figures have produced no sense of exhilaration in the public mind. In the first place, they are challenged by the building trade itself. Experts, in Manchester and elsewhere, pronounce the £400 house a flat impossibility. And 32,000 new houses a year—practically all of them built to sell, not to rent, and therefore not available for the average worker—will not go very far to meet the deficit of 870,000 that was officially estimated two years ago. At the Liberal Summer School at Cambridge last month an authority on the subject declared that 80,000 houses were required annually to meet the increase of population and to replace houses that became unfit to live in. So it looks as though most of the "homes for heroes" so confidently promised by Mr. Lloyd George would long remain castles in the air.

SHERMAN'S march to the sea cost Georgia no more than the loss she is suffering from the migration of her Negro population, according to the Georgia Bankers' Association, which is worried over a threatened reduction of State wealth by $27,000,000 this year, with 46,674 farmhouses left vacant, $55,524 idle plows, and a labor shortage already of 70,843 persons. If the present rate of exodus keeps up, the number of persons lost this year will equal the population of ten average mid-Georgia counties. Land that brought from $40 to $75 an acre in 1919 now meets no demand at all and weeds are the only crop. President William A. Winburn, of the Central of Georgia Railway, wants more cheap labor from Europe and is bombarding members of Congress to let down the bars to immigration. While the Georgia Legislature dallies with a proposal to make it "a felony for any person or concern to solicit labor in Georgia for other States" and amends the general tax so that each labor agent in the State must, in addition to paying a $1,000 tax, give a bond to protect creditors of each person sent out of the State, the Negroes have held a Statewide conference. These Negroes, who represent 45 per cent of Georgia's population, point to discrimination in the distribution of agricultural relief, to the crowded tenements and farm shanties, to the unspeakable Jim-Crow cars, to the absentee landlord system with its indecent overseers, and to the $15,000 spent on Negro schools while $735,000 goes to white schools. And, they add, the Negro's life is too cheap; in the midst of mob violence no colored person, however honest, industrious, humble, and law-abiding, can possibly feel himself safe overnight. Too often he is made to feel that the law was designed solely for his punishment, but not for his protection.

THE fundamental error has been, the Negroes say, in attempting to run a democracy without all the people:

> The whole truth is, and you ought to know it, that a very large percentage of us have lost faith in either your willingness now or your intention ever to treat the colored people justly and to allow them to become a basic part of our civilization. This faith restored by unmistakable evidences to the contrary would infinitely improve the unsettled conditions among us. . . . We lay the blame for this most unfortunate condition at the door of the cheap political demagogue, who, to satisfy a purely selfish ambition, and for personal motives, from platform and through an unfair press, has maligned us, misrepresented us, and prejudiced many good white people against us who otherwise would today be our substantial friends, by their self-made scarecrow of "social equality" and "Negro domination." . . . We confess that we covet that life which bread alone cannot give. . . . We challenge you to join us as Christian people in the task of working out a program of justice, equity, and Christian brotherhood, which shall include both groups, each separate in his sphere, that shall guarantee to both the fullest opportunity . . . so absolutely essential to a well-rounded humanity.

On August 17 a mob battered down the doors of the jail at Cochran, Georgia, seized Aaron Harris, colored, hanged him on a tree where others have been lynched, and riddled his body with bullets. The same day officers taking Lee Green, colored, to the jail at Perry, Georgia, were forcibly stopped, and Green, a rope tied around his neck, was forced to climb a tree and then told to jump. When he refused, 300 shots were fired into his body and he fell lifeless from the limb. Is this to be Georgia's only reply to the Negroes?

THE Institute of Politics at Williamstown has just ended a session, less brilliant by far than the preceding ones, of which the hero was the German representative, Count Harry Kessler. Here is what Andrew Ten Eyck says about him in the current Outlook:

> The greatest force on the lecture platform has been Kessler. Cold, logical, thorough, oblivious of the approval or disapproval of his audiences, which have been consistently large, and steering to his objective with the precision of a skilful pilot, he has had the hardest task and won the greatest victory. . . . But the sum total of the impression that Kessler made is, in my judgment, that the war psychology is gone, and that there is a real German case, attribute German default to what you will—inefficiency or dishonesty.

This is almost the universal testimony. It was given to Kessler, partly because of his perfect command of English, to demonstrate that Germans abroad may, after all, display tact and understanding of their audiences, and ability to appreciate the psychology of others—which latter we had come to doubt. Certainly no German since 1914 has served his country so well in America. As for the other speakers, the selections were far from the best. France was by no means as forcefully represented as she should have been, and we might have been spared the appearance of Lord Birkenhead. None the less the Institute is well worth while, because it helps to concentrate public attention in midsummer upon foreign affairs, and affords a public debating ground. We are sorry to hear rumors that there is danger that it may not be maintained. Its abandonment would be a misfortune.

HAVING decided to go after the French in the field of aircraft, the English are going at it with their accustomed thoroughness. Thus, the Air Minister, the Committee of Imperial Defense, and the Imperial Shipping Committee have decided to accept the proposal of the Burney Airship Company to start a bi-weekly service of six large airships to India, subject to the approval of the House of Commons. The company is to build one airship of 150 tons and five million cubic feet capacity, capable of carrying from 130 to 150 passengers, together with ten tons of mail. The government will provide $2,000,000 as a loan toward the construction of this ship, and after it has successfully flown to India within a hundred hours the government will advance $2,000,000 a year for the following three years—all as a loan. After the company has maintained a weekly service to India for three months, the government will contribute $1,250,000 a year as an outright subsidy, for which it will be entitled to send officers and men to India without charge. The first airship, which is of the rigid Zeppelin type, will have a speed of eighty miles an hour with engines using kerosene and hydrogen combined, and will be built in eighteen months, after which one ship will be turned out every four months until six are complete. Of course, the construction will at first be directed by the Germans, just as the Germans are building the airships for the New York-Chicago Zeppelin line to be started in 1924. We are on the threshold of marvelous airship developments.

FIVE thousand men and women milled through the streets of Harlem when "Kid Dropper," chief of the Essex Street gang, was buried, and his enemies hired a jazz band and put in a false fire alarm in their post-mortem hate. The newspapers dug out of their "morgues" columns of stories of earlier gangsters, of "Chuck" Connors, whose engraved cards gave the address "Chinatown, New York," of "Gyp the Blood," of "Monk" Eastman, who went straight during the war only to be shot by an unruly prohibition agent two years after. The Dropper's record was blazoned on the front page—including his last achievement, the death of the boy for whose love sixteen-year-old Yotchki Churgin, East-Side "vamp," had left the "Dropper's" brother Izzie. Dime novels, Nick Carter romances, tales of Deadwood Dick can hardly rival for romance these revelations of the underworld in 1923 New York. Is the old frontier replaced by a new frontier within our million-manned cities? The new frontier has a sinister side—these gangsters fight not only their own murderous battles of personal love and hate; they write in their lives and crimes the worst pages in the industrial history of America. But after all, was the old frontier so much purer, or is it merely more distant?

COMMEND us for adequate self-appreciation to the Russian pianist Vladimir de Pachmann—whom James Huneker called "the Chopinzee." He was always self-satisfied; years ago he would say to his audiences in the middle of a piece: "Didn't I play that well?" "Isn't that rendering charming?" Sometimes he indulged in scurrilous remarks about people in the audience whose bearing he did not like. Now he is able to declare that he is the "only real genius" of the piano, though he admits that it was but five years ago that he reached that rank—at the age of seventy. Then he discovered the one and only method of piano playing, showing, if he could demonstrate anything so trite and conventional, that it is never too late to learn anew. Perhaps the greatest charm of De Pachmann, aside from his originality, is his frankness in dealing with his rivals. Other artists are always loud in their praises of their contemporaries in their own field and pretend a great enthusiasm, while in their hearts they often burn with envy and hate. Not so De Pachmann. With him the truth prevails at all times. Paderewski, he assured the reporters on his arrival in New York last week, is not a great pianist, but "a good one." Busoni and Rosenthal and Godowsky are good technicians, and the latter is the greatest of all living composers (!). Hofmann's playing, his great audiences will be glad to learn, has grown "steadily worse" ever since he was nine years old. As for Rachmaninoff: "My God, no such people exist for me, he is second-class, no, he is third-class." When it comes to De Pachmann himself, why: "Nothing could be finer or more superb than what I play; it is marvelous. When I hear what I play I say 'it is finished, a perfect thing, thank God.'" There is only one thing lacking: his contemporaries' similarly frank opinions of De Pachmann.

The League of Nations Faces the Test

BY the act of a tyrant the League of Nations has been brought to book. It must now demonstrate that it has courage and capacity or go to the wall. If it cannot deal with Mussolini it ought to be painlessly chloroformed. If it permits Italy, a signatory to the Covenant and a member of the League, to declare that its unproved grievance against Greece is one affecting its national honor and that, therefore, it is not bound to let the League arbitrate, then is the Covenant but a scrap of paper. If it refuses to act vigorously on the just appeal of Greece, then will it stultify itself. And if for a moment it should entertain Mussolini's reported proposal that the World Court should arbitrate the question whether the League of Nations is competent to deal with this situation, it would become a byword—no, the laughing-stock of the world. A reference to the World Court is unthinkable.

So this impudent swashbuckler has brought up with a round turn the Robert Cecils, the Smutses, the Nansens, and all the good and true Americans who have been insisting that a League of Nations conceived and constituted like this one was going to exercise its powers to pacify the world. Now they and their League must face the music. The procedure it ought to take is clearly specified and known of all men. The question is whether it has the courage and the nerve to grapple with the man who has flouted it and declares that his country will withdraw from the League if it does not take his point of view exactly. It has shown no courage whatever in dealing with the Poles at Vilna, the misgovernment in the Saar which is such direct violation of the Treaty of Versailles; it has pussyfooted as to the opium trade and above all it has been shamefully silent as to the monstrous wickedness of the Ruhr occupation. No wonder Mussolini has felt that he can thumb his nose at the Council in Geneva. He knows, and everybody else knows who looks beneath the surface, that the only reason the League has not acted as to the Ruhr is that it is too cowardly to grapple with France. Some of its chief spokesmen say that in letters to and in private conversations with the editors of The Nation, and they beg that the League be given a little more time to get on its feet before it is called upon to tackle "one of the big fellows." Very well, here is a littler fellow who is beginning to shoot up Europe in the finest manner of a drunken cowboy in a Western mining-camp. How about his case?

Mussolini ought not to be so difficult for the League to handle because he is so vulnerable economically. If he is to have an economic boycott declared against him, as is provided in Article XVI of the Covenant, it should be very easy to reduce him to terms, for Italy does not produce a ton of coal, and since the Ruhr invasion took place has obtained practically all of its coal from England. And England is, after Greece, the very country which is the most deeply aggrieved and affronted. Mussolini has, moreover, put Great Britain in a dreadful hole. It went to war over Belgium because of secret obligations, never made public and persistently lied about in the Commons, which bound it, so its Edward Greys declared, to defend the violated neutrality of Belgium. Now here is a violation of an agreement of neutrality made as to Corfu by Great Britain, France, and Russia in 1863 and publicly recorded since that time. Is the same country which rightfully denounced Germany for its brutal violation of its treaty with Belgium to sit by and let Mussolini have his way with Corfu? Then shall it once more not escape the charge that its statesmen are hypocrites; that its spasms of virtue in foreign affairs are invariably synchronous with pecuniary gain or the opportunity to destroy a trade rival. No, England must move now or confess the utter hollowness of her pretexts in 1914.

We are aware, of course, that Mussolini has excellent precedents for his excuse that this is not war but merely the seizing of a guaranty. The self-righteous Woodrow Wilson gave him one when he took and held Vera Cruz, his fleet murdering about 400 men, women, and children as he did so. The English have given him plenty, notably when they seized a Venezuelan harbor to enforce the payment of debts. But best of exemplars is Poincaré. Is that gentleman not morally bound to uphold Mussolini? Isn't he merely holding the Ruhr as a guaranty of reparations for colossal wrongs? Isn't he, too, certain that his invasion is not an act of war? The truth is that all the great nations are tarred with the same brush. They are hypocritical imperialists and all on the make at the dictation of their capitalist society.

All the more reason that England, for one, should begin to repair its record by calling a halt on Mussolini. If he is justified in Corfu, then is any highbinder or footpad within the pale. But quite aside from anything else is the fact that Europe is a powder magazine and no such running amuck with a flaring torch can be tolerated. As we go to press the indications are favorable. But who can prophesy? Nobody dreamed that the murder at Sarajevo would set the whole world ablaze and cost ten million human lives. The barbarous murder of the Italian delegation in Albania is so nearly a repetition of that incident as to make one shudder. Again the scene is in the Balkans, and this time instead of a feeble old Kaiser like Franz Josef to deal with we must reckon with an utterly irresponsible tyrant, who has been raised to dictatorial power by naked force, by preaching the doctrine of might above right, one who has long been an advocate of Italianizing the entire Mediterranean.

If the League of Nations can head him off it will be entitled to the highest praise, which we, for our part, shall not be backward in giving to it. If it fails to act, then the enlightened governments and the public opinion of the world must none the less be brought into play. In the latter, the Italians resident in this and other countries than Italy should aid. They must know of the danger of Jugoslavia's breaking loose if Italy really becomes involved in war with Greece. And with Jugoslavia in, who can say what bounds could be set to the new war to end war and make the world safe for democracy? In the effort to save us from this, our own country should also act and at once. Enlightened statesmanship at Washington should, without waiting for anybody or anything else, voice its protest at the incredible folly, to give them no other name, of Mussolini's acts. It would be a heaven-sent opportunity for a brave and far-seeing President, but—at least the country itself may speak.

Mussolini and Hughes

WHILE Mussolini was landing troops at Tangier in Morocco, and delivering an ultimatum (reminiscent of the Austrian missive of 1914) to Greece, our own Mr. Hughes was expressing, to the members of the American Bar Association, his very Mussolini-like philosophy of international relations. Both gentlemen proclaim the good old Machiavellian principle of sacro egoismo. Indeed, it may be an injustice to Machiavelli to trace the Mussolini-Hughes doctrine to him; its real father is the cave-man or the extinct dinosaur.

It is a doctrine which is becoming increasingly open in the world (it has always been popular) and it seems to achieve a certain immediate success. It is the doctrine that individuals and nations have a right to anything they want—if they have the power to take it and keep it. It is the doctrine which the League of Nations consecrated when the Poles took Vilna and allowed when the Lithuanians took Memel. It is the doctrine by which the Germans justified their seizure of Belgium in 1914, by which the French excuse their action in the Ruhr today, and by which Mr. Hughes is ready to explain anything which the United States has done or may care to do in this hemisphere. The Monroe Doctrine, he says, "remains an assertion of the principle of national security" (!), and "the Government of the United States reserves to itself its definition, interpretation, and application." In the language commonly used by individuals applying Mr. Hughes's code, we will do as we blooming well please. It is all very much in the manner of the dictator of Italy—and after all, since Mr. C. W. Barron has announced that the two greatest economic minds of the world "are those of Mussolini and Coolidge," why should not Mr. Coolidge's chief secretary seek to claim fame as one of the two greatest political philosophers of the day? (We expect some learned lawyer soon to proclaim Mussolini as such.)

Mussolini's ultimatum to Greece was inexcusable swashbuckling. Moreover, there is no proof as yet that they were Greek bandits who murdered the Italian commissioners three miles from the Albanian frontier—but Mussolini says they were, and, like Mr. Hughes, he reserves to himself all questions of "definition, interpretation, and application."

One may even suspect that he would like to pick a quarrel. Italy still holds the Greek islands which she took from Turkey in 1912 and half-promised to return to Greece, and a good excuse for retaining them would be convenient. Furthermore, Albania has become almost a province of the Italian empire, and the Greek-Albanian frontier naturally interests Italian statesmen.

Tangier is another question. Italy was not a great Mediterranean Power when Tangier went under a sort of international directorate. Joint control did not work well, and since the war France has established herself as virtual ruler of Tangier. England, fearful of a strong Power established opposite Gibraltar, has sought to restore international control, but both England and France have refused to admit that Italy's claim to an "interest," as a Mediterranean Power, in the fate of Tangier had any basis. So Mussolini has taken the short and eloquent step of landing troops there "to protect Italian interests." It's the old, old story of empire-building; Mr. Hughes uses as pretty words to explain the maintenance of our troops in Haiti and Santo Domingo and to justify his intrusion into Cuba's domestic policies.

We are, as Americans, particularly aggrieved at Mr. Hughes's address on the Monroe Doctrine. The whole moral basis of America's attitude to Europe is undermined by his persistent refusal to face the fact that we are playing the bully to Latin America. The Monroe Doctrine may, at its inception, have been a measure of defense—though even then the idea of a great hemispheric American empire was not undreamed; it has become a cloak for aggression. For Mr. Hughes to say that it "does not infringe upon the independence and sovereignty of other American states" and to insist that it "does not stand in the way of Pan-American cooperation" is simply preposterous. All Latin America is seething with protest at the dictatorial attitude of the United States delegates to the recent Pan-American conference.

These are the facts: our marines hold Haiti, Santo Domingo, and Nicaragua; we are telling Cuba what to do with her lottery and her railroads; we have just brought Mexico to adjust her oil and land laws to please American investors; all Central America is under our financial thumb; an American financial mission has been instructing Colombia how to run her finances; American bankers control Bolivian policy, and Peru is virtually in American hands; an American naval mission to Brazil has almost precipitated war between that country and Argentina. Could any one guess these things from Mr. Hughes's talk to his fellow-members of the legal profession?

"Principle of national security?" Not for anyone but ourselves, surely—and will we claim that Cuba's lottery threatens our safety? "Cooperation?" In no truer sense than Germany cooperated with Belgium during the war. It is sacro egoismo, divine selfishness, "do-anything-you-can-get-away-with." Mr. Hughes leaves Americans scant right to read moral lessons to Mussolini, and yet it is still our duty to protest. But, we fear, Mr. Hughes is far too much of a blood brother to Mussolini to hope for much.

On Rereading

THE advice of Hazlitt to reread an old book whenever one is tempted to read a new one is good advice. But like even the best advice it should be acted on not only not too literally but with moderation. The reading of many years leaves many memories—beautiful and somber, gay and moving. In hours of reverie these memories are part of the mind's best possessions. For reading is deeply rooted in life. It marks high moments, profound consolations, periods of splendor and decline. To have read George Moore's "Confessions of a Young Man" at twenty is something more than reading. It is akin to religion and to love. But shall we reread that book? Heaven forbid! For we can well imagine how cold those palpitating pages would seem today, how drained of what we once brought to them, how much of their wisdom would seem knowingness, how much of their beauty to be touched by decay. Not to reread the book—that is the only way of possessing it forever and of possessing untarnished that hour of youth when first it swam into our ken.

This, then, is the true philosophy of the matter. All but the authentic classics, new or old, had better be left alone if we would keep the gifts that they once had to give us. Various temperaments will react toward past reading in various ways. The principle remains. In an idle hour, not long ago, we took up "Lavengro." Once we had almost belonged to what Andrew Lang called the true Borrovians. Alas, we found Borrow amazingly dull, pompous, and wooden. What had once seemed rude manliness now seemed mere ignorant pig-headedness. Did ever mortal know so much with so little result? The experience was a little disconcerting. We had planned to reread some of Dickens, not a little Stevenson, even Trollope. We shall not do so. We shall leave Mr. Micawber alive forever in the chambers of the mind; we shall keep untouched by the morose criticism of the later years the inimitable Alan Breck Stuart; we shall not lose our cathedral closes and towers of Barchester by rashly opening the books that gave them to us once. On a lower plane the counsel to reread is imperative. Long ago we had hours of keen absorption in Walter Besant and in Wilkie Collins; not only in "All Sorts and Conditions of Men" but even in "The Woman in White." We must flee from such books or they are ruined forever. We once tried, for ten horrible minutes, to reread "The History of David Grieve."

The minor Elizabethans share this fate with the minor Victorians. It is no empty observation to make that all the unromantic part of the eighteenth century stands the test of rereading magnificently. As experience and reason ripen one is drawn more and more to the sovereign sanity and simplicity of the books of that age. If Stevenson seems a little thin and tormented, read Defoe's "Captain Singleton," if all the words of the moderns seem either over-used or over-luscious, read Swift; if poetry seems, in certain moods, to have lost both the ground under its feet and the rhythm of its eternal tread, it is no bad plan to reread the "Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot" or certain incomparable lines in the "Epistle to Jervas." Addison, to be sure, seems ever more anemic and meanly proper as the years go on. It is a superstition, however, that Johnson is important only as the sitter for a memorable portrait. With all its faults and prejudiced judgments and failures of vision, the "Lives of the Poets" remains one of the sanest, most fascinating, most human books in the language. Nor is this all. It was in the despised Rambler that Johnson said he "would not willingly interrupt the dream of harmless stupidity or destroy the jest which makes its author laugh"; it was there, too, that he declared: "It ought to be the first endeavor of a writer to distinguish nature from custom; or that which is established because it is right, from that which is right only because it is established; that he may neither violate essential principles by a desire of novelty, nor debar himself from the attainment of beauties within his view by a needless fear of breaking rules which no literary dictator had authority to enact." We may be very mordant wits and very philosophical critics today. We shall not easily beat that.

Yes, the books that bear rereading are the books that have essential sanity and freedom. They may be as lofty as "Faust," or as kneaded of the common clay as the tales of Smollett. It is the overbright that fades, the strained that snaps. An unnatural polish will soon tarnish, and intricate forms not stuffed with substance will crumple, wither, and decay. Johnson's prose is fresher today than Oscar Wilde's, Pope's verses than those of Arthur O'Shaughnessy. Here is a counsel for writers as well as readers. The books that can be reread are the books that are models. The others partake of the nature of dreams, pleasurable but transitory.

Labor's Newspapers

As the commercialization of journalism increases, as the big newspapers swallow the little ones and editorial independence becomes less and less valued, the newspapers tend more and more to express the point of view of the possessing classes. No wonder labor turns eagerly to the hope of establishing a press of its own. When big dailies are sold for millions of dollars their editors inevitably are men of the big-financier type, and the chance that they will have broad liberal sympathies or employ men of democratic contacts to write editorials for them is slight. Newspapers have become not merely slaves of "big business" but a part of "big business." It is a mere accident of fortune when papers like the Baltimore Suns are given a free rein, or when the sons of a fortune-maker, like the younger generation of Pulitzers, keep their papers as liberal as the New York World or the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Labor, of course, is twice handicapped in any effort to establish journals of its own. It lacks the enormous funds requisite, and it lacks experience in journalism. Labor leaders are all too likely to care more for partisanship than for fair play; in their resentment of capitalist distortions they often lose the faculty of self-criticism. They are prone to want a trade journal, carrying too exclusively news of the labor organizations, and to realize too little that it is their own members who support the papers which carry least labor news. (It is a curious fact that the Times at present prints the best labor news of any large daily in New York.)

The recent reorganization of the New York Call gives hope of a labor newspaper which will be at once a labor paper and a *news*paper. The ownership passes from party Socialists to a group of labor unions led by the powerful Amalgamated Clothing Workers and the International Ladies Garment Workers Union. Norman Thomas, a contributing editor of The Nation, becomes editor-in-chief of the Call, and Heber Blankenhorn, whose long experience on a New York afternoon paper has been complemented by intimate association with labor organizations in the Bureau of Industrial Research, becomes the managing editor. Evans Clark, of the Labor Bureau, assumes the business managership. The names of these men are guaranties of the independence and editorial quality of the new paper. These qualities the old paper has too often lacked. Its clear-headed war-time policy has lately faded into a rather gloomy partisanship, wholly uninteresting to the average reader, and its style has suffered the inevitable effect of such a lapse. For all that, its history is one of courage and sacrifice on the part of its editors and its supporters, and the new management should be able to build a far greater paper on the sturdy foundation of the loyalty that has kept the Call alive.

Whether such a paper can be a financial success remains a question. The only English-language labor paper in the United States with a clear balance-sheet is Victor Berger's Milwaukee Leader. The Butte Bulletin and the Oklahoma Leader have become weeklies; the Seattle Union-Record and the Minnesota Star struggle with deficits. Chicago and Boston have almost forgotten that they ever had labor dailies. Even in England the Daily Herald is in one of its periodic crises, from which it will emerge only if the Trade Union Congress comes to its rescue. Can the new Call do better? Time alone will tell. But if labor can manage its own banks, why not its own newspapers?

The Greatest Jewish City in the World

By KONRAD BERCOVICI

THERE is an old European saying that every country deserves the kind of Jews it has.

If so, New York does not know what it deserves, for it has every kind—gangsters, social workers, philanthropists, corrupt politicians, patriotic capitalists, preaching socialists, anarchists, bigots, atheists, ignorant illiterates, highly educated men. Every kind of Jew, from the lowest strata of humanity to the peak of culture, is represented here—a complete nation. The only way to purify water is to sterilize it. The only way to purify a nation is to kill it. You can kill a Jew but you can't kill the Jews. Spain has learned that. Russia has had her lesson. Poland has tried to solve her Jewish problem in a river. Hungary has imitated Poland. Rumania has tried to imitate them. Germany is doing it now. But it all comes down to one and the same thing. You can kill a Jew, ten, a hundred, a thousand, but you can't kill the Jews. They cannot even be absorbed. No sooner has the inevitable process of absorption begun in a country after two generations of tolerance have put their national or racial consciousness to sleep, than an anti-Semitic outbreak in that country or in another awakens the consciousness in the Jews and the reluctance to absorb them in the non-Jews. And the would-be alloy separates like non-mixable chemical matter, a little tarnished but not welded.

During my long residence in New York I have observed the following changes in one man: He arrived a bearded talmudical scholar in 1910. Rabbi Glockman was then less than thirty years old. He had a wife and four children, two sons and two daughters. The oldest was twelve years old, which meant that the father had married at eighteen. A year later Rabbi Glockman was still teaching Hebrew in a little after-school "Cheder" where the Jewish children were sent by their parents so as not to forget they were Jews. The school was on Division Street, way down on the East Side. Two years later, with the beard a little trimmed, Mr. Glockman owned a "Kosher" delicatessen store, on Second Avenue near Tenth Street. The place closed on Friday evening and remained closed till Saturday after prayers. Mr. Glockman was the president of a congregation. Four years later Mr. Glockman was partner in a shirt-waist factory where they worked on the Sabbath. The beard was completely gone. They lived in the Bronx. Six years later Mr. Glockman smoked on the Sabbath, ate "unclean" food, and was denounced in a strike as the worst exploiter. He employed only Italian labor and had changed his name to Bell, George Bell, and had moved from the Bronx to Morristown; because there were no Jews there. Eight years later his daughter had married a Gentile. But then the railroad strike broke out. The great Morristown plan, by which the wealthiest commuters manned the trains, entered into vogue. Mr. Bell came to the station every morning with his overalls under his arms ready to take his place as a scab—to help the country. But Mr. T. and Mr. D. and Mr. F. who were at the head would not have the Jew with them in the cab. He had to ride as a passenger. They would not even give him the privilege of acting as conductor. Today Mr. Bell is again Solome Glockman. He lives in Harlem, in the heart of the Jewish district. Is a member of the congregation and a fanatical Zionist. Even the beard was allowed to grow back, a little trimmed, to its full length. Until the daughter divorced her husband and married a Jew she was not allowed to cross her parents' door.

An exception? No. It is typical.

When the first Jews came to live in New York, then New Amsterdam, in 1630 or thereabouts, Peter Stuyvesant was governor. They were known as Portuguese Jews. In reality they were Spanish Jews, escaped from Spanish persecution, who had acquired Portuguese citizenship in Brazil, then ruled by Portugal. Peter Stuyvesant unscrewed his wooden leg and beating the governmental desk with it asked their extermination. They were unworthy to tread the earth, he argued. He hated Jews. But that Mayflower Jewry dealt in gorgeous silks and beautiful jewelry which they received from compatriots the world over, and they had many supporters. There are several cemeteries full of these Jews in New York. One is a small triangle lot on the southeastern corner of Eleventh Street and Sixth Avenue. Another one is on the Bowery below Canal Street. There are washlines strung between the red-brick houses on both sides of this cemetery. The houses are inhabited by Greeks and Italians. At night the shadows of the fluttering white bed sheets give a ghastly animation to the weather-beaten crookedly-leaning grey tombstones. There is another cemetery in a back yard of a Jewish theater on Second Avenue.

If Peter Stuyvesant could only see what has happened! On his Bouwerie, his farm, close to the church his widow had erected to his memory, from one end to the other of his estate: Jews, nothing but Jews—synagogues and theaters—temples, Jewish institutions. His district sends Jewish representatives to the Assembly, to Congress, makes Jewish judges, and on the square, within earshot of his grave in the wall of the church, Jewish boys and women talk politics and religion and make love. And were it not for Jews who come to hear lectures on music and poetry his church would be empty on Sundays and holidays.

There are more Jews in New York than in Palestine, more than Palestine can ever hope to have. (For that matter there are more Italians in New York than in Rome, and more Greeks than in Athens.) Down on Allen Street, under the elevated railway, where the sun never penetrates, where the night is only a little darker than the day, live the Syrian and Moroccan Jews. You may see them on the street in civilized garb, but in their stores and houses, hammering out brass for lanterns and working at curiously patterned jewelry as they sit on their heels, Turkish fashion, they wear their own garments—the wide, large, folded pantaloons that come down to a narrow cuff at the ankles of the bare feet in red slippers. They wear long beards covering their chests. They wear heavy brocaded burnouses and on their heads rest small cone-like brown fezes. And their heavy, dark-eyed, olive-skinned women wear tasseled skirts, and white shawls over their black hair. Those who have arrived but recently still wear the yellow patch, the Jew sign of the Moroccan Ghetto. Try to speak Yiddish to them! Not a word do they understand. They speak Hebrew and Spanish—the old Castilian, to be exact. For they too are descendants of the Spanish Jews. Their ancestors fled Spain centuries ago but they took the language with them; the language which Ibn Ezra, Ibn Gabirol, and Ben Halevy, the three great Jewish poetic stars of the Middle Ages, have immortalized in their beautiful verses. Today if a Spanish scholar desires to study the Castilian tongue he has to come to New York to study it from the Jews. They have their own synagogue, their own congregation, and even their own paper, printed in Spanish. They stand aside from the other Jews. They consider themselves superior; for their ancestors have been tortured on the rack in Spain. The early comers of the same race of Jews have enriched themselves, become multi-millionaires, in the tobacco and cigarette business, in the traffic in lace, jewelry, and silks. Only a great calamity, like the late war or the pogroms in Russia, awakens in them Jewish consciousness.

Below Allen Street, on Division Street, is Jewish Newspaper Row. There have long been four large Jewish daily papers. A fifth one under the editorship of L. E. Miller, the father of Jewish journalism in America, has just been revived. There are several weeklies—a reactionary one and one of anarchistic tendencies. The combined circulation of these papers is over a million a day. Probably half of that is subscribed by out-of-town readers. There are several periodicals in the old Hebrew of the prophets. On East Broadway and on Grand Street, back of the pushcarts, lit by smoking acetylene torches at night, behind rickety toys and second-hand new clothes, are several publishing-houses. They publish books written in Yiddish—modern books on philosophy and sociology, translations of Nietzsche, Bergson, Freud, James, Marx, Tolstoi, Balzac, Dostoievski, and Jack London; also new editions of the Talmud with its commentaries, and treatises on the Cabala.

Every other day there arises a new great poet or prosateur on the East Side. One day it was Moritz Rosenfeld. His fame spread to the outer world, thanks to the interest of a Columbia professor of literature. His poems were translated into all the languages and praised in all of them. You can read about him that he was a tailor. A miracle had come to pass; a tailor became a great poet. What they forgot to say was that a great Hebrew scholar had become a tailor in America. Leon Dolitzky's fame rose. A six-foot-two giant, he was a legendary figure in Jewish life before he was twenty. You can still meet him at the Division Street cafe, as straight as an arrow at seventy. And if he likes you well enough he will read you his latest love poem. Then came Abraham Raisin, that sweetest of all singers. Sholom Asch, unsuccessful with three books translated into English, suddenly attracted attention with his play, "The God of Vengeance." And Pinski, Cahan, Moishe Nadir, Libin, Jehoash, Peretz Hirshbein, in whose plays Ben Ami starred, and a host of others too numerous to mention. The best of Jewish talent and intelligence crowds on an afternoon in the Division Street cafe and at the Royal on Second Avenue at night—painters, sculptors, musicians, poets, actors.

There are a dozen Jewish theaters in Greater New York with some three hundred plays in their repertoire. This repertoire includes Ibsen, Tolstoi, Andreiev, Pshibishevski, Sudermann, Schnitzler, Shaw, Shakespeare, and also includes such trash as one is ashamed to stumble upon. The Yiddish Broadway, Second Avenue, is an exact duplicate of the real Broadway. Actors and managers the world over are of the same ilk. The acting fraternity is a race apart. Language is but a superficial distinction. But the Jewish acting profession in New York has given to the American stage some of its best—the Schildkrauts, father and son, Ben Ami, the Adlers, the Larrimores, Warfield, and a host of others. They may play on the English stage but when at leisure they come down to the East Side to meet friends. For it is the peculiarity of the Jew to return to his erstwhile haunts when successful. He returns there in cutaway and silk hat, bediamonded and with a condescending air. But he returns.

There is a cafe on Second Avenue where gather the parents and relatives of the celebrities. They are pointed out to strangers as the father of Elman, the brother of Levitzky, the sister of Alma Gluck, etc. One evening after a long absence Mischa Elman's father, a scholarly gentleman who would have won his spurs as a writer if his son had not become a great virtuoso, explained that he had visited nightly another coffee-house, frequented by talmudic scholars, where he was not known. Four weeks his happiness lasted. He gathered laurels of his own. Then some one who knew him came in, and the happiness was gone. It was his fate to be known only as Mischa's father.

When Mme. Gluck's sister discourses on music no one dares say a word. But the father of the son who had just graduated from the talmudic school on East Broadway is just as proud of his offspring as the father of the great lawyer or virtuoso or millionaire. It's the coffee-house of fathers and relatives.

Slowly the Jews have been pushed northward by the Italians, who have invaded their territory after being dislodged from theirs by the Syrians. Signs in Hebrew letters on the windows have been scratched out and Italian words painted there instead. You can still see the traces of the old signs. Many a synagogue became a Chiesa Cattolica. And in the move upward many a church was transformed into a synagogue. The Jews and Italians are always close neighbors in New York—heartily disliking one another, nevertheless. Two things make them so neighborly. The pushcarts first—the old oriental bazaar, with merchandise on the street, where one bargains for every article, where the buyer and the seller try to outwit one another, appeals to both peoples strongly. The pushcart trade exists only in Jewish and Italian settlements. Musical instruments side by side with onions, apples, garlic, praying shawls, phylacteries, holy images; a trick picture of Moses and Washington in one, and of the holy Virgin and Garibaldi next to it; plaster casts, cut glass, jewelry, furs, pistols, knives, fishing tackle, oysters, clams—the bazaar. Crowds. Noises. Quarrels. The Jew trying to speak Italian; the Italian offering his wares in a broken Yiddish. Curses in both languages. The children play. A hand organ with a chained black bird that "pulls out your luck" from the stack of yellow cards near its beak; a monkey climbing up the window to collect a penny; a phonograph hoarsely bellowing out the latest of Cantor Rosenblatt or Caruso. And from an open window in Hester Street come the strains of a perfectly played Beethoven Sonata. It's Hershman, the pushcart peddler's daughter, playing. He calls out "Apples, apples," and listens to her playing. On Mulberry Street the son of the tailor is getting ready for grand opera. On Delancey Street my barber used to leave me in the chair half shaved to go to the back of the store and remonstrate with his son for not practicing faithfully. That son was Max Rosen, the celebrated violinist. Once I had a sign painted by a youngster who is now a famous painter. The pushcart, the bazaar, is the bond between the Italians and the Jews. I mean one of the bonds; the second is: Italians like fresh-killed meat and they can get it in Jewish butcher stores.

Crowded northward, the Jews discovered the wilds of the Bronx. The doctors advised them to go and live there when they had a "touch of consumption." It was "the country." What they did with these wilds is history. They destroyed beautiful forest estates and built ugly tenement houses, created a new Hester Street where there was a park. But they also created a town where there were only rocks and marshes. Theaters, synagogues, institutions, hospitals, factories, gambling houses, other houses. There is now a generation of Bronx Jews, quite distinct from the East Side Jew. It's the second generation Jew, with all the outward characteristics minus beard and mustache, playing baseball, great fight fans, commercial travelers, clean-shirted, white-collared, derby-hatted, crease-trousered. The women are stylish and stout, white-skinned, long-nosed, bediamonded; social workers, actresses, stump speakers, jazz dancers, with none of the color and the virtues of their erstwhile bearded, bewigged parents, and a few vices of their own acquisition. But they bathe frequently.

A third generation is now being housed on Riverside Drive. The Bronx having become "too Jewish" for them, they went to the "Drive." And as the Drive then still harbored the feeling voiced by many a to-let sign in Harlem and some parts above Gramercy Park, "No Jews," they did what they had done to Lakewood, New Jersey. Many years ago, Nathan Straus went to a Lakewood Hotel to pass a few weeks at that rather exclusive winter resort. The manager told him, "No Jews here." So he built a hotel next to it for Jews only. The result was that in a few years hundreds of little and big "kosher" hotels swamped the place. What happened to the "No Jew" place is history. The natives have not yet regretted the change. Last Christmas there was a Jewish flag on top of the community's Christmas tree on Main Street. Yes. It's what has happened to the Drive; they built tenement houses. It's no longer Riverside Drive; it's Jewish Drive. In another few years the Drive generation, a very much Americanized one, Glockmans in the last stage of "Bells," will leave the Drive to go elsewhere—because the Drive is too Jewish. Already many prefer to refer to their residences as Morningside. The East Side and part of the Bronx go to synagogues where the prayers are made in Hebrew. Harlem goes to Reform Synagogues where they have women in the choirs and organ music. The Drive goes to temples where the beardless Rabbis are doctors from American theological seminaries.

Yet so far the only cultural values have come from the East Side. The men and women contributing to American thought, American letters, American revolt, American art, American music, have come from the East Side—immigrants pregnant yet with their idealism, and the first generation.

I don't mean to say one has to elbow his way through swarming geniuses on the dirty East Side streets. On an evening, at the close of the factories and sweatshops, west of Third Avenue from Canal Street to Thirty-second Street, when the thousands and thousands are let loose from the chains of the needle-factory wheels, it looks as if it was the mission of Israel in America to trouser, coat and gown the rest of the population of this continent. Yet if it were not for the Jews the Metropolitan Opera House would only have its tier boxes and the upper gallery filled. The boxes by the gentry and the gallery by the Italians on Italian nights. Go to Carnegie Hall or to Aeolian Hall at a worthwhile concert and perhaps you will change your opinion about Jews caring for nothing but dollars. You will see many a boy and girl who, you will think, could have used dollars in a more practical way.

As a matter of fact one does not exclude the other. Has not Jehuda Ben Halevy been a very practical man, and a great poet? Moses Mendelssohn, Moishe Dessauer, had been a banker, a bookkeeper, and a philosopher, whose book "Immortality of the Soul" will live longer than the glory of his son Felix. And many a great poet of today combines business ability with art.

Another fallacy is the great feeling of unity among all the Jews. As a matter of fact the Jews, the immigrants especially, live in national groups—the Rumanian Jews in one district, the Russians in another, the Polish and Galician elsewhere, and so on. The German Jews put a great distance between themselves and the others. One dislikes the other's peculiarities and all dislike the German Jews, especially because they rule the institutions, orphanages, hospitals, charity dispensaries, and the Educational Alliance, and because they treat the others with condescension. Before we entered the European war each Jew took sides with the country he migrated from. The German Jew could not forgive the Russian Jew for his successful invasion of the needle and real-estate trade. Now they frown on them because of their political activities. The argument is that they spoil the "good name" of the Jews by being Socialists and Bolshevists. In politics the German Jew has always sided with the stronger one.

How clannish the different Jewish nationalities are can be illustrated by the fact that only one Rumanian Jew is employed in all of the Yiddish newspapers. They are all in the hands of Russian Jews, with here and there a Polish or a Galician thrown in.

A million and a half of Jews from the world over in one city! Glockmans at different stages; tadpoles becoming frogs—and vice versa. In all walks of life, wedded to the country for good or worse, molding and being molded, shedding their colors (which do not always fall on barren soil), sing-songing the tongue they have acquired in the manner of the one they have forgotten, trying hard to fit old traditions in a new life—fathers looking upon sons as strangers, only half understanding them, never agreeing, desiring their children to Americanize, yet fearing the new will never be worth the old, subconsciously hoping that a wave of anti-Semitism will rescue the race from assimilation.

Contributors to This Issue

KONRAD BERCOVICI, a Rumanian by origin, is the author of a book of short stories, "Dust of New York," "Ghitza and Other Romances," and recently of a novel, "Murdo."

HENRI BARBUSSE first became generally known in America through his story of the war, "Le Feu." The Nation printed a debate between him and Romain Rolland on February 8, 1922, entitled The Tower of Ivory.

BERTHA WALLERSTEIN has been an organizer for the Amalgamated Clothing Workers. She contributed The Working-Woman's Idea to The Nation of May 30, last.

The Woman

By HENRI BARBUSSE

DAYLIGHT, when it entered the low, black hovel was changed into the dusk of evening, and nothing but projecting angles was ever visible in the room. The floor of mud and stones might have been a piece of poor roadway.

The dying woman raised herself up on her pallet. A broken shaft of light coming through the bars of the window, set in the slant of the roof, fell upon her thin figure.

"When I am dead," she said to her daughter Mary, "go find your brother. He has been working in the mines ever since your father and I parted. You will both be orphans, so stay together. You should. It's the right thing to do, and it's natural for brother and sister to live with each other. You'll recognize him. If you don't, you'll know him by his name. You'll be a help to him. And he'll be a help to you, too. He's not a bad one, you know."

This was all the dying woman could say. During the night her lips closed forever.

After the funeral Mary, who wore a gray dress and had removed the flower from her hat in sign of mourning, took the train, got off at the station for the mines, and walked across the blackened countryside to find her brother John.

Blacker and blacker grew the roads, the nearer the coal-mines. A vast storm-cloud seemed to have spread over the neighborhood and faded off on the earth.

Mary took a room in one of the hotels on the main street, where the houses had turned the color of a smokened lamp-chimney from the drifts of grit and coal-dust. In the evening she went to the exit of the pits and stood among the housewives who were waiting for the men to come out.

The shriek of the sirens stunned her. Then she was jostled by the mass of workers—that dull, livid mass of men, who emerged from the opening and moved off in the same direction, like a funeral cortège.

Though she and her brother had not seen each other since he was fifteen, she recognized him. Yes, that was John, with his small, pale face—too small, too pale—and his big body—his too-big body. His manner was different from the others; he seemed to be worn out and lonely—profoundly lonely.

Good heavens!

Mary saw John's companions push him and titter. They were making fun of him.

He struggled, broke away, and fled.

She followed him.

He entered a lodging-house. But first he lifted his head and looked at the house, as if to make sure of it; which is a way shy people have. Soon he came out and went to the inn for dinner. Here he hesitated a moment on the threshold as though frightened by the clatter inside. Then he walked mechanically over to the remotest corner, where he tucked himself as far out of sight as possible.

No woman, no sweetheart then?

Odd.

Well, one thing was certain: she, Mary, could sit down near him without making a nuisance of herself. That was fine! But the ease with which matters had been proceeding since her risky coming to the mines made her heart contract.

She entered the restaurant and seated herself opposite her brother two tables away wedged in between gabbling diners.

He looked bored and sad, though he couldn't have known of his mother's death. An unshaded gas-jet threw black lines and white splotches on his bony face.

Ah, a good-looking fellow!

Some would-be comedians stopped in front of John and asked him joking questions. Among them was an airy, beribboned hussy with the light of wine in her eyes. John stammered something and stuck his nose in his plate. His ridiculers left, but the women at the tables all around burst out laughing.

Oh, the brother Mary had found was a butt for ridicule, a thing to be flouted. Nobody wanted him. It was to get away from people as much as possible that he came rushing home from work and ate as though driven to bay in the remotest corner of the inn.

Tears came to Mary's eyes. How sorry she was for him! Well, now she had come. She would sweeten his life. She would be his family. She and he would take rooms together and his mantel would be brightened by flowers.

Before slipping from her place, where she was almost being crushed between her mobile neighbors, she gave him a long look. He happened to raise his head, caught the look, and stared at her.

She smiled at him.

A woman smiled at him! He gaped and sat in arrested movement.

Mary blushed. Of course he couldn't recognize her. So he must imagine that. . . . Instinctively, she lowered her eyes. But instinctively she raised them again. He kept looking at her with wide-open eyes. In the pallor of his face his eyes shone like tears. And his face wore a look of surprise so poignant that Mary trembled all over and—smiled again.

The scene had not escaped the noisy crowd of diners seated at the other tables—John Cadiot and the pretty stranger were exchanging glances! The workmen nudged each other and watched the by-play in amazement.

"What do you know about that?" they murmured.

Mary was abashed. She sat still and finished her dinner, without risking another glance in John's direction, though she felt that he was looking at her steadily. And so were the others.

After coffee was served, half the people went out.

Mary got up and started toward her brother. He, seeing she really meant to come to him, rose to his feet and said, so as to clear up her mistake and forestall misunderstanding:

"I am John Cadiot."

She opened her mouth to say: "Yes and I'm Mary, you know—Mary?" But he was looking at her fresh mouth with a sort of hope so extraordinary that, unconsciously, she said nothing, but merely smiled again and remained standing there.

John finally decided to murmur:

"Shall we leave this place?"

They quietly and awkwardly made their way out.

At their passage complete silence fell among the people in the workmen's restaurant. The moment they were out of doors John touched her, then took her arm. She let him do it. Why did she not promptly dispel this painful, this grievous mistake? Why?

She only said:

"You live all by yourself?"

"Of course," he replied.

Then he made an effort and stammered:

"Why do you ask? It's so strange for anyone to care about me. I'm not rich, you know? Everybody thinks it funny."

He pointed with his thumb.

Glued to the windows of the cabarets lining the street were dark spying faces.

"You haven't any friends?"

"Is any one likely to care for me? I understand why—that is I mean—"

It was hard for him to talk of such things, as if he weren't used to the phraseology.

Mary still withheld the revelation, and said in a low voice:

"You seem to be very nice. There are lots of women who would be happy with you."

"No one has ever told me so," muttered the young man.

"I am saying so, you see."

"You—you!"

John threw his long arms around Mary's shoulders and drew her to him to kiss her. His lips brushed the young girl's cheeks. She pushed him away.

"No, no!"

His arms fell to his side. He stood like a staid slave.

"Listen," Mary said, "you mustn't fall in love with me. I should be very unhappy if you did. I am not free. I'm not, really. If you only knew! And I'm going away from here. But other women beside me will find you very different from the rest of the men."

"Ah!" he said, "in what way, in what way?"

He planted himself in front of her, in ecstasy.

"They'll love me, me? Really? Tell me, would you love me if you were free?"

"Yes," she said. "Good-by. Yes" . . .

She disappeared.

He stood there, straight, pale, lighted like a candle. His eyes, his face, his whole being shone with the magnificent reflection of the woman.

Thenceforth he would be adorned as with an incalculable treasure, as with a talisman which would give him courage and the strength to meet life and happiness.

Mary had slipped through the corridor of her hotel and buried herself in the little room which she had hired for the day. In the morning she would go far, far away. She must never see her brother again. For his sake she had preferred to be, not a real sister, but the phantom of a real woman. And she wept tears of mingled joy and sadness.

The New Emancipation of the Negro

By BERTHA WALLERSTEIN

TIME was when the Negro question in the United States was purely a matter of justice and humanity. Yet that plea has done little for the Negro. Even the Great Emancipator freed the slaves as a war measure—not out of abstract justice, however keenly he himself may have felt its force. History is repeating itself. In 1923, as in 1863, there is hope of a second emancipation of the black race, not because the white race has suddenly become converted to the doctrines set forth in the Sermon on the Mount or the Declaration of Independence, but because it is again a matter of expediency. For the Negro question is now an industrial question. It concerns the white man just as much as the black. The colored people are entering industry. They are leaving the agricultural South for the industrial North. The process was described by W. E. B. DuBois in The Nation of May 9, 1923. From 1910 to 1920 the Negro population of New York doubled. That of Chicago, Cincinnati, Detroit, and Pittsburgh more than doubled. Employment bureaus report that thousands of Negroes have been placed in industry in Cleveland, St. Louis, Chicago, and the steel towns of Ohio. Needle trades unions report an enormous increase in Negro workers in their trades since the beginning of the war. The Department of Labor states that Negroes are being drawn North into the iron and steel, meat-packing, glass, food, and transportation industries. Its study of 273 manufacturing firms employing Negro labor shows an increase of 42.6 per cent in the number of Negroes on the payrolls in a single year (April, 1922, to April, 1923). The increase is greatest in the North, yet it is considerable even in border States like Kentucky and Maryland. More than one-third of the Negroes in Ohio plants studied, and more than one-fifth in the Pennsylvania plants, had come North during the previous year. As these are the great steel States, we may conclude that Mr. Gary has found in Negro labor a substitute for the immigrant labor whose lack he deplores.

When a new group of workers enters industry in large numbers, it is up to employers on the one hand and to organized labor on the other, to win the loyalty of the new workers. Is colored labor going to swell the ranks of union membership and increase union strength? Or is it going to help open-shop employers to defeat organized labor? If the white workers are to enlist the new body of Negro workers, there must be no more prejudice and discrimination. White workers must see their common interest with black, and must make it their business to convince the latter of that common interest. In this way equality for the Negro is a necessary war measure for white labor.

On the other hand, if the employer is to win over the Negro worker, his problem is far simpler. He has only to treat him with the courtesy and consideration of one human being for another. The Negro immigrant from the South, accustomed to make way on the street for the white man, to ride in Jim Crow cars, and to suffer a thousand other daily reminders of inferiority, is easily flattered by an appearance of equality. It has worked with white labor: it will work even better with the Negro. It is probable that nothing has done so much to prevent organization of American labor as the democratic doctrine that the worker is just as good as the boss—that he has the same chance to climb to the top. If this is true of the white workers, how much is it truer of the colored workers, to whom equality with any white man is a new sensation. How much easier to win the Negro's loyalty by giving him an equal chance in industry, by organizing a little welfare work for him, by convincing him that his boss is his friend.

The colored worker often finds that his boss is the first white man who has ever treated him as an equal. He is loyal to his employer. In a recent strike in a plant employing colored and white workers, the colored workers elected a committee to inform the employer that they would stand by him because he had been so square to them, and that they could give him useful information about applicants for the strikers' jobs, telling which of them were likely to "make trouble," and which were loyal workers. Yes, it pays the employer to be "square" to the colored worker.

Just now it is especially to the interest of both sides to give the Negro worker equality. For we are on the crest of an industrial boom. Labor is in demand. Organized labor has an excellent chance to make favorable agreements, and to win new members to its ranks. The union is in a position to convince the timid worker that it can do something to further his interest. And the worker need not fear to lose his job by joining the union. At the same time, employers are trying to maintain the open shop in spite of their need of labor. They are clamoring for a revision of the immigration laws, that they may have a large supply of unorganized labor. The Negro migration into Northern industries promises to supply their needs. In many industries it has already done so. The steel industry, for instance, which has wailed the loudest about labor shortage, is absorbing a larger supply of Negro labor than any other.

The Negro worker is the strategic trench in the struggle between employer and worker. Which will capture him? It seems safe to predict that it will be the one which first sheds prejudice and discrimination. This fact is perhaps more obvious to the employer than to the unions. But even though he realizes his need and sends agents to the South, to represent to dissatisfied Negro farmers the advantages of working in Northern mills and factories, he has not entirely abolished industrial discrimination. The Negro has not been employed on skilled work in large numbers, except in the foundries. But in that industry, as elsewhere, he has proved his ability to do the skilled job as well as a white man. One of the first shipyard gangs during the war to win a prize for rapid work at pile driving was a colored gang. In general, the opinion of employers is that colored workers have made good and there is every reason to expect that in time they will have an equal chance with white men to do skilled work.

Discrimination in wages is hard to determine. Negro leaders and Negro organizations hold that members of their race get lower wages than white workers for the same work. The most extensive study of Negroes in industry, made by the Department of Labor, indicates that wages of white and colored workers vary more or less equally, if all industries are averaged. On the other hand, studies of colored women workers show that they are earning less than white women, although it is hard to say how far this is due to a lower grade of skill and speed on the part of the colored women.

It is much easier to determine how far the unions give an equal chance to colored workers in their respective trades. Certainly there is a great deal of discrimination. The ordinary union worker has not learned that he must win the colored man, if only to safeguard his own union and his own pay envelope. It is reported that in 1919 two thousand white workers in Richmond, Virginia, withdrew from the State Federation of Labor because its convention seated a Negro delegate. But besides the general prejudice, the white worker has a special conviction that colored men are strike-breakers. Negroes helped to break the steel strike of 1919-1920—due perhaps to a failure on the part of the organized workers to win them over. They broke the Chicago stockyard strike of 1904. They were accused of breaking that of 1919, and the belief that they did so led to race riots, but the charge was probably unjust, for there were many Negro strikers and union members. They "scabbed" on the workers of East St. Louis in 1917, and the result was a horrible race riot. But there have also been instances when Negroes have fought side by side with white men. They have even come out in support of white strikers when the union excluded Negroes. It is certainly unfair to label colored workers, as a class, as strike-breakers. As the Messenger, a Negro journal, puts it: "White workers cannot lynch Negro workers, debar them from joining their unions, and expect them to show the spirit of cooperation when white workers are sore pressed by the brutal hand of capital."

Labor is waking up to the fact that, when the Negro is a strike-breaker, it is usually the white man's fault. The issue came up at the 1919 convention of the American Federation of Labor, and was met with a resolution to give full and equal membership rights to colored workers. There was only one vote against the resolution, cast by the Railway Postal Clerks.

But the Negroes have learned how little avail mere resolutions. Each international union of the American Federation of Labor has complete self-government, and the Federation itself can impose no restriction upon individual unions in regard to membership or regulations. A number of unions still exclude Negroes, and a dozen A. F. of L. resolutions will not change their policy. But the Federation may issue a separate charter to colored workers who are excluded by the white union, with the consent of that union. There are 488 colored locals in the A. F. of L. under separate charters. On the other hand, there have been cases where the white union has refused to allow the Federation to issue a separate charter, and has then turned round and blamed Negro workers, excluded from the union, for undercutting union rates! A number of powerful international unions have nothing in their constitutions to exclude colored workers, but nevertheless do so as a matter of unwritten law. Still others leave it to the jurisdiction of the locals, which often means that they are admitted in the North, but excluded in the South. The Brotherhood of Railway Carmen admits colored members to separate locals under the jurisdiction of the nearest white local, but they must be represented at conventions by white men.

There are numerous unions in the American Federation of Labor which admit colored workers on absolutely equal terms, and which make a special effort to organize them. These include some of the largest and most powerful unions. The United Mine Workers has thousands of colored members. The International Longshoremen's Association counted eighty colored delegates at its 1921 convention. The International Ladies Garment Workers Union has been successful in organizing colored women, and sometimes a colored girl is shop chairman in this union in a shop where whites are in the majority. The New York Waist and Dress Makers first encountered the colored problem in the big 1919 strike, when the strikers' places were filled by Negro girls. Instead of denouncing them as "scabs" and letting it end there, the union went to work to organize them, until nearly all came out with the white workers and helped to win the strike and share the fruits of victory. They have been faithful members ever since.

Outside the Federation of Labor as within, the policy varies among the different unions. The four Railroad Brotherhoods exclude Negroes openly. On the other hand, both the Amalgamated Clothing Workers and the Industrial Workers of the World have made an effort to organize them.

I recently wrote to various unions asking them about their Negro policy, and whether they found Negroes difficult to organize. Sixteen replies to the second question were from unions in trades which have an appreciable number of Negro workers and in which Negroes are admitted to the union. Of these, nine found Negroes quite as responsive to unionism as white workers, including the International Ladies Garment Workers and the United Mine Workers. Both of these industries have large numbers of Negro workers. Of the remaining seven, only two state without qualification that the Negro is difficult to organize. The other five give reasons for the situation. Some say that the Negro is employed for the most part in unskilled trades. Others say that he is difficult to organize but makes a good member once he has joined. One blames the difficulty on the prejudice of the white workers. The reply of the Molders' Union is especially interesting because the foundries are among the industries most affected by the northward migration of Negroes, and this is the only industry in which they are employed to a great extent on skilled jobs. Apparently the molders have found Southern Negroes difficult to organize, and have met the same problem in the North in recent years when Southern Negroes have been flocking to Northern foundries. The union reports that the Negroes are good members in thoroughly organized foundries, but drop out quickly in the "open shops." Another difficulty is the lack of Negro leadership—other unions, too, have complained of this—but the molders believe time will cure that difficulty, "for many of them possess the necessary intelligence, and the shortcomings which I have mentioned are probably due to lack of experience more than to anything else."

Generally speaking, the difficulty of organizing Negroes appears to be temporary. With the gradual disappearance of race prejudice and the further education of the Negro through equal opportunities with white men, these difficulties ought to disappear. Unions may expect to suffer from Negro "scabbing" and undercutting just so long as they maintain prejudice and discrimination. And this means prejudice and discrimination of the individual workers in their everyday contact with Negroes just as much as exclusion in union policy. A mere negative equality, a mere razing of the barriers of exclusion, will not do the work. There must be a definite bond, woven of the strands of the common interests of black and white workers. "Our International Union realizes," writes one union secretary, "that if men of different color can work together in the shop, and be jointly exploited by the employer, they also ought to have sense enough to jointly act together in resisting these attempts of exploitation on the part of the employer." This is the spirit of the second emancipation proclamation for the Negro, which the rank and file of white workers must issue as a war measure in their struggle to maintain wages and the power of their unions.

London's Dockland

By AN ONLOOKER

Since this was written the strikers have returned to work at the lower wages which caused their protest.

THE other day I took one of our leading women artists to see a corner of old London that I thought would interest her. We stood at the entrance to a lane flanked on either side by huge walls of dull brick sixty feet high and looked up at the immense windowless warehouses rising behind and above the walls. "It is like the gateway into some part of Dante's Inferno," she said after a pause.

There is something peculiarly sinister in these monster buildings, something terribly impersonal, something typical of our hard industrial age. It would not surprise me to see written over the gates that give admission to the docks within "Abandon hope all you that enter here."

Nor is the interest lessened by the fact that, close at hand, stands that huddle of fortress, barrack, and prison, with their inclosing moat and unclimbable granite wall, known as the Tower of London. Here princes have languished and died, and many a noble heart has pined away. The grimness of the Middle Ages here faces the grimness of the twentieth century.

This is the battleground of the conflict now going on between the Port of London Authority and the dockers. On the one hand the men are said to have broken the agreement binding them to accept reductions in wages in accordance with the fall in the cost of living. On the other hand, the men assert that no such fall has taken place and that further reduction means starvation.

Tower Hill has been a battleground for such conflicts for many a year. An old man with snow white goatee and wrinkled face—a typical waterman whose father and father's father had been Thames watermen before him—told me of the strike of 1885, his bed-ridden wife nodding approval. In that strike he was obliged to sell most of his furniture to buy food. "We've never been the same since," he says, "we've never picked up." Those were the times when processions of starving men marched through London and were batoned into silence in Trafalgar Square, John Burns and others being imprisoned for disorderly conduct. It was then, I think, that labor questions first took hold of the imagination of the middle class and the complacency of the Victorian age was first seriously challenged by the workers. It will be remembered that it was at that time that Cardinal Manning earned the undying gratitude of the dockers by offering to arbitrate and succeeding in securing a substantial rise for the men.

Of more recent date—1912 to be exact—was the fight against Lord Devonport, chairman of the Port of London Authority, when the dockers, under Ben Tillett, fought with a determination and ferocity I have never seen equaled. There was something epic in that terrible struggle. Passion, on the men's side, reached murderous limits. I remember hearing Ben Tillett, the eagle-faced man with a voice vibrant with lava-like feeling, speak from the wall overlooking Tower Hill. "May God Almighty strike Lord Devonport dead! Amen!" A thousand dockers echoed that Amen. But Lord Devonport lives to carry on the fight, and Ben, today, is supporting him.

The work of the London docker is not only badly paid; from the nature of the case it is casual labor. Formerly one could watch in early morning long queues of men waiting to be picked at the dock gates. The sight was one of the most pathetic I have seen as the rejected turned away. Today that feature of the industrial struggle is minimized. The men have been placed in different categories. A section are permanently employed. Then comes a second class which may look for work somewhat less frequently. Last of all are the casuals who, though in possession of the ticket enabling them to accept employment, are only employed when there is an abundance of work.

The men are standing about today in groups, hands in pockets, resolute, grim like the buildings they work amongst. "They seems to think we can get fat by looking at other people's food," said one—these men handle thousands of tons of foodstuffs from overseas—"but they're mistaken. We've got our backs to the wall this time, for it's victory or starvation." A large number of these workers are ex-service men, as you realize when you see them march in procession, and they know what hardship is. "We fought for the —— Empire," said one of the leaders today, "and now by —— we'll fight for ourselves." This is a soldiers' battle. The trade union officials are with the bosses this time.

On the other side there is determination too. Look at that big building, mounting up, pyramid-like—block upon block of sheer masonry—just weight and strength and firm clear outline! That is the new Port of London Authority's building, opened by Mr. Lloyd George a few days after his resignation. It dominates the scene, overlooking the little plot of grass where the headsman's block stood in former days. Well-dressed city men come and go through that marble vestibule. The men who sit in conclave there say that the dockers are breaking their agreement, ignoring their own trade union officials, holding up the shipping and food supply of London for the sake of a quibble. They are not sentimental gentlemen, these. They look at facts. They quote prices and terms of agreement. They are firm, precise, lawyer-like. They know their business. Sentimentalists do not build a pyramidal colossus like that.

The real battle lies back from the Tower and warehouses in the tenement buildings whose square outlines cut deep into the dingy London sky. It is there that the women and children swarm and chatter while the men are out in the streets. That is where the "public opinion" is fashioned which tells most with the strikers. And it is there, too, that the actualities of the struggle are felt. "I was up at five this morning," said one of these women to me, "washing clothes for the children to go to school in." She was nursing a three-weeks-old baby as she spoke. Some of these women tell the men that they are fools. These rooms with their little bits of broken furniture are dear to them, and a strike always brings the fear that they may lose them. They will make almost any sacrifice to prevent that. The bosses' great asset is the Englishman's love of his home. It is probable that in the end the men will be beaten and will go back to work at the reduced terms offered by the bosses. The cries of the women and children will be their undoing.

Progress? Look at that Tower with its embattlements, the slits in its prison walls! Recall its bloody records. And then look at the dock walls guarding the treasures of London's commerce and those prison-like tenements where, these hot summer days, the children play on the hot asphalt! Progress? Yes, perhaps!

In the Driftway

THE Drifter is not one to purchase clothing in large quantities or at frequent intervals. Yet at some time or other he must have been guilty of buying a new suit, or perhaps his old one has become more conspicuous than he realized, for he has just received a tailor's announcement that for a while threatened to change the course of his life. Beginning with Shakespeare's celebrated remark about the apparel oft proclaiming the man, this little book shows by simple pictures that any child could understand just what advantages accrue to the man far-seeing enough to buy X—— Tailored Clothes. On page after page appears first the ill-dressed, shabby, sour-looking individual who is not wearing X—— Tailored Clothes, and then the unwrinkled, bland, composed creature with the perfectly fitting X—— Tailored Suit worn over his Grecian form. Bell-boys in hotels rush up to him, stenographers stop chewing their gum and hasten to take his dictation, young lady ushers in the theater light his way with a deferential torch when he comes in late—as so important a man inevitably must—and in the shoe store where he is a clerk the most beautiful and delectable customers flock to him for their size three-and-a-half dancing slippers.

* * * * *

IT is hardly necessary for the Drifter to add that the picture on the opposite page shows a sadder story. Almost with tears did he view the poor, ill-fitted young man finding his own seat, carrying his own luggage, unable to gain the waiter's attention at table, unable to convince the jury or to keep the judge from yawning while he pleads a case. And nothing in the world but X—— Tailored Clothes between him and success! At first the Drifter determined that his life-work from now on should be to go out and preach this simple doctrine of greatness. Surely here was an unprecedented chance to do some good in the world, for one who up to now had not been too conspicuous in that line. His first misgiving smote the Drifter when it occurred to him that possibly none of the unsuccessful could be saved by him in his present attire. Was it not unlikely that he could command attention wearing the same suit he had worn for the last five years, which had not been pressed for longer than he cared to remember? Was it possible that he would have to begin his campaign of education with himself? At that thought his ardor began to cool. After all, why should a stenographer stop chewing gum and listen to stupid letters beginning "Yours of the fifth inst. received, etc."? Why should ushers be allowed to poke torches in the eyes of persons who had had the courtesy to come early to the theater, for the sake of someone who had not? Why should not even a judge be allowed to yawn if he was bored?

* * * * *

AS soon as he had begun to reason in this wise the Drifter's zeal disappeared entirely. For his part he will not only never buy X—— Tailored Clothes, but he will not buy any clothes as long as his present ill-fitting, wrinkled, sagging, worn garments hold together. He does not care if beautiful young ladies on the sidewalk ignore him; if he ever became clerk in a shoe store he would not care if only wriggling little boys came to be fitted for shoes. A man must show some spirit in these matters. From now on, with such reservations as his age and sex demand, his motto will be that of the young persons in Somerset, Pennsylvania, who, when their parents objected to the dress and decorum of the modern flapper, replied in the following immortal verse:

I can show my shoulders,
I can show my knees;
I'm a free-born American
And can wear what I please.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Letters to the Editor should ordinarily not exceed 500 words, and shorter communications are more likely to be printed. In any case the Editor reserves the right to abridge communications.

Who Would Not Take a Chance?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When I think of Coolidge I begin dimly to realize why grown-up men buy oil stock, women consult clairvoyants, and girls get married. Who would not take a chance? The Goddess of Fortune is evidently deaf, dumb, and blind, and should be made a ward of a chancery court for her latest outbreak.

San Diego, California, August 13 R. W. M.

Sinclair Lewis Also Nods

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Sinclair Lewis's story The Hack Driver in this week's Nation is very entertaining and edifying. As a member of the legal profession I especially appreciate the realistic description of the narrator's aspirations and ambitions as he was graduated from law school and the severe shock he received upon his first employment in a law office. The author shows an intimate knowledge of the workings of law offices and the psychology of lawyers and their clerks.

But it is no surprise that the Supreme Court justice, when he was only a law clerk, was so easily hoodwinked by Oliver Lutkins. The learned judge does not, even today, know that a witness is not brought into court by the service of a summons upon him. He says: "I rejoiced one day when they sent me . . . to serve a summons on one Oliver Lutkins . . . we needed him as a witness." Now, "the magnificent law firm of Hodgins, Hodgins, Berkman and Taupe" never gave our hero a summons on this occasion. His Honor ought to know that it is our practice, as lawyers, to bring a witness into court by service upon him of a subpoena and not a summons. This is elementary and any clerk that did not know it would and should be fired.

Small wonder that Mr. Lewis does not disclose this Supreme Court justice's name.

New York, August 27 ELI KRIGER

A Deportation Scandal

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Rev. R. G. Barrow is a Negro minister of the A. M. E. Church who was born in the Island of Barbados but had been resident in St. Croix (Virgin Islands) long enough to have built up a large and flourishing church. He associated himself with the labor movement which had developed under the leadership of D. Hamilton Jackson, and helped in the heroic struggle of the black working people for manhood rights and better economic conditions. His work on their behalf drew the ire of former Governor Kittelle and George Washington Williams, who, unlike his historic namesake, delights in a plurality of offices, being at the same time Government's attorney, magistrate, a member of the Board of Pardons and Parole, and holder of other offices too numerous to mention. Precisely what violation of law Mr. Barrow was guilty of has never been indicated by the naval autocrats. He was persona non grata to them, and that was sufficient.

No attempt was made on the part of officialdom to invoke the civil courts. Deportation was planned, to go into effect on September 9, last. But for some reason it was not attempted until the 14th, when Jackson, the union leader and an able lawyer, was on the high seas on his way to the United States. There was some bungling of plans, however, and on the 16th it was necessary to telegraph the Navy Department in Washington to "speed it up" by way of the Provost Marshal's Court, notwithstanding the fact that this recourse is only justified in cases of military occupation. No charges had been filed in Washington, and up to the time of Mr. Barrow's deportation there was no record of the case in the files of the Navy Department.

Just the same he was torn (without even the formality of a trial) from his wife and children and congregation and hustled aboard a ship. Seeing there was no justice to be had in the island, he eventually came to the United States, where he was followed by the kind ministrations of the naval autocrats, who sought to get him deported from the mainland also. But in the meanwhile the Virgin Islands' Congressional Council was able through legal channels to present the facts to James Davis, Secretary of Labor, who has jurisdiction over deportation cases in the United States. The Secretary decided that Mr. Barrow might remain in the United States pending further developments. Secretary Davis, as revealed by this act, represents the highest type of American official life.

This Barrow case goes far to explain why the people of the Virgin Islands are clamoring for the abolition of government by the Navy Department—a thing hitherto unheard of in American colonial practice—and the speedy substitution by Congress of a civil government in which due process of the law will be available for everyone.

CASPER HOLSTEIN,
President, Virgin Islands Congressional Council

New York, July 20

Josephus Visits Boulder

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

